

START

Microfilmed By:

NORTHEAST DOCUMENT CONSERVATION CENTER

Andover, MA 01810

OCTOBER 1993

Camera Operator: Kathy Wilder

MICROFILMED
August 1993 - April 1994

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
SCRAPBOOK MICROFILMING PROJECT

Funded in part by

THE NATIONAL ENDOWMENT FOR THE HUMANITIES

Grant No. PS-20709-93

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA MICROFILMING PROJECT

A COOPERATIVE PROJECT BETWEEN THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA ARCHIVES AND THE BOSTON PUBLIC LIBRARY
(AUGUST 1993 - APRIL 1994)

This microfilming project includes two collections of scrapbooks housed in two separate repositories. The first set of scrapbooks (80 volumes) resides within the Allen A. Brown Collection in the Music Department of the Boston Public Library (BPL). Their call number is M.125.5. The second set of scrapbooks (132 volumes) resides within the Boston Symphony Orchestra (BSO) Archives' Press Clippings collection. They have the designation Pres 56.

The BPL scrapbooks begin with the founding of the BSO in 1881 and continue, through 79 seasons, to 1960. Articles consist mainly of reviews and feature stories from Boston and New York newspapers. Occasionally, magazine articles and press releases are also included. The scrapbooks cover most aspects of the BSO.

The BSO scrapbooks run from 1889, the Orchestra's 9th season, to 1973. In addition to local reviews and features, the volumes contain articles culled from national and international publications. The scrapbooks document, in detail, all aspects of the BSO: The Symphony Orchestra (including subscription concerts, tours, and trips), the Boston Pops, the Tanglewood Festival, the Tanglewood Music Center, and Symphony Hall.

The two sets of scrapbooks have been filmed as two separate entities. Researchers wanting to look at specific seasons or subjects must examine both sets of films to ensure full coverage.

The scrapbooks do not represent the complete holdings of either location on the subject of the BSO.

Requests for positive microfilm copies of individual rolls, or of film sets, should be directed to the respective repositories.

Music Department
Boston Public Library
P. O. Box 286
Boston, MA 02117

Boston Symphony Orchestra Archives
Symphony Hall
Boston, MA 02115

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SCRAPBOOKS

1881-1882 TO 1959-1960

1881-18 to 1915-16 compiled by Allen A. Brown

1916-17 to 1937-38 compiled by Mary A. Brown

1938-39 to 1959-60 compiled by the Music Department

These scrapbooks contain reviews of concerts, articles concerning the Symphony, its players and conductors, interviews with soloists and composers, occasional letters and notes, an occasional autograph, ticket stubs, pictures of conductors, the Symphony, soloists and composers, and caricatures.

In the scrapbooks compiled by Mr. Brown, it is possible to find articles or reviews pasted on a program which does not have the same date. Mr. Brown used multiple copies of programs for his scrapbook "fillers;" the fillers have no relation to the articles pasted on them. The fillers may be partially to completely covered.

These scrapbooks do not contain the complete programs. For the complete program, the researcher must consult either the hard copies found in either the Boston Symphony Archives or the Boston Public Library's Music Department or the microfilm of programs published by KTO Microform (Millwood, New York) and dating from the 1881-82 season through the 1974-75 season.

Generally, one volume represents one Symphony season; the volume and season should therefore match. Depending upon the compiler and the clippings available, some reviews and articles may be found concerning the Promenade Concerts, Boston Pops, the Berkshire Music Festival and Tanglewood.

The Music Department of the Boston Public Library does maintain other materials concerning the Boston Symphony Orchestra in other scrapbooks and files. Please consult with the Music Librarian for these materials.

VOLUMES 11-13

1891-92 TO 1893-94

THIS REEL CONTAINS MANUSCRIPT MATERIAL.

MANUSCRIPTS MAY NOT

BE REPRODUCED

WITHOUT PERMISSION.

TECHNICAL DATA

IMAGE PLACEMENT: IA IB IIA IIB

REDUCTION RATIO: 1.2X

FILM STOCK:

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

150 mm

100 mm

A4

A5

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

PRECISIONSM RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

4.5 mm

3.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

MULTIPLE EXPOSURES DUE TO COLOR VARIATIONS
AND OVERLAPPING MATERIAL

VOLUME 11

1891-1892

THIS REEL CONTAINS MANUSCRIPT MATERIAL.

MANUSCRIPTS MAY NOT

BE REPRODUCED

WITHOUT PERMISSION.

☆☆ M 125.5
v. 11 1891-92

THE PUBLIC LIBRARY OF THE CITY OF BOSTON
THE ALLEN A. BROWN COLLECTION

FILMED AS BOUND

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON ^{11 M. 125.5}
^{vol. 11}

✻ 1891-1892 ✻

PROGRAMMES AND COMMENTS

COMPILED BY

ALLEN A. BROWN

L. S. Johnson.

7028

FILMED AS BOUND

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

BOSTON
SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON

✻ 1891-1892 ✻

PROGRAMMES AND COMMENTS
COMPILED BY
ALLEN A. BROWN

* No. 125. 5. Vol II

1881-1893

Allen O. Brown

Aug 14, 1894

128

Index

Composer	Title of work	Concert	Date	Soloists
Bach J. S.	Sarabande for cello	Extra	Mar 2.92	Alvin Schröder
Beethoven	Symphony No 3	XIII	July 23.92
	" " 4	VIII	Dec 5.91
	" " 6	IV	Oct 31.91
	" " 8	XX	Mar 26.92
	Over "Dedication of the Home"	I	Oct 10.91
	" "Lenore No. 2"	XIX	Mar 12.92
	" "Egmont"	XXII	Apr 9.92
	Menuetto & Finale 2 nd & 3 rd No 3. (strings)	II	Oct 17.91
	Concerto Piano & orch No 4. op 50	V	Nov 14.91	J. B. Busoni
	" " " " 5.	XIX	Mar 12.92	Eugen Albert
	Aria "Ah Perfido" with orch.	I	Oct 10.91	Lilian Nordica
Berlioz H.	Symphony "Harold in Italy"	XV	July 6.92
Bird, Arthur	A carnival scene for orch.	Popular	July 6.92
Borodini A.	"Eine Steppenskizze"	XVII	July 27.92
Brahms J.	Symphony No 1. C major op 68	XXIV	Apr 23.92
	" " 2 D major	XI	July 2.92
	" " 4 E major	III	Oct 24.91
	Tragic Overture	XX	Mar 26.92
	Concerto Violin & orch. op 77	VII	Nov 28.91	Adolph Brodsky
Bruch M.	Concerto Violin & orch in G major	XIV	July 30.92	J. Adamowski
	" " " No. 3 op 58	XVIII	Mar 5.92	Camille Mroo
Busoni F. B.	Symphonische Suite op 25	XVI	July 20.92
Chadwick F. W.	A Pastoral Prelude	XXV	July 30.92
Chopin	Concerto in F minor. Piano & orch.	XIII	July 23.92	Mrs H. H. A. Beach
	Impromptu for Piano	VIII	Dec 5.91	Paderewski
	Polse " "	"	" "	"

Davidoff	'At the Fountain' for cello	Extra	Feb 292	Alwin Schroeder	Loeffler C. M.	Suite "Les Vieilles de l'Ukraine" Violin & orch.	VI	Nov 21.91	C. M. Loeffler
Delibes L.	Long "Regrets"	Extra	Feb 2.92	Mrs Wyman	Mascagni P.	Prelude from "Cavalleria Rusticana"
						orch. with incidental Solo	II	Oct 17.91	Mr. J. Wink
Dvorak A.	Symphony No. 4 G major	XVII	Feb 27.92		Masonet J.	Opus "Phedre"	II	Oct 17.91
	Three Slavonic Dances	XIV	Jan 30.92			Ballet Music "Le Cid"	Popular	Jan 6.92
Ferrari	Long "A une fiancee"	Extra	Feb 2.92	Mrs Wyman		Suite "Esclarmonde"	Extra	Feb 2.92
Floersheim O.	'Prelude and Fugue' for orch.	IX	Feb 6.92			Song "Bonne nuit"	"	"	Mrs Wyman
						Aria "Herodias" with orch.	XXIV	Apr 16.92	Mrs Geo. Henschel
Gluck	Opus "Iphigenia in Aulide"	VII	Nov 28.91		Mac Donnell E. A.	Suite in A minor: op 42	III	Oct 24.91
	"Reigen Seligen Geister u. Fromm Tonz" orphens	XX	Feb 26.92
	Aria from "Orpheus" with orch	"	" " "	Miss Annie Jordan	Mendelssohn	Symphony No. 3 Anni. (Scotts)	XXI	Apr 2.92
Goldmark	Opus "Prometheus"	XI	Jan 2.92			Opus "Ruy Blas"	XVII	Feb 27.92
	" "Taktatale"	XXII	Apr 9.92
Handel	Concerto for strings & two Wind orch. in F.	X	Dec 26.91		Mozart	Symphony G minor:	XVI	Feb 20.92
	" " " "	XV	Feb 6.92			" " " " " " " "	IX	Dec 9.91
	Aria "Alessandro" with orch.	XXIII	Apr 16.92	Mrs Geo. Henschel		Opus "Magic Flute"	"	" " "
Haydn	Symphony No. 1 (B. H.) in E s	V	Nov 14.91			Masonic Funeral Music	"	" " "
	" " 13 " " " " " " " "	XXIV	Apr 23.92			Symph. Concerto Violin & Viola with orch	XI	Jan 2.92	C. M. Loeffler } Franz Kneisel }
						And. & allegro from Concerto for Flute	XXI	Apr 2.92	Charles Mole } Herr: Schenk }
Henschel G.	Suite "Hamlet" op 50	XXIII	Apr 16.92			and Trump
	Ballad "There was an ancient King" with orch.	VI	Nov 21.91	Miss Mary. Hall		" Dove Sono Figaro	IX	Dec 19.91	Miss Fusch Madi
						Aria from "Don Giovanni"	"	" " "	" " "
Jensen et.	Song "Murmelerde Luftchen"	II	Oct 17.92	Mr. J. Wink	Paderewski J. J.	Concerto Piano & orch. op 17.	VIII	Dec 5.91	Paderewski
Koven R. de	'Dance et Marche des Gnomes' for orch	Popular	Jan 6.92		Paganini	Concerto for Violin in D maj:	XXIV	Apr 23.92	Franz Kneisel
Lalo E.	Opus "Le Roi d'ys"	VI	Nov 21.91		Panic J. K.	Symphony No. 2 in A "In the Spring"	XXII	Apr 19.92
Leszt J.	Symph. Poem: "Les Preludes"	XVII	Feb 27.92		Raff J.	Symphony No. 5, op 177 "Lenore"	VI	Nov 21.91
	"Hungarian Fantasy" Piano & Orch	Extra	Feb 2.92	Paderewski		Concerto Piano & orch. op 185	XVI	Feb 20.92	Mr. H. Sherman
	"Rhapsodie Hongroise" for Piano	VII	Dec 5.91	"	Rubinstein	Ocean Symphony op 42 (Original Version)	X	Dec 26.91
Litolff H.	Opus "King Lear"	Popular	Jan 6.92			Concerto Piano & orch No 4 op 70	IV	Oct 31.91	Alfred Schnittke
					Saint-James C.	Symphonic Poem "Le Rouet d'Orpheus"	XV	Feb 6.92
						Rondo Capriccioso for Violin	Popular	Jan 6.92	Maud Powell

8	Schubert F.	Symphony No. 9 in E	VII	Nov. 28. 91
		Unfinished Symp. in B min.	XII	Jan 9. 92
		Entr' acte "Rosamunde"	XI	Jan 2. 92
		Moment Musical for cello	Extra	Feb 2. 92	Alum. Schröder
	(Schumann)	"Manfred Music" Complete	XII	Jan 9. 92
		Mrs. Nikisch & Wynnau, Mess. Hinrich,
		Meyn, Hay & Sargent & a Chorus
		by the "Cecilia"
	Schubert	Song "Der Nengierige"	II	Oct 17. 91	W. J. Winck
		" " "Liebesbotschaft"	XX	Feb 26. 92	Amalie Joachim
		" " " "	VI	Nov 21. 91	Marguitta Hall
		" " "An die Leier"	"	"	"
		" " "Rastlose Liebe"	"	"	"
		" " "Erl König"	XX	Feb 26. 92	Amalie Joachim
	Schumann	Symphony No. 1. op. 38	XXIII	Apr 16. 92
		" " 3 " 97	I	Oct 10. 91
		" " 4 " 120	XXIII	Feb 5. 92
		" " 4 " " Original Version	XIX	Feb 12. 92
		Over. Scherzo & Finale op. 50.	V	Nov 14. 91
		Concert Piano & Orch.	Extra	Feb 2. 92
		Song "Mondnacht"	II	Oct 17. 91	W. J. Winck
		" " "Schöne Frauen meine Lieder"	XX	Feb 26. 92	Amalie Joachim
	Spohr L.	Symphony No. 3 in E major	XIV	Jan 13. 92
	Strauss, Rich.	Symph. Poem "Don Juan"	IV	Oct 31. 91
	Stucken, rander	Pagani & Amore	Popular	Jan 6. 92
	Swendsen J. S.	"Carnival in Paris"	VIII	Dec 5. 91
	Tschaiikowsky	Andante & Scherzo from Symp. No. 4	Extra	Feb 2. 92
		Suite op. 55	II	Oct 17. 91
		Symph. Poem "Hamlet"	XXIII	Feb 5. 92
		Concerto No. 1. Piano & Orch. op. 23	Popular	Jan 6. 92	Mrs. Aus der Ohe
	Tollmann R.	Serenade for Strings in D	XXI	Apr 2. 92
		Concerto for Cello with op. 33	III	Oct 24. 91	Alum. Schröder

Wagner R.

"Good Fridays Spell" Parsifal
 "Prelude" Parsifal
 Faust Overture
 Overture to "Tannhäuser"
 Huldigungs March
 Aria "Hall of Song" Tannhäuser Wotan's Farewell & Fire Chorus from
 "Die Walküre"

I Oct 10. 91
 X Dec 26. 91
 XIII Jan 23. 92
 Extra Feb 2. 92
 XVI Feb 20. 92
 I Oct 10. 91
 XXI Apr 2. 92

Lilian Nordica
 Heinrich Meyn

Weber C. M. von

Over. "Euryanthe"
 "Oberon"

VIII Dec 5. 91
 XXIII Apr 16. 92

Composers:

with no. of works performed

Bach J. S.	1
Beethoven	11
Berlioz	1
Bird et.	1
Borodin	1
Brahms J.	5
Brecht M.	1
Busoni F. B.	1
Chadwick F. W.	1
Chopin	3
Davidoff	1
Debussy C.	1
Dvořák A.	2
Ferrari	1
Floersheim, Otto	1
Gluck	3
Goldmark	2
Handel	2
Haydn	2
Henschel Geo.	2
Jensen et al.	1
Koven R. de	1
Lalo E.	1

8 Schubert F.	Symphony No. 9 in E	VII	Nov. 28. 91
	Unfinished Symp. in B min:	XII	Jan 9. 92
	Entr' acte "Rosamunde"	II	Jan 2. 92
	Moment Musical for cello	Extra	Feb 2. 92	Alum. Schindler
(Schumann)	"Manfred Music" Complete	XII	Jan 9. 92
	Mrs. Mikisch & Wynn, Mess. Heinrich,
	Meyn, Hay & Sargent & a Chorus
	by the "Cecilia"
Schubert	Song "Der Neugierige"	II	Oct 17. 91	W. J. Winck
	" " Liebesbotschaft"	XX	Feb 26. 92	Annie Joachim
	" " " "	VI	Nov 21. 91	Marguerite Zell
	" " An die Leier"	"	"	"
	" " Rastlose Liebe"	"	"	"
	" " Erl König"	XX	Feb 26. 92	Annie Joachim
Schumann	Symphony No. 1. op. 38	XXIII	Apr 16. 92
	" " 3 " 97	I	Oct 10. 91
	" " 4 " 120	XVIII	Feb 5. 92
	" " 4 " " Original Version	XIX	Feb 12. 92
	Ouv. Scherzo & Finale op. 50,	V	Nov 14. 91
	Concert Piano & Orch.	Extra	Feb 2. 92
	Song "Mondnacht"	II	Oct 17. 91	W. J. Winck
	" " Ichöne trügen meine Lieder"	XX	Feb 26. 92	Annie Joachim
Spohr L.	Symphony No. 3 in E moll	XIV	Jan 13. 92
Strauss, Rich.	Symph. Poem "Don Juan"	IV	Oct 31. 91
Stuck, rander	Pagina d' Amore	Popular	Jan 6. 92
Svensson J. S.	"Carnival in Paris"	VIII	Dec 5. 91
Tchaikovsky	Andante scherzo from Symp. No. 4	Extra	Feb 2. 92
	Suite op. 55	II	Oct 17. 91
	Symph. Poem "Hamlet"	XVIII	Feb 5. 92
	Concerto No. 1. Piano & Orch. op. 23	Popular	Jan 6. 92	Mrs. Aus der Ohe
Tollmann R.	Serenade for String in D	XXI	Apr 2. 92
	Concerto for Cello with op. 33	III	Oct 24. 91	Alum. Schindler

Wagner R.

"Good Friday's Spell" Parsifal
 "Prelude" Parsifal
 Faust Overture
 Overture to "Tannhäuser"
 Huldigungs March
 Aria "Kull of Song" Tannhäuser Wolfram's Farewell & Fire Chorus from
 "Die Walküre"

Weber C. M. von

Ouv. "Euryanthe"
 "Oberon"

Composers:

with no. of works performed

Bach J. S.	1
Beethoven	11
Berlioz	1
Bird et.	1
Borodin	1
Brahms J.	5
Brecht M.	1
Busoni F. B.	1
Chadwick F. W.	1
Chopin	3
Davidoff	1
Delibes L.	1
Dvořák A.	2
Ferrari	1
Floersheim, Otto	1
Gluck	3
Goldmark	2
Handel	2
Haydn	2
Henschel Geo.	2
Jensen et.	1
Koven R. de	1
Lalo E.	1

I	Oct 10. 91
X	Dec 26. 91
XII	Jan 23. 92
Extra	Feb 2. 92
XVI	Feb 20. 92
I	Oct 10. 91	Lilian Nordica
XX	Apr 2. 92	Heinrich Meyn
VIII	Dec 5. 91
XXIII	Apr 16. 92

Liszt F.	3
Litolff H.	1
Loeffler C.H.	1
MacDowell E.A.	1
Mascagni P.	1
Massenet J.	5
Mendelssohn	2
Mozart	8
Paderewski J. J.	1
Paganini	1
Pami J. K.	1
Raff J.	2
Rubinstein	2
Saint-Saens C.	2
Schubert	9
Schumann	9
Spohr L.	1
Strauss, Rich.	1
Stuckow, van der	1
Svensen J. S.	1
Tchaikovsky P.	4
Tolkman R.	2
Wagner R.	7
Weber C.M. von	2

Soloists:
with date of appearance

Piano
Aus der Ohe, Miss	July 6. 92
Black Mrs H. H. et.	July 23. 92
Buzoni J. B.	Nov 14. 91
D'Albort, Eugene	Nov 12. 92
Grinfield, Alfred	Oct 31. 91
Paderewski J. J.	Dec 5. 91
"	Nov 2. 92
Therwood W. H.	Feb 20. 92

Violin

Adamowski T.	July 30. 92
Brodsky, Adolph	Nov 28. 91
Kneisel, Franz	July 2. 92
" "	Apr 23. 92
Loeffler C. M.	Nov 21. 91
" "	July 2. 92
Powell, Maud	July 6. 92
Urso, Camilla	Nov 5. 92

Cello

Schroeder Alwin	Nov 2. 92	Oct 24. 91
-----------------	-----------	------------

Flute

Moli, Charles	Apr 2. 92
---------------	-----------

Harp

Schuecker, Heinrich	Apr 2. 92
---------------------	-----------

Vocalists

Fursch-Madi, Mad.	Dec 19. 91
Hall, Miss Marguerite	Nov 21. 91
Hay, Clarence	July 9. 92
Heinrich Mr.	" " "
Henschel Mrs Geo.	Apr 16. 92
Joachim, Miss Amelia	Nov 26. 92
Mayn, Heinrich	July 9. 92
Nikisch, Mrs Arthur	" " "
Nordie, Lillian	Oct 10. 91
Sargent Mr	July 9. 92
Witch, Mrs J.	Oct 17. 91
Wyman Mrs	July 9. 92

Also by the "Cecilia"

Conductor

Mr Arthur Nikisch

Oct. 10 1	Oct. 17 2	Oct. 24 3	Oct. 31 4	Nov. 14 5	Nov. 21 6	Nov. 28 7	Dec. 5 8	Dec. 19 9	Dec. 26 10	Jan. 2 11	Jan. 9 12	Jan. 23 13	Jan. 30 14	Feb. 6 15
  R 15 2d BALCONY   BOSTON MUSIC HALL <hr/> The Boston Symphony Orchestra MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor. CONCERTS, SATURDAY EVENINGS, at 8 o'clock   15 2d BALCONY
Apr. 23 24	Apr. 16 23	Apr. 9 22	Apr. 2 21	Mar. 26 20	Mar. 12 19	Mar. 5 18	Feb. 26 17	Feb. 20 16

BOSTON MUSIC HALL.

Eleventh Season.—1891-92.

THE

Boston Symphony Orchestra,

(85 PERFORMERS,)

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, CONDUCTOR,

WILL GIVE A SERIES OF

TWENTY-FOUR CONCERTS

ON CONSECUTIVE SATURDAY EVENINGS, FROM OCTOBER 10, 1891, TO
APRIL 23, 1892, OMITTING NOV. 7, DEC. 12, 1891, JAN. 16, FEB. 13,
AND MARCH 19, 1892, AND

TWENTY-FOUR PUBLIC REHEARSALS

ON CONSECUTIVE FRIDAY AFTERNOONS, FROM OCTOBER 9, 1891, TO
APRIL 22, 1892, OMITTING NOV. 6, DEC. 11, 1891, JAN. 15, FEB. 12
AND MARCH 18, 1892.

TICKETS for the series of Concerts $12.00 and $7.50, according to and for the series of Rehearsals location.

The $12 Seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall,
Monday, September 14th, at 10 A. M.

The $7.50 Seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, Tuesday, September 15th, at 10 A. M. Any Rehearsal Seats not sold at auction will be on sale at the Box Office, Music Hall, Wednesday, Sept. 16th.

The $12 Seats for the Concerts will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, on Thursday, September 17th, at 10 A. M.

The $7.50 Seats for the Concerts will be sold in like manner at the same place on Friday, September 18th, at 10 A. M.

Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold.

Tickets will be delivered in the Hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be resold.

All seats remaining unsold after the auction will be on sale at the Box Office on and after Saturday, September 19th.

Special Notice.

The owner of this ticket will please write name and address on the lines below as an aid to its recovery in case of loss.

Name.....

Alfred A. Brown

Address.....

30 Kilby St. Room 19

This ticket must be presented to the door-keeper at every performance, persons neglecting to bring tickets will be admitted to the hall only by purchasing an evening ticket.

BOSTON MUSIC HALL.

Eleventh Season.—1891-92.

THE

Boston Symphony Orchestra,

(85 PERFORMERS.)

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, CONDUCTOR,

WILL GIVE A SERIES OF

TWENTY-FOUR CONCERTS

ON CONSECUTIVE SATURDAY EVENINGS, FROM OCTOBER 10, 1891, TO
APRIL 23, 1892, OMITTING NOV. 7, DEC. 12, 1891, JAN. 16, FEB. 13,
AND MARCH 19, 1892, AND

TWENTY-FOUR PUBLIC REHEARSALS

ON CONSECUTIVE FRIDAY AFTERNOONS, FROM OCTOBER 9, 1891, TO
APRIL 22, 1892, OMITTING NOV. 6, DEC. 11, 1891, JAN. 15, FEB. 12
AND MARCH 18, 1892.

TICKETS for the series of Concerts and for the series of Rehearsals $12.00 and $7.50, according to location.

The $12 Seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, Monday, September 14th, at 10 A. M.

The $7.50 Seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, Tuesday, September 15th, at 10 A. M. Any Rehearsal Seats not sold at auction will be on sale at the Box Office, Music Hall, Wednesday, Sept. 16th.

The $12 Seats for the Concerts will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, on Thursday, September 17th, at 10 A. M.

The $7.50 Seats for the Concerts will be sold in like manner at the same place on Friday, September 18th, at 10 A. M.

Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold.

Tickets will be delivered in the Hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be resold.

All seats remaining unsold after the auction will be on sale at the Box Office on and after Saturday, September 19th.

Special Notice.

The owner of this ticket will please write name and address on the lines below as an aid to its recovery in case of loss.

Name.....Wm. A. Brown

Address.....30 Kilby St. Room 14

Box 1802

This ticket must be presented to the door-keeper at every performance, persons neglecting to bring tickets will be admitted to the hall only by purchasing an evening ticket.

AFTER THE SYMPHONY

A DELIGHTFUL PROSPECT.
Many Musical Novelties
the Symphony
Novelty

BOSTON MUSIC HALL

Sept. 15, at ten o'clock, public rehearsals will be and under the same

ng. Sept. 17, at ten o'clock, aturday evening concerts one place and under the $7.50 concert tickets will the way, beginning at ten 18.

no bids are received at ill be offered at the box day and Saturday morn.
sales, at the advertised be distinctly understood ll be sold to the highest premium be small or large tempt will be made to in premium beyond the figures

oston concerts, the usual Cambridge, Providence, hia, Baltimore and Wash-on, six public rehearsals oklyn, under the auspices harmonic Society. The will also be made during

MATTERS.

— Aug 30/91

Concerts--Plans et Sales.

es, which during the n over to the force of the alterations and early in the season, air of business, and is and his assistants preparing for the fall

hony concerts take a preparatory work of ns for the ticket sales esterday for the first

here will be 24 Friday arsals, and the same evening concerts, the ng on Friday, Oct. 3, on Saturday, Oct. 10,
continued each week with the exceptions of n Saturdays Nov. 7,
b. 13 and March 19,
ven to the occasional over the usual route, phia, Baltimore and made in the prices of ions of the hall from he best seats being sold hearsals and concerts,

50 for the season, save ny seats will again be et holders at the public ets being sold at 25
s rehearsal.

BOSTON STOCK MARKET.
Boston, April 23, 1892. The following were the sales today, and the closing bids of yesterday and today:

Bonds.
	Am't.	High.	Low.	Closing.
	of	est.	est.	April	April
	sales.	pr's.	pr's.	22.	23.
Johnson 4s.....	9000	82 1/4	82 1/4	82 1/4	82
do. incomes.....	11800	57 1/4	56 3/4	57 1/4	56 1/2
do. M. 7s 1904.....	5000	98 3/4	98 1/2	98 3/4	98 1/2
do. Un. Gas. 5s.....
do. 2d 5s.....	2000	77	77	89 1/4	89 1/4
do. ur. & Mo. non.....	600	105 1/2	105 1/2	78	77
do. hic. B. & N. 5s.....	500	103 3/8	103 3/8	103 1/2	103
do. 2d 6s.....				103	103
do. B. & Q. con. 5s.....					110 1/2
do. sub. 25 p. ct. pd.....	500	109	109
do. 1st 7s.....	1000	122	122	121 1/2	121 1/2
do. Den. Ex. 4s.....				92 1/2	93
do. plain 4s.....				86	86
do. Iowa div. 4s.....				92 1/2	92
do. M. & S. P. 6s DD.....				116	116
do. J. R. & S. Y. 5s.....	1000	94 3/4	94 3/4	94 1/4	94 1/4
do. hic. & W. M. 5s.....				98 1/4	98 1/4
do. hic. & N. M. 5s.....				92	92
do. Vermont 5s.....	1000	95 1/4	95 1/4	95	95
do. re. & Elk. 6s. un.....				120	120
do. stamped.....					122
do. K. C. Sp. & M. scrip.....	125	70	70
do. do. 5s.....					61
do. do. assented.....					51
do. K. C. Clin. & S. 5s.....					90
do. K. C. Ft. S. & G. 7s.....				112	112
do. M. H. O. 6s. 1903.....					100
do. Mex. Cent. 4s.....				69	69
do. do. 1st inc.....	3000	35	35	35	35
do. N. Y. & N. E. 6s.....				110 1/2	110 1/2
do. do. 2d 6s.....				105	104 1/2
do. N. E. Tel. 6s 1907.....	1000	105	105
do. Og. & L. C. con. 6s.....				105 1/2	105 1/2
do. Oregon Sh. L. 6s.....	5000	103 1/2	103 1/2	103 1/2	103 1/2
do. Or. Sh. L. & U. N. 5s.....				79	79
do. Rutland 5s.....				100	100
do. Wis. Cent. inc.....	8000	35	35
Railroad Co's.
Atch. & Ton.....	4691	35 1/2	35	35 1/2	35
Atlantic & Pac.....				4	4
Bos. & Albany.....	50	206	205	206	205
Boston & Low.....	6	176	176	175 1/2	175 1/2
Bos. & Maine.....	15	166 1/2	166 1/4		166
Boston & Prov.....				250	250
Cent. Mass. com.....				16	16
do. pref.....				33	33
Chic. Bur. & Q.....	118	108 3/4	108 3/4	108 5/8	108 1/4
do. b. 30.....	100	108 3/8	108 3/8
Chic. & W. M.....				54	54
Cleve. & Can. pr.....				19	19
do. com.....				5 1/2	5 1/2
Fitchburg pref.....	88	89	88 3/4	88 3/4	88 3/4
do. com.....				19 1/2	19
Flint pref.....	50	85 1/2	85	86
do. com.....				110
K. C. Ft. S. & M pr.....				40
do. com.....				15
K. C. Mem. & B.....				15
Maine Central.....				117
Mexican Central.....	200	18 1/4	18 1/4	18 1/4	18
Missouri Pacific.....	10	60	60
N. Y. & N. E.....	950	41 1/4	40 3/4	40 1/2	40 3/8
do. s. 10.....	100	40 3/4	40 3/4
do. b. 30.....	100	41	41
do. pref.....	55	93 1/2	93	93	92 1/2
Old Colony.....	5	174 3/4	174 3/4		174
Oregon Sh. Line.....				26 1/2	26 1/2
Summit Branch.....				5 1/8	5
Union Pacific.....	600	45	44 7/8	45 1/4	44 7/8
do. b. 60.....	100	45	45
West End com.....	121	73	72 1/2	72 1/2	72 1/2
do. s. 30 no int.....	50	72 1/2	72 1/2
do. pref.....	110	86 1/2	86 1/4	86 1/2	86 1/2
Wis. Cent. com.....				17 1/4	17 3/8
do. pref.....	50	40 1/8	40 1/8	42	40 1/4
Land Co's.
Anniston.....				28	30
Aspinwall.....				9	9
Boothbay.....					10
Boston Land.....				6	6
Bos. Wat. Power.....				3 1/4	3 1/2
Camb. Field.....					4
Cutler Land.....				1 1/8	1 1/8
East Boston.....	55	5 1/2	5 1/8		5
Sullivan Land.....				35	35
West End.....				19 1/4	19
Winter Harbor.....				20	20
Wollaston Land.....	300	2 3/8	2 3/8	2 3/8	2 3/8
Mining Co's.
	200	75	75	75	75

Manufacturing.
1 Atlantic Cotton Mills.....	1
10 South End.....	1
10 Tremont Nat. Bank.....	1
Railroad Co's.
15 Boston & Maine R. pref.....	1
5 do. com.....	1
100 Boston & Providence R.....	251 @ 2
83 Conn. & Passumpsic R. pref.....	119 1/4 @ 1
40 Dover & Winnissee R.....	1
4 New London & Northern R.....	1
4 Norwich & Worcester R.....	1
12 West End R. pref.....	1
5 Ware River R.....	1
Gaslight Co's.
9 Bay State Gas.....	1
8 Jamaica Plain Gaslight.....	1
2 Newton & Watertown Gas Co.....	1
Insurance Co's.
20 Firemen's Ins. Co.....	1
Miscellaneous.
5 H. B. Claflin Co. com.....	1
70 Lombard Investment.....	40 1/4 @
75 Reece Button Hole Co.....	1
City and Town Bonds.
$3000 Des Moines 4 1/2s. 1907.....	1
$1000 Lawrence 6s. 1894.....	1
$4000 Lansing, Mich., 4s. 1900.....	1
$2000 do. do. 4 1/2s. 1915.....	1
$3000 Lewiston 5s. 1907.....	1
$5000 Minneapolis 4 1/2s. 1913.....	1
Railroad and Miscellaneous Bonds.
$450 Bay State Gas income scrip.....	1
$500 Boston Athletic Asso. 5s. 1908.....	1
$1800 Bur. & Mo. 6s exempt. 1918.....	115 1/2 @ 1
$500 Chic. Bur. & No. 1st 5s. 1926.....	1
$5000 County of Washington, Ill., 6s. 1902.....	1
$2000 Chic. Bur. & Q. 5s. 1903.....	1
$3000 Denver City Cable 6s.....	1
$5000 Det. Lans. & Nor. 7s. 1907.....	1
$1000 Gr. Rap. Lans. & Det. 5s. 1927.....	1
$1000 Nashua & Lowell 6s. 1893.....	1
$6000 Old Colony 4 1/2s. 1904.....	1
$4500 Real Estate 6s. 1896, guar. by Lomb. Investment Co.....	1
$3000 do. 6s. 1894.....	1
$5000 Swift & Co. 6s. 1910.....	1
$2000 United States 4s. coup. 1907.....	1
$10000 do. registered.....	1
NEW YORK MONEY AND STOCKS.
[Special Dispatch to the Sunday Herald.]
NEW YORK, April 23, 1892. Money on hand has been easy, ranging from 1 1/2 to 2, loan at 2, and closing offered at 2 per cent. Prime mercantile paper is increasing supply, but the demand remains large, no accumulation occurs. Rates are practically unchanged, and 60 to 90-day inland bills receivable are 3 1/2, four months' advances 4 @ 4 1/2, and good single names from four to six months to run 5 per cent. Sterling exchange is quiet and firm, actual business in bankers' bills at 4 for 60-day bills and 4.88 3/4 for demand posted rates are 4.88 @ 4.89 1/2; comme bills at 4.86 1/4 @ 4.88 1/2. Government bills have been dull and steady. Railroad bills have been fairly active and generally Bar silver, 86 3/4.
Below are the sales of the principal stocks and the highest and lowest prices of day:
Bonds.
Apr. 23	Apr. 22
AFTER THE SYMPHONY

A DELIGHTFUL PROSPECT.

Many Musical Novelties to be Given at the Symphony Concerts This Season—Nordica and Paderewski are Among the Soloists.

Few announcements of coming events arouse such general interest as the statement of the plans for the winter's season of Symphony concerts. In the past attractive programmes have been announced but there has never been a list of novelties that compares with that to be given this winter. The following-named pieces are to be given during the season of concerts and all are absolute novelties in America:

A new symphony by Sgambati; symphony No. 5, Tchaikowsky, also symphonic poem, "The Tempest," and suite, op. 55 by the same composer; symphonic poem, "Don Juan," Richard Strauss; "Rhapsodie Espagnole," Emmanuel Chabrier; "Carnival in Paris," Svendsen; ballet music, "Colombe," Mackenzie; prelude, "Cavalleria Rusticana," Mascagni; symphonic poem, "La Sirene," Mihalovich; "Faschingsbilder," Nicode; a new symphony by Dvorak; symphony in F. major, Felix Draesecke.

American composers will have an unusually prominent position in the programmes of the season, and among the numbers already selected are John K. Paine's "Spring Symphony," Arthur Bird's "Carnival Scenes," and F. Van der Stucken's "Pagina D'Amare," while other works are still to be selected. Other numbers to be mentioned are overture "Le Roi D'Ys," Lalo; "Scenes Alsaciennes," Massenet; "Reformation Symphony," Mendelssohn (seldom played); symphony in C minor, Spohr; "Ocean Symphony," Rubinstein; "Harold Symphony," Berlioz; overture, "King Lear," Litolff; and, as a matter of course, many of the standard works by Beethoven, Mozart, Haydn, Mendelssohn, Brahms and Wagner.

While the principal attraction of these concerts must ever be the splendid playing of this fine body of musicians, which has been continued for the coming season almost without change, the management is not unmindful of the expectations of patrons as regards soloists. Engagements have been already effected with a number of famous solo artists, among whom are Mme. Nordica, Mme. Joachim, Mrs. H. H. A. Beach, Eugen D'Albert, Ignace J. Paderewski, Alfred Gruenfeld, Mr. Busoin, Alwin Schroeder and others.

As already stated, the twenty-four public rehearsals and concerts will be given on Friday afternoons and Saturday evenings, beginning Oct. 9 and 10, continued each week through the season, with the exceptions of the weeks ending on Saturdays Nov. 7, Dec. 12, Jan. 16, Feb. 13 and March 19.

On Monday morning Sept. 14, at ten o'clock, the $12 seats for the public rehearsals will be offered by auction at Music Hall, as in former years, not more than four seats being offered at a single bid, the seats being sold in regular order, beginning at the stage line, no bid of less than twenty-five cents being received, and all seats not called for and paid for immediately being resold without reserve.

On Tuesday morning, Sept. 15, at ten o'clock, the $7.50 seats for the public rehearsals will be sold at the same place and under the same rules.

On Thursday morning, Sept. 17, at ten o'clock, $12 seats for the Saturday evening concerts will be sold at the same place and under the same rules, and the $7.50 concert tickets will be put up in the same way, beginning at ten o'clock Friday, Sept. 18.

All seats for which no bids are received at these auction sales will be offered at the box office on the Wednesday and Saturday mornings after the two sales, at the advertised prices, and it should be distinctly understood that all the seats will be sold to the highest bidder, whether the premium be small or large in amount, and no attempt will be made to in any way force the premium beyond the figures readily obtained.

In addition to the Boston concerts, the usual series will be given in Cambridge, Providence, New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington, and, in addition, six public rehearsals and six concerts in Brooklyn, under the auspices of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society. The annual western tour will also be made during the spring months.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

Herald — Aug 30/91

The Symphony Concerts--Plans for Ticket Sales.

The Music Hall offices, which during the summer have been given over to the force of mechanics engaged in the alterations and repairs decided upon early in the season, have again assumed an air of business, and Manager Charles A. Ellis and his assistants are busily engaged in preparing for the fall and winter campaign.

Naturally the Symphony concerts take a prominent place in the preparatory work of the season, and the plans for the ticket sales were duly announced yesterday for the first time.

As in former years, there will be 24 Friday afternoon public rehearsals, and the same number of Saturday evening concerts, the first rehearsal occurring on Friday, Oct. 9, and the first concert on Saturday, Oct. 10. The series will be continued each week through the season, with the exceptions of the weeks ending on Saturdays Nov. 7, Dec. 12, Jan. 16, Feb. 13 and March 19, these weeks being given to the occasional tours of the orchestra over the usual route, New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington.

No change will be made in the prices of tickets or in the divisions of the hall from those of last season, the best seats being sold for $12 for both the rehearsals and concerts, and all others at $7.50. This season, save that the upper balcony seats will again be left for admission ticket holders at the public rehearsals, these tickets being sold at 25 cents for each week's rehearsal.

On Monday morning, Sept. 14, at 10 o'clock, the $12 seats for the public rehearsals will be offered at auction at Music Hall, as in former years, not more than four seats being offered at a single bid, the seats being sold in regular order, beginning at the stage line, no bid of less than 25 cents being received, and all seats not called for and paid for immediately being resold without reserve.

On Tuesday morning, Sept. 15, at 10 o'clock, the $7.50 seats for the public rehearsals will be sold at the same place and under the same rules.

On Thursday morning, Sept. 17, at 10 o'clock the $12 seats for the Saturday evening concerts will be sold at the same place and under the same rules, and the $7.50 concert tickets will be put up in the same way, beginning at 10 o'clock Friday, Sept. 18.

All seats for which no bids are received at these auction sales will be offered at the box office on the Wednesday and Saturday mornings after the two sales, at the advertised prices, and it should be distinctly understood that all the seats will be sold to the highest bidder, whether the premium be small or large in amount, and no attempt will be made to in any way force the premium beyond the figures readily obtained.

Director Nikisch, who has recently returned from Europe, has given his vacation time very largely to the interests of the Symphony orchestra and the concerts of the coming season. The few vacancies in the membership of the organization caused by the changes incidental to any large body of musicians have been supplied by players equally competent, and the numerical strength of the orchestra will be maintained the same as last season.

Director Nikisch also improved his absence abroad by collecting from the leading sources of supply on the continent everything of value in the way of new orchestral composition, as well as several works for chorus and orchestra, all of which he hopes to introduce to notice during the season. With the additions made to the library of the orchestra during this visit, the organization will possess a supply of compositions and works affording the widest variety in programme, making during the season an opportunity which will doubtless be fully improved by Director Nikisch.

It appears that the announcement of a permanent chorus as a part of the Symphony concert scheme, made at the close of last season, was somewhat premature. Director Nikisch greatly desires, as he always has desired since he assumed his present position, to produce works for both chorus and orchestra, and it is more than possible that some plan for such a union of chorus and orchestra as was hinted at last spring may yet come about.

In the matter of soloists, although no "official utterances" have been made as yet, it is safe to entertain the most satisfying anticipations, and there is good reason to suppose that the great vocalists of the world will be most happily represented in the season's engagements.

It will interest many readers to know that Manager Ellis will again have as an associate Mr. Fred R. Comee, who will, as usual, give his especial attention to the analytical programme book, for the editing of which the able assistance of Mr. George H. Wilson has again been secured.

The Music Hall offices are now open for all who desire further information regarding the concerts or other events of the season.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

Conductor Nikisch's Plans for the Symphony Concerts.

No better evidence of the absolute confidence of the Boston public in a musical enterprise, or in the honesty of purpose of an individual, has ever been given than that shown year after year in the Symphony concert scheme and its generous founder. Circumstances, entirely beyond the control of those having the direct management of this great enterprise, have made it an impossibility to hardly outline the scheme of any of the earlier seasons before the tickets for the entire series were put upon the market, and yet, year after year, these tickets have been bought, and at a large advance upon the announced price, without a question as to the details of the concerts for which they were sold. It is gratifying that this faith should have been exhibited by the public in former years, but it is still more gratifying to be able this season to present a reasonably complete schedule of the artists and works promised for these concerts before the annual sale of tickets for the season.

Conductor Arthur Nikisch can hardly be said to have passed a leisure summer, for, leaving Boston after ending his work for the season of '90, and '91, he went almost immediately to Leipzig and his arrival in that city was no sooner known than his rooms were fairly besieged by publishers and composers eager to gain a hearing of their works in the new world by such an organization as the Boston Symphony orchestra.

Any doubts which may exist in America as to the widespread fame of the Boston orchestra throughout Europe will be easily dispelled by Conductor Nikisch's narrative of his experiences during his visit to his former field of labor.

For many weeks his time was given almost exclusively to the examination and reading of compositions that came to him from all the countries of Europe, and the completion of arrangements for the performance of such as he decided to add to the repertoire of the Boston orchestra. It will be seen that Conductor Nikisch entered upon the duty of deciding upon the novelties for the coming season in a most catholic spirit, and that he has apparently sought the desirable wherever it could be found.

Some of the novelties and works of special interest to be expected during the season are the following: A new symphony by Sgambati; symphony No. 5, Tschalkowsky also symphonic poem, "The Tempest," and suite op. 55 by the same composer; symphonic poem, "Don Juan," Richard Strauss; "Rhapsodie Espagnole," Emmanuel Chabrier; "Carnival in Paris," Svendsen; ballet music, "Colombe," Mackenzie; prelude, "Cavalliera Rusticana," Mascagni; symphonic poem, "La Sirene," Mihalovich; "Faschingsbilder," Nicode; a new symphony by Dvorak; symphony in F major, Felix Draesecke. All of these so far as known are absolute novelties in America.

Interesting features of the concerts will be John K. Paine's "Spring Symphony;" Carnival Scenes, Arthur Bird; "Pagina D'Amare,"

F. van der Stucken, and other works by American composers yet to be selected. Other numbers to be mentioned are overture "Le Roi D'Ys," Lalo; "Scenes Alsaciennes," Massenet; "Reformation Symphony," Mendelssohn (seldom played); Symphony in C minor, Spohr; "Ocean Symphony," Rubinstein; "Harold Symphony," Berlioz; overture, "King Lear," Litolff, and, as a matter of course, many of the standard works by Beethoven, Mozart, Haydn, Mendelssohn, Brahms and Wagner.

The selection of soloists is, for many reasons, not as yet fully completed; but a number of great artists have already been definitely decided upon, these including Mme. Nordica, soprano; Miss Emma Eames, soprano; Mme. Joachim, contralto; Mrs. H. A. Beach, Mr. Eugen D. Albert, Mr. Ignace J. Paderewski, Mr. Alfred Gruenfeld, pianists; Mr. Busoni, cello, and Mr. Alwin Schroeder, pianist, and others.

But a very few changes have been made in the membership of the orchestra, and these have preserved its excellence in every way.

As already stated, the 24 public rehearsals and concerts will be given on Friday afternoons and Saturday evenings, beginning Oct. 9 and 10, continued each week through the season, with the exceptions of the weeks ending on Saturdays Nov. 7, Dec. 12, Jan. 16, Feb. 13 and March 19.

On Monday morning, Sept. 14, at 10 o'clock, the $12 seats for the public rehearsals will be offered at auction at Music Hall, as in former years, not more than four seats being offered at a single bid, the seats being sold in regular order, beginning at the stage line, no bid of less than 25 cents being received, and all seats not called for and paid for immediately being resold without reserve.

On Tuesday morning, Sept. 15, at 10 o'clock, the $7.50 seats for the public rehearsals will be sold at the same place and under the same rules.

On Thursday morning, Sept. 17, at 10 o'clock, the $12 seats for the Saturday evening concerts will be sold at the same place and under the same rules, and the $7.50 concert tickets will be put up in the same way, beginning at 10 o'clock Friday, Sept. 18.

All seats for which no bids are received at these auction sales will be offered at the box office on the Wednesday and Saturday mornings after the two sales, at the advertised prices, and it should be distinctly understood that all the seats will be sold to the highest bidder, whether the premium be small or large in amount, and no attempt will be made to in any way force the premium beyond the figures readily obtained.

In addition to the Boston concerts, the usual series will be given in Cambridge, Providence, New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington, and, in addition, six public rehearsals and six concerts in Brooklyn, under the auspices of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society. The annual western tour will also be made during the spring months.

HIGH PRICES FOR SYMPHONY TICKETS.

A Desirable Seat for the Series of Rehearsals Sells for $111—The Average Price Somewhat Higher than Last Year.

It was just ten o'clock this morning when auctioneer H. W. Jackson ascended the steps leading to the platform of Music Hall and announced to the large audience there assembled that he was ready to receive bids for tickets for the rehearsals for the eleventh concert season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The bidding was lively from the start, a large proportion of the spectators having been patrons of these auction sales since their commencement, and there was an evident desire among many to secure the same seats which they had occupied in former years.

Seat number 1 in section A was sold to Mrs. A. H. Plympton, who paid $9.50 premium on $12, the regular price of the ticket. The prices rose gradually until number 28 was reached, that seat and the three adjoining it bringing $16.60 premium. In section B the prices varied from $13 to $16.50; in section C, from $14.50 to $26; and in section D, from $21.50 to $40. J. H. Hecht purchasing two seats at the last-named price. As Section E was called off the speculators began to bid, and the prices rose as high as $45.50. J. A. Lowell paid $53 for No. 23, an end seat in Section F, while the bidder for No. 24 paid only $20. Mrs. John L. Gardner obtained four seats in Section G at a premium of $53 on each seat, and the first four in the next row brought $30, the highest price in that section being $56.

Number 19 in Section J, which last year brought $150, went today for $111 to G. F. Wadsworth, and this was the highest figure realized at the sale. The next was $102.50, which was paid by C. P. Curtis for an end seat in M. Beyond that section the bids began to fall off, the prices varying from $20 to $15.

It was noticeable that more single seats were sold this year than last, and also that there were many more ladies who purchased largely. The principal ticket speculators were present at the sale, and their bids were among the highest made during the morning. The average price was fifteen per cent higher than at the last auction.

Tomorrow morning at ten o'clock the $7.50 seats for the rehearsals will be disposed of in the same manner, and on Thursday, at the same place, at the same hour, the $12 seats for the concerts will be offered, those for $7.50 to be sold on the day following. All seats for which no bids are received at these sales will be sold at the box office at the advertised prices.

BIDDING FOR SEATS.

Opening of the Sale of Tickets to the Symphony Concerts and Rehearsals.

The auction sales of seats for the symphony rehearsals and concerts, during the season of 1891-1892, was opened this morning in Music Hall, shortly after 10 o'clock.

Auctioneer Jackson, on mounting the platform, found himself before a much larger assemblage than last year, the estimated number being between 400 and 500. He reminded the purchasers that the bids were on the premiums in addition to the regular ticket price. He announced today's sale to consist of the $12 rehearsal tickets, and called for bids on the first seat in row A.

GOOD PRICES FOR THE SYMPHONY TICKETS

The auction sale of the $12 seats for the Symphony concerts was held at Music Hall yesterday morning, but no extraordinary prices were realized, although the average price was far in advance of that of the sale for the rehearsals.

Among the first buyers yesterday were Professor Royce of Cambridge, Arthur Howard Pickering, J. H. Hecht and Arthur Austin, who purchased desirable seats in the front row. These seats varied from $5 to $20, the average price being $10. The highest premium of the morning was $36, which was paid by Mr. Stewart, for seats in Section H. The next price was $29, which was paid for a centre seat in K.

The $7.50 tickets for the concerts will be sold tomorrow at the same hour.

The bidding opened in a spirited manner and was speedily run up towards the $10 mark, but stopped at $8.50. The purchaser, a benevolent looking gentleman, appeared highly elated, but his bargain was bettered by the next buyer, who secured the next seat at a premium of $8.50. The bidding then took an upward start, and the four last seats in the first row to the left of the stage commanded a premium of $16.50.

Row B opened with a sale of two seats at $12.50 premium. The bidding continued to be lively and the management looked happy.

Tomorrow the $7.50 rehearsal seats will be offered; Wednesday the $12 concert seats, and Thursday the $7.50 concert seats.

At 2 o'Clock.

The sale of seats to the Symphony rehearsals has continued all day. As the sale neared the transverse aisle premiums took a boom and went up to $50 to $60. These bids continued, decreasing slightly toward the rear of the hall. The attendance has been on the increase all day.

REHEARSAL TICKETS.

Large Premiums Again Paid at Music Hall.

The sale of the $12 Friday afternoon Symphony rehearsal seats at Music Hall, yesterday, was a greater success in many ways than anything in this line known in the symphony concert records.

The hall was well filled down stairs when the sale began at 10 o'clock, and the buyers were more generally representative of personal interests than in former years. The fashionable speculators (for fashion has drawn its line in this profession as in others), were well supplied with orders, but there were many who have held large commissions in former years who were not as ready to take the risks incidental to "extras" as formerly.

The bidding started off briskly at $9.50 premium for the first corner seats on the front row, and the corresponding seats on the left of the house brought $16.50 each. From these figures the premiums advanced from $20 to $40 for the first half-dozen rows, and then the competition began for the "best" seats, or, in other words, the seats which have brought the highest prices for the last few years.

This competition quickly forced the premium bids over $50, and in two cases to more than double that figure, two seats fetching $102 each, and two others $119 each.

The bidding was steady throughout the day, and practically every seat of the $12 set was sold.

The balcony seats sold well up to those on the floor, and a rough estimate gives a result fully as satisfactory as that of last year.

This morning the $7.50 rehearsal seats will be sold at auction, on Thursday morning, the $12 seats for the Saturday evening concert, and on Friday morning the $7.50 concert seats will be offered in the same way.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The unusually explicit announcements regarding the series of home concerts by the Boston symphony orchestra have been productive of excellent results, and all familiar with this great enterprise in past years express a belief that the success of the coming season will be entirely unprecedented. The various agents who make a business of attending the ticket sales in the interest of their customers all report a very extensive list of orders, and a large proportion of these are given "at discretion," showing a very general determination among the regular attendants to maintain their positions and retain their seats, at whatever expense is made necessary by the competitions incidental to the sales.

It is necessary each year to correct the impression that ladies cannot attend the ticket sales and successfully compete for the purchase of seats. There has been a steady gain in the attendance of ladies in recent years at these sales, and all who desire to be present will find that every effort is made to give them all possible attention.

The bidding is so conducted that the most inexperienced person can readily compete for any seat, and ladies will find that their bids will be carefully watched for by the auctioneer, who never "dwells," or makes any effort to force the premium above its apparent limit.

As already stated, the 24 public rehearsals and concerts will be given on Friday afternoons and Saturday evenings, beginning Oct. 9 and 10, continued each week through the season, with the exceptions of the weeks ending on Saturdays Nov. 7, Dec. 12, Jan. 16, Feb. 13, and March 19.

On Monday morning, Sept. 14, at 10 o'clock, the $12 seats for the public rehearsals will be offered at auction at Music Hall, as in former years, not more than four seats being offered at a single bid, the seats being sold in regular order beginning at the stage line, no bid of less than 25 cents being received, and all seats not called for and paid for immediately being resold without reserve.

On Tuesday morning, Sept. 15, at 10 o'clock, the $7.50 seats for the public rehearsals will be sold at the same place and under the same rules.

On Thursday morning, Sept. 17, at 10 o'clock, the $12 seats for the Saturday evening concerts will be sold at the same place and under the same rules, and the $7.50 concert tickets will be put up in the same way, beginning at 10 o'clock Friday, Sept. 18.

All seats for which no bids are received at these auction sales will be offered at the box office on the Wednesday and Saturday mornings after the two sales at the advertised prices.

Symphony Tickets All Gone.

About seventy-five tickets for the Symphony Concerts were left over from the auction sale of Thursday and yesterday, and when the box office at Music Hall was opened at eight o'clock this morning there were about fifty people already in line. Some of these were anxious to secure tickets for the rehearsals and turned away much disappointed when they learned that there were none left. The few tickets remaining were purchased during the forenoon.

PRICES NOT SO HIGH AS LAST YEAR.

Second Day's Auction Sale of Symphony Rehearsal Tickets.

There was even a larger attendance than yesterday at the auction sale of the Symphony concert rehearsal seats, which opened this morning at ten o'clock, at Music Hall. The best seats were disposed of yesterday, and those offered today were the lot for which a premium was asked over $7.50. The first seat offered by Auctioneer Jackson was numbered 1152, and was at the end of the first section under the lower balcony. It brought $12, and the prices along the row ranged from that figure to $8.50. The seats directly under the balcony brought much less than at last year's sale, the highest price today being $7.50 and the lowest twenty-five cents, while several were not bid for at all. Considerable amusement was caused when the centre seat in the last row, next to those which had just been checked off at thirty-five cents each, was carried up to $5, there being two eager bidders for that desired spot. An elderly lady became its proud possessor, and bore off the ticket in triumph, but not before the next three seats had been declared sold at seventy-five cents premium. The prices realized for this section of the hall were said by the speculators to be far behind those of last year. The back rows of seats in the balcony brought from $17.50 to $5, most of the seats being sold singly. The tickets left over from these auctions will be sold at the box office tomorrow, and the sale for the concerts will be opened at ten o'clock Thursday.

MUSICIANS BUY SYMPHONY TICKETS.

This Season's Sale Pronounced More Satisfactory than That of Last Year.

The largest audience of the week gathered in Music Hall this morning for the last auction sale of seats for the Symphony Concerts. The bidding was brisk from ten until nearly one o'clock, only about twenty-five seats being left at the conclusion of the sale. The first seats offered were those on the floor under the balcony, a few of them bringing as high as $4, while several in the last row went for seventy-five, fifty and twenty-five cents, and some were not bid for at all. A repetition of the amusing incident of Tuesday took place when two individuals who were desirous of securing the same seat in this section, bid against one another until the price went up to $6.50, while the seats on each side sold for twenty-five cents premium. The $7.50 seats in the balconies brought excellent prices, no large figure being realized, but every seat was sold and none brought less than $4, while a few sold for $15. The average figure was about $10. On the whole the sale was much more satisfactory than that of last year. Among the purchasers today were Mr. and Mrs. C. N. Allen, Miss Gertrude Edmonds, Alfred De Seve, Miss Harriet Whittier and Rev. Samuel J. Barrows.

SOME GOOD PREMIUMS.

Continued Sale of Symphony Concert Seats—Musical People on Hand.

Auctioneer Jackson struck off the $12 seats for the Saturday night concerts of the Symphony Orchestra at Music Hall, yesterday morning. Many well-known musical people of the city were in attendance and took part in the bidding.

The attendance was hardly as large as at the sale of $12 seats for public rehearsals the first day, yet few seats remained unsold, though the average receipts of the morning's sale did not equal that for the rehearsals.

A seat which sold to an enthusiast last Monday for the rehearsals at a premium of $111 went off easily at $18. As far back as row N, the largest premium paid for a seat was $36 in row H.

Prof. Royce of Harvard located himself and friends in row E, and Arthur Austin, the broker, took four seats in E at $13.50 premium. A. H. Pickering, the author, took seats half way back in the hall. J. H. Hecht, the wool merchant, who was a liberal purchaser last Monday for rehearsal seats, took several.

The average sales in the morning were at a premium of $10 and $12.

UNIFORMLY GOOD PRICES.

No Extraordinary Premiums Were Paid at this Morning's Sale of Symphony Tickets.

The auction sale of $12 seats for the Symphony Concerts began at ten o'clock this morning at Music Hall with a small audience in attendance, which increased considerably as the sale progressed. There was a large number of well-known musical and society people present, many of whom have become regular patrons of the sales and concerts. Auctioneer Jackson's efforts on Monday and Tuesday have nearly deprived him of his voice, and at times this morning it was almost impossible to hear his words.

Among the first buyers today were Professor Royce of Cambridge, Arthur Howard Pickering, J. H. Hecht and Arthur Austin, who purchased desirable seats in the front row. These seats varied from $5 to $20, the average price being $10. The highest premium of the morning was $36, which was paid by Mr. Stewart for seats in section H. The next price was $28, which was paid for a centre seat in K.

The premiums did not run nearly as high as at the sale for the rehearsals, but the average price was far in advance of that at the former sale. Beyond row M the prices kept uniformly good, and ranged from $15 to $20. The bidding was regular and the speculators did considerable buying for their out-of-town patrons.

The $7.50 tickets for the concerts will be sold tomorrow at the same hour.

SYMPHONY TICKETS

For sale by GEO. W. STEWART, 120 Tremont street, Room 97. to [A] s 15

ARTHUR NIKISCH.

THE SYMPHONY TICKETS.

The Symphony Concerts have grown in ten years to occupy such a prominent place in the musical life of the city that surprise no longer is manifested when the reports of the auction sales of season tickets appear. Yesterday, when the sale of seats for the eleventh season began, there was evidence that the desire of music lovers to share in the weekly feast was as great as ever; while the willingness of individuals to pay for positions specially to their liking was again generously expressed. It may not be necessary to answer the objections of those who see, or think they see, in these large premiums a perversion of the avowed purpose of the concerts—to provide the best performances of high-class orchestra music at the lowest price. But as, judging from the experiences of former years, complaints on this score are likely to arise, it is well to point out that after all these high premiums do not affect the general public sensibly. Last year's sales showed these results:

Rehearsal tickets—
$12.00	range of premiums,	$9.00 to $150.00
do.	average	do.	26.90
7.50	range	do.	4.00 to 27.00
do.	average	do.	13.87
Both grades	do.	cost	$34.11
Concert tickets—
$12.00	range of premiums,	25c to $39.00
do.	average	do.	11.19
7.50	range	do.	25c to 15.50
do.	average	do.	4.88
Both grades	do.	cost	$18.83

The grand total of receipts, including admission tickets for both series, twenty-four public rehearsals and twenty-four concerts, was figured to be $114,841, and the attendance was estimated at 128,534, showing that the average cost of a ticket was less than a dollar. Taking the sales of season tickets by themselves, with and without premium, the price of a seat at a public rehearsal was less than $1.50, and for one at a concert about 75 cents. It is further to be noted that the auction sales offer an equal chance to everyone. The premiums paid by the rich make possible the lower rates paid by the students and other music-lovers of moderate means, while assuring the continuance of the concerts as a self-supporting if not profitable business enterprise. The auction sale is certainly in all ways a great improvement on the employment of les misérables to capture luxury for us—forming the pitiful and repulsive mob which used to gather on Winter street when the window sale was the only method followed; and it is not unlikely that buyers get their seats at lower prices than when they had to depend on the services of ragged men and boys or the good will of intermediary speculators. The buyers for a possible profit are still in the field, but they no longer control the business.

REHEARSAL.

After filling orders for SYMPHONY REHEARSALS, MR. CONNELLY, Theatre Ticket Office, Adams House, has a few choice seats left on the floor and in the balcony, which should be applied for at once.

SYMPHONY TICKETS FOR FRIDAY AFTERNOON REHEARSALS AND SATURDAY EVENING CONCERTS. Choice Seats, Floor and Balconies, Ten to Thirty Dollars. Apply to GEORGE B. APPLETON & CO., 304 Washington St.

SYMPHONY.

One-half interest in two choice seats, first balcony, for sale, $16. A., P. O. Box 341. 117(A) $19

Symphony Tickets.

In good locations, at reasonable prices, at RUB. SELL'S, 10 Hamilton place. 8TuTh(A) $19

Symphony Concerts.

Two good seats on floor for alternate nights—$10 each. Address K. M. M., Transcript Office. 117(A) $19

SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Desirable seats, second balcony, front row. Address C. L. O., Transcript Office. (A) 217 $18

TWO SYMPHONY REHEARSAL TICKETS, P. 23 and 30. Price $50 each. Address WARREN, Box 6089, Boston. 117(A) $19

Symphony Rehearsals.

FOR SALE—Two very desirable seats on the floor. Address M. E. J., 118 Devonshire street, Room 5. 8Tu(A) $19

SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

FOR SALE—Two Symphony Concert tickets (single seats), third row, first balcony, half-way down on the left of the stage. $15 each. Address P. O. Box 1146. 117(A) $14

SYMPHONY TICKETS

For sale by GEO. W. STEWART, 129 Tremont street, Room 97. 16(A) $18

People are looking back to Gerike's rule as the golden—if it was the iron one—of the orchestra. His firm hand would have tapped with his baton that saucy third violin, especially, who is altogether too much the petted darling to do justice to his work without some such reminder.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Symphony Concerts Another Financial Success.

The Worcester Festival—A Brilliant Scheme of Programmes—The New Departure of the New England Conservatory—Notable Opera Productions—Entertainment Courses—Notes.

The Boston Symphony orchestra has in the last few years come to be an institution of well-nigh national reputation, and the success attending its annual series of concerts interests a vast public scattered throughout the States.

It will gratify those who have been absent from the city during the week's sales at Music Hall, to know that for the fourth consecutive year every seat for every one of the 24 Friday afternoon public rehearsals, as well as for the 24 Saturday evening concerts, has been sold.

Such a result is again the best practical demonstration of the interest taken by the Boston public in the orchestra, its conductor and the work to be accomplished during the coming season. The maintenance of the orchestra, as is well known, is the private undertaking of a private citizen, and, however great a public interest there may be in facts and figures relating to this enterprise, it will be readily seen that no official statement can be made as to the actual financial results of the concerts.

Even the most persistent attendants upon the sales cannot give reliable figures, but the most careful estimate of the receipts shows that fully $100,000 has been paid into the Music Hall box office for the coming Symphony season, and, in round numbers, this means an average payment of $1 per seat for each concert for each attendant.

It would be well for those who take opportunities to cry down the financial side of this enterprise to keep these figures in mind, as well as to remember that, in addition to the 100,000 seats provided at the rate of $1 each, there are about 12,000 seats sold during the season, at the rehearsals, at 25 cents each, with nearly as many more admissions both at the rehearsals and concerts at the same figure.

The first of the rehearsals occurs Friday Afternoon, Oct. 9, and the first concert Saturday evening, Oct. 10.

SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The Auction Sale of Seats Again Results Successfully.

The attendance at Music Hall yesterday, upon the occasion of the auction sale of the $12 seats for the Saturday evening concerts of the Symphony orchestra, lacked the excitement attendant upon the sales of the rehearsal seats, but, nevertheless, the results were every way satisfactory. At the start the sale looked a little discouraging as the first seat went at a premium of 25 cents, and until the 5 o'clock was reached the bids averaged little more than $5. It was noticeable that the full limit of four seats was usually filled by every buyer, and this fact may explain the greater sociability which is characteristic of the concert audiences as compared with those of the rehearsals.

After 5 o'clock the bidding advanced, and the seats on the floor were bought up so speedily that all below the balconies had been sold by 1:30 o'clock, thus making the greatest time record in the history of these concerts. The balcony seats went off in the same spirited fashion, and at 3:20 P. M. every one of the $12 seats had been sold and paid for.

A rough estimate of the prices got indicates that the gross receipts were well up to those of last year. This morning the $7.50 seats for the concerts will be sold at auction.

Nordica

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1891-92.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

I. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 10, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

BEETHOVEN.

OVERTURE, "Dedication of the House."

BEETHOVEN.

ARIA, "Ah Perfido."

WAGNER.

GOOD FRIDAY SPELL, from "Parsifal."

WAGNER.

ARIA, "Hall of Song," from "Tannhaeuser."

SCHUMANN.

SYMPHONY No. 3, in E flat, (Rhenish), op. 97.
Vivace.—Molto moderato.—Andante.—
Religioso.—Vivace.

SOLOIST:

MME. LILLIAN NORDICA.

NORDICA.

SYMPHONIES BEGIN.

adv!

A NOBLE PROGRAMME FOR THE FIRST.

Beethoven's "Dedication of the House" the First Number Performed—Mme. Nordica, the Soloist, in Good Voice—"Good Friday's Spell" One of the Most Beautiful Numbers

A crowd of musical and fashionable life, a long line of standing auditors fringing the edges of the hall, and a cordial welcome to Mr. Nikisch, were foregone conclusions at the first symphony concert of the season, on Saturday night. During Mr. Henschel's regime it was customary to begin each season with Beethoven's "Dedication of the House" overture, and now Mr. Nikisch has piously returned to this custom as a musical means of saying grace. I suppose that every musical auditor said "amen" to it for, with all the defects inseparable from the first concert, the programme of noble music was as refreshing as rain upon a thirsty land. The Beethoven overture received a broad reading, just a trifle exaggerated in its slow passages, but the contrapuntal finale went right merrily, and with a virility that would have excused much greater shortcomings than there were to condone. Mr. Nikisch must, however, carefully guard the line which lies between breadth and bombast, for with Beethoven and Wagner it is only too easy to pass the frontier without knowing it. A word of praise must be given to the bassoonist for the execution of the florid work in this overture.

One can learn in Italy how to sing the music of Germany. Mme. Albani once told me that she attributed her successes in Wagnerian roles to her Milanese studies, and at this concert Mme. Nordica proved that her studies in the Italian school had not unfitted her for the massive German style. In the dramatic aria, "Ah Perfido," her intonation was always pure and the ensemble throughout undisturbed, while the richness of her tones in lower register was such as few sopranos possess. Yet the higher and intensely vehement passages left something to be desired, and they did not sit quite easily upon the singer; it seemed rather a task well accomplished than a spontaneous outpouring of emotion. In the "Greeting to the Hall," from "Tannhauser," there was more success, the voice being pure at all times and the climax of great power. This number evoked considerable enthusiasm, the singer being twice recalled.

"Good Friday's Spell," from "Parsifal," was as beautiful as any number on the programme. This scarcely loses by disassociation from its stage accessories; in fact, to some there is a distinct gain in obliterating the view of Kundry as Mary Magdalen wiping the feet of Parsifal (who is palpably intended to represent the Saviour) with her hair, and the baptism of Kundry by Parsifal (not "Parsifal's baptism by Kundry," as the programme book had it), since these scenes are scarcely fitted for representation at the hands of any actors, unless, possibly, those at Ober-Ammergau. In the performance the brasses were at least once a little too blatant. It is a popular idea that Wagner cannot be played too loudly, but as an actual fact one will find a full volume of tone a hundred times, in a Bayreuth performance, where one finds mere loudness a single time. It is about time that the vulgar idea of Wagner as a tonal ogre, an idea fostered by the lower order of witlings most assiduously, should be corrected. The culprit's name is Berlioz, not Wagner. When Berlioz received a government contract in the musical line, (it was for a "Te Deum,") he called for a whole regiment of noise-producers, scarcely stopping short of a Gilmorean park of artillery; when Wagner had all Germany, from a king to thousands of musicians, at his feet, when he might have had an orchestra of 1000 at a word, he chose only 116 men as a maximum, and often dropped much below this number.

But the blatancy of the brasses alluded to, was only temporary, and the good shading of the latter part of the number calls for recognition. Mr. Nikisch was especially successful in his accentuation of the figures with which this portion of the opera teems, so that the leitmotiven could be followed by all who knew of their existence. With Schumann's Cologne symphony the concert closed. Just as the B-flat symphony gave expression to the first great joy in Schumann's career, so this E-flat symphony tells of the last; they are the sunrise and sunset of his life, for while the former speaks of spring and love, of the happy consummation of his courtship of Clara Wieck, so this symphony tells of the happy change from Leipzig to the Rhine country, and the brightness of his hopes there. It would be presumption to trace such close connection between the works and the lives of other composers, but with Schumann it may be done without sentimentalizing, for he confessedly wrote his own career with much detail into his music.

But if one finds joy in the work, one will never find jollity, for Schumann never gave vent to animal spirits as did Beethoven, whose whole eighth symphony is a brusque scherzo. Even in the scherzo of this Rhenish symphony, there is a little of Eusebius (as Schumann called the dreamy side of the nature) present, and the last movement, where the glorious outdoor life of the Rhine valley is depicted, is full of bustle rather than of hilarity; it is the subjective Schumann bending even an objective tone-picture to his own character. The work was well read and reasonably well played; somehow Mr. Nikisch seems to enter with keener appreciation into the dual character of Schumann's works than any of our other conductors have done. No wonder then that the interest was sustained to the end, and that very few left before the last movement, although there is a contingent which would leave before the last movement, even if the programme consisted only of a Corelli two-movement sonata.

Next week we are to have "Hamlet," with the part of Hamlet omitted! The symphonic programme is to consist of a string quartette magnified into orchestral proportions, a little of the new Mascagni opera, a few songs with piano accompaniment and a French overture. But a Tchaikowsky suite may be sufficient sop to the classicists to allow the symphonic title still to cover it. Louis C. ELSON.

MUSICAL. Gazette

The Symphony Concert.

The first concert of the eleventh season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, last night, was listened to by a large audience. Mr. Nikisch was cordially welcomed when he came forward to take his place at the conductor's stand. The orchestral part of the programme consisted of Beethoven's "Dedication of the House" overture, the "Good Friday Spell" from Wagner's "Parsifal," and Schumann's "Rhenish" Symphony. The work of the orchestra was not up to its best standard, and was ragged and undecided here and there; the result doubtless, of its six months freedom from discipline, and shortcomings that will, of course, disappear presently. The Wagner selection was given with much warmth of tone color, and impressiveness in vigorous contrast of effects. The Beethoven overture was read somewhat affectedly, but without rendering its monotonous tonality any more interesting. The soloist was Mme. Lillian Nordica, who sang Beethoven's "Ah, Perfidio" (the "O Hall of Song" from Wagner's "Tannhäuser"). The artist was overweighted by the Beethoven aria, which needs a larger, broader, and warmer style than she possesses. It is a work wholly unfavorable to a voice cold and metallic in quality, and she sang it in a manner both unsympathetic and unimpressive. In the Wagner song she was scarcely more successful. There was a recall after the first selection, and two recalls after the second. The programme was not especially brilliant, in fact was somewhat dull, and there was less of enthusiasm on the part of the audience than has been customary at the opening concerts of the orchestra. The selections for the next concert are: Suite, op. 55, Tchaikowsky, (first time); Prelude from "Rustic Chivalry," Mascagni (first time); Minuet and Finale, from string quartet, op. 59, No. 3, played by all the strings (first time), and Massenet's overture to "Phedre." The soloist is to be Mr. W. J. Winch, who will sing the solo in the Mascagni prelude, and a group of songs with piano.

The first Symphony Concert drew an enormous audience to Music Hall last Saturday night. A warm greeting was awarded to both Mr. Nikisch and Mme. Nordica. Nordica looked like a picture in beautiful white brocaded satin, with an Elizabethan ruff, and magnificent diamonds. Among the audience were noticed Mr. and Mrs. Barthold Schlesinger, Miss Schlesinger, Dr. and Mrs. Frank Watson, Mr. Frank Jackson, Mr. and Mrs. B. J. Lang, Miss Lang, Mr. J. S. Dwight, Mr. and Mrs. W. J. Winch, Mr. Arthur Foote, Mrs. Mark Hollingsworth, Miss White, Mr. Hiram Tucker, Mr. J. Edward Priest, Mr. A. H. Pickering, Mr. and Mrs. H. M. Rogers, Dr. George Monks, Mr. I. M. Gaugengigl, Mrs. W. F. Apthorp, Mrs. Phoebe Jenks, Mr. and Mrs. Elliot Hubbard, Miss Stackpole, Dr. Donald White, Mr. and Mrs. F. J. Bradlee, Mrs. Flake Warren, Mrs. Samuel D. Warren, Dr. and Mrs. Olla, and Mrs. Julius Elchberg.

The opening Symphony concert of the winter at Music Hall last week Saturday night, brought out the regular patrons in goodly numbers, who, most of them, occupied seats in the same old locality which they have favored since the first season. The little musical group, smaller, in numbers, however, owing to the absence of several of that set in Europe, occupied seats in the right-hand balcony, near the stage, Mr. and Mrs. Lang, Mr. and Mrs. Apthorp, Mr. and Mrs. Hiram Tucker, Mrs. Gardner and Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Foote being of the number, while in the opposite balcony the corresponding seats were filled by Mr. S. B. Whitney, Mr. and Mrs. George L. Osgood, Mr. and Mrs. C. N. Allen, Miss Gertrude Edmunds, Mr. Bernard Listemann, Mr. Percival Gassett and other equally well-known musical people. On the floor of the hall, in their accustomed seats, were Mr. and Mrs. H. L. Higginson, Mr. and Mrs. E. W. Codman, Mme. Agassiz, Dr. and Mrs. F. S. Watson, Mr. and Mrs. Barthold Schlesinger and daughters, Mr. and Mrs. J. T. Morse, Jr., Mr. and Mrs. W. B. Parker, Mrs. Templeman Coolidge, with her uncle, Dr. Sturgis Bigelow; Miss Lowell, Mr. and Mrs. Edward R. Andrews, Mr. Frank Jackson, Mr. Gaugengigl, Mr. A. H. Pickering, Mr. and Mrs. Henry M. Rogers, Mr. and Mrs. C. A. Cummings, Mr. and Mrs. J. H. Hecht, Mr. Arthur Austin, Miss Austin and Mr. Jules Jordan, the tenor, who came up from Providence. Mme. Nordica looked every inch a queen in a heavy cream-white brocade, with an openwork Elizabethan collar sewn with pearls. Her fine diamonds glistened from hair, throat and corsage. Her reception was most flattering, as it was Monday night also at the Star course.

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The first symphony concert of the season was given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, the programme being:

Beethoven: Overture, "Zur Weihe des Hauses," Op. 124.
Beethoven: Scena and Aria, "Ahl perfido," Op. 65.
Wagner: Good Friday Spell from "Parsifal."
Wagner: "Sei mir gegrüsst, du liebe Halle," from "Tannhäuser."
Schumann: Symphony No. 3, in E-flat (Rhenish), Op. 97.
Mme. Lillian Nordica was the singer.

Since 1822 Beethoven's "Weihe des Hauses" overture has served to open a good many things besides the Josephstädter Theater, for which it was written; it has ushered in not a few musical seasons, as it did on Saturday evening. Now and then some people complain a little of this time-honored custom—for to begin a course of concerts with the "Weihe des Hauses" may almost be called a custom—but it is hard to see any reasonable ground for complaint. It is a noble overture, one that does not pall upon the musical palate by repeated hearing every twelvemonth or so. The stately opening, Maestoso e sostenuto, has all the solemn pomp of an "inaugural address" (and a good deal more stuff in it than most addresses of the sort), while the contrapuntal style of the Allegro con brio, with its quasi-Handelian theme, makes the movement a sort of musical expression of that "Res severa est verum gaudium" which stands written on the walls of the Gewandhaus concert room in Leipzig—a most excellent motto for symphony concert-goers to bear in mind. But it seems as if some people kicked against a custom simply because of its being a custom. Few listeners last Saturday evening, however, can have got anything but pleasure from the really superb performance of this overture. Our orchestra has seldom done a finer piece of playing.

After hearing Wagner's "Good Friday Spell" in its proper place in "Parsifal"—whether at the Bayreuth theatre or in concertrooms elsewhere matters little—one likes less and less to hear it given separately, as a "number" on a symphony programme. We can hardly recall anything else in music the true character of which is so totally changed by being given out of its natural surroundings. Berlioz used to say that, whenever he gave the whole of his own "Harold" symphony, the Pilgrims' March was pretty sure of an encore; but that when he gave the March alone, it hardly ever got a hand. The "Good Friday Spell" is even a stronger example of the same principle; for some reason not easily to be explained, it loses all its calm, pastoral character when given separately. The performance, too, on Saturday evening, although good in the main, still left something to be desired in point of delicacy and repose, especially in the wind instruments.

The noble Schumann Symphony, on the other hand, went grandly. The "Cathedral" movement was even more than commonly impressive. We own to liking the first movement to go a little slower than Mr. Nikisch takes it; in taking 3-4 time too fast one runs the risk of effacing its true triple character; the listener no longer finds himself impelled to count, "one, two, three," but his ear instinctively tends to accept the dotted half-note as the rhythmic unit, instead of the quarter-note. No one inclines to count "one, two, three" in his head in listening to a Strauss waltz or a Beethoven scherzo; but he distinctly does so incline while hearing a Haydn minuet. Of course, in the case of this Vivace movement of Schumann's, it may be an open question which rhythmic unit is really the true one; whether the listener should be impelled to count one beat to a measure, or three. It should be remembered, however, that Schumann's indication "Vivace" does not, of itself, furnish any solution of the question; for, by taking the tempo just slow enough to admit of the ear's accepting the quarter-note as the unit, you would give the impression of a quicker beat, and hence of greater vivacity of movement, than if you played it so that the ear instinctively counted only one to every dotted half-note. Be the true solution what it may in this particular case, Mr. Nikisch's tempo is by no means indefensible; he certainly knows how to make it effective.

Mme. Nordica sang the "Ahl perfido" in superb voice, and with no little artistic savoir-faire. In sentiment her singing seemed rather superficial, as lacking the true Beethoven earnestness and warmth of passion—we liked her best in the more brilliant parts of the quick movement—but the skilled singer was manifest in almost all she did. In the "Tannhäuser" selection she seemed more in sympathy with the music, and sang very effectively. But it is hard to see how anyone can choose this short and little-developed apostrophe of Elisabeth's for concert performance. In the opera it is a brilliant and inspiring opening to a long scene; but, taken by itself, it is rather insignificant. The audience did not seem to think so, however, for Mme. Nordica was twice recalled after it.

Mr. Nikisch was greeted with enthusiastic applause as he stepped up to the conductor's desk at the beginning of the concert.

The next programme is: Tchaikowsky, suite, Op. 55; Mascagni, prelude to "Cavalleria Rusticana;" Beethoven, minuet and finale from string quartet in C, Op. 59, No. 3; Songs with pianoforte; Massenet, overture to "Phedre." Mr. William J. Winch will be the singer.

SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

FOR SALE—One Ticket in B, near centre. Price, $30. Address W. M. Godding's Apothecary, corner Dartmouth and Newbury streets. 11(A) o 10

SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Wanted, two Symphony Concert tickets on floor, between E and cross aisle and between 14 and 30; reply, stating lowest price and number of seats; must be together. Address C. R., Brookline, Mass. ThSM(A) o 8

...The auctions of the Symphony tickets next week will bring people back to town who won't come for nothing else.

symphonic programme is to consist of a string quartette magnified into orchestral proportions, a little of the new Mascagni opera, a few songs with piano accompaniment and a French overture. But a Tschalkowsky suite may be sufficient sop to the classicists to allow the symphonic title still to cover it. LOUIS C. ELSON.

MUSICAL. Gazette

The Symphony Concert.

The first concert of the eleventh season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, last night, was listened to by a large audience. Mr. Nikisch was cordially welcomed when he came forward to take his place at the conductor's stand. The orchestral part of the programme consisted of Beethoven's "Dedication of the House" overture, the "Good Friday Spell" from Wagner's "Parsifal," and Schumann's "Rhenish" Symphony. The work of the orchestra was not up to its best standard, and was ragged and undecided here and there; the result doubtless, of its six months freedom from discipline, and shortcomings that will, of course, disappear presently. The Wagner selection was given with much warmth of tone color, and impressiveness in vigorous contrast of effects. The Beethoven overture was read somewhat affectedly, but without rendering its monotonous tonality any more interesting. The soloist was Mme. Lillian Nordica, who sang Beethoven's "Ah, Perfidio" the "O Hall of Song" from Wagner's "Tannhäuser." The artist was overweighted by the Beethoven aria, which needs a larger, broader, and warmer style than she possesses. It is a work wholly unfavorable to a voice cold and metallic in quality, and she sang it in a manner both unsympathetic and unimpressive. In the Wagner song she was scarcely more successful. There was a recall after the first selection, and two recalls after the second. The programme was not especially brilliant, in fact was somewhat dull, and there was less of enthusiasm on the part of the audience than has been customary at the opening concerts of the orchestra. The selections for the next concert are: Suite, op. 55, Tschalkowsky, (first time); Prelude from "Rustic Chivalry," Mascagni (first time); Minuet and Finale, from string quartet, op. 59, No. 3, played by all the strings (first time), and Massenet's overture to "Phedre." The soloist is to be Mr. W. J. Winch, who will sing the solo in the Mascagni prelude, and a group of songs with piano.

— The first Symphony Concert drew an enormous audience to Music Hall last Saturday night. A warm greeting was awarded to both Mr. Nikisch and Mme. Nordica. Nordica looked like a picture in beautiful white brocaded satin, with an Elizabethan ruff, and magnificent diamonds. Among the audience were noticed Mr. and Mrs. Barthold Schlesinger, Miss Schlesinger, Dr. and Mrs. Frank Watson, Mr. Frank Jackson, Mr. and Mrs. B. J. Lang, Miss Lang, Mr. J. S. Dwight, Mr. and Mrs. W. J. Winch, Mr. Arthur Foote, Mrs. Mark Hollingsworth, Miss White, Mr. Hiram Tucker, Mr. J. Edward Priest, Mr. A. H. Pickering, Mr. and Mrs. H. M. Rogers, Dr. George Monks, Mr. I. M. Gaugengigl, Mrs. W. F. Apthorp, Mrs. Phoebe Jenks, Mr. and Mrs. Elliot Hubbard, Miss Stackpole, Dr. Donald White, Mr. and Mrs. F. J. Bradley, Mrs. Fiske Warren, Mrs. Samuel D. Warren, Dr. and Mrs. Oils, and Mrs. Julius Eichberg.

— The opening Symphony concert of the winter at Music Hall last week Saturday night, brought out the regular patrons in goodly numbers, who, most of them, occupied seats in the same old locality which they have favored since the first season. The little musical group, smaller, in numbers, however, owing to the absence of several of that set in Europe, occupied seats in the right-hand balcony, near the stage, Mr. and Mrs. Lang, Mr. and Mrs. Apthorp, Mr. and Mrs. Hiram Tucker, Mrs. Gardner and Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Foote being of the number, while in the opposite balcony the corresponding seats were filled by Mr. S. B. Whitney, Mr. and Mrs. George L. Osgood, Mr. and Mrs. C. N. Allen, Miss Gertrude Edmunds, Mr. Bernard Listemann, Mr. Percival Gassett and other equally well-known musical people. On the floor of the hall, in their accustomed seats, were Mr. and Mrs. H. L. Higginson, Mr. and Mrs. E. W. Codman, Mme. Agassiz, Dr. and Mrs. F. S. Watson, Mr. and Mrs. Barthold Schlesinger and daughters, Mr. and Mrs. J. T. Morse, Jr., Mr. and Mrs. W. B. Parker, Mrs. Templeman Coolidge, with her uncle, Dr. Sturgis Bigelow; Miss Lowell, Mr. and Mrs. Edward R. Andrews, Mr. Frank Jackson, Mr. Gaugengigl, Mr. A. H. Pickering, Mr. and Mrs. Henry M. Rogers, Mr. and Mrs. C. A. Cummings, Mr. and Mrs. J. H. Hecht, Mr. Arthur Austin, Miss Austin and Mr. Jules Jordan, the tenor, who came up from Providence. Mme. Nordica looked every inch a queen in a heavy cream-white brocade, with an openwork Elizabethan collar sewn with pearls. Her fine diamonds glistened from hair, throat and corsage. Her reception was most flattering, as it was Monday night also at the Star course.

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The first symphony concert of the season was given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, the programme being:

Beethoven: Overture, "Zur Weihe des Hauses," Op. 124.
Beethoven: Scena and Aria, "Ah! perfido," Op. 65.
Wagner: Good Friday Spell from "Parsifal."
Wagner: "Sei mir gegrüsst, du liebe Halle," from "Tannhäuser."
Schumann: Symphony No. 3, in E-flat (Rhenish), Op. 97.
Mme. Lillian Nordica was the singer.

Since 1822 Beethoven's "Weihe des Hauses" overture has served to open a good many things besides the Josephstädter Theater, for which it was written; it has ushered in not a few musical seasons, as it did on Saturday evening. Now and then some people complain a little of this time-honored custom—for to begin a course of concerts with the "Weihe des Hauses" may almost be called a custom—but it is hard to see any reasonable ground for complaint. It is a noble overture, one that does not pall upon the musical palate by repeated hearing every twelvemonth or so. The stately opening, Maestoso e sostenuto, has all the solemn pomp of an "inaugural address" (and a good deal more stuff in it than most addresses of the sort), while the contrapuntal style of the Allegro con brio, with its quasi Handel theme, makes the movement a sort of musical expression of that "Res severa est verum gaudium" which stands written on the walls of the Gewandhaus concert room in Leipzig—a most excellent motto for symphony concert-goers to bear in mind. But it seems as if some people kicked against a custom simply because of its being a custom. Few listeners last Saturday evening, however, can have got anything but pleasure from the really superb performance of this overture. Our orchestra has seldom done a finer piece of playing.

After hearing Wagner's "Good Friday Spell" in its proper place in "Parsifal"—whether at the Bayreuth theatre or in concert rooms elsewhere matters little—one likes less and less to hear it given separately, as a "number" on a symphony programme. We can hardly recall anything else in music the true character of which is so totally changed by being given out of its natural surroundings. Berlioz used to say that, whenever he gave the whole of his own "Harold" symphony, the Pilgrims' March was pretty sure of an encore; but that when he gave the March alone, it hardly ever got a hand. The "Good Friday Spell" is even a stronger example of the same principle; for some reason not easily to be explained, it loses all its calm, pastoral character when given separately. The performance, too, on Saturday evening, although good in the main, still left something to be desired in point of delicacy and repose, especially in the wind instruments.

The noble Schumann Symphony, on the other hand, went grandly. The "Cathedral" movement was even more than commonly impressive. We own to liking the first movement to go a little slower than Mr. Nikisch takes it; in taking 3-4 times too fast one runs the risk of effacing its true triple character; the listener no longer finds himself impelled to count, "one, two, three," but his ear instinctively tends to accept the dotted half-note as the rhythmic unit, instead of the quarter-note. No one inclines to count "one, two, three" in his head in listening to a Strauss waltz or a Beethoven scherzo; but he distinctly does so incline while hearing a Haydn minuet. Of course, in the case of this Vivace movement of Schumann's, it may be an open question which rhythmic unit is really the true one; whether the listener should be impelled to count one beat to a measure, or three. It should be remembered, however, that Schumann's indication "Vivace" does not, of itself, furnish any solution of the question; for, by taking the tempo just slow enough to admit of the ear's accepting the quarter-note as the unit, you would give the impression of a quicker beat, and hence of greater vivacity of movement, than if you played it so that the ear instinctively counted only one to every dotted half-note. Be the true solution what it may in this particular case, Mr. Nikisch's tempo is by no means indefensible; he certainly knows how to make it effective.

Mme. Nordica sang the "Ah! perfido" in superb voice, and with no little artistic savoir faire. In sentiment her singing seemed rather superficial, as lacking the true Beethoven earnestness and warmth of passion—we liked her best in the more brilliant parts of the quick movement—but the skilled singer was manifest in almost all she did. In the "Tannhäuser" selection she seemed more in sympathy with the music, and sang very effectively. But it is hard to see how anyone can choose this short and little-developed apostrophe of Elisabeth's for concert performance. In the opera it is a brilliant and inspiring opening to a long scene; but, taken by itself, it is rather insignificant. The audience did not seem to think so, however, for Mme. Nordica was twice recalled after it.

Mr. Nikisch was greeted with enthusiastic applause as he stepped up to the conductor's desk at the beginning of the concert.

The next programme is: Tschalkowski, suite, Op. 55; Mascagni, prelude to "Cavalleria Rusticana;" Beethoven, minuet and finale from string quartet in C, Op. 59, No. 3; Songs with pianoforte; Massenet, overture to "Phedre." Mr. William J. Winch will be the singer.

SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

FOR SALE—One Ticket in R, near centre. Price, $30. Address W. M., Godding's Apothecary, corner Dartmouth and Newbury streets. 11[A] o 10

SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Wanted, two Symphony Concert tickets on floor, between E and cross aisle and between 14 and 30; reply, stating lowest price and number of seats; must be together. Address C. R., Brookline, Mass. ThSM[A] o 8

...The auctions of the Symphony tickets next week will bring people back to town who won't come for nothing else.

MADAME NORDICA.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

Herald

First Symphony Concert, Soloist Mme. Nordica.

"Wang," "Ship Ahoy," "Indigo" and "Cavalleria Rusticana" All to Be Heard This Week—Mme. Laura Schirmer-Mapleson's Re-entrance in "Lucia"—News, Gossip and Comment

The formal opening of the 11th season of the concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra occurred at Music Hall last evening. The event, like similar ones in former years, showed the great popularity of the orchestra with the local public, and again the seats of the hall were filled by representatives of the highest artistic and social circles. Mr. Arthur Nikisch is again conductor, and his own personal popularity was freshly attested by the ovation with which he was greeted upon his entrance.

But few changes were noticeable in the makeup of the organization. Here and there a familiar face was missed, but the leaders of the separate parts of the band are mainly the same, and wherever changes have been made the men appear to have been well chosen. Mr. Nikisch introduced his programme by a most acceptable performance of the Beethoven overture, "Dedication of the House." The composition was well chosen to show the command which Mr. Nikisch has already gained over his forces, and its performance displayed the excellence of the orchestra to splendid advantage.

The other orchestral features of the programme were the "Good Friday Spell" and Schumann's symphony No. 8 (the Rhenish). The Wagner selection was played in much the fashion that is expected in Mr. Nikisch's reading of such selections. While not altogether satisfying, its performance showed a fine command over the players, an intelligent understanding of the composition, and many excellencies in detail, which went far to atone for the lack of sentiment and feeling demanded in a perfect interpretation of this number.

The Schumann symphony was read with splendid results throughout, and several movements were admirably interpreted and showed the work in all its beauties. Mr. Nikisch has little cause to complain of a lack of appreciation of his efforts if the applause of his audience is to be taken as a criterion. The orchestral work of the evening was certainly an evidence that the concerts of the coming season are to show no falling off in this regard. Mr. Nikisch has evidently chosen his new men with care and good judgment, and the preliminary rehearsals of the season have already moulded them to his will to such a degree that the best results may be anticipated.

The singer of the evening was Mme. Lillian Nordica, a Boston girl, who has from time to time returned from her triumphs abroad to show her friends at home the artistic progress she is making. Her present visit has thus far proved a very fine success, and she and her friends have good reason to rejoice over the triumphs she has won at the Worcester festival and in last evening's concert. Her reception by the audience proved that she has not been forgotten in local musical circles, and the applause which followed her singing of both of her numbers was a high tribute to her vocal abilities. The Beethoven aria, "Ah, Perfido," made her first selection, and served to show the advance she has made in her art since she was last here. In her broad dramatic treatment of the recitative and in the fine expression and feeling she gave to the aria her excellencies as a singer were made very apparent. The aria from the Tannhaeuser, which made her second selection, was even more satisfying; and the fine stage presence of the singer added not a little to the impressiveness of this selection.

Mme. Nordica's voice is one of great purity; her intonations are delightfully accurate, and the breadth of style which she showed in this last aria surprised and charmed those most familiar with her former efforts. The audience rewarded her most generously, and she was repeatedly recalled to bow her acknowledgments.

The programme for next Saturday's concert is as follows: Tchaikowsky, suite, op. 55, first time in Boston. Mascagni, prelude from the opera "Cavalleria Rusticana," first time at these concerts. Beethoven, minuetto and finale (tugue) from string quartet, op. 59, No. 3, in C; played by all the strings; first time. Songs with piano, Schubert, "Der Neugierige"; Schumann, "Mondnacht"; Jensen, "Murmeln des Luftchen." Massenet, overture, "Phedre." The soloist will be Mr. William J. Winch, tenor.

Star

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Arthur Nikisch, conductor, began its eleventh season of concerts at Music Hall last evening.

The soloist of the evening was Mme. Lillian Nordica, and the programme was made up as follows: Overture, "Dedication of the House," Beethoven; aria, "Ah, Perfido," Beethoven; "Good Friday Spell," Wagner; aria from "Tannhaeuser," and the Schumann symphony, No. 3.

Despite the interest attendant upon the opening of the series in regard to the orchestra and its leader, it must be admitted by those who were present that Mme. Nordica and her selections made a most important feature of the evening's attraction.

Accepting this as a fact, it would seem to be a wise course for the managers of these concerts to supply their patrons with a larger number of soloists than in former seasons.

Mme. Nordica is well known to Boston audiences.

She has in her former visits gained a position in the favor of the Boston public that is shared by few artists. Not a little pride has been taken in her triumphs abroad by Boston music lovers, and her standing among the world's artists was heartily recognized by the applause which greeted her upon her entrance.

Queenly in stature, graceful in pose, and elegant in all that goes to make an attractive stage presence, Mme. Nordica wins an audience even before she sings.

The pleasant impression she gives is, however, not alone restricted to her personal charms. Her singing is well calculated to please the most captious critic of vocal art.

In the Beethoven aria she displayed fine taste, and gave an interpretation of the aria which called out a grand ovation for

The Wagner aria was delivered with splendid effect, and the applause which followed it and recalled the artist to bow her acknowledgments was fully justified. Mme. Nordica has seldom made a more pronounced triumph in her artistic home, and her future successes will interest all who heard her last evening.

The orchestral work of the programme gave evidence of the faithful labors of Mr. Nikisch in the preparatory rehearsals.

Some changes have occurred in the membership of his organization, but the standard has been fully maintained, and the season's concerts will unquestionably again attest his great ability as a conductor.

The Beethoven overture has seldom been better played than on this occasion. It afforded a splendid opportunity to show the value of the orchestra, and the many beauties of the composition were faithfully depicted in the reading given by Mr. Nikisch.

The "Good Friday Spell" from "Parsifal" also had a most enjoyable interpretation. Mr. Nikisch is to be commended for the admirable finish with which this number was performed.

The beautiful Rhenish symphony was made a most enjoyable ending of the programme, its several movements being given with delightful clearness and intelligence. All in all the opening concert was in keeping with the record made by Mr. Nikisch in former seasons. His programme was well chosen, a competent soloist was supplied, and the audience was not detained beyond a reasonable limit.

—The first Symphony rehearsal of the eleventh season, Friday afternoon, drew out the largest representation of the society contingent yet gathered this season and the vast audience filled almost every seat. The sale of admission tickets was stopped the day previous, causing hundreds to be turned away on Friday. The centre of attraction, after Mr. Nikisch and his orchestra were given a royal welcome, was Mme. Nordica, who sang with such splendid spirit and in such glorious voice she was recalled three times amid great enthusiasm. She looked superbly handsome in a trained Worth gown of mauve brocade, the corsage and skirt bordered with silver fringe, and a line of silver outlining the open neck and edge of the long full sleeves. It was an exquisite dress and fitted Mme. Nordica's perfect figure faultlessly. Dr. O. W. Holmes, Mr. and Mrs. C. P. Curtis, Mrs. Agassiz, Mr. and Mrs. H. L. Higginson, Mr. Francis Bartlett and his daughter, Mrs. Herbert Sears, Mr. W. F. Weld—whom his friends were all glad to see out again—Mrs. Weld, Mr. C. F. Sprague and Miss Pratt, Mrs. G. B. Shattuck, Miss Elsie Perkins, Mrs. Charles Fairchild and daughters (who had seats in the balcony), Miss Thomas, Miss Lyman, Mr. Harry Wainwright, Mr. W. P. Blake, Dr. Sturgis Bigelow, Rev. Father Bodfish, Mr. John D. Williams, Col. Livermore and daughter, Mr. Edmund Dwight, Mrs. Sewell Fessenden, Miss Georgiana Putnam, Mr. Heinrichs and Mr. and Mrs. Eliot Hubbard were among the many familiar season ticket-holders in the audience.

The Boston girl sallied forth in her pride, on Friday afternoon, and the vicinity of Music Hall was full of her to overflowing. She had evidently visited the flower shops, for she was affluent in lilies, violets and roses, and her face was radiant with happiness;—not a wild, unbalanced happiness such as might dominate her New York or Chicago sister, but a measured, æsthetic and discreet happiness, intellectual in essence, and highly proper in all things. For six months had she languished and lived on the memory of the joys that had been, and having almost exhausted her store of them, like the youngster in the Lilliput Ball who licked away the stick of sugar candy with a sweet and secret flame, was prepared to renew her stock of the saccharine delight. For her, Friday had long ceased to be the unlucky day of tradition, and this especial Friday became a day of bright omen, of heart ease and soul uplifting, and of life-worth living promise; for did not her whole being thrill with rapture as she wended her way to the first of this season's symphony rehearsals? The dear creature went to renew her worship at the sacred shrine of art and to prostrate herself, inwardly, of course, at the feet of such of its disciples as had won her gentle heart. She was to gaze again on the hair that draped in a severely poetic bang over the brow of one adored minstrel; at the delicate moustache that curved gracefully over the upper lip of another; at the dreamy eyes of still another son of Apollo; at the dear white hands of still another; at the too-fascinating beard of yet another, and so on through the long list of the fondly but silently-loved favorites in the orchestra. It was a delicious Friday afternoon for her, and her tender, heart-engendered sighs floated through the hall, and produced the effect of a far-away æolian harp when kissed by a quietly respectful waft of warm summer air, as each "mashing" musician came into view. Life has many woes, and fate is not always kind; but there are moments that compensate for the harshest frowns of destiny, and this compensation was accorded Boston girlhood on this the heavenliest Friday of all the year.

On Friday evening a lady who is a superior musical critic and a constant patron of the Symphony Concerts was asked how the enterprise of this season had impressed her in its opening work. "The season begins admirably," she answered. "This afternoon the house was crowded, and the audience, for a Friday afternoon gathering, was not only appreciative but also responsive. Mr. Winch sang superbly, and the honest informality of his manner was just what is taking with such an assemblage. Those little German songs he sings as I never heard any one else, and he interprets their significance with a musical force and brilliancy that fairly dazzle his hearers. Mme. Nordica did excellent work last week, and altogether the individual and orchestral work done and to be done makes the 1891-2 series of concerts a musical treat of the highest order."

MUSIC.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The programme of the first Symphony concert of this season, given Saturday evening, was as follows:

Overture, "Dedication of the House"..... Beethoven
Aria, "Ah! Perfidio"..... Beethoven
Good Friday Spell, from "Parsifal"..... Wagner
Aria, "O! Hall of Song," from "Tannhäuser"..... Wagner
Symphony No. 3, in E flat..... Schumann

This programme was made up of familiar numbers which do not call for extended comment, nor would it be just to criticize in detail the performance. It may be said in general, that there was often a lack of precision, and in the overture and symphony the work of the wind instruments, both wood and brass, was at times unworthy of the reputation of the orchestra. Of the three selections, the Wagner excerpt was by far the most satisfactory. The symphony was played roughly from the beginning to the end. To be sure, it was the first concert, and therefore absolute precision might not, perhaps, have been expected, but the omissions and commissions exceeded the excuse. Perhaps also the changes in the personnel of the orchestra were unavoidable, but such changes are to be deplored. For no matter how experienced individually a new man may be, it will necessarily be some time before the orchestra as a whole will show improvement or even maintain the standing of the past. In orchestra as in chorus the touching of familiar elbows inspires confidence, and this confidence, the result of familiarity, is a plant of slow growth. Assurance that the men who sit in the chairs are able to do their duty is more to be desired than curiosity concerning the abilities of the unknown.

When Mrs. Nordica sang a year ago last spring in "Trovatore" in Mechanics' Building, her singing was worthy of high praise. When she sang bravura arias last month at the Worcester festival, what she could do was swallowed up in the endeavor to accomplish that which is forbidden her by nature. Saturday evening she was at her best in the Wagner aria, which she delivered with breadth and dignity. The Beethoven aria was outside of her limited temperament. There are many admirable qualities in her singing. Her tones are firm, her intonation is, as a rule beyond reproach; she seldom screams; and her delivery is a delight. For she sings spontaneously, as though she could not check her song. It is singing, and not a singular phenomenon of jugulation, in which the neck is swollen and the face is red. On the other hand, the voice is hard and unsympathetic; and when she feigns emotion, the deception is apparent. Her coldness is not the coldness of indifference; it is rather the absence of temperament. When she essays bravura the result is disappointing, for her voice lends itself ungraciously to brilliant passages. Yet in measures of majestic declamation there is a brilliancy, but it is the brilliancy of ice. A superb woman, who in purely heroic roles can command respect and admiration; a woman who is limited in her art not by lack of advantages or opportunities, but by the confines of her own nature. As though she blew sonorous tones through an impassive, unresponsive instrument.

Mrs. Nordica was recalled after the first aria and very heartily applauded after the air of Elizabeth, when she was twice recalled. Mr. Nikisch was also warmly welcomed when he appeared upon the stage.

The programme of the concert to be given Saturday evening, Oct. 18, is as follows: Tchaikowsky's Suite, op. 55; Mascagni's Prelude and Sicilienne from "Cavalleria Rusticana;" Beethoven's Minuetto and Finale, from String Quartette, op. 59, No. 3 in C (played by all the strings), and Massenet's Overture "Phedre." Mr. William J. Winch will sing the Sicilienne in the Mascagni Prelude and songs by Schubert, Schumann and Jensen. PHILIP HALE.

The fashionable Bostonians pay no regard to weather, other conditions, and even the arrangements of the calendar, but have their own landmarks by which they regulate the evolutions of the season.

"The Season" proper, for instance, nobody but an absolute dunce would count as commencing on any other date but from the date of the Symphonies.

The evening that ushers in the concerts at Music Hall is a signal for the great people of Boston to fall into line, trim their plumes and rush for the festivities and gayeties which distinguish "the season" from winter, summer, autumn or spring. The first night of the symphony concerts presents a most edifying spectacle at Music Hall.

Looking down, scarcely a seat could be seen empty, while one could easily pick out amongst the assembly faces and figures renowned for beauty, wisdom or other blessings! They all sit there, apparently, absorbed in listening to the beautiful strains of music which come pouring forth in majestic harmony, and which seem to swell their breasts with a well-consciousness of their own merits and their own position!

The leader of the orchestra, Herr Nikisch, on the contrary, seems to be quite differently occupied. Himself the observed of all observers he stands up, raises his baton, and while apparently "nothing noting, notes it all!" He only listens to the sounds, he only matches the motion, he only follows the theme, and all this apparently without the least consciousness of effort or strain.

Herr Nikisch is slightly stiff in acknowledging the shower of applause which falls upon him. His small figure does not permit him to make a graceful bow, and he seems to receive the enthusiasm which his leadership excites with a serious, almost solemn, acknowledgment, as if to say, "Well, then, since you will have it, thanks! (danke, sehr!)"

BUD BRIER.

—The story of the Boston Symphony concert people has caused ripples of laughter all over the country. J. W. VINCH.

ed is a Steinway.

the singer.

The Wagner aria was delivered with splendid effect, and the applause which followed it and recalled the artist to bow her acknowledgments was fully justified. Mme. Nordica has seldom made a more pronounced triumph in her artistic home, and her future successes will interest all who heard her last evening.

The orchestral work of the programme gave evidence of the faithful labors of Mr. Nikisch in the preparatory rehearsals.

Some changes have occurred in the membership of his organization, but the standard has been fully maintained, and the season's concerts will unquestionably again attest his great ability as a conductor.

The Beethoven overture has seldom been better played than on this occasion. It afforded a splendid opportunity to show the value of the orchestra, and the many beauties of the composition were faithfully depicted in the reading given by Mr. Nikisch.

The Good Friday Spell from "Parsifal" also had a most enjoyable interpretation. Mr. Nikisch is to be commended for the admirable finish with which this number was performed.

The beautiful Rhenish symphony was made a most enjoyable ending of the programme, its several movements being given with delightful clearness and intelligence. All in all the opening concert was in keeping with the record made by Mr. Nikisch in former seasons. His programme was well chosen, a competent soloist was supplied, and the audience was not detained beyond a reasonable limit.

—The first Symphony rehearsal of the eleventh season, Friday afternoon, drew out the largest representation of the society contingent yet gathered this season and the vast audience filled almost every seat. The sale of admission tickets was stopped the day previous, causing hundreds to be turned away on Friday. The centre of attraction, after Mr. Nikisch and his orchestra were given a roval welcome, was Mme. Nordica, who sang with such splendid spirit and in such glorious voice she was recalled three times amid great enthusiasm. She looked superbly handsome in a trained Worth gown of mauve brocade, the corsage and skirt bordered with silver fringe, and a line of silver outlining the open neck and edge of the long full sleeves. It was an exquisite dress and fitted Mme. Nordica's perfect figure faultlessly. Dr. O. W. Holmes, Mr. and Mrs. C. P. Curtis, Mrs. Agassiz, Mr. and Mrs. H. L. Higginson, Mr. Francis Bartlett and his daughter, Mrs. Herbert Sears, Mr. W. F. Weld—whom his friends were all glad to see out again—Mrs. Weld, Mr. C. F. Sprague and Miss Pratt, Mrs. G. B. Shattuck, Miss Elsie Perkins, Mrs. Charles Fairchild and daughters (who had seats in the balcony), Miss Thomas, Miss Lyman, Mr. Harry Wainwright, Mr. W. P. Blake, Dr. Sturgis Bigelow, Rev. Father Bodfish, Mr. John D. Williams, Col. Livermore and daughter, Mr. Edmund Dwight, Mrs. Sewell Fessenden, Miss Georgiana Putnam, Mr. Heinrichs and Mr. and Mrs. Eliot Hubbard were among the many familiar season ticket-holders in the audience.

The Boston girl sallied forth in her pride, on Friday afternoon, and the vicinity of Music Hall was full of her to overflowing. She had evidently visited the flower shops, for she was affluent in lilies, violets and roses, and her face was radiant with happiness;—not a wild, unbalanced happiness such as might dominate her New York or Chicago sister, but a measured, æsthetic and discreet happiness, intellectual in essence, and highly proper in all things. For six months had she languished and lived on the memory of the joys that had been, and having almost exhausted her store of them, like the youngster in the Lilliput Ball who licked away the stick of sugar candy with a sweet and secret flame, was prepared to renew her stock of the saccharine delight. For her, Friday had long ceased to be the unlucky day of tradition, and this especial Friday became a day of bright omen, of heart ease and soul uplifting, and of life-worth living promise; for did not her whole being thrill with rapture as she wended her way to the first of this season's symphony rehearsals? The dear creature went to renew her worship at the sacred shrine of art and to prostrate herself, inwardly, of course, at the feet of such of its disciples as had won her gentle heart. She was to gaze again on the hair that draped in a severely poetic bang over the brow of one adored minstrel; at the delicate moustache that curved gracefully over the upper lip of another; at the dreamy eyes of still another son of Apollo; at the dear white hands of still another; at the too-fascinating beard of yet another, and so on through the long list of the fondly but silently-loved favorites in the orchestra. It was a delicious Friday afternoon for her, and her tender, heart-engendered sighs floated through the hall, and produced the effect of a far-away æolian harp when kissed by a quietly respectful waft of warm summer air, as each "mashing" musician came into view. Life has many woes, and fate is not always kind; but there are moments that compensate for the harshest frowns of destiny, and this compensation was accorded Boston girlhood on this the heavenliest Friday of all the year.

On Friday evening a lady who is a superior musical critic and a constant patron of the Symphony Concerts was asked how the enterprise of this season had impressed her in its opening work. "The season begins admirably," she answered. "This afternoon the house was crowded, and the audience, for a Friday afternoon gathering, was not only appreciative but also responsive. Mr. Winch sang superbly, and the honest informality of his manner was just what is taking with such an assemblage. Those little German songs he sings as I never heard any one else, and he interprets their significance with a musical force and brilliancy that fairly dazzle his hearers. Mme. Nordica did excellent work last week, and altogether the individual and orchestral work done and to be done makes the 1891-2 series of concerts a musical treat of the highest order."

MUSIC.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The programme of the first Symphony concert of this season, given Saturday evening, was as follows:

Overture, "Dedication of the House" Beethoven
Aria, "Ah Perfido" Beethoven
Good Friday Spell, from "Parsifal" Wagner
Aria, "O Hall of Song," from "Tannhauser" Wagner
Symphony No. 3, in E flat Schumann

This programme was made up of familiar numbers which do not call for extended comment, nor would it be just to criticise in detail the performance. It may be said in general, that there was often a lack of precision, and in the overture and symphony the work of the wind instruments, both wood and brass, was at times unworthy of the reputation of the orchestra. Of the three selections, the Wagner excerpt was by far the most satisfactory. The symphony was played roughly from the beginning to the end. To be sure, it was the first concert, and therefore absolute precision might not, perhaps, have been expected, but the omissions and commissions exceeded the excuse. Perhaps also the changes in the personnel of the orchestra were unavoidable, but such changes are to be deplored. For no matter how experienced individually a new man may be, it will necessarily be some time before the orchestra as a whole will show improvement or even maintain the standing of the past. In orchestra as in chorus the touching of familiar elbows inspires confidence, and this confidence, the result of familiarity, is a plant of slow growth. Assurance that the men who sit in the chairs are able to do their duty is more to be desired than curiosity concerning the abilities of the unknown.

When Mrs. Nordica sang a year ago last spring in "Trovatore" in Mechanics' Building, her singing was worthy of high praise. When she sang bravura arias last month at the Worcester festival, what she could do was swallowed up in the endeavor to accomplish that which is forbidden her by nature. Saturday evening she was at her best in the Wagner aria, which she delivered with breadth and dignity. The Beethoven aria was outside of her limited temperament. There are many admirable qualities in her singing. Her tones are firm, her intonation is, as a rule, beyond reproach; she seldom screams; and her delivery is a delight. For she sings spontaneously, as though she could not check her song. It is singing, and not a singular phenomenon of jugulation, in which the neck is swollen and the face is red. On the other hand, the voice is hard and unsympathetic; and when she feigns emotion, the deception is apparent. Her coldness is not the coldness of indifference; it is rather the absence of temperament. When she essays bravura the result is disappointing, for her voice lends itself ungraciously to brilliant passages. Yet in measures of majestic declamation there is a brilliancy, but it is the brilliancy of ice. A superb woman, who in purely heroic roles can command respect and admiration; a woman who is limited in her art not by lack of advantages or opportunities, but by the confines of her own nature. As though she blew sonorous tones through an impassive, unresponsive instrument.

Mrs. Nordica was recalled after the first aria and very heartily applauded after the air of Elizabeth, when she was twice recalled. Mr. Nikisch was also warmly welcomed when he appeared upon the stage.

The programme of the concert to be given Saturday evening, Oct. 18, is as follows: Tchaikowsky's Suite, op. 55; Mascagni's Prelude and Sicilienne from "Cavalleria Rusticana;" Beethoven's Minuetto and Finale, from String Quartette, op. 59, No. 3 in C (played by all the strings), and Massenet's Overture "Phedre." Mr. William J. Winch will sing the Sicilienne in the Mascagni Prelude and songs by Schubert, Schumann and Jensen.

The fashionable Bostonians pay no regard to weather, other conditions, and even the arrangements of the calendar, but have their own landmarks by which they regulate the evolutions of the season.

"The Season" proper, for instance, nobody but an absolute dunce would count as commencing on any other date but from the date of the Symphonies.

The evening that ushers in the concerts at Music Hall is a signal for the great people of Boston to fall into line, trim their plumes and rush for the festivities and gayeties which distinguish "the season" from winter, summer, autumn or spring. The first night of the symphony concerts presents a most edifying spectacle at Music Hall.

Looking down, scarcely a seat could be seen empty, while one could easily pick out amongst the assembly faces and figures renowned for beauty, wisdom or other blessings! They all sit there, apparently, absorbed in listening to the beautiful strains of music which come pouring forth in majestic harmony, and which seem to swell their breasts with a well-consciousness of their own merits and their own position!

The leader of the orchestra, Herr Nikisch, on the contrary, seems to be quite differently occupied. Himself the observed of all observers he stands up, raises his baton, and while apparently "nothing noting, notes it all!" He only listens to the sounds, he only matches the motion, he only follows the theme, and all this apparently without the least consciousness of effort or strain.

Herr Nikisch is slightly stiff in acknowledging the shower of applause which falls upon him. His small figure does not permit him to make a graceful bow, and he seems to receive the enthusiasm which his leadership excites with a serious, almost solemn, acknowledgment, as if to say, "Well, then, since you will have it, thanks! (danke, seher!)"

BUD BRIER.

—The story of the Boston Symphony concert pool has caused ripples of laughter all over the country.

W. J. WINCH.

sed is a Steinway.

FIRST SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Conductor Arthur Nikisch made a most appropriate selection for the inauguration of the Symphony season of 1891-92, making the eleventh in the series in Beethoven's overture, "Dedication of the House." The very opening strain showed the command of this skillful conductor over his intelligent corps of musicians, and their prompt and delicate response to his every movement affirmed their artistic feeling and fine appreciation of the requirements of the overture, to the great delight of the large audience who will listen with increasing interest during the coming season.

One might be pardoned the thought of the wish for a "House" to dedicate—not such an one, perhaps, as this overture was composed for, the Josephstadt at Vienna—but we do hope that some day Boston may be able to speak with pride of her Academy of Music. The applause of welcome with which Mr. Nikisch was greeted was also extended to the familiar faces in the orchestra and the new ones, who gave promise by their careful work of fitting into their places and maintaining the perfect whole that this orchestra has so well established.

The special features of the programme were Wagner's Good Friday Spell, from Parsifal, and Schumann's symphony in E flat (Rhenish); the former expressing beauty in imaginative musical description, a "tone-picture," as it is sometimes called, of Good Friday morn, and the return of Parsifal after many years' absence.

This selection was rendered with fine effect and finish, showing the complete control of the master over his performers and the uniform expression of intelligent conception of the composer's varied ideas on the part of the players.

Perhaps the Schumann symphony, the last on the programme, created the most enthusiasm of the orchestral numbers, as the applause that followed was both hearty and long. The beauties of the different movements were brought out with clearness of expression, breadth of interpretation, delicacy of skill and careful, thoughtful attention to detail and excellence.

Mr. Nikisch may be heartily congratulated on the results of this season's initial programme, the uniform excellence of his strong organization and the expressed approval of his cultivated audience.

The appearance of Mme. Lillian Nordica, fresh with pronounced success at the Worcester festival, brought out a hearty ovation and most cordial welcome from the audience who were waiting with anticipation to hear her again. Her graceful and dignified presence demanded attention. She rendered two selections, the first the Beethoven aria "Ah Perfido," which gave fine opportunities of showing her breadth of style, clearness of recitative, perfection of intonation and purity of tone; the second, the aria from Tannhauser, was even better and elicited most generous applause. She was repeatedly recalled to bow her acknowledgments, and retired with another triumph added to her list.

The programme for this week includes Suite, op. 55, by Tchaikowsky (first time in Boston.) Prelude from the opera, "Cavalleria Rusticana," by Mascagni. Beethoven's minuetto and finale from string quartette, Massenet's overture "Phedre," and songs with piano from Schubert, Schumann and Jensen, with Mr. Wm. J. Winch soloist.

HOME OF FRAU NIKISCH.

Charming Dwelling of the Symphony Director and his Accomplished Wife
—They Say They Both Like America Better Than Europe.

The piquant mome made by more than one "Symphony Girl" when she heard that pale, poetic success of Director Gericke was to be joined by his German frau and kinder gave place to a radiant welcoming smile as soon as the little lady had fairly set foot in America.

There was but one verdict: "Mrs. Nikisch is charming;" and from that first day when the social fiat went forth, Mrs. Arthur Nikisch has reigned in Boston's artistic firmament, not by reflected glory, but by reason of her own attitude as a musician and the undeniable charm of her personality.

MRS. ARTHUR NIKISCH.

The temple of the family Lares and Penates is a commodious wooden residence at the corner of High st. and Cumberland av., in the older part of Brookline, the unrelieved dun of the external walls giving no hint of the picturesque interior, which is, as the shrine of music should be, unpretentious and suggestive of culture.

In place of the customary drawing-room there is a music room where a grand piano has the place of honor, and a portrait of the mistress of the house, which she laughingly refers to as "a very pious picture of me," is framed in an alcove, bordered by palms and ropes of laurel, suggestive of an anniversary fete.

Beneath is an exquisite copy of a Madonna in rich, soft coloring, that looks as old as the original. It is a photograph, under glass, painted by Mrs. Nikisch, showing that fingers as well as voice have been laid under tribute to art, for art's sake.

Back of the music room is the library, lined with books and decorated with etch-ings, engravings, photographs, and more books and more pictures, that tell their own tales of many peoples and many lands.

Editions of Dickens, Shakespeare, Schiller and Goethe bespeak among others from their cherry shelves built into the apartment, the Catholic taste of the master and the mistress, the latter of whom comes to meet the SUNDAY GLOBE's representative, looking as fair as any girl, in a trailing gown of dark blue with a scarlet silk blouse showing under the jacket bodice.

Mrs. Nikisch is a pretty woman who does not look her 27 years by half a decade. Soft, light brown hair curling over her forehead, laughing blue eyes, regular features and a fair skin name but half the charms of her face.

Enthusiasm for whatever appeals to her is written in the quick, sympathetic play of expression as she talks, and her manner is as unaffected, cordial and unmistakably that of a gentlewoman as it is agreeable.

Mrs. Nikisch confines her own newspaper reading, as does Mr. Nikisch, to New York and German journals, to avoid being disturbed by local criticisms, which they think so contradictory as to be of no help, and in any case powerless to inspire more earnest endeavor than personal love for their work already dictates. But, upon being assured that she and her husband are in a minority of two, Mrs. Nikisch good humoredly consented to outline a bit of autobiography for the hosts of GLOBE readers who will like to know something of the personality of such a society favorite as the wife of the director of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

Mrs. Nikisch was born Amelie Heussner in Brussels, where she lived for the first dozen years of her life, speaking only French and laying the foundation, it is to be surmised, of her present fluent command of that language.

She made her first visit to Paris only this last summer, when for five weeks she spent every day with the celebrated Mme. Marchesi, who is an old friend of Mr. Nikisch, and one who did very much, says Mrs. Nikisch, gratefully, to help him when, as a very young man, he was getting his first footing in the musical world.

Mr. Nikisch, by the way, is not a German, but a Hungarian by birth, and later a Bohemian by long residence in that unique country. Then he settled in Deutschland and learned the German tongue, and in so doing, has forgotten his native language as well as that of Bohemia, which is neither Prussian nor Hungarian, nor like any other.

When she was 12 years old Mrs. Nikisch entered the conservatory at Cologne, where she studied singing and the piano, recitations and so on, and at 17 years of age she made her debut as an opera singer, appearing in Mozart's and the lighter French operas until her marriage, and with marked success.

There was a season in Berlin, and then one in Leipzig, where, in the role of a nun, at the age of 18, she first met Mr. Nikisch, who was conductor of the orchestra in the theatre.

"It was a case of love at first sight," she says, naively and with amusement at the recollection of the rehearsals.

The little man left the city before they were engaged, but the betrothal and marriage followed soon. Mrs. Nikisch sang for the last time upon the operatic stage in Castle a week before her wedding day as Zerlina in "Don Juan."

"Such a happy time as it all was," she says, and, if one may judge, it has been a happy time ever since.

After their marriage they lived in Leipzig until they came to this country. Mrs. Nikisch retiring from the opera stage out of deference to her husband's wishes; he objected to the wearing life for her when there was no longer need for her to continue.

They like America, both she and her husband.

"Oh, very much," she says, bringing her pretty hands together enthusiastically. "We love it. We were on the other side for 10 weeks this last summer, and when we were preparing to come back we said to each other, 'it is good to be going again to America.'"

"Life is more varied here, more interesting. In Germany people seem to find nothing but common places to talk about—the beard of the Emperor, or something of that sort."

"We are lively people, and like good nice times," says Mrs. Nikisch, with her quaint foreign accent, and for the first time making a little slip in English, which she speaks remarkably well.

Interrogated as to how she has so quickly learned the language, she credits her success to her instruction in her school days, and to the private lessons she took just before coming over, by advice of Mr. Nikisch, who admonished her that she could not enjoy American society unless she could speak in its vernacular.

But, in common with most Europeans, Mrs. Nikisch has a talent for mastering language, although she avers it is somewhat a matter of moods.

"Some days," she says, "I know myself I get on very well, and I say beautiful; and then the next day, perhaps, I say to Mr. Nikisch, 'Oh, but today you should have heard the blunders I made.'"

In their home German is spoken for the benefit of the children, who are certain to learn English, and must not be allowed to forget the speech of their fatherland.

The children are two; Katie is the graceful little maiden of 5 who smiles from the painting on the easel in the library.

The baby of the family is Master Arthur, aged 3, a clever little fellow who, if he answers to his parents' hopes, will be a master of the violin in the days to come. "But musicians' children are often not at all musical, you know," says their mother.

On Friday Mrs. Nikisch went to New York, of which city she is very fond, to join her husband. Today they leave for Detroit, where tomorrow they will appear in a chamber concert, with Mrs. Nikisch as the singer, while Mr. Nikisch will do what he has never consented to do here, play the piano part in a string quintet.

Their Brookline home is one of the nuclei of the artistic life of Boston, Mrs. Nikisch's Mondays being among the pleasantest of "at homes."

Music. Home Journal

SYMPHONY CONCERT.—The first of the Symphony concerts of the season of '91, '92 was given last Saturday evening in Music Hall. When The trombones and the third and the fourth horns Mr. Nikisch stepped upon the stage he was greeted heartily by the audience. Changes have been made in the personnel of the orchestra, are in the hands of new members. Mr. Heindl, the excellent viola player, is now in the second rank, and Mr. Hekking's place is filled by Mr. Alwin Schroeder. The program was made up of familiar numbers: Beethoven's Overture, "Dedication of the House"; Wagner's "Good Friday Spell," from "Parsifal," and Schumann's Symphony No. 3 in E flat. As a whole it was not an attractive program, and the performance by the orchestra was coarse and ragged in both the overture and the symphony. The fact that it was the first concert after the vacation, together with the changes made in the orchestra, may account in a measure for the slips in intonation and precision; but it does not account for the repeated indifference of Mr. Nikisch to the inten-

FIRST SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Conductor Arthur Nikisch made a most appropriate selection for the inauguration of the Symphony season of 1891-92, making the eleventh in the series in Beethoven's overture, "Dedication of the House." The very opening strain showed the command of this skillful conductor over his intelligent corps of musicians, and their prompt and delicate response to his every movement affirmed their artistic feeling and fine appreciation of the requirements of the overture, to the great delight of the large audience who will listen with increasing interest during the coming season.

One might be pardoned the thought of the wish for a "House" to dedicate—not such an one, perhaps, as this overture was composed for, the Josephstadt at Vienna—but we do hope that some day Boston may be able to speak with pride of her Academy of Music. The applause of welcome with which Mr. Nikisch was greeted was also extended to the familiar faces in the orchestra and the new ones, who gave promise by their careful work of fitting into their places and maintaining the perfect whole that this orchestra has so well established.

The special features of the programme were Wagner's Good Friday Spell, from Parsifal, and Schumann's symphony in E flat (Rhenish); the former expressing beauty in imaginative musical description, a "tone-picture," as it is sometimes called, of Good Friday morn, and the return of Parsifal after many years' absence.

This selection was rendered with fine effect and finish, showing the complete control of the master over his performers and the uniform expression of intelligent conception of the composer's varied ideas on the part of the players.

Perhaps the Schumann symphony, the last on the programme, created the most enthusiasm of the orchestral numbers, as the applause that followed was both hearty and long. The beauties of the different movements were brought out with clearness of expression, breadth of interpretation, delicacy of skill and careful, thoughtful attention to detail and excellence.

Mr. Nikisch may be heartily congratulated on the results of this season's initial programme, the uniform excellence of his strong organization and the expressed approval of his cultivated audience.

The appearance of Mme. Lillian Nordica, fresh with pronounced success at the Worcester festival, brought out a hearty ovation and most cordial welcome from the audience who were waiting with anticipation to hear her again. Her graceful and dignified presence demanded attention. She rendered two selections, the first the Beethoven aria "Ah Perfido," which gave fine opportunities of showing her breadth of style, clearness of recitative, perfection of intonation and purity of tone; the second, the aria from Tannhauser, was even better and elicited most generous applause. She was repeatedly recalled to bow her acknowledgments, and retired with another triumph added to her list.

The programme for this week includes Suite, op. 55, by Tchaikowsky (first time in Boston), Prelude from the opera, "Cavalleria Rusticana," by Mascagni, Beethoven's minuetto and finale from string quartette, Massenet's overture "Phedre," and songs with piano from Schubert, Schumann and Jensen, with Mr. Wm. J. Winch soloist.

HOME OF FRAU NIKISCH.

Charming Dwelling of the Symphony Director and his Accomplished Wife—They Say They Both Like America Better Than Europe.

The piquant moue made by more than one "Symphony Girl" when she heard that pale, poetic success of Director Gericke was to be joined by his German frau and kinder gave place to a radiant welcoming smile as soon as the little lady had fairly set foot in America.

There was but one verdict: "Mrs. Nikisch is charming;" and from that first day when the social fiat went forth, Mrs. Arthur Nikisch has reigned in Boston's artistic firmament, not by reflected glory, but by reason of her own attitude as a musician and the undeniable charm of her personality.

MRS. ARTHUR NIKISCH.

The temple of the family Lares and Penates is a commodious wooden residence at the corner of High st. and Cumberland av., in the older part of Brookline, the unrelieved dun of the external walls giving no hint of the picturesque interior, which is, as the shrine of music should be, unpretentious and suggestive of culture.

In place of the customary drawing-room there is a music room where a grand piano has the place of honor, and a portrait of the mistress of the house, which she laughingly refers to as "a very pious picture of me," is framed in an alcove, bordered by palms and ropes of laurel, suggestive of an anniversary fete.

Beneath is an exquisite copy of a Madonna in rich, soft coloring, that looks as old as the original. It is a photograph, under glass, painted by Mrs. Nikisch, showing that fingers as well as voice have been laid under tribute to art, for art's sake.

Back of the music room is the library, lined with books and decorated with etch-ings, engravings, photographs, and more books and more pictures, that tell their own tales of many peoples and many lands.

Editions of Dickens, Shakespeare, Schiller and Goethe bespeak among others from their cherry shelves built into the apartment, the Catholic taste of the master and the mistress, the latter of whom comes to meet the SUNDAY GLOBE's representative, looking as fair as any girl, in a trailing gown of dark blue with a scarlet silk blouse showing under the jacket bodice.

Mrs. Nikisch is a pretty woman who does not look her 27 years by half a decade. Soft, light brown hair curling over her forehead, laughing blue eyes, regular features and a fair skin name but half the charms of her face.

Enthusiasm for whatever appeals to her is written in the quick, sympathetic play of expression as she talks, and her manner is as unaffected, cordial and unmistakably that of a gentlewoman as it is agreeable.

Mrs. Nikisch confines her own newspaper reading, as does Mr. Nikisch, to New York and German journals, to avoid being disturbed by local criticisms, which they think so contradictory as to be of no help, and in any case powerless to inspire more earnest endeavor than personal love for their work already dictates. But, upon being assured that she and her husband are in a minority of two, Mrs. Nikisch good humoredly consented to outline a bit of autobiography for the hosts of GLOBE readers who will like to know something of the personality of such a society favorite as the wife of the director of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

Mrs. Nikisch was born Amelie Heussner in Brussels, where she lived for the first dozen years of her life, speaking only French and laying the foundation, it is to be surmised, of her present fluent command of that language.

She made her first visit to Paris only this last summer, when for five weeks she spent every day with the celebrated Mme. Marchesi, who is an old friend of Mr. Nikisch, and one who did very much, says Mrs. Nikisch, gratefully, to help him when, as a very young man, he was getting his first footing in the musical world.

Mr. Nikisch, by the way, is not a German, but a Hungarian by birth, and later a Bohemian by long residence in that unique country. Then he settled in Deutschland and learned the German tongue, and in so doing, has forgotten his native language as well as that of Bohemia, which is neither Prussian nor Hungarian, nor like any other.

When she was 12 years old Mrs. Nikisch entered the conservatory at Cologne, where she studied singing and the piano, recitations and so on, and at 17 years of age she made her debut as an opera singer, appearing in Mozart's and the lighter French operas until her marriage, and with marked success.

There was a season in Berlin, and then one in Leipzig, where, in the role of a nun, at the age of 18, she first met Mr. Nikisch, who was conductor of the orchestra in the theatre.

"It was a case of love at first sight," she says, naively and with amusement at the recollection of the rehearsals.

The little man left the city before they were engaged, but the betrothal and marriage followed soon. Mrs. Nikisch sang for the last time upon the operatic stage in Castle a week before her wedding day as Zerlina in "Don Juan."

"Such a happy time as it all was," she says, and, if one may judge, it has been a happy time ever since.

After their marriage they lived in Leipzig until they came to this country. Mrs. Nikisch retiring from the opera stage out of deference to her husband's wishes; he objected to the wearing life for her when there was no longer need for her to continue.

They like America, both she and her husband.

"Oh, very much," she says, bringing her pretty hands together enthusiastically, "we love it. We were on the other side for 10 weeks this last summer, and when we were preparing to come back we said to each other, 'it is good to be going again to America.'"

"Life is more varied here, more interesting. In Germany people seem to find nothing but common places to talk about—the beard of the Emperor, or something of that sort."

"We are lively people, and like good nice times," says Mrs. Nikisch, with her quaint foreign accent, and for the first time making a little slip in English, which she speaks remarkably well.

Interrogated as to how she has so quickly learned the language, she credits her success to her instruction in her school days, and to the private lessons she took just before coming over, by advice of Mr. Nikisch, who admonished her that she could not enjoy American society unless she could speak in its vernacular.

But, in common with most Europeans, Mrs. Nikisch has a talent for mastering language, although she avers it is somewhat a matter of moods.

"Some days," she says, "I know myself I get on very well, and I say beautiful; and then the next day, perhaps, I say to Mr. Nikisch, 'Oh, but today you should have heard the blunders I made.'"

In their home German is spoken for the benefit of the children, who are certain to learn English, and must not be allowed to forget the speech of their fatherland.

The children are two; Katie is the graceful little maiden of 5 who smiles from the painting on the easel in the library.

The baby of the family is Master Arthur, aged 3, a clever little fellow who, if he answers to his parents' hopes, will be a master of the violin in the days to come. "But musicians' children are often not at all musical, you know," says their mother.

On Friday Mrs. Nikisch went to New York, of which city she is very fond, to join her husband. Today they leave for Detroit, where tomorrow they will appear in a chamber concert, with Mrs. Nikisch as the singer, while Mr. Nikisch will do what he has never consented to do here, play the piano part in a string quintet.

Their Brookline home is one of the nuclei of the artistic life of Boston, Mrs. Nikisch's Mondays being among the pleasantest of "at homes."

Music.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.—The first of the Symphony concerts of the season of '91, '92 was given last Saturday evening in Music Hall. When the trombones and the third and the fourth horns Mr. Nikisch stepped upon the stage he was greeted heartily by the audience. Changes have been made in the personnel of the orchestra. are in the hands of new members. Mr. Heindl, the excellent viola player, is now in the second rank, and Mr. Hekking's place is filled by Mr. Alwin Schroeder. The program was made up of familiar numbers: Beethoven's Overture, "Dedication of the House"; Wagner's "Good Friday Spell," from "Parsifal," and Schumann's Symphony No. 3 in E flat. As a whole it was not an attractive program, and the performance by the orchestra was coarse and ragged in both the overture and the symphony. The fact that it was the first concert after the vacation, together with the changes made in the orchestra, may account in a measure for the slips in intonation and precision; but it does not account for the repeated indifference of Mr. Nikisch to the intentions of the composers. The audience applauded in a perfunctory manner.

36

Mrs. Lillian Nordica sang Beethoven's "Ah Perfido," which was beyond her abilities, and "O Hall of Song," from Tannhaeuser. This latter aria she sang with much dignity. She was happier in passages of a declamatory quasi heroic nature than in the portrayal of the purely emotional. She was recalled twice after the Wagner selection.

The program of this evening includes Tschai-kowsky's Suite op. 55; the Prelude to "Cavalleria Rusticana;" Massenet's overture, "Phédre," and Beethoven's Minuetto and Finale from the string quartet op. 59, No. 3 (played by all the strings). Mr. Wm. J. Winch will sing the Serenade in the Mascagni Prelude, Schubert's "Der Neugierige," Schumann's "Mondnacht," and Jensen's "Murmelerde Lüftchen."

THE SYMPHONY. Continued

THE OPENING CONCERT OF THE SEASON LAST NIGHT.

The eleventh season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was begun last evening in Music Hall. As has usually been the case of late years, nearly every seat was occupied by subscribers, and the occasion of the first night, together with the appearance of one of America's most gifted vocalists, combined to draw an additional number of people, who filled all the available standing room.

Generally speaking, the orchestra presented its well-known familiar aspect. Nearly all the leading players were to be seen, including Mr. Loeffler, who looked the picture of health in spite of his serious illness of last spring. Some important changes, nevertheless, have been made. Mr. Schroeder, late violoncellist of the noted Brodsky string quartette of Leipzig, takes the place of Mr. Hekking, who has gone over to Mr. Damrosch, in New York. He bears a high reputation, and will doubtless soon be heard as a soloist. Mr. Novacek, also of Leipzig, now leads the violas, and Mr. Guetter is the new first bassoon player. The third horn player is also new to the organization which this year will possess an extra performer on that instrument, as well as a third trumpeter. There would seem to be no question as to the strength of the orchestra.

Mr. Nikisch was heartily greeted as he appeared on the platform. The opening number was that exceedingly useful composition as far as name is concerned, but somewhat musty one, regarded from a musical point of view, Beethoven's overture, "Dedication of the House," opus 124. It certainly seems unfortunate that the great composer ever bestowed on this work the title it bears, since it is far better calculated to depress an audience into a state of gloomy silence than to create feelings of contagious liveliness. As an interesting example of how Beethoven could write in the so-called Handelian style, it may well find an occasional place on a symphony programme. But take away its name, and one might quite safely venture the assertion that it would never be heard at the dedication of any hall or theatre (it was written for the latter purpose), or as the first number of the first programme of a series of symphony concerts. And what an injustice, too, to Beethoven, to dig up this uninspired work for so important an occasion, when one of the "Leonore" overtures would have thrilled the very souls of the people present, and, without doubt, led them to the verge at least of enthusiasm.

As it was, the applause inspired by that feeling was reserved for Mrs. Lillian Nordica, the soloist of the evening, who was first heard in Beethoven's concert aria, "Ah Perfido." Mrs. Nordica possessed so many of the elements of popularity that it is small wonder she is the favorite that she is. Aside from her magnetic personality and the truly American spirit that she invariably displays in everything she attempts, her earnest and artistic endeavors command respect. She forces the careful listener to conclude that she has studied hard and patiently, that she is thoroughly interested in her work; and these qualities together with her musical, resonant voice, and her dramatic manner of delivery must of necessity, seldom fail to hold the attention, and to win the applause of her audiences.

In the aria just mentioned, it can hardly be said that she sounded any great depths of passion; but her singing was artistic, intelligent as to phrasing, and brilliant and effective as to execution. In this, as well as in her second number, the aria, "O Hall of Song," from "Tannhaeuser," she frequently gave evidence of the strong dramatic ability she is known to possess, and at the conclusion of both she was recalled several times.

The remaining numbers were the music from the third act of "Parsifal," called "Good Friday Spell," and Schumann's third symphony in E flat. The first is a concert piece made up of the music which accompanies "the anointing of Parsifal; his baptism by Kundry; and his reflections upon his position as King of the Grail," naturally, an arrangement interesting to hear. But why it should have been injected into the programme of this concert is one of the mysteries that are passing finding out. The symphony is too well known to require extended comment. As a whole, the programme must be considered altogether too sombre in character for one of the principal events of Boston's musical season; and hard to be accounted for, unless perhaps on the ground that Mr. Nikisch wished to impress strongly upon the minds of the subscribers to these concerts the seriousness of their undertaking.

Of the playing by the orchestra, it must be said that, although it would be impossible for so splendid a body of men to fail to play splendidly, to greater or less degree, it was not by any means a fair example of what they are capable of. One could but involuntarily recall to mind the beautiful technical finish of the band at the commencement of its first season under Mr. Nikisch, and contrast it with the frequently harsh and ragged playing of last evening. But perhaps this disappointing condition of things was due to the enforced separation of the men during the summer months.

FIRST CONCERT. Times

The present season of Symphony concerts (the eleventh season) was inaugurated at Music Hall Saturday evening, October 10, by the Boston Symphony orchestra under the direction of Mr. Arthur Nikisch. It is superfluous to say the hall was completely filled with the fashion, wealth, culture and music-loving common folk. The wealth and fashion occupied most of the floor and front tiers of the first balcony, while the real appreciators and common folk were less prominent in the back tiers. The orchestra has undergone but few changes in its general make-up, and with one exception the changes are no doubt for the better, although just yet, not quite apparent.

The entrée of Conductor Nikisch was signalled by the usual generous applause, though it did not reach an ovation. Mr. Nikisch looked hearty and well. He received the applause with that becoming dignity and posing stiffness for which he is somewhat noted, although there was noticeably more flexibility about his "entrée movements" than formerly. From an elevated and lofty position we commanded an excellent view of the entire house, seeing every thing worth seeing, and hearing considerably more than we wished to. Here is the programme:

Overture, "Dedication of the House," Beethoven; aria, "Ah, Perfido," Beethoven; Good Friday Spell from "Parsifal," Wagner; aria from "Tannhäuser," Wagner; Symphony in E flat, No. 3 (Rheinisch), Schumann. Mme. Lillian Nordica was the singer.

The very first beat showed lack of confidence and decision on the part of the orchestra in their leader, for they came in behind it, after it had passed. It was the same with several succeeding measures. Why was this and what the cause? There certainly are not new men enough to result in such a state of affairs. There have been ample rehearsals to overcome all the difficulties contained in the overture, and yet it was coarsely done, almost from beginning to end. In the fugue movement the brass was decidedly brassy, the men apparently blowing till they were purple outside and in. It was terrific to the hearing and nerves. If the instruments had been in better tune, matters would have been bettered somewhat. To make the din still more unbearable the contra basses sawed away for dear life, as if their very existence depended on the amount of noise they could produce. All in all, the overture fared worse than we ever remember to have heard it.

Madame Nordica was greeted with genuine applause, for she is a favorite here, having received much of her early education in Boston, though she is a Farmington, Maine, girl. The madame has the wonderful advantage of possessing a fine stage presence. This, with her elegant gown and outside paraphernalia, created as much enthusiasm as her singing, though she really sings well. She possesses a clear, ringing voice, possibly somewhat devoid of real sweetness. It is well cultivated, and this, with other brilliant qualities, go to make her a pronounced success. Her singing evidently pleased the large audience, for they called her out again and again. But she only bowed her acknowledgements.

37

The Parsifal music was quite satisfactorily performed, though it might be improved; no doubt after the orchestra have been together a little longer they will play better. They are not yet settled down to real, hard, earnest work. It is too soon after vacation.

Madame Nordica's second selection was even more successful than the first. She really sang it better. She was called out three times at its conclusion, and was, as a matter of course, presented with choice flowers.

The Schumann E flat symphony was much overstrained from the brass. But this we hope, will be remedied in time.

JAMES M. TRACY.

Last Saturday night brought back society, en masse, to attend the first Symphony concert. Music Hall was full to overflowing. The first balcony was, as has been the recent fashion, the musical center; there were to be seen Mr. B. J. Lang and wife, Mr. Wm. F. Apthorp and wife, Miss Lang, Mr. Arthur Foote, Miss Gertrude Edmands, Mr. W. J. Winch and wife, and Mr. Hiram G. Tucker. The left balcony contained Mr. Harry Fay and wife, Mr. J. S. Dwight, Mr. G. L. Osgood and wife, Mr. Bernard Listemann, Mrs. C. L. Thayer, Mr. J. E. Priest, and Miss Richardson. On the floor were to be seen the Misses Riddle, Mrs. Arthur Nickish, Mr. H. M. Rogers and wife, Mrs. Julius Eichburg, Mrs. T. B. King, Mrs. Mark Hollingsworth, Mr. Hecht and wife, Mr. Eliot Hubbard and wife, Dr. Roland Whitridge, Mr. William Peters, Miss Winslow, Mr. Arthur Pickering, Mr. Arthur Austin, Mr. Donald White, Miss Mary Russell, Mrs. Phoebe Jenks, Mr. Barton Jenks, Dr. Fred Cheney, Mr. I. M. Gaugengigl, Mr. Edward Codman and wife, Dr. F. D. Stackpole, Mrs. Boardman, Miss Abbot, Miss Stackpole, Miss Heloise Hersey, Miss Gilman, and Mr. Frank Jackson. The chief changes to be seen were that Mr. Kneisel had gained flesh and Mr. Loeffler had grown a beard and had curly hair. Mr. Adamowski and Mr. Arkroyd seem to have drunk of the fountain of perpetual youth, and Mr. Nickish's hands were whiter than ever and his hair more volatile. Mrs. Apthorp, with her bonnet on one side and a veil across her forehead, seemed to have less chic than ever, and more flesh. Mrs. Gardner's seats were vacant, excepting when Mr. H. L. Harding took possession of them late in the evening. Mrs. Fiske Warren looked as beautiful as ever, and Mrs. Frank Watson was looking her best, after a summer in Europe.

tions of the composers. The audience applauded in a perfunctory manner.

Mrs. Lillian Nordica sang Beethoven's "Ah Perfido," which was beyond her abilities, and "O Hall of Song," from Tannhaeuser. This latter aria she sang with much dignity. She was happier in passages of a declamatory quasi heroic nature than in the portrayal of the purely emotional. She was recalled twice after the Wagner selection.

The program of this evening includes Teshai-kowsky's Suite op. 55; the Prelude to "Cavalleria Rusticana;" Massenet's overture, "Phèdre," and Beethoven's Minuetto and Finale from the string quartet op. 59, No. 3 (played by all the strings). Mr. Wm. J. Winch will sing the Serenade in the Mascagni Prelude, Schubert's "Der Neugierige," Schumann's "Mondnacht," and Jensen's "Murmelerde Lüftchen."

THE SYMPHONY. Continued

THE OPENING CONCERT OF THE SEASON LAST NIGHT.

The eleventh season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was begun last evening in Music Hall. As has usually been the case of late years, nearly every seat was occupied by subscribers, and the occasion of the first night, together with the appearance of one of America's most gifted vocalists, combined to draw an additional number of people, who filled all the available standing room.

Generally speaking, the orchestra presented its well-known familiar aspect. Nearly all the leading players were to be seen, including Mr. Loeffler, who looked the picture of health in spite of his serious illness of last spring. Some important changes, nevertheless, have been made. Mr. Schroeder, late violoncellist of the noted Brodsky string quartette of Leipzig, takes the place of Mr. Hekking, who has gone over to Mr. Damrosch, in New York. He bears a high reputation, and will doubtless soon be heard as a soloist. Mr. Novacek, also of Leipzig, now leads the violas, and Mr. Guetter is the new first bassoon player. The third horn player is also new to the organization which this year will possess an extra performer on that instrument, as well as a third trumpeter. There would seem to be no question as to the strength of the orchestra.

Mr. Nikisch was heartily greeted as he appeared on the platform. The opening number was that exceedingly useful composition as far as name is concerned, but somewhat musty one, regarded from a musical point of view, Beethoven's overture, "Dedication of the House," opus 124. It certainly seems unfortunate that the great composer ever bestowed on this work the title it bears, since it is far better calculated to depress an audience into a state of gloomy silence than to create feelings of contagious liveliness. As an interesting example of how Beethoven could write in the so-called Handelian style, it may well find an occasional place on a symphony programme. But take away its name, and one might quite safely venture the assertion that it would never be heard at the dedication of any hall or theatre (it was written for the latter purpose), or as the first number of the first programme of a series of symphony concerts. And what an injustice, too, to Beethoven, to dig up this uninspired work for so important an occasion, when one of the "Leonore" overtures would have thrilled the very souls of the people present, and, without doubt, led them to the verge at least of enthusiasm.

As it was, the applause inspired by that feeling was reserved for Mrs. Lillian Nordica, the soloist of the evening, who was first heard in Beethoven's concert aria, "Ah Perfido." Mrs. Nordica possessed so many of the elements of popularity that it is small wonder she is the favorite that she is. Aside from her magnetic personality and the truly American spirit that she invariably displays in everything she attempts, her earnest and artistic endeavors command respect. She forces the careful listener to conclude that she has studied hard and patiently, that she is thoroughly interested in her work; and these qualities together with her musical, resonant voice, and her dramatic manner of delivery must of necessity, seldom fail to hold the attention, and to win the applause of her audiences.

In the aria just mentioned, it can hardly be said that she sounded any great depths of passion; but her singing was artistic, intelligent as to phrasing, and brilliant and effective as to execution. In this, as well as in her second number, the aria, "O Hall of Song," from "Tannhaeuser," she frequently gave evidence of the strong dramatic ability she is known to possess, and at the conclusion of both she was recalled several times.

The remaining numbers were the music from the third act of "Parsifal," called "Good Friday Spell," and Schumann's third symphony in E flat. The first is a concert piece made up of the music which accompanies "the anointing of Parsifal; his baptism by Kundry; and his reflections upon his position as King of the Grail," naturally, an arrangement interesting to hear. But why should have been injected into the programme of this concert is one of the mysteries that are past finding out. The symphony is too well known to require extended comment. As a whole, the programme must be considered altogether too sombre in character for one of the principal events of Boston's musical season; and hard to be accounted for, unless perhaps on the ground that Mr. Nikisch wished to impress strongly upon the minds of the subscribers to these concerts the seriousness of their undertaking.

Of the playing by the orchestra, it must be said that, although it would be impossible for so splendid a body of men to fail to play splendidly, to a greater or less degree, it was not by any means a fair example of what they are capable of. One could but involuntarily recall to mind the beautiful technical finish of the band at the commencement of its first season under Mr. Nikisch, and contrast it with the frequently harsh and ragged playing of last evening. But perhaps this disappointing condition of things was due to the enforced separation of the men during the summer months.

FIRST CONCERT. Times

The present season of Symphony concerts (the eleventh season) was inaugurated at Music Hall Saturday evening, October 10, by the Boston Symphony orchestra under the direction of Mr. Arthur Nikisch. It is superfluous to say the hall was completely filled with the fashion, wealth, culture and music-loving common folk. The wealth and fashion occupied most of the floor and front tiers of the first balcony, while the real appreciators and common folk were less prominent in the back tiers. The orchestra has undergone but few changes in its general make-up, and with one exception the changes are no doubt for the better, although just yet, not quite apparent.

The entrée of Conductor Nikisch was signalled by the usual generous applause, though it did not reach an ovation. Mr. Nikisch looked hearty and well. He received the applause with that becoming dignity and posing stiffness for which he is somewhat noted, although there was noticeably more flexibility about his "entrée movements" than formerly. From an elevated and lofty position we commanded an excellent view of the entire house, seeing every thing worth seeing, and hearing considerably more than we wished to. Here is the programme:

Overture, "Dedication of the House," Beethoven; aria, "Ah, Perfido," Beethoven; Good Friday Spell from "Parsifal," Wagner; aria from "Tannhäuser," Wagner; Symphony in E flat, No. 3 (Rheinisch), Schumann. Mme. Lillian Nordica was the singer.

The very first beat showed lack of confidence and decision on the part of the orchestra in their leader, for they came in behind it, after it had passed. It was the same with several succeeding measures. Why was this and what the cause? There certainly are not new men enough to result in such a state of affairs. There have been ample rehearsals to overcome all the difficulties contained in the overture, and yet it was coarsely done, almost from beginning to end. In the fugue movement the brass was decidedly brassy, the men apparently blowing till they were purple outside and in. It was terrific to the hearing and nerves. If the instruments had been in better tune, matters would have been bettered somewhat. To make the din still more unbearable the contra basses sawed away for dear life, as if their very existence depended on the amount of noise they could produce. All in all, the overture fared worse than we ever remember to have heard it.

Madame Nordica was greeted with genuine applause, for she is a favorite here, having received much of her early education in Boston, though she is a Farmington, Maine, girl. The madame has the wonderful advantage of possessing a fine stage presence. This, with her elegant gown and outside paraphernalia, created as much enthusiasm as her singing, though she really sings well. She possesses a clear, ringing voice, possibly somewhat devoid of real sweetness. It is well cultivated, and this, with other brilliant qualities, go to make her a pronounced success. Her singing evidently pleased the large audience, for they called her out again and again. But she only bowed her acknowledgements.

The Parsifal music was quite satisfactorily performed, though it might be improved; no doubt after the orchestra have been together a little longer they will play better. They are not yet settled down to real hard, earnest work. It is too soon after vacation.

Madame Nordica's second selection was even more successful than the first. She really sang it better. She was called out three times at its conclusion, and was, as a matter of course, presented with choice flowers.

The Schumann E flat symphony was much overstrained from the brass. But this we hope, will be remedied in time.

JAMES M. TRACY.

Last Saturday night brought back society, en masse, to attend the first Symphony concert. Music Hall was full to overflowing. The first balcony was, as has been the recent fashion, the musical center; there were to be seen Mr. B. J. Lang and wife, Mr. Wm. F. Apthorp and wife, Miss Lang, Mr. Arthur Foote, Miss Gertrude Edmonds, Mr. W. J. Winch and wife, and Mr. Hiram G. Tucker. The left balcony contained Mr. Harry Fay and wife, Mr. J. S. Dwight, Mr. G. L. Osgood and wife, Mr. Bernard Listemann, Mrs. C. L. Thayer, Mr. J. E. Priest, and Miss Richardson. On the floor were to be seen the Misses Riddle, Mrs. Arthur Nickish, Mr. H. M. Rogers and wife, Mrs. Julius Eichburg, Mrs. T. B. King, Mrs. Mark Hollingsworth, Mr. Hecht and wife, Mr. Eliot Hubbard and wife, Dr. Roland Whitridge, Mr. William Peters, Miss Winslow, Mr. Arthur Pickering, Mr. Arthur Austin, Mr. Donald White, Miss Mary Russell, Mrs. Phoebe Jenks, Mr. Barton Jenks, Dr. Fred Cheney, Mr. I. M. Gaugengigl, Mr. Edward Codman and wife, Dr. F. D. Stackpole, Mrs. Boardman, Miss Abbot, Miss Stackpole, Miss Heloise Hersey, Miss Gilman, and Mr. Frank Jackson. The chief changes to be seen were that Mr. Kneisel had gained flesh and Mr. Loeffler had grown a beard and had curly hair. Mr. Adamowski and Mr. Arkroyd seem to have drunk of the fountain of perpetual youth, and Mr. Nickish's hands were whiter than ever and his hair more volatile. Mrs. Apthorp, with her bonnet on one side and a veil across her forehead, seemed to have less chic than ever, and more flesh. Mrs. Gardner's seats were vacant, excepting when Mr. H. L. Harding took possession of them late in the evening. Mrs. Fiske Warren looked as beautiful as ever, and Mrs. Frank Watson was looking her best, after a summer in Europe.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

THEIR EDUCATIONAL VALUE—MR. NIKISCH
AND MR. GERICKE.

The announcement of the sale of tickets for the coming course of Symphony concerts is a forcible reminder that summer is over and that the musical season is close at hand. A year ago Boston was in a state of high excitement over the expected advent of the new conductor, who was to take the baton laid down by Mr. Gericke and lead our splendid orchestra to heights that had never before been attained by them under his predecessor. Under Mr. Nikisch the patrons of the concerts were to be favored with model programmes, and with an originality and breadth of conception of the works of the masters as had previously been unknown in our city. Of one thing in particular they were fully assured: there could be no doubt but that he would accomplish one feat that Mr. Gericke had at least been exceedingly chary of performing—that of “letting out the brass.” In fact there were all sorts of rumors and statements in circulation, many of which in the course of the winter were proved to have been absurd; and in all likelihood no one, if he could have realized the nature of the expectations thus aroused, would have regretted it more sincerely than Mr. Nikisch. The result of all this fever of anticipation was an unheard-of demand for tickets, and phenomenal prices at the auction sales. As to the concerts, the balance was so unevenly maintained between the fulfillment of these expectations and many unlooked for disappointments as to give rise to more confident assertion than ever before by some people, who, although deeply interested in the musical welfare of Boston, have always seemed to regard them with suspicion—that at last it had seen their best days. It is to show why this is quite improbable, and to recall to the minds of would-be patrons of the coming season its true purpose, that this article is written.

Any thoughtful person who hears for the first time of the scheme of the Boston Symphony Concerts can hardly fail to come to the conclusion that their mission must be, of necessity, purely educational. A few such concerts, given during a winter, may not improperly be regarded in the light of refined entertainment. But a course of twenty-four, given weekly, must soon cease to become entertaining, in the accepted sense of the term, and take on instead the form of a regular course of musical instruction. No persons, however indifferent or unmusical, can attend such a series constantly, without finding themselves involuntarily trying with more and more earnestness to comprehend what is going on. In addition, their ears gradually become so thoroughly accustomed to music and performances of the highest class, that inferior music and inadequate performances will soon grow to a large degree intolerable to them.

It is evident that the importance of the relation of the present to the coming generation is not to be overlooked in music any more than in other departments of education. All teachers of this art know the disadvantages they labor under, when they have to deal with the musical children of unmusical parents; and as this condition of things is nowadays more prevalent than otherwise, it can readily be seen that any institution that tends to remedy it, is, if for no other reason, worthy of the highest praise and sincerest support.

However the Symphony concerts may have been regarded at the outset, there can be no reasonable doubt that their present prosperity is really due to their value as a means of education, rather than to their power of creating momentary pleasure. They are eagerly anticipated by a very large number of cultivated people of Boston and vicinity, who will in all probability continue to take a deep interest in them as long as their present high standard is maintained.

Even in the event of their becoming no longer fashionable, it is impossible to believe that the places made vacant by followers of the fickle goddess would not be quickly filled. There might result to the management a loss in premiums, but it is fair to presume that such a loss would not produce any change in their character or quality; for Mr. Higginson, when he established them, could not possibly have foreseen the course they have since taken, and consequently could not have counted on the great help the premiums have been in keeping down the yearly deficit.

With respect to Mr. Nikisch and his success and lack of it last winter, it seems clear now that he was placed at as great a disadvantage as Mr. Gericke was during the first part of his engagement: that is, he was as much over-rated as his predecessor was under-rated. Mr. Gericke had everything to do when he took the leadership, for the reason that the first three years of the existence of the orchestra were purely experimental. A man of ideas and faithful to a high ideal, he had to make it clear that a thorough reorganization was necessary before that which he deemed worthy of the institution and himself could be accomplished. This done, he proceeded on his way toward his chosen goal with as much loyalty and forgetfulness of self as it is given most men to show.

It is easy to recall the results of his faithfulness; how, year after year he labored, until his efforts were finally crowned with the tremendous success of his last two seasons; how the fame of his band spread abroad until the demand for tickets became unprecedented. Every one felt that he was doing magnificent work. And yet, the love of change is so inborn with most people, that, notwithstanding this evident appreciation, the eagerness with which the glowing accounts of Mr. Nikisch were received was sure proof that he had not been estimated at his true worth.

40

It has been said of Mr Gericke that he was a great drill-master, but not a great interpreter. There is, without doubt, plenty of truth in the first assertion, and plenty of room for argument over the last. One thing however is certain: the value of his work as a whole, and his influence on the thousands that listened to his splendid examples of ensemble playing and artistic and conservative readings of the masters cannot be over-estimated.

The noble manner in which Mr. Gericke performed his part can as plainly be seen now as can the failure of Mr. Nikisch to justify wholly the expectations that were aroused concerning him. But if the latter's conceptions, and lack of care in maintaining the technical excellence of the orchestra were subject to much adverse comment, so also were the former's first efforts. It is said that Mr. Nikisch is sensitive to criticism. However that may be, the performances under his direction present at this time a curious spectacle of ups and downs. For some time there was a steady falling off in accuracy and finish; and the audiences were treated to certain interpretations, which could at the time only be accounted for when his former intimate connection with the opera at Leipsic was taken into consideration.

But we have now a dim suspicion that other things may have influenced him strongly. Mr. Nikisch, although extremely talented, is also extremely young for the position he holds. It seems improbable that he could have fully realized before he came here the nature of the institution of which he was to be the autocratic leader. Being a man of boundless imagination and ambition, when he discovered the true state of affairs—this mine of wealth as it were, which was placed at his disposal, what could be more natural than that he should have desired to work it for his own benefit? In other words, his audiences were most likely the victims of not a few experiments on his part. Perhaps, too, he labored under the impression that nothing short of loud and sensational readings would suit us Americans.

Whether these suppositions are correct or not, before the end of the season a marked improvement in the performances was noticeable, which seemed at least to indicate that he was getting more thoroughly accustomed to the atmosphere of the concert room than he had been in Leipsic.

That Mr. Nikisch possesses rare talent is unquestionable. And it will be to his friends, whose number already is legion, the saddest of surprises if, having sown his wild oats last year, he does not proceed to put the orchestra and their performances on the high plane that he was expected to do at the very commencement of his first season. There can be scarcely a doubt but that he will accomplish all this, and that the end of his term will find him indissolubly identified with another step in the progress of music in Boston.

T. P. CURRIER.

41
Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1891-92.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

II. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 17, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

TSCHAIKOWSKY.

SUITE, op. 55.

Elegie.—Valse melancholique.—Scherzo.—

Tema con Variazioni.

(First time in Boston.)

MASCAGNI.

PRELUDE from the Opera "Cavalleria Rusticana."

(First time at these Concerts.)

BEETHOVEN.

MENUETTO AND FINALE. (Fugue), from String Quartette, op. 59, No. 3, in C.

(Played by all the Strings.)

(First time.)

SONGS with PIANO.

a) SCHUBERT.

"DER NEUGIERIGE."

b) SCHUMANN.

"MONDNACHT."

c) JENSEN.

"MURMELNDES LUFTCHEN."

MASSNET.

OVERTURE. "Phedre."

SOLOIST:

MR. WILLIAM J. WINCH.

The Piano used is a Steinway.

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the second concert was:

Tschaikowsky: Suite No. 3, op. 55.
 Mascagni: Prelude to "Cavalleria Rusticana."
 Beethoven: Menuetto and Finale from quartet in C, op. 59, No. 3.
 Songs with Pianoforte:
 Schubert—"Der Neugierige."
 Schumann—"Mondnacht."
 Jensen—"Murmeldes Lüftchen."
 Massenet: Overture to "Phèdre."
 Mr. William J. Winch was the singer.

The Tschaikowsky suite, which is one of the composer's prime favorites, shows him in a more genial mood than many of his compositions do that have been heard here before. It is a work which he has conducted in almost every city in Europe in which he has held a bâton, and one wonders rather that no one has ever played the trick on him that a wag once played on Goldmark, who was much surprised one evening to find himself registered at his hotel as "Carl Goldmark and suite." This work of Tschaikowsky's is not always of the deepest seriousness, for which one is not unthankful, for when Tschaikowsky takes it into his head to be very serious indeed, he often becomes terribly grim, and carries his theme through its development with an inexorableness of musical logic and a disregard for so trivial a thing as euphony that are really appalling. But here one finds little of this musical ferocity. To be sure, in the second movement, Valse mélancolique, he now and then has a moment of black gloom such as no one but a Russian can be afflicted with; but the suite is for the most part genially musical, often exceedingly brilliant, and only at rare intervals tainted with triviality. The last movement, alla Polacca, of the variations comes rather ticklishly near to the general spirit of a Meyerbeer Fackeltanz, but its brilliancy is unquestionable. The Scherzo is a gem in its way. The orchestration is masterly throughout. The orchestra played the work magnificently, the strings doing wonders of prowess in one of the variations—far better worth doing than a Paganini "Perpetuum mobile" for all the violins!

No one need have been surprised to find the Prelude to Mascagni's "Cavalleria Rusticana" on the programme; an epidemic is an epidemic, and may be caught by anyone. It is, upon the whole, just as well for our Symphony Orchestra to take its share of the "Rusticana" infection, in a benign form, before Mascagni's opera has had to stand as sponsor for a new brand of cigars, or a new make of paper collars. True, it does not necessarily follow that because a composition is a work of genius, it is in place on every possible musical occasion; and one may feel that this prelude of Mascagni's, work of genius though it may be, possesses few of those characteristics which are usually regarded as passports to a symphony concert programme. It is a brilliant, but wholly sketchy, exposition of certain themes which are developed later on in the opera, and is interrupted at one point by a charming serenade, sung behind the stage by a tenor voice; but of musical form and musical development, in any true sense of the term, it has little or none. Still there is something to be said on the other side of the case. The "Cavalleria Rusticana" is a work about which the musical world is all agog with interest just now, and, as operative conditions go in this country, the only place in which the public can well hope to hear a really worthy performance of the Prelude is in the concert-room. Considering this, it is perhaps just as well to stretch a point in its favor as to do the same for the prelude to "Parsifal," the "Good Friday Spell," or any other unsymphonic tid-bit from the lyric stage of today. Perhaps Mr. Nikisch may yet give us a hearing of the "Hymen!" entr'acte movement from Massenet's "Esclarmonde," which, if not so regularly constructed as his overture to "Phèdre," is far pleasanter to listen to. We, for one, shall not complain. Mascagni's prelude is certainly exciting enough and was capitally played, Mr. Winch singing Turiddu's little serenade (no light task, by the way) with admirable fire and effectiveness. In the three songs by Schubert, Schumann and Jensen he was fairly at his best; the accompaniments were beautifully played by Mr. Nikisch.

Massenet's "Phèdre" overture was grandly played; but it is not music that wears well. It has passages of undeniable strength, but is, in general, coarse and often trivial in conception, and by no means remarkable in point of workmanship; the instrumentation is of truly masterly vulgarity. It is no very thankful task showing hospitality to contemporary French works for orchestra; they behave themselves so like a bull in a China shop!

Of the two movements from Beethoven's third Rasoumoffsky quartet we must say that the presence in Boston of two such organizations as the Kneisel and Adamowski Quartets makes the doing of this sort of thing at an orchestral concert doubly reprehensible; there is enough legitimate orchestral music in the world to make it needless to poach on other manors. Of course, when music is so supremely good as this of Beethoven's, and so capitally played as it was last Saturday evening, it must sound well and be highly enjoyable. But there should be a fitness in all things.

The next programme is: MacDowell, suite, Op. 42; Volkmann, concerto for violoncello, in A minor; Brahms, symphony No. 4, in E minor. Mr. Alwin Schroeder will be the cellist.

... The symphony concert of Saturday night was especially creditable to Mr. Nikisch as an exhibition of his catholicity of taste. Of the seven pieces, big and little, played or sung, only four were by German composers.

— The first Symphony Concert drew an enormous audience to Music Hall last Saturday night. A warm greeting was awarded to both Mr. Nikisch and Mme. Nordica. Nordica looked like a picture in beautiful white brocaded satin, with an Elizabethan ruff, and magnificent diamonds. Among the audience were noticed Mr. and Mrs. Barthold Schlesinger, Miss Schlesinger, Dr. and Mrs. Frank Watson, Mr. Frank Jackson, Mr. and Mrs. B. J. Lang, Miss Lang, Mr. J. S. Dwight, Mr. and Mrs. W. J. Winch, Mr. Arthur Foote, Mrs. Mark Hollingsworth, Miss White, Mr. Hiram Tucker, Mr. J. Edward Priest, Mr. A. H. Pickering, Mr. and Mrs. H. M. Rogers, Dr. George Monks, Mr. I. M. Gaugengigl, Mrs. W. F. Apthorp, Mrs. Phoebe Jenks, Mr. and Mrs. Ello: Hubbard, Miss Stackpole, Dr. Donald White, Mr. and Mrs. F. J. Bradlee, Mrs. Flake Warren, Mrs. Samuel D. Warren, Dr. and Mrs. Olla, and Mrs. Julius Eichberg.

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the second concert was:

Tschaikowsky: Suite No. 3, op. 55.
Mascagni: Prelude to "Cavalleria Rusticana."
Beethoven: Menuetto and Finale from quartet in C, op. 59, No. 3.
Songs with Pianoforte:
Schubert—"Der Neugierige."
Schumann—"Mondnacht."
Jensen—"Murmeldes Lüftchen."
Massenet: Overture to "Phèdre."
Mr. William J. Winch was the singer.

The Tschaikowsky suite, which is one of the composer's prime favorites, shows him in a more genial mood than many of his compositions do that have been heard here before. It is a work which he has conducted in almost every city in Europe in which he has held a bâton, and one wonders rather that no one has ever played the trick on him that a wag once played on Goldmark, who was much surprised one evening to find himself registered at his hotel as "Carl Goldmark and suite." This work of Tschaikowsky's is not always of the deepest seriousness, for which one is not unthankful, for when Tschaikowsky takes it into his head to be very serious indeed, he often becomes terribly grim, and carries his theme through its development with an inexorableness of musical logic and a disregard for so trivial a thing as euphony that are really appalling. But here one finds little of this musical ferocity. To be sure, in the second movement, Valse mélancholique, he now and then has a moment of black gloom such as no one but a Russian can be afflicted with; but the suite is for the most part genially musical, often exceedingly brilliant, and only at rare intervals tainted with triviality. The last movement, alla Polacca, of the variations comes rather ticklishly near to the general spirit of a Meyerbeer Fackeltanz, but its brilliancy is unquestionable. The Scherzo is a gem in its way. The orchestration is masterly throughout. The orchestra played the work magnificently, the strings doing wonders of prowess in one of the variations—far better worth doing than a Paganini "Perpetuum mobile" for all the violins!

No one need have been surprised to find the Prelude to Mascagni's "Cavalleria Rusticana" on the programme; an epidemic is an epidemic, and may be caught by anyone. It is, upon the whole, just as well for our Symphony Orchestra to take its share of the "Rusticana" infection, in a benign form, before Mascagni's opera has had to stand as sponsor for a new brand of cigars, or a new make of paper collars. True, it does not necessarily follow that because a composition is a work of genius, it is in place on every possible musical occasion; and one may feel that this prelude of Mascagni's, work of genius though it may be, possesses few of those characteristics which are usually regarded as passports to a symphony concert programme. It is a brilliant, but wholly sketchy, exposition of certain themes which are developed later on in the opera, and is interrupted at one point by a charming serenade, sung behind the stage by a tenor voice; but of musical form and musical development, in any true sense of the term, it has little or none. Still there is something to be said on the other side of the case. The "Cavalleria Rusticana" is a work about which the musical world is all agog with interest just now, and, as operatic conditions go in this country, the only place in which the public can well hope to hear a really worthy performance of the Prelude is in the concert-room. Considering this, it is perhaps just as well to stretch a point in its favor as to do the same for the prelude to "Parsifal," the "Good Friday Spell," or any other unsymphonic tid-bit from the lyric stage of today. Perhaps Mr. Nikisch may yet give us a hearing of the "Hymen!" entr'acte movement from Massenet's "Esclarmonde," which, if not so regularly constructed as his overture to "Phèdre," is far pleasanter to listen to. We, for one, shall not complain. Mascagni's prelude is certainly exciting enough and was capitally played, Mr. Winch singing Turiddu's little serenade (no light task, by the way) with admirable fire and effectiveness. In the three songs by Schubert, Schumann and Jensen he was fairly at his best; the accompaniments were beautifully played by Mr. Nikisch.

Massenet's "Phèdre" overture was grandly played; but it is not music that wears well. It has passages of undeniable strength, but is, in general, coarse and often trivial in conception, and by no means remarkable in point of workmanship; the instrumentation is of truly masterly vulgarity. It is no very thankful task showing hospitality to contemporary French works for orchestra; they behave themselves so like a bull in a China shop!

Of the two movements from Beethoven's third Rasoumoffsky quartet we must say that the presence in Boston of two such organizations as the Kneisel and Adamowski Quartets makes the doing of this sort of thing at an orchestral concert doubly reprehensible; there is enough legitimate orchestral music in the world to make it needless to poach on other manors. Of course, when music is so supremely good as this of Beethoven's, and so capitally played as it was last Saturday evening, it must sound well and be highly enjoyable. But there should be a fitness in all things.

The next programme is: MacDowell, suite, Op. 42; Volkmann, concerto for violoncello, in A minor; Brahms, symphony No. 4, in E minor. Mr. Alwin Schroeder will be the 'cellist.

....The symphony concert of Saturday night was especially creditable to Mr. Nikisch as an exhibition of his catholicity of taste. Of the seven pieces, big and little, played or sung, only four were by German composers.

—The first Symphony Concert drew an enormous audience to Music Hall last Saturday night. A warm greeting was awarded to both Mr. Nikisch and Mme. Nordica. Nordica looked like a picture in beautiful white brocaded satin, with an Elizabethan ruff, and magnificent diamonds. Among the audience were noticed Mr. and Mrs. Barthold Schlesinger, Miss Schlesinger, Dr. and Mrs. Frank Watson, Mr. Frank Jackson, Mr. and Mrs. B. J. Lang, Miss Lang, Mr. J. S. Dwight, Mr. and Mrs. W. J. Winch, Mr. Arthur Foote, Mrs. Mark Hollingsworth, Miss White, Mr. Hiram Tucker, Mr. J. Edward Priest, Mr. A. H. Pickering, Mr. and Mrs. H. M. Rogers, Dr. George Monks, Mr. I. M. Gaugengigl, Mrs. W. F. Apthorp, Mrs. Phoebe Jenks, Mr. and Mrs. Eliot Hubbard, Miss Stackpole, Dr. Donald White, Mr. and Mrs. F. J. Bradley, Mrs. Fiske Warren, Mrs. Samuel D. Warren, Dr. and Mrs. Olla, and Mrs. Julius Eichberg.

THE SECOND SYMPHONY CONCERT.—The program of the second symphony concert was an interesting one, although some complained of a "lack of dignity," because there was no symphony. But to many the change was agreeable and a relief. As a musical people we have yet to learn that music worth hearing does not necessarily depend upon the dimensions of time and space, but that a waltz, if it is well-made and well played, has its legitimate place in the concert hall and has a right to demand serious attention. At present many of us really believe that outside of a symphony, no matter whether it is stupid—for there are stupid symphonies and many of them—there is nothing worth hearing, and we regard it as a personal insult if the program seems frivolous. But at heart we are pleased.

If the program was an improvement over that of the week before, it must be frankly admitted on the other hand, that the playing of the orchestra in the Third Suite of Tschalkowsky (op. 55), given for the first time in Boston, was not worthy of its reputation. It was often ragged, and at times absolutely coarse. The wood-wind players frequently blew false, and the string-men scratched without excuse. On the other hand, the Prelude to "Cavalleria Rusticana" was finely played, and although it may be rank blasphemy to say so, the Prelude was the most pleasing number of the program, as well as the one most carefully played. In the first place it is genuine music, the speech of a man who is burning to talk. And to his natural eloquence is added the charm of cultivated expression. And what effective instrumentation from the beginning to the end! What sonority in the final fortissimo, not noise, but as though a great and thundering speech rolled out from the mouths of organ pipes! It has been said that this Prelude is too theatrical for a symphony concert. It is dramatic without doubt; theatrical if you please, but in the best sense of the word. Should it be refused a hearing in Music Hall because it excites and thrills? Nor was it one half as sensational as the performance of the Minuet and Fugue from Beethoven's string quartet, op. 59. No. 3 in C played by all the strings, which was a deliberate piece of clap-trap, an appeal to the gaping wonder of the crowd. Nor is the music more sensational than Massenet's "Phèdre" overture, which brought the concert to a close.

The Third Tschalkowsky Suite is not upon the whole so masterly a composition as the suite that precedes it in order. The Elegy is interesting and ingeniously made, nor is it devoid of spontaneity, but the Waltz and the Scherzo are manufactured. To be sure the machinery is of the newest description and the patterns have been approved; still the product is nothing but the result of patient labor. The last movement, Theme and Variations, is a noble work, full of scholarship vivified by the strong and pungent personality of this remarkable composer. The variations are well contrasted; the attention of the hearer never flags, nor does he find himself counting the numbers and anticipating gladly the Finale.

Mr. William J. Winch sang the serenade in the Prelude with spirit and with taste. He also sang two dull songs by Schubert and Schumann ("Der Neugierige" and "Mondnacht") and the song by Jensen, of which he never grows weary, "Murmeldes Lueftchen." He continually used in these songs the peculiar head tones he so delights in, and he thereby pleased the audience and gained two recalls. Hen. Jan.

MUSIC.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The first number of the Symphony Concert of Saturday evening was the Third Suite (op. 55) of Tschalkowsky. The radical musicians of the modern Russian school reject the compositions of Tschalkowsky as being cosmopolitan rather than national. Without going into the vexed question of whether nationality in music is a mere illusion, it may be said that it is impossible for a composer of today to avoid the influence of great or favorite composers. It is true that the music of Tschalkowsky shows what is known as German thoughtfulness. On the other hand he has studied Italian melody and French instrumentation. But above all there is the man himself, and his music is Russian in that he often presents his thoughts in a peculiar harmonic manner found only among the Russian composers. Whether this peculiarity arises from a sense of tonality derived from the plain song of the Greco-Russian church, or from the Slavonic temperament, or from any other attributed cause, is now immaterial. The fact remains that his music stands apart from that of men of other nations; just as the novels of Dostoyevsky could not have been written by a German or a Frenchman. And although he may not go as far as his nihilistic friends in despising the established scales and the systems of modulations, yet in spite of all his polish and his culture, he often appears shaggy, unkempt, barbaric, and terrible.

This Third Suite of Tschalkowsky, played for the first time in Boston, is long and of unequal worth. The themes of the "Elegie" are fresh and beautiful, and they are ingeniously treated. The two movements that follow show chiefly eccentricity. The "Valse Melancholique" it certainly doleful enough, and the "Scherzo" is bizarre. In these two movements everything seems forced and labored. The rhythm is tormented; the harmonies are sought for with pain; there is a heated hunt for new instrumental combinations. But the composer has nothing to say; and, perhaps knowing this, he strives to conceal the fact by unheard of and startling forms of expression. The result is weariness to the flesh. The final movement, "Tema con Variazioni," is the work of a master. A set of variations is too often a many-horned monster inspiring honest terror, but here the interest is always maintained, and the layman and the musician are alike delighted. The close with its dash of Meyerbeerish pomp is admirably put together and exceedingly effective. The Suite, as a whole, was well played, although the work of the wood-wind was occasionally faulty in intonation, and there was a lack of precision in many passages of the Scherzo.

The Prelude to "Cavalleria Rusticana" was played superbly, and Mr. Winch sang the tenor solo with genuine passion; yet this serenade demands a full, free and hot Italian voice. It was a great pleasure to at last hear this epitome of Mascagni's melodrama played by a fit orchestra. The prelude itself needs no words of praise. In this connection it is interesting to note—and I have not seen the fact mentioned in foreign or American newspapers—that in 1888 Verza's story was made into a play of one act by Paul Solanges and put upon the stage of the Theatre Libre of Paris. It was called "Chevalerie Rustique," and it was a dismal failure.

Beethoven's "Minuetto and Finale," from the string quartette op. 59. No. 3 in C, was played on all the strings. In its original form it is noble music. Swollen out of all proportions, distorted for the purpose of exciting the wonder of the unthinking, it loses its meaning; and the performance, however skillful, is no better than a raree show.

The final orchestral number was Massenet's Overture "Phèdre," a highly-flavored, intoxicating composition, with a melody of long breath, and many noisy measures. When Gluck treated a Grecian subject of passion, he wrote like a Greek. Massenet, perhaps inevitably, writes like a modern Frenchman, and Phèdre exchanges her antique robes for a Parisian costume, and the odor of absinthe is upon her feverish lips. Never would this heroine of Massenet have confessed and hung herself in despair as long as there was morphine to be bought of a good-natured apothecary.

Mr. Winch sang, with pianoforte accompaniment, Schubert's "Der Neugierige," Schumann's "Mondnacht" and Jensen's "Murmeldes Lueftchen." He sang these songs very sweetly, and he was twice recalled.

The programme of the concert Oct. 24 will be as follows: MacDowell's Suite op. 42 (first time in Boston); Volkmann's Cello Concerto in A minor, Brahms' fourth Symphony. Mr. Alwin Schroeder will be the soloist.

PHILIP HALE.

DRAMATIC AND MUSICAL.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT—SOLOIST, MR. WILLIAM J. WINCH.

A highly interesting and enjoyable programme was the one listened to at last Saturday night's Symphony concert. The works of the modern composers, Mascagni, Italian, and Tschalkowsky Russian, claimed special attention and interest, the "Cavalleria Rusticana" taking the lead, perhaps. This opera gained such sudden success at its first performance in Rome a little over a year ago, and later among other cities of Europe, that America looked forward to it with much anticipation. Its popularity is still increasing in spite of the conflicting opinions in regard to its claim of ranking with the great works of Verdi, Donizetti, Bellini and those of other Italian composers. The unexpected introduction in the prelude of the voice in the distance, gave Mr. Winch a splendid opportunity of attesting again his ability as a tenor of cultivation and distinction. With the exception of a slight strain when the climax was reached the serenade was most satisfactorily rendered.

Mr. Schneckner played the accompaniment on the harp in the ante-room with Mr. Winch, while Miss Shaw acted as harpist in the orchestra. The audience expressed great pleasure and delight at the close of this number and enthusiastically called forth Mr. Winch from his seclusion.

The suite of Tschalkowsky coming first on the programme, and played for the first time in Boston, put the audience in an expectant attitude and prepared them somewhat for the novelty of the movements which followed. The development of the "Elegie" was peculiar, although not altogether satisfactory, the "Valse Melancholique" surely a dance weird enough for the uncanny phantoms that might arise from some enchanted spot in the "old country," while the "Scherzo" dispelled all gloom and depression and aroused such feelings of mirth and fun as to bring smiles and plaudits from the fascinated hearers.

THE SECOND SYMPHONY CONCERT.—The program of the second symphony concert was an interesting one, although some complained of a "lack of dignity," because there was no symphony. But to many the change was agreeable and a relief. As a musical people we have yet to learn that music worth hearing does not necessarily depend upon the dimensions of time and space, but that a waltz, if it is well-made and well played, has its legitimate place in the concert hall and has a right to demand serious attention. At present many of us really believe that outside of a symphony, no matter whether it is stupid—for there are stupid symphonies and many of them—there is nothing worth hearing, and we regard it as a personal insult if the program seems frivolous. But at heart we are pleased.

If the program was an improvement over that of the week before, it must be frankly admitted on the other hand, that the playing of the orchestra in the Third Suite of Tchaikowsky (op. 55), given for the first time in Boston, was not worthy of its reputation. It was often ragged, and at times absolutely coarse. The wood-wind players frequently blew false, and the string-men scratched without excuse. On the other hand, the Prelude to "Cavalleria Rusticana" was finely played, and although it may be rank blasphemy to say so, the Prelude was the most pleasing number of the program, as well as the one most carefully played. In the first place it is genuine music, the speech of a man who is burning to talk. And to his natural eloquence is added the charm of cultivated expression. And what effective instrumentation from the beginning to the end! What sonority in the final fortissimo, not noise, but as though a great and thundering speech rolled out from the mouths of organ pipes! It has been said that this Prelude is too theatrical for a symphony concert. It is dramatic without doubt; theatrical if you please, but in the best sense of the word. Should it be refused a hearing in Music Hall because it excites and thrills? Nor was it one half as sensational as the performance of the Minuet and Fugue from Beethoven's string quartet, op. 59. No. 3 in C played by all the strings, which was a deliberate piece of clap-trap, an appeal to the gaping wonder of the crowd. Nor is the music more sensational than Massenet's "Phédre" overture, which brought the concert to a close.

The Third Tchaikowsky Suite is not upon the whole so masterly a composition as the suite that precedes it in order. The Elegy is interesting and ingeniously made, nor is it devoid of spontaneity, but the Waltz and the Scherzo are manufactured. To be sure the machinery is of the newest description and the patterns have been approved; still the product is nothing but the result of patient labor. The last movement, Theme and Variations, is a noble work, full of scholarship vivified by the strong and pungent personality of this remarkable composer. The variations are well contrasted; the attention of the hearer never flags, nor does he find himself counting the numbers and anticipating gladly the Finale.

Mr. William J. Winch sang the serenade in the Prelude with spirit and with taste. He also sang two dull songs by Schubert and Schumann ("Der Neugierige" and "Mondnacht") and the song by Jensen, of which he never grows weary, "Murmeldes Lueftchen." He continually used in these songs the peculiar head tones he so delights in, and he thereby pleased the audience and gained two recalls. How True

MUSIC.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The first number of the Symphony Concert of Saturday evening was the Third Suite (op. 55) of Tchaikowsky. The radical musicians of the modern Russian school reject the compositions of Tchaikowsky as being cosmopolitan rather than national. Without going into the vexed question of whether nationality in music is a mere illusion, it may be said that it is impossible for a composer of today to avoid the influence of great or favorite composers. It is true that the music of Tchaikowsky shows what is known as German thoughtfulness. On the other hand he has studied Italian melody and French instrumentation. But above all there is the man himself, and his music is Russian in that he often presents his thoughts in a peculiar harmonic manner found only among the Russian composers. Whether this peculiarity arises from a sense of tonality derived from the plain song of the Greco-Russian church, or from the Slavonic temperament, or from any other attributed cause, is now immaterial. The fact remains that his music stands apart from that of men of other nations; just as the novels of Dostoevsky could not have been written by a German or a Frenchman. And although he may not go as far as his nihilistic friends in despising the established scales and the systems of modulations yet in spite of all his polish and his culture, he often appears shaggy, unkempt, barbaric, and terrible.

This Third Suite of Tchaikowsky, played for the first time in Boston, is long and of unequal worth. The themes of the "Elegie" are fresh and beautiful, and they are ingeniously treated. The two movements that follow show chiefly eccentricity. The "Valse Melancholique" is certainly doleful enough, and the "Scherzo" is bizarre. In these two movements everything seems forced and labored. The rhythm is tormented; the harmonies are sought for with pain; there is a heated hunt for new instrumental combinations. But the composer has nothing to say; and, perhaps knowing this, he strives to conceal the fact by unheard of and startling forms of expression. The result is weariness to the flesh. The final movement, "Tema con Variazioni," is the work of a master. A set of variations is too often a many-horned monster inspiring honest terror, but here the interest is always maintained, and the layman and the musician are alike delighted. The close with its dash of Meyerbeerish pomp is admirably put together and exceedingly effective. The Suite, as a whole, was well played, although the work of the wood-wind was occasionally faulty in intonation, and there was a lack of precision in many passages of the Scherzo.

The Prelude to "Cavalleria Rusticana" was played superbly, and Mr. Winch sang the tenor solo with genuine passion; yet this serenade demands a full, free and hot Italian voice. It was a great pleasure to at last hear this epitome of Mascagni's melodrama played by a fit orchestra. The prelude itself needs no words of praise. In this connection it is interesting to note—and I have not seen the fact mentioned in foreign or American newspapers—that in 1888 Verga's story was made into a play of one act by Paul Solanges and put upon the stage of the Theatre Libre of Paris. It was called "Chevalerie Rustique," and it was a dismal failure.

Beethoven's "Minuetto and Finale," from the string quartette op. 59, No. 3 in C, was played on all the strings. In its original form it is noble music. Swollen out of all proportions, distorted for the purpose of exciting the wonder of the unthinking, it loses its meaning; and the performance, however skillful, is no better than a rance show.

The final orchestral number was Massenet's Overture "Phédre," a highly-flavored, intoxicating composition, with a melody of long breath, and many noisy measures. When Gluck treated a Grecian subject of passion, he wrote like a Greek. Massenet, perhaps inevitably, writes like a modern Frenchman, and Phédre exchanges her antique robes for a Parisian costume, and the odor of absinthe is upon her feverish lips. Never would this heroine of Massenet have confessed and hung herself in despair as long as there was morphine to be bought of a good-natured apothecary.

Mr. Winch sang, with pianoforte accompaniment, Schubert's "Der Neugierige," Schumann's "Mondnacht" and Jensen's "Murmeldes Lueftchen." He sang these songs very sweetly, and he was twice recalled.

The programme of the concert Oct. 24 will be as follows: MacDowell's Suite op. 42 (first time in Boston); Volkmann's "Cello Concerto in A minor, Brahms's fourth Symphony. Mr. Alwin Schroeder will be the soloist.

PHILIP HALE.

DRAMATIC AND MUSICAL.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT—SOLOIST, MR. WILLIAM J. WINCH.

A highly interesting and enjoyable programme was the one listened to at last Saturday night's Symphony concert. The works of the modern composers, Mascagni, Italian, and Tchaikowsky Russian, claimed special attention and interest, the "Cavalleria Rusticana" taking the lead; perhaps. This opera gained such sudden success at its first performance in Rome a little over a year ago, and later among other cities of Europe, that America looked forward to it with much anticipation. Its popularity is still increasing in spite of the conflicting opinions in regard to its claim of ranking with the great works of Verdi, Donizetti, Bellini and those of other Italian composers. The unexpected introduction in the prelude of the voice in the distance, gave Mr. Winch a splendid opportunity of attesting again his ability as a tenor of cultivation and distinction. With the exception of a slight strain when the climax was reached the serenade was most satisfactorily rendered.

Mr. Schaecker played the accompaniment on the harp in the ante-room with Mr. Winch, while Miss Shaw acted as harpist in the orchestra. The audience expressed great pleasure and delight at the close of this number and enthusiastically called forth Mr. Winch from his seclusion.

The suite of Tchaikowsky coming first on the programme, and played for the first time in Boston, put the audience in an expectant attitude and prepared them somewhat for the novelty of the movements which followed. The development of the "Elegie" was peculiar, although not altogether satisfactory, the "Valse Melancholique," surely a dance weird enough for the uncanny phantoms that might arise from some enchanted spot in the "old country," while the "Scherzo" dispelled all gloom and depression and aroused such feelings of mirth and fun as to bring smiles and plaudits from the fascinated hearers.

The finale afforded a fine opportunity for the different parts of the orchestra to do some excellent work in elaborating the melodious theme in its ingenious variations. Mr. Kneisel was heard with great pleasure in his violin solo, with the soft, full orchestra accompaniment, as were also the trio for flutes and the English horn. Beethoven's Minuetto and Finale by the strings proved to be the least satisfactory work of the evening, although much enjoyment was looked for in this number.

The "Phedre" overture by Massenet dwelt upon the tragic side of the story almost wholly, and made a grand dramatic ending of the evening's performance. In the cluster of songs by Schubert, Schumann and Jensen, with Mr. Nikisch presiding at the piano, Mr. Winch was heard to the greatest satisfaction. His fine phrasing, the light and shade in facial expression, the clearness of enunciation and purity and sweetness of his tones were truly worthy of his best work.

The programme for next Saturday night promises to be more classical, although some doubt may arise as to its being more universally enjoyed. The new cello player, Mr. Alwin Schroeder, will be the soloist, and the suite op. 42, by E. A. McDowell, the cello concerto, in A minor, by Volkman, and Brahms' fourth symphony will complete the programme.

SYMPHONY AND SONG.

Tschaikowsky Harmonies and Mascagni Melodies.

The second of the Symphony concerts, given in Music Hall last evening, was enjoyed by an assemblage no less notable than the gathering which welcomed the beginning of the series a week previous.

Conductor Nikisch's programme included the first performances by his band of a suite by Tschaikowsky, selections from a Beethoven string quartet and the prelude from "Cavalleria Rusticana."

Portions of the suite and the prelude in its entirety proved delicious treats to the audience, and won at both afternoon rehearsal and evening concert uncommon demonstrations of approval.

Tschaikowsky's name has frequently occupied a place of prominence on symphony programmes, and the hearing of his suite, op. 55, certainly strengthened the regard and admiration already felt for this master's spirited style of scoring and grand command of harmonic effects.

The suite consists of four movements, elegie, valse melancholique, scherzo and finale, the latter 12 variations on an exquisite theme.

The first two movements, although marked by strength and originality, are not particularly noteworthy, as compared with the striking beauties of the scherzo and the variations. The scherzo is brilliant and dashing in style, and is scored for full orchestra, with triangle, drum and tambourine added.

The theme is introduced by the first violins and is then successively treated by nearly all the instruments with astonishing variety and brilliancy of effect.

Perhaps the most pleasing of all was the trio for flutes, violins and strings.

It was with genuine delight that the audience listened to the "Cavalleria" prelude.

Although previous performances by other orchestras had won admiration for the work, not before had opportunities been afforded for full appreciation of its beauties.

Mascagni's opera has already been considered at such length that it is unnecessary to now comment upon its wealth of melodic effects originality and grandeur of orchestration.

The prelude includes many of the principal themes of the opera and the tenor's serenade, sung with harp accompaniment, before the curtain raises. Mr. William J. Winch was the soloist, and he was twice recalled to share honors with the orchestra.

Mr. Winch also contributed three songs, with piano accompaniment by Mr. Nikisch. "Der Neugeborene," by Schubert, "Mondnacht," by Schumann, and "Murmured Luftchen," by Jensen, were his selections, and each was sung with the refined taste, purity of tone and correctness of technique always prominent in this admirable artist's vocal work. The sweet and delicate melody of the Jensen number was especially enjoyable.

The minuetto and finale from Beethoven's string quartet, op. 59, no. 3, in C made a very good impression for a first hearing, but it belongs to a class of music which gains appreciation from the student rather than the average auditor, at least when presented as a novelty. It was splendidly played by the orchestra.

Massenet's familiar "Phedre" overture brought the enjoyable concert to an end.

Announcements for the next concert are as follows:

E. A. MacDowell..... Suite, op. 42
(First time in Boston.)
Volkman..... Concerto for violoncello, in A minor
Brahms..... Symphony No. 4, in E minor
Mr. Alwin Schroeder will be the soloist.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Symphony Concert.

The programme of Saturday was not of symphonic dignity, and even if one concedes the necessity of an occasional lapse from a severe standard, the arrangement of the numbers, and their performance, too, left much to be desired. Summed up in a word, the concert consisted of sugar and sensation. The symphonic cloak was thrown over the proceedings by Tschaikowsky's Suite which has almost as good a claim to symphonic title as Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding Symphony," although the proper sonata form with development is lacking.

The work reminded of Goldmark in more ways than one, for it had often the sensuous languor which characterizes the works of the Viennese composer, and the same richness of orchestration that can be found in the "Queen of Sheba," a richness that is at times oppressive. The English horn is made much of in the first two movements, and this instrument, so well adapted to express a profound melancholy, certainly did it in the "Valse Melancholique" which was sad, even to the Mrs. Gummidge point of lachrymation, but the instrument was excellently played and certainly is not to be blamed for the dreariness of the tale of woe which the composer desired to ventilate. The scherzo is piquant enough to make amends, the combination of the woodwind instruments with the characteristic pizzicati of the contrabasses being good (although the syncopations were not very clearly caught up) and the pianissimo effects of trumpets and drum giving an unexpected contrast to the chief theme.

But the best part of the work, on a first hearing, seemed to be the variations of the close. Ever since Beethoven ended his heroic symphony in this form, the composers who sought a fitting climax to their large instrumental forms, have found it in "Theme and Variations," and next Saturday we shall find a great symphony (Brahms' E minor) reaching its close in the same manner. And Tschaikowsky is particularly successful in this form, for his themes are always interesting and melodious, and his modes of treatment, from the contrapuntal down to the simplest homophonic, are musicianly and effective. Such variations are interesting also, from the fact that they pass the different departments of the orchestra in review, so that one can judge of it in detail. The English horn and the solo violin (Mr. Kneisel) had fine opportunities in this part of the suite, and they made the most of them. The woodwind instruments were not above reproach, nor were the strings remarkable for good ensemble, although they played with abundant spirit. The same hearty energy was present in the entire orchestra in the highly-spiced ending, but one may whisper it, even in Gath, that there is sometimes more dash than elegance in the execution at present.

The prelude to "Cavalleria Rusticana" has been sufficiently reviewed of recent days, and I may pass it by with the statement that, spite of the broad reading and fiery performance, the work smacks too much of the theatre to be admitted into the highest order of concert programmes. The singing of Mr. Winch in this deserves commendation, for the number is quite outside of his usual vein, yet he gave it a breadth and passion that proved him more versatile than he generally receives credit for being. As for his later solos, with piano accompaniment, they would have suited better to Chickering or Steinert Hall than to this place and programme. Schumann's "Mondnacht" went altogether too languishingly, as if the moonlight were mingled with syrup, but at least all this languor and sentimentality were thoroughly in place in that tenderest of musical sugar plums. Jensen's "Murmuring Breeze," which, along with Dvorak's "Als die alte Mutter," belongs to the singer by right, because of the excellence of his legato and falsetto.

To give part of a Beethoven string quartet (op. 59, No. 3) in a magnified state as work for string orchestra was not in good taste. If it was intended to show the perfection of the strings in difficult work, it failed of its purpose, for the deeper parts were out of all proportion to the violins, and the attacks and shading were not of highest excellence. Some of Beethoven's piano works might better be elaborated into orchestral compositions; to work the great sonata (the largest ever written, and absolutely a piano symphony), op. 106, into a full score, might more readily be condoned than this tampering with the composer's intention.

The concert ended with Massenet's "Phedre" overture, and here Mr. Nikisch was at his best, for he gave a most passionate reading which brought out the meaning of the work excellently. It is much to be able to read a Schumann symphony one week and follow it the next with a work of such totally different school, and do both so equally well. The orchestra, inspired by their conductor, gave the number with an abandon that was inspiring.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Symphony Concert-Soloist, William J. Winch.

"Wang" Makes a Great Success at the Globe—The "Cavalleria Rusticana" Enjoyed at the Tremont—The Kneisel Quartet Concerts—Mr. Peter-Silea's Analytical Recitals—Notes.

Mascagni and Tschaikowsky divided the honors at last evening's symphony concert, the programme including the "Cavalleria Rusticana" prelude and Tschaikowsky's suite op. 55, both novelties to the patrons of these concerts. These numbers and the "Phedre" overture as an ending made the programme approach very nearly the popular order, but the Beethoven "Minuetto and Finale" from the string quartet op. 53, No. 3 in C, saved such a catastrophe.

48
Mr. William J. Winch was the soloist, and his singing of the serenade in the Mascagni prelude gained him a great ovation. He sang the number in the ante-room with Mr. Schuecker, the harpist, as accompanist, the harp part in the orchestra for this number being played by Miss Shaw. The interest awakened in the music of Mascagni in this work has become so general that the selection made a most important feature of the programme, and the orchestral score had an interpretation that revealed its beauties in the most satisfactory way. It was a source of keen delight to listen to such a performance of the now-familiar prelude, and the pleasure it gave the audience found quick and enthusiastic expression.

An equal interest was aroused by the playing of the new Tchaikowsky suite, which had its first hearing here on this occasion.

The "Elegie," which makes its first movement, does not appear to be the result of the spontaneous outpouring of the composer's mind, and the "Waltz Melancholique," which follows, is aptly named. The third movement is a "scherzo," and in this the bright, jolly, fascinating work of the composer creates the greatest enjoyment, all the clapping materials of the band being used to increase the effect of this portion of the suite. The theme, and 12 variations on the same, making the final movement, however, gives an ending to the suite which puts the unmistakable stamp of genius upon it. The possibilities of the tone colorings of the modern orchestra appear to have been well nigh exhausted in the ingenious combinations used in these variations, and the tuneful theme assumes characteristics of the most widely varied forms. In the performance of this number the excellence of the leading members of the orchestra were prominently displayed, and the solo violin playing of Mr. Kniesel, the trio for flutes and the work done by the English horn player were especially enjoyable.

Mr. Winch's songs, with the piano accompaniments of Mr. Nikisch, Schubert's "Der Neugierige," Schumann's "Mondnacht" and Jensen's "Murmelndes Luftchen" were highly artistic vocal efforts, and gained this most satisfying singer a well merited recall after he had concluded the group.

The work done by the string players in the Beethoven selection might have been better, but the ill success attending this number was well nigh forgotten in the splendid performance of the "Phedre" overture.

Next Saturday evening the soloist will be Mr. Alvin Schroeder, the new cello player, and the programme will be E. A. MacDowell's suite, op. 42, Volkmann's cello concerto in A minor and Brahms' fourth symphony.

—One missed at the concert Saturday night, and will miss more and more through the winter at all the choice musical occasions, those patrons who have always been prominent in their active interest and co-operation, but who are abroad for the season. Mrs. Bell and Mrs. Pratt, the R. M. Cushings, Mr. and Mrs. R. C. Dixey, Mr. and Mrs. Henry Winsor, Mrs. Frank Higginson, Mrs. C. H. Dorr, and Mr. Theodore Chase being among the number. One misses, too, the presence of the late Charles Shimmis, who was always a faithful attendant where the best music was to be heard, and whose genial face and kindly nature will long be cherished by his friends in grateful memory.

MUSICAL. Suite

The Symphony Concert.

The concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall, last evening, attracted a large audience, but not so large as that of the first concert. The programme covered a wide field, and it could not justly be complained that it lacked eclecticism in style. It opened with a new Suite, op. 55, by the Russian, Tchaikowsky, and was followed by the Prelude to the opera "Cavalleria Rusticana," by the Italian Mascagni. Just here German Beethoven dropped in rather incongruously, with the minuet and finale from the string quartet, op. 59, No. 3, played by all the strings; the whole ending with the overture to "Phedre," by the Frenchman, Massenet. The new suite is a strong and interesting work, composed of four movements—an Elegie, that is not by any means elegiac, but is full of grace and freshness in its themes, and rich beauty in its harmonies and instrumentation; a Valse Melancholique, that is exceedingly melancholy, but very uninteresting; a Scherzo, grotesque and weird, and abundant in queer rhythms and wild frolic, but labored and affected in style; and a Theme with variations, a noble bit of writing and by far the finest and most solid movement of the work. The instrumentation is of rare beauty through the suite, but it reaches its highest point in the finale, which, on the whole, seems to us the broadest, clearest and most masterly effort that we have yet heard by this composer. It was carefully and effectively played, as the rule, but now and then the wood wind were painfully out of tune, and in the brilliant and difficult scherzo there was much of raggedness in the playing of the orchestra generally. The suite is very long, taking three quarters of an hour in performance, a fact, perhaps, which accounted somewhat for the coldness of its reception up to the last movement, which, on the contrary, was heartily and deservedly applauded. The impressive and beautiful Mascagni Prelude was finely read and played, the performance increasing immeasurably the favor with which the composition has met here. For the first time it was heard with an adequate orchestra and efficient players, and the effect was strikingly impressive. Mr. Winch sang the tenor solo with admirable fire and sympathy. The warmest applause of the evening rewarded this work. The virtuosity of the string orchestra was interestingly illustrated by its playing of the Beethoven selection; but why turn a quartet into an orchestral work; why pervert the composer's intention and intensify the perversion by impudently luging in the contre basses, to the inevitable destruction of the original color and of the original effect generally? A quartet is one thing and a quartet is quite a different affair. Besides, there is not such a dearth of music written expressly for the orchestra as to necessitate "monkeying" with a well-proportioned masterpiece until it is bloated entirely out of shape. There is no more logical reason for swelling a Rasoumowski quartet into an orchestral work than there is for diminishing an Eroica symphony to a quartet. It is to be hoped that these concerts may not be prolific in such inartistic and useless misrepresentations of great works. Mr. Winch, in addition to his solo in the Prelude, contributed to the concert a group of songs, with piano accompaniments, which he sang at his very best, and at the end of which he received two hearty recalls. The programme for the next concert is: Suite, op. 42, E. A. MacDowell; Concerto for Violoncello, Volkmann; Symphony No. 4, in E minor, Brahms. The soloist is to be Mr. Alvin Schroeder.

—The third symphony concert brought together many familiar faces. Beautiful Mrs. C. E. Inches and pretty Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, in "smart" brown costume, were conspicuous on the floor, as were the tall and splendid looking daughters of Mr. J. Lewis Stackpole. The right balcony was, as usual, the corner to which all eyes were turned, although Mr. MacDowell was in the left balcony. Miss Marie Grelaud, looking exceedingly handsome, was in Mrs. Gardner's seat, and chatted across the aisle with Mr. Apthorp, whose wife was not present. Mrs. Arthur Foote, looking wonderfully young and piquant, appeared for the first time in her seat; and Mrs. Henry Whitman, in a buff gown and thickly veiled, was another new comer.

THE SYMPHONY.

The programme of the second rehearsal and concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra contained a fair share of novelties.

Tchaikowsky's Suite opus 55 for full orchestra was the opening number, and was performed for the first time in Boston. It is divided into four movements. The first an "Elegie," has for its theme a fresh, charming melody quietly given out by the strings, with which the wood-wind and horns are soon combined. After extended treatment of the melody, some slight contrapuntal development occurs which leads through a fine crescendo to a return of the theme, now played by the full orchestra fortissimo. Then the close draws near, a short solo on the English horn is heard, and the movement, in effect a song, ends as tranquilly as it began. Next comes a "Valse Melancholique," which begins with weird, sombre minor harmonies, rendered more striking by combinations of the low wood-wind, 'celli and double-basses. After a few measures the first theme is given out by three flutes, and mostly upon this material an extended period is built. No decided waltz rhythm is noticeable until the appearance of the middle part, which is strong in accent, and brusque in character.

The first part then returns, bringing the movement to a melancholy close. No thoughts of the waltz, as most people of Western civilization regard that diversion, are aroused by Tchaikowsky's gloomy strains; but it may be that among the oppressed natives of his own mysterious country, there are to be discovered those who find rhythmic inspiration in such mournful measures.

The scherzo brings relief with its nervous, animated rhythm in dotted notes and triplets, and its fascinating orchestration. Effective tone coloring is produced by the skilful and fanciful use of various instruments, including the trumpets, triangle, snare drum and cymbels; and though its humor is not of the lightest, the movement is in a degree enlivening, and serves to prepare the mind for the brilliant, imposing finale. This consists of a theme and twelve variations, which it is unnecessary to refer to in detail. The theme is a simple, pleasant melody; and in the variations are displayed much ingenuity of construction, effectiveness of contrast, and gorgeousness of orchestration. The flute, English horn and violin appear as solo instruments; and the final variation in polacca form, in which the full strength of the orchestra is used with splendid effect, brings the work to a stirring end. Although in the suite form, Tchaikowsky is necessarily prevented from giving full rein to the strong imagination and passionate feeling with which other works of his are deeply imbued, this opus 55 is a characteristic and worthy product of his pen; of a kind that might be expected to come from the hand of the original yet not eccentric, bold yet not reckless genius who stands today first among Russian composers. It was finely played, the work of the orchestra being far in advance of that of last week.

The remaining novelty was the prelude to Mascagni's opera, "Cavalleria Rusticana," of which it can be said that it has at last received an adequate performance in this city. Mr. Nikisch's reading was simply a stroke of genius, his tempi and nuances, and the breadth and dignity of his conception of the music leaving nothing to be desired. The orchestra also played with real enthusiasm, the quality of tone produced by the strings being positively thrilling. "Turridu's" serenade, which is a part of the prelude, and at the theatre is sung behind the curtain, was here sung in the ante-room by Mr. W. J. Winch, to the harp accompaniment of Mr. Schuecker, his place in the orchestra being taken by a lady. Mr. Winch rendered the passionate love song very expressively and dramatically, though the natural musical quality of his voice was somewhat impaired through the necessity of making himself heard at such a distance. The whole performance thoroughly aroused the audience and Mr. Winch was heartily recalled. Later in the evening he sang three songs, "The Inquirer," Schubert; "Moonlight," Schumann, and "Whispering Breezes," Jensen, to Mr. Nikisch's accompaniment, in a manner instinct with taste, musical feeling and artistic simplicity of style.

49

Following the prelude came the menuetto and fugue from Beethoven's string quartette, opus 59, in C, played by all the strings including the double basses. This number served well the apparent purpose of its introduction—to give the string players some solid practice—and the fugue was certainly very effective. The concert closed with Massenet's overture to "Phedre," a brilliant work, written in the conventional concert overture form, but on the whole rather noisy and theatrical.

TOBER 25, 1891. Times

THE SYMPHONIES.

SECOND CONCERT.

The second Symphony concert (Saturday evening, Oct. 17) was quite an improvement on the first, in two respects. First, it contained some novelties which greatly pleased and interested its patrons. Second, the orchestra as a whole played better, though there is much room for further improvement. One point seems quite clear to the unprejudiced, and that is, Mr. Nikisch, so far, has not succeeded in producing a well defined, gradual crescendo or diminuendo. He jumps from fortissimo to pianissimo; there is no half way; no real, absolute, well defined gradation of tone-coloring. There is effect in sudden loud and sudden soft which Mr. Nikisch seems to fully understand, for he deals in that art to perfection; but on the score of legitimate musical expression, it is somewhat questionable. All departments of the orchestra produce a much tougher quality of tone than formerly, a fact which is absolutely true. Yes, the string department which used to be so firm in finesse is now more or less disjointed—each player seems to act on his own impulses. The material of the orchestra is unquestionably superb, there is no better in the world; but—they require firmness in discipline, without which the best material avails nothing. With such an orchestra better results can be attained.

We did not hear the first number of the Tchaikowsky suite; we have no doubt it was interesting. "Waltz Melancholique" must

Mr. William J. Winch was the soloist, and his singing of the serenade in the Mascagni prelude gained him a great ovation. He sang the number in the ante-room with Mr. Schuecker, the harpist, as accompanist, the harp part in the orchestra for this number being played by Miss Shaw. The interest awakened in the music of Mascagni in this work has become so general that the selection made a most important feature of the programme, and the orchestral score had an interpretation that revealed its beauties in the most satisfactory way. It was a source of keen delight to listen to such a performance of the now-familiar prelude, and the pleasure it gave the audience found quick and enthusiastic expression.

An equal interest was aroused by the playing of the new Tschaiakowsky suite, which had its first hearing here on this occasion.

The "Elegie," which makes its first movement, does not appear to be the result of the spontaneous outpourings of the composer's mind, and the "Waltz Melancholique," which follows, is aptly named. The third movement is a "scherzo," and in this the bright, jolly, fascinating work of the composer creates the greatest enjoyment, all the clatrap materials of the band being used to increase the effect of this portion of the suite. The theme, and 12 variations on the same, making the final movement, however, gives an ending to the suite which puts the unmistakable stamp of genius upon it. The possibilities of the tone colorings of the modern orchestra appear to have been well nigh exhausted in the ingenious combinations used in these variations, and the tuneful theme assumes characteristics of the most widely varied forms. In the performance of this number the excellence of the leading members of the orchestra were prominently displayed, and the solo violin playing of Mr. Kneisel, the trio for flutes and the work done by the English horn player were especially enjoyable.

Mr. Winch's songs, with the piano accompaniments of Mr. Nikisch, Schubert's "Der Neugierige," Schumann's "Mondnacht" and Jensen's "Murmelndes Luftchen" were highly artistic vocal efforts, and gained this most satisfying singer a well merited recall after he had concluded the group.

The work done by the string players in the Beethoven selection might have been better, but the ill success attending this number was well nigh forgotten in the splendid performance of the "Phedre" overture.

Next Saturday evening the soloist will be Mr. Alvin Schroeder, the new 'cello player, and the programme will be E. A. McDowell's suite, op. 42, Volkmann's 'cello concerto in A minor and Brahms' fourth symphony.

—One missed at the concert Saturday night, and will miss more and more through the winter at all the choice musical occasions, those patrons who have always been prominent in their active interest and co-operation, but who are abroad for the season. Mrs. Bell and Mrs. Pratt, the R. M. Cushings, Mr. and Mrs. R. C. Dixey, Mr. and Mrs. Henry Winsor, Mrs. Frank Higginson, Mrs. C. H. Dorr, and Mr. Theodore Chase being among the number. One misses, too, the presence of the late Charles Shimmie, who was always a faithful attendant where the best music was to be heard, and whose genial face and kindly nature will long be cherished by his friends in grateful memory.

MUSICAL. Society

The Symphony Concert.

The concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall, last evening, attracted a large audience, but not so large as that of the first concert. The programme covered a wide field, and it could not justly be complained that it lacked eclecticism in style. It opened with a new Suite, op. 55, by the Russian, Tschaiakowsky, and was followed by the Prelude to the opera "Cavalleria Rusticana," by the Italian Mascagni. Just here German Beethoven dropped in rather incongruously, with the minuet and finale from the string quartet, op. 59, No. 3, played by all the strings; the whole ending with the overture to "Phedre," by the Frenchman, Massenet. The new suite is a strong and interesting work, composed of four movements—an Elegie, that is not by any means elegiac, but is full of grace and freshness in its themes, and rich beauty in its harmonies and instrumentation; a Valse Melancholique, that is exceedingly melancholy, but very uninteresting; a Scherzo, grotesque and weird, and abundant in queer rhythms and wild frolic, but labored and affected in style; and a Theme with variations, a noble bit of writing and by far the finest and most solid movement of the work. The instrumentation is of rare beauty through the suite, but it reaches its highest point in the finale, which, on the whole, seems to us the broadest, clearest and most masterly effort that we have yet heard by this composer. It was carefully and effectively played, as the rule, but now and then the wood wind were painfully out of tune, and in the brilliant and difficult scherzo there was much of raggedness in the playing of the orchestra generally. The suite is very long, taking three quarters of an hour in performance, a fact, perhaps, which accounted somewhat for the coldness of its reception up to the last movement, which, on the contrary, was heartily and deservedly applauded. The impressive and beautiful Mascagni Prelude was finely read and played, the performance increasing immeasurably the favor with which the composition has met here. For the first time it was heard with an adequate orchestra and efficient players, and the effect was strikingly impressive. Mr. Winch sang the tenor solo with admirable fire and sympathy. The warmest applause of the evening rewarded this work. The virtuosity of the string orchestra was interestingly illustrated by its playing of the Beethoven selection; but why turn a quartet into an orchestral work; why pervert the composer's intention and intensify the perversion by impudently lugging in the contre basses, to the inevitable destruction of the original color and of the original effect generally? A quartet is one thing and a quartetized is quite a different affair. Besides, there is not such a dearth of music written expressly for the orchestra as to necessitate "monkeying" with a well-proportioned masterpiece until it is bloated entirely out of shape. There is no more logical reason for swelling a Rasumowski quartet into an orchestral work than there is for diminishing an Eroica symphony to a quartet. It is to be hoped that these concerts may not be prolific in such inartistic and useless misrepresentations of great works. Mr. Winch, in addition to his solo in the Prelude, contributed to the concert a group of songs, with piano accompaniments, which he sang at his very best, and at the end of which he received two hearty recalls. The programme for the next concert is: Suite, op. 42, E. A. McDowell; Concerto for Violoncello, Volkmann; Symphony No. 4, in E minor, Brahms. The soloist is to be Mr. Alvin Schroeder.

—The third Symphony concert brought together many familiar faces. Beautiful Mrs. C. E. Inches and pretty Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, in "smart" brown costume, were conspicuous on the floor, as were the tall and splendid looking daughters of Mr. J. Lewis Stackpole. The right balcony was, as usual, the corner to which all eyes were turned, although Mr. MacDowell was in the left balcony. Miss Marie Grelaud, looking exceedingly handsome, was in Mrs. Gardner's seat, and chatted across the aisle with Mr. Apthorp, whose wife was not present. Mrs. Arthur Foote, looking wonderfully young and plump, appeared for the first time in her seat; and Mrs. Henry Whitman, in a buff gown and thickly veiled, was another new comer.

THE SYMPHONY.

The programme of the second rehearsal and concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra contained a fair share of novelties.

Tschaiakowsky's Suite opus 55 for full orchestra was the opening number, and was performed for the first time in Boston. It is divided into four movements. The first an "Elegie," has for its theme a fresh, charming melody quietly given out by the strings, with which the wood-wind and horns are soon combined. After extended treatment of the melody, some slight contrapuntal development occurs which leads through a fine crescendo to a return of the theme, now played by the full orchestra fortissimo. Then the close draws near, a short solo on the English horn is heard, and the movement, in effect a song, ends as tranquilly as it began. Next comes a "Valse Melancholique," which begins with weird, sombre minor harmonies, rendered more striking by combinations of the low wood-wind, 'celli and double-basses. After a few measures the first theme is given out by three flutes, and mostly upon this material an extended period is built. No decided waltz rhythm is noticeable until the appearance of the middle part, which is strong in accent, and brusque in character.

The first part then returns, bringing the movement to a melancholy close. No thoughts of the waltz, as most people of Western civilization regard that diversion, are aroused by Tschaiakowsky's gloomy strains; but it may be that among the oppressed natives of his own mysterious country, there are to be discovered those who find rhythmic inspiration in such mournful measures.

The scherzo brings relief with its nervous, animated rhythm in dotted notes and triplets, and its fascinating orchestration. Effective tone coloring is produced by the skilful and fanciful use of various instruments, including the trumpets, triangle, snare drum and cymbals; and though its humor is not of the lightest, the movement is in a degree enlivening, and serves to prepare the mind for the brilliant, imposing finale. This consists of a theme and twelve variations, which it is unnecessary to refer to in detail. The theme is a simple, pleasant melody; and in the variations are displayed much ingenuity of construction, effectiveness of contrast, and gorgeousness of orchestration. The flute, English horn and violin appear as solo instruments; and the final variation in polacca form, in which the full strength of the orchestra is used with splendid effect, brings the work to a stirring end. Although in the suite form, Tschaiakowsky is necessarily prevented from giving full rein to the strong imagination and passionate feeling with which other works of his are deeply imbued, this opus 55 is a characteristic and worthy product of his pen; of a kind that might be expected to come from the hand of the original yet not eccentric, bold yet not reckless genius who stands today first among Russian composers. It was finely played, the work of the orchestra being far in advance of that of last week.

The remaining novelty was the prelude to Mascagni's opera, "Cavalleria Rusticana," of which it can be said that it has at last received an adequate performance in this city. Mr. Nikisch's reading was simply a stroke of genius, his tempi and nuances, and the breadth and dignity of his conception of the music leaving nothing to be desired. The orchestra also played with real enthusiasm, the quality of tone produced by the strings being positively thrilling. "Turridu's" serenade, which is a part of the prelude, and at the theatre is sung behind the curtain, was here sung in the ante-room by Mr. W. J. Winch, to the harp accompaniment of Mr. Schuecker, his place in the orchestra being taken by a lady. Mr. Winch rendered the passionate love song very expressively and dramatically, though the natural musical quality of his voice was somewhat impaired through the necessity of making himself heard at such a distance. The whole performance thoroughly aroused the audience and Mr. Winch was heartily recalled. Later in the evening he sang three songs, "The Inquirer," Schubert; "Moonlight," Schumann, and "Whispering Breezes," Jensen, to Mr. Nikisch's accompaniment, in a manner instinct with taste, musical feeling and artistic simplicity of style.

Following the prelude came the menuetto and fugue from Beethoven's string quartette, opus 59, in C, played by all the strings including the double basses. This number served well the apparent purpose of its introduction—to give the string players some solid practice—and the fugue was certainly very effective. The concert closed with Massenet's overture to "Phedre," a brilliant work, written in the conventional concert overture form, but on the whole rather noisy and theatrical.

TOBER 25, 1891. Times

THE SYMPHONIES.

SECOND CONCERT.

The second Symphony concert (Saturday evening, Oct. 17) was quite an improvement on the first, in two respects. First, it contained some novelties which greatly pleased and interested its patrons. Second, the orchestra as a whole played better, though there is much room for further improvement. One point seems quite clear to the unprejudiced, and that is, Mr. Nikisch, so far, has not succeeded in producing a well defined, gradual crescendo or diminuendo. He jumps from fortissimo to pianissimo; there is no half way; no real, absolute, well defined gradation of tone-coloring. There is effect in sudden loud and sudden soft which Mr. Nikisch seems to fully understand, for he deals in that art to perfection; but on the score of legitimate musical expression, it is somewhat questionable. All departments of the orchestra produce a much tougher quality of tone than formerly, a fact which is absolutely true. Yes, the string department which used to be so firm in finesse is now more or less disjointed—each player seems to act on his own impulses. The material of the orchestra is unquestionably superb, there is no better in the world; but—they require firmness in discipline, without which the best material avails nothing. With such an orchestra better results can be attained.

We did not hear the first number of the Tschaiakowsky suite; we have no doubt it was interesting. "Waltz Melancholique" must have been written when the author was suffering with "Catsenyarmer," a German word, but we spell it after the American plan. The meaning of the word is, "seasickness," pain in the head, an unsteady locomotion, with a persistency of the sidewalk coming up to meet you face to face! The waltz time and accent is mostly missing, at least there is little reminder of either, while the music is doleful enough to carry one safely through purgatory. The Scherzo was considerably brighter, showing convalescence from a severe fit of the blues. The theme with variations showed the author's knowledge of orchestration in the highest possible light. Only a master and genius can write such a score, and whatever sensational there is about it there is the stamp of a master mind. The orchestra did their work very well, and the audience were carried away with delight.

50

Mascagni's Prelude was an opportune selection. It made us forget we were listening to the Boston Symphony. The rendition of the music was satisfying, while Mr. Winch's singing in the ante-room was really fine. To such selections, even the fashion does not object, but applaud.

Beethoven's quartette by all the strings was a poor selection. There is plenty of good music by this author to be found without resorting to such scraps. It is well enough for the strings to have practise together, but let it be when they are alone together.

The three German songs sung by Mr. Winch are all gems, and it is but just to him to say he did them in a very artistic manner. We do not remember to have heard him when he sang so well, particularly in the last selection. He was very heartily recalled several times. Mr. Nikisch is also deserving praise for the chaste and beautiful accompaniments he furnished on the pianoforte.

The Massenet overture made a fitting close to a very enjoyable concert, albeit it is a noisy and rather an uninteresting production.

JAMES M. TRACY.

51
Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1890-91.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

VIII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 6TH, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

BEETHOVEN. OVERTURE, "Coriolan."

GOLDMARK. CONCERTO for VIOLIN.
(First time.)

SCHUMANN. SYMPHONY in C major, No. 2.

SOLOIST:

MR. FRANZ KNEISEL.

50
have been written when the author was suffering with "Catzenyarnmer," a German word, but we spell it after the American plan. The meaning of the word is, "seasickness," pain in the head, an unsteady locomotion, with a persistency of the sidewalk coming up to meet you face to face! The waltz time and accent is mostly missing, at least there is little reminder of either, while the music is doleful enough to carry one safely through purgatory. The Scherzo was considerably brighter, showing convalescence from a severe fit of the blues. The theme with variations showed the author's knowledge of orchestration in the highest possible light. Only a master and genius can write such a score, and whatever sensational there is about it there is the stamp of a master mind. The orchestra did their work very well, and the audience were carried away with delight.

Mascagni's Prelude was an opportune selection. It made us forget we were listening to the Boston Symphony. The rendition of the music was satisfying, while Mr. Winch's singing in the ante-room was really fine. To such selections, even the fashion does not object, but applaud.

Beethoven's quartette by all the strings was a poor selection. There is plenty of good music by this author to be found without resorting to such scraps. It is well enough for the strings to have practise together, but let it be when they are alone together.

The three German songs sung by Mr. Winch are all gems, and it is but just to him to say he did them in a very artistic manner. We do not remember to have heard him when he sang so well, particularly in the last selection. He was very heartily recalled several times. Mr. Nikisch is also deserving praise for the chaste and beautiful accompaniments he furnished on the pianoforte.

The Massenet overture made a fitting close to a very enjoyable concert, albeit it is a noisy and rather an uninteresting production.

JAMES M. TRACY.

51
Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1890-91.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

VIII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 6TH, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

BEETHOVEN. OVERTURE, "Coriolan."

GOLDMARK. CONCERTO for VIOLIN.
(First time.)

SCHUMANN. SYMPHONY in C major, No. 2.

SOLOIST:

MR. FRANZ KNEISEL.

52

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1891-92.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

III. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 24, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

- | | |
|------------------|--|
| E. A. MACDOWELL. | SUITE in A minor, op. 42.
IN A HAUNTED FOREST. (Largamente misterioso; Allegro furioso; Maestoso).
SUMMER IDYL. (Allegretto grazioso).
THE SHEPHERDESS SONG. (Andantino, Semplice).
FOREST SPIRITS. (Molto Allegro; Misterioso; Molto Allegro; Presto).
(First time in Boston). |
| VOLKMANN. | CONCERTO FOR VIOLONCELLO, A minor op. 33.
Allegro moderato.—Vivace.—Tempo primo. |
| <hr/> | |
| BRAHMS. | SYMPHONY No. 4, in E minor,
Allegro non troppo.—Andante moderato.—
Allegro giocoso.—Allegro energico e passionato. |
-

SOLOIST:

MR. ALWIN SCHROEDER.

DRAMATIC AND MUSICAL.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The third of the Symphony concerts for this season was held at Music Hall last Saturday night before the usual large and appreciative audience.

Conductor Nikisch, as he stood on his high platform with baton in hand, reminded one of an artist with his paint brush, the orchestra forming the responsive canvas and bringing out the artist's ideals as the master willed.

A light touch of the brush produced the delicate tints and tones of color, while a deep dip brought out the shades and strong coloring in æsthetic contrast. Specially beautiful were the pictures painted through the vivid imagination of Mr. E. A. McDowell in his suite in A minor. The first movement, "In a Haunted Forest." What an opportunity for the fanciful play of the imaginative, and how it brought up all the stories of ghosts, gnomes, brownies and other freaks of one's early, fable-loving days!

The second movement, "Summer Idyl," was like a beautiful poem, written in the peaceful summer warmth of a "rare day in June."

In "The Shepherdess Song" one could see the hills of Scotland and the "bonnie lassie" in her Highland garb, with her crook in her right hand and her left shading her eyes in search of a lost lamb or maybe the "laddie" approaching in the distance. The picture seemed very clear, but one listened in vain for the sound of her voice, which made one wish for the introduction of a solo from the violin, and, perhaps, the lover's response from the flute coming from "across the hills and far away."

Then in strong contrast to all the preceding movements came the "Forest Spirit." Enjoying a revel in the depths of their seclusion, "far from the busy haunts of men," the dainty sprites and fairies tripped over the velvety green moss of some beautiful dell, while others pirouetted on a harebell or floated away among the whispering leaves of the friendly trees, and when the final notes died away the awakening plaudits revealed the fact that sitting in the balcony was the author of this delightful musical fantasy. The applause increased to such an extent that the diffident composer was obliged to acknowledge his identity, which he did with a modest bow.

Admirers of the violoncello must have been greatly pleased with the playing of the soloist of the evening, Mr. Alwyn Schroeder, who proved himself an artist of the first degree. The choice of Volkmann's concerto afforded him the best of opportunities for giving a broad and masterly conception of the wide range of musical ideas that can be expressed with a 'cello. His tones were clear, pure and sweet, and his execution artistic and skillful. He plays with a great deal of warmth and fine feeling, and his instrument responds like a living thing.

Those who heard Brahms's string quartette at the Kneisel chamber concert would scarcely recognize the same composer in the closing Symphony No. 4, in E minor. With the exception of the first movement there seemed to be such an overflow of musical ideas tumbling over each other, that only those of thorough musical training could be able to digest the rapid changes. Brahms is to music what Browning is to poetry, and the taste for each must be an acquired one.

An excellent programme is announced for next week, with Mr. Alfred Greenfield as piano soloist. Beethoven's beautiful Pastoral Symphony No. 6 and Strauss's symphonic poem, "Don Juan," with the concerto for pianoforte in D minor, by Rubinstein, are the attractive numbers in store for those who attend the next concert.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Symphony Concert, Soloist, Alwyn Schroeder.

E. A. MacDowell's New Suite Played—
The Adamowski Quartet Concerts—
The Austrian Juvenile Band's Tour—
The Cecilia's Plans—Notable Announcements—News, Comment.

The third of the season's concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra at Music Hall last evening, Mr. Arthur Nikisch, conductor, was enjoyed by the usual large audience. The soloist of the occasion was Mr. Alwyn Schroeder, the new 'cello player, who was heard in Volkmann's concerto in A minor, and the programme also included a first hearing here of Mr. E. A. MacDowell's orchestral suite, op. 42, and the symphony No. 4, in E minor, by Brahms.

The 'cello player, Mr. Schroeder, is a distinct acquisition to the orchestra, and his future appearances as soloist will be anticipated with pleasure by all who heard him play last evening. He has a fine 'cello, and under his bow it gives out a big, rich, pure tone, which affords keen satisfaction in the strongest, and it responds as well to the faintest touch. The new player is a master of the technique of the 'cello, and the fanciful embellishments of the theme in the second and last movements of the concerto were very skillfully handled. No artist could ask for a quicker or more enthusiastic recognition of merit than that which rewarded Mr. Schroeder's efforts at the conclusion of the concerto. He is a charming player, and will, without question, quickly take his place with the best 'cello soloists in America.

Mr. MacDowell's suite had its first public performance at the Worcester festival in September, and the pleasant impressions gained of the work at that time were fully confirmed in last evening's performance. The more extended study made possible for last evening's performance, by the fortunate conditions attending the Boston orchestra at home, resulted in a great gain in the interpretation of the suite, and Mr. MacDowell could hardly ask for a better hearing of his most admirable composition.

The first movement "In a Haunted Forest" has some delightfully "chivery" music that fairly recall childhood's memories of hobgoblins and such like beings that were conjured up by the enemies of youth, and the ghostly effects are splendidly worked up. The "Summer Idyl" which follows is in strong contrast and makes a tone picture suggesting a season of calm laziness so seldom realized in these days of life at high pressure. The andantino movement, styled "The Shepherdess Song," may be in keeping with the characteristics of this class of vocal efforts, but imagination fails to realize the accuracy of the idea in the mind of the composer. In the final movement, "Forest Spirits," Mr. MacDowell has caught the fashion of the "Dans Macabre," by Saint-Saëns, and, without imitating that composition, has produced a very fascinating tone picture, which suggests the midnight revels of imps and skeletons, which concludes with a suggestion of a devil-may-care jig by an inexperienced spirit unaccustomed to heeding the midnight summons.

The fourth of Mr. Brahms' symphonies was played to the taste of his admirers. Next Saturday evening Mr. Alfred Grunfeld, the pianist, is to play the D-minor concerto by Rubinstein, and the programme will also include the "Don Juan" symphonic poem by Richard Strauss, and the "Pastorale" symphony by Beethoven.

CONCERTS AND LECTURES.

Echoes of the Symphony Orchestra.

First Hearing of McDowell's Suite— A New 'Cello Soloist.

Announcements of Welcome Events in the Local Music World.

The programme offered by Director Nikisch at the third of this season's symphony concerts can scarcely be numbered among his most pleasing contributions. It was rather too heavy to receive popular approval and greater variety would have been welcome.

The concert was especially interesting, however, from the fact that it gave the first Boston performance of a new suite by Mr. E. A. McDowell, and marked the first appearance here as a soloist of the orchestra's new 'celloist, Mr. Alwin Schroeder.

Mr. McDowell is recognized as among the most accomplished of American composers and several of his former works have received unqualified approval from symphony audiences. His writings have also received recognition abroad, possibly with greater favor than those of any other American.

The suite played yesterday is a decided departure from his former style of writing. It is in a freer and more fanciful vein than are any of his earlier orchestral works.

The characteristics of the composition are indicated by the titles given to each of the four movements, "In a Haunted Forest," "Summer Idyl," "The Shepherdess' Song," "Forest Spirits."

Although many of the passages are strikingly suggestive of other composers, the work is not devoid of originality, but on the contrary there is much that is delightfully novel in harmonic effects, and in the arrangement of fantastic forms, which while perhaps not strictly new themselves, are charmingly set forth in unique settings, richly colored and beautifully contrasted.

As a series of tone pictures the suite is certainly entitled to high rank. One need not be a musical scholar to readily imagine the composer's thoughts.

"The Shepherdess' Song" is an exceedingly sweet and tender bit of pastoral writing, and the brilliant fourth movement is most praiseworthy. The entire work is treated in a skilful and musicianly manner.

Volkman's concerto for violoncello was the selection chosen by Mr. Schroeder for his introduction as a soloist to symphony audiences.

He received a very cordial greeting, and the hearty commendation accorded his playing promised much for his future popularity here.

The concerto offers excellent opportunity for a display of virtuosity, and it is for his technical skill that Mr. Schroeder merits most praise. His style is brilliant and finished, and he plays with much expression and with excellent taste. The tonal quality of his playing, however, is not equal to that of some other 'celloists who have been with this band.

Brahms' symphony No. 4, in E-minor, concluded the programme. Better performances of this brilliant work have been heard here in the past, especially that of the four movement, which was yesterday at times decidedly rough and noisy.

Next Friday and Saturday the following programme will be given: Richard Strauss, symphonic poem "Don Juan;" Rubinstein, concerto for pianoforte in D-minor; Beethoven's symphony No. 8, "Pastorale;" soloist, Mr. Alfred Grunfeld.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Symphony Concert.

It is no longer a matter of doubt; our orchestra has sunk below the standard of past years. The roughness that was apparent in the first concert might be condoned as almost inseparable from the beginning of a season; the same plea might be extended to cover the faults of the second, although the sensational features could scarcely be extenuated on such a ground; but the performance of the Brahms Symphony on Saturday was worse than anything that had preceded it, and I am reluctantly forced to the conclusion that our orchestral music is retrograding. Not only was everything done with a coarse and heavy hand, but the work was read as if it were a Liszt Rhapsody rather than an example of the purest vein of logical development and classical form. This is the more to be regretted, because our public have imbibed the notion that Brahms is fearfully dull, and undoubtedly many of the blurs of the orchestra were set down to the account of the innocent composer.

It may be granted that the first and last movements are music for musicians rather than for what Bulwer-Lytton called "the common herd," but certainly the second movement has sufficient of folksong flavor (although development is not lacking either) and the third movement is exciting enough. This last named movement may be set down as the poorest of the work, but the great beauty of the preceding movement and the extreme ingenuity of the variations of the finale make fullest amends for the temporary nodding of the musical Homer. It was in these variations that the greatest faults were committed, a blatant mock-heroic style adopted, and some of the ingenious treatments of the theme distorted to the point of obscurity. It is difficult enough for the amateur to follow these symphonic variations when they are clearly rendered, therefore last night the end of the work must have seemed a tonal labyrinth. The final measures of the movement degenerated into "sound and fury, signifying nothing."

Without going so far as to regard the four symphonies by Brahms as a continuation of the Beethoven series, one may state with absolute certainty that, considered from the intellectual side, Brahms has no living equal in homophonic, instrumental music. The truest music, however, is where intellect and emotion are in perfect equipoise. Brahms is as far on one side of the line as Chopin is on the other, and Beethoven comes nearest to being a wonderful combination of both qualities. Perhaps Brahms suffers under the same artistic disadvantage that hampered Mendelssohn, the misfortune of being too prosperous. As well expect an artist who has never been near the coast to paint the sea, as to hope for the expression of great emotion in the works of a composer who has suffered little. The sorrows and poverty of a Mozart or a Schubert seem to have constituted a part of their musical equipment, and were transmuted into tones. Brahms' one great sorrow, the loss of his mother, produced his greatest musical work, the "German Requiem." Since that time there has been something phlegmatic in his work. But let not any art lover despise the products of pure intellectuality; it is only the boarding-school miss who craves to be fed on purely emotional music and who may think that Brahms and dullness are synonyms.

The new violoncellist, Mr. Alwin Schroeder, made his first appearance at these concerts in this programme. He chose a rather prolix work for his debut, the A minor concerto by Volkmann. If the cadenza of the last movement of this could be attached to the first movement as a brilliant ending, the work would still be of ample length for what it has to say. The new artist made a favorable impression, and his technique is certainly marvellous. The chief fault to be noted was a lightness of tone, but this lack of breadth may be attributed to the instrument, which, however, was sweet in quality. The intonation was always pure, although a few of the harmonies were of doubtful quality. The end of the first movement, on the deepest tones of the C string, was strong and powerful enough. The march-like theme of the second part of the work was well played, but the finest display of virtuosity was reserved, of course, for the cadenza of the last movement. Here Mr. Schroeder displayed the utmost flexibility, and the runs, even in highest positions, were excellent, while the passages in double-stopping were clear, and the combination of bowing and pizzicato was also conquered without apparent effort. With a little broader tone Mr. Schroeder would take rank with the very best cello players heard here in recent years.

It remains only to speak of the Suite which began the concert, and this was not only the best played number of the programme, but was of most especial interest as being the composition of an American composer, and a resident of Boston. Mr. MacDowell is not one of those native composers who write correct contrapuntal exercises and consider that they are enriching the native repertoire thereby; when he writes a work he has something to say, and while he says it according to the canons of art, one loses sight of the correctness in the wealth of ideas. His scoring is very effective, and in this work, is exciting, if not new. The suite begins with a scene in a "Haunted Forest." Raff has already given us a set of sylvan spectres in the final of his "Im Walde" symphony, and it is impossible to avoid comparing the two movements, particularly as there is a recurrent figure in this which reminds of the Raff style of development.

It is, however, a proof of the vague character of programme music, that the picture represents a storm at sea quite as accurately as a haunted forest, indeed, the monotonous organ-point of the beginning, the rhythmic figure and the chromatic runs, suit better to a marine than to the woodland idea. The ghosts are not quite as unruly as Frau Holle and her suite in the Raff symphony, but they run, and pipe, and shiver, the piccolo shrieks, the violins tremble, and the contrabasses give a pizzicato as impressive as the famous ones in the "Freischütz" overture, and the effect is sufficiently spectral. The two interior movements of the suite are very short, and the second, "A Summer Idyl," has not very much to say (nor was it well played), but the third movement, "The Shepherdess Song," was tenderly romantic, and allowed the clarinet good opportunities, which were taken advantage of.

58

The finale was weird and uncanny enough to inspire the entire audience to appreciation, and its sudden, tricky changes from pp. to ff., its wild explosions, its bass clarinet tones (reminiscent of Weber and Berlioz) and its sudden pull-up, were not only spicy, but suited Mr. Nikisch's vein entirely, and nothing in the concert was so well played. Mr. MacDowell is decidedly influenced by the French school of orchestration, which may account for the fact that Massenet eulogized his works enthusiastically to me two years ago, and his compositions played at the Paris exposition evoked the heartiest response. The audience at this concert displayed an enthusiasm beyond anything I have ever seen aroused by a native work, and it was delightful to feel that it was deserved, for Mr. MacDowell is at once the most genial and the most spontaneous of our American composers.

The applause would not be stayed, but it was so significantly intended for the composer, that Mr. Nikisch did not accept it as a tribute to the orchestral playing (generally excellent in this work) or to his own fiery reading, but bowed with a gesture that spoke volumes for his pantomimic powers, and intimated in dumb show that he did not know where the composer was hidden, but almost simultaneously with this, there appeared the handsome head in which the ghosts had originated, at the rail of the upper balcony, and Mr. Nikisch pointed out the star, high up in the firmament, all of which was charmingly informal, and only added to the good humor which prevailed after the composer had made the public's flesh creep with his eerie tone-picture.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

MUSIC.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The programme of the third Symphony concert was as follows:

Suite in A minor, op. 42.....MacDowell
(First time in Boston.)
Concerto for Violoncello in A minor.....Volkman
Symphony No. 4, in E minor.....Brahms

Mr. MacDowell's Suite was played for the first time at the Worcester Festival Sept. 24, by an orchestra under the direction of Mr. Zerrahn. It then made a most pleasing impression upon musicians and laymen. Played last Saturday evening, it met with even a more flattering reception, and the long continued applause at the end of the work was not the mere formal and conventional expression of kindly feeling towards the composer who honors the town of his adoption; it was rather the open manifestation of delight at hearing a composition of such genuine beauty and skilful workmanship.

The composer has given fanciful names to the movements of his suite, as "In a Haunted Forest," "Summer Idyl," "The Shepherdess Song," and "Forest Spirits," but here he stops. He does not add to his music a printed programme as minute as an auctioneer's bill of sale. He suggests to the hearer a mood, and he allows the fancy of the hearer to roam at will. Even if he had not given his titles, if he had simply numbered the movements, the music would give just as much pleasure.

Here is an American composer, a young man, who is not an echo. He has a voice of his own. Although he has evidently studied all the means of expression, he conceals his studies in the apparent spontaneity and freedom of his art. His melodies are fresh; his harmonies are often exquisite, often striking; and his command of the resources of the orchestra is sure.

Indeed the instrumentation is thoroughly delightful throughout. This suite is as noticeable from what Mr. MacDowell reserves and omits as from the actual evidence submitted by him. When he gains an effect, he is content with it, and he dismisses it from his mind, instead of caressing it and introducing it on all occasions until the hearer is vexed and begins to question its value. He is also content with a simple statement, and he realizes the danger of over-elaboration. He is able to stand apart from his work and look at it, judge it, condemn, reject. There is here no trace of worship of a self-carved idol. His good sense saves him from youthful extravagance; he is sane even when he is bizarre. And, O rarest of musical virtues!—he knows when he has finished his speech.

The symphony was the fourth of Brahms. It would be idle to deny the solidity of the materials, the cunning of the workmanship, or the fine proportions. But the building is simply the work of the builder. No inspiration vivifies the mass.

It is the prevailing custom when a stranger enters the orchestra and takes a commanding position, to give him his opportunity for display. This custom is a pleasure to the audience, for the personality of the player wins more attention, even in symphony concerts, than the impersonality of the orchestra. It was Mr. Alwin Schroeder's turn, and his choice was the Volkmann 'cello concerto in A minor, an unfortunate choice. The composition is respectably dull and might be signed by any Professor Schultz or Mueller. It served, however, to show many of the excellent qualities that were recognized in Mr. Schroeder's playing at the late Kneisel concert. He is a careful and conscientious player; a thoughtful musician without virtuosic blood in his veins. The audience was pleased with his scholarly performance, and he was twice recalled.

The orchestra played the symphony with more vigor than discretion, and the suite was given with an appreciation of its many beauties. The wind instruments were not entirely satisfactory. Such eminent players as Mr. Mole and certain of his brethren have fallen into careless ways, and the horns have apparently lost their characteristic quality. Too often they sound like a new and attempted compromise between noisy members of the brass. It should be remembered that the horn is a "noble and melancholy instrument" and does not brook angry attacks upon it.

The programme of the concert of Saturday evening, Oct. 31, is as follows: Symphonic poem "Don Juan," Richard Strauss (first time in Boston); Rubinstein's Pianoforte Concerto in D minor; and Beethoven's "Pastorale" Symphony. Mr. Alfred Grunfeld will be the soloist.

PHILIP HALE.

MUSIC.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The programme of the third Symphony concert was as follows:

Suite in A minor, op. 42.....MacDowell
(First time in Boston.)
Concerto for Violoncello in A minor.....Volkman
Symphony No. 4, in E minor.....Brahms

Mr. MacDowell's Suite was played for the first time at the Worcester Festival Sept. 24, by an orchestra under the direction of Mr. Zerrahn. It then made a most pleasing impression upon musicians and laymen. Played last Saturday evening, it met with even a more flattering reception, and the long continued applause at the end of the work was not the mere formal and conventional expression of kindly feeling towards the composer who honors the town of his adoption; it was rather the open manifestation of delight at hearing a composition of such genuine beauty and skilful workmanship.

The composer has given fanciful names to the movements of his suite, as "In a Haunted Forest," "Summer Idyl," "The Shepherdess Song," and "Forest Spirits," but here he stops. He does not add to his music a printed programme as minute as an auctioneer's bill of sale. He suggests to the hearer a mood, and he allows the fancy of the hearer to roam at will. Even if he had not given his titles, if he had simply numbered the movements, the music would give just as much pleasure.

Here is an American composer, a young man, who is not an echo. He has a voice of his own. Although he has evidently studied all the means of expression, he conceals his studies in the apparent spontaneity and freedom of his art. His melodies are fresh; his harmonies are often exquisite, often striking; and his command of the resources of the orchestra is sure.

Indeed the instrumentation is thoroughly delightful throughout. This suite is as noticeable from what Mr. MacDowell reserves and omits as from the actual evidence submitted by him. When he gains an effect, he is content with it, and he dismisses it from his mind, instead of caressing it and introducing it on all occasions until the hearer is vexed and begins to question its value. He is also content with a simple statement, and he realizes the danger of over-elaboration. He is able to stand apart from his work and look at it, judge it, condemn, reject. There is here no trace of worship of a self-carved idol. His good sense saves him from youthful extravagance; he is sane even when he is bizarre. And, O rarest of musical virtues!—he knows when he has finished his speech.

The symphony was the fourth of Brahms. It would be idle to deny the solidity of the materials, the cunning of the workmanship, or the fine proportions. But the building is simply the work of the builder. No inspiration vivifies the mass.

It is the prevailing custom when a stranger enters the orchestra and takes a commanding position, to give him his opportunity for display. This custom is a pleasure to the audience, for the personality of the player wins more attention, even in symphony concerts, than the impersonality of the orchestra. It was Mr. Alwin Schroeder's turn, and his choice was the Volkmann 'cello concerto in A minor, an unfortunate choice. The composition is respectably dull and might be signed by any Professor Schultz or Mueller. It served, however, to show many of the excellent qualities that were recognized in Mr. Schroeder's playing at the late Kneisel concert. He is a careful and conscientious player; a thoughtful musician without virtuosic blood in his veins. The audience was pleased with his scholarly performance, and he was twice recalled.

59

The orchestra played the symphony with more vigor than discretion, and the suite was given with an appreciation of its many beauties. The wind instruments were not entirely satisfactory. Such eminent players as Mr. Mole and certain of his brethren have fallen into careless ways, and the horns have apparently lost their characteristic quality. Too often they sound like a new and attempted compromise between noisy members of the brass. It should be remembered that the horn is a "noble and melancholy instrument" and does not brook angry attacks upon it.

The programme of the concert of Saturday evening, Oct. 31, is as follows: Symphonic poem "Don Juan," Richard Strauss (first time in Boston); Rubinstein's Pianoforte Concerto in D minor; and Beethoven's "Pastorale" Symphony. Mr. Alfred Grunfeld will be the soloist.

PHILIP HALE.

MUSICAL.

The Symphony Concert.

Last night's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra opened with Mr. E. A. Macdowell's Suite for Orchestra in A-minor, op. 42; a work delightful throughout in the refined grace of its themes, and the delicacy, and the beauty of its tone color. If the suite have a fault, it is on the side of the brevity of its movements, which are dealt with so concisely that their subjects are scarcely set forth before the end comes as a surprise and disappointment. What there is, however, is very dainty and full of charm. The musicianship of the composer is manifested with unmistakable clearness, not only in the easy flow of his harmonies and their treatment, but in the richness and brilliancy of his instrumentation, which is masterly alike in its discretion and in the thorough knowledge it shows of the resources of the modern orchestra. The work was wholly gratifying in the hearing, was listened to with great interest, and at its close, met with hearty applause that was equally appreciative and deserved, and that was prolonged until the composer modestly bowed his acknowledgments from the upper balcony. It was carefully and sympathetically played, though the wind instruments were not beyond reproach in respect to intonation. The soloist was Mr. Alwin Schroeder, who played Volkmann's concerto, in A-minor, op. 33, for violoncello. It had been heard here before, and it did not improve on a second hearing. It is somewhat tedious and uninteresting and is much in the Kapellmeister vein. Mr. Schroeder is unquestionably an artist of excellent skill and taste. His tone is not large, but it is round and pure; his technique is able and ample. He was at his best, however, in his cantabile playing, which is delightfully broad, refined and artistic. He made a very favorable impression, was vigorously applauded and twice recalled. The concert ended with Brahms's labored and on the whole, noisy fourth symphony, and of which the third and last movements are the most interesting. We were less impressed by it on a second hearing than we were when it was given before at these concerts. It was spiritedly but somewhat coarsely and monoto-

movement, "The Shepherdess Song," was tenderly romantic, and allowed the clarinet good opportunities, which were taken advantage of.

The finale was weird and uncanny enough to inspire the entire audience to appreciation, and its sudden, tricky changes from pp. to ff., its wild explosions, its bass clarinet tones (reminiscent of Weber and Berlioz) and its sudden pull-up, were not only spicy, but suited Mr. Nikisch's vein entirely, and nothing in the concert was so well played. Mr. MacDowell is decidedly influenced by the French school of orchestration, which may account for the fact that Massenet eulogized his works enthusiastically to me two years ago, and his compositions played at the Paris exposition evoked the heartiest response. The audience at this concert displayed an enthusiasm beyond anything I have ever seen aroused by a native work, and it was delightful to feel that it was deserved, for Mr. MacDowell is at once the most genial and the most spontaneous of our American composers.

The applause would not be stayed, but it was so significantly intended for the composer, that Mr. Nikisch did not accept it as a tribute to the orchestral playing (generally excellent in this work) or to his own fiery reading, but bowed with a gesture that spoke volumes for his pantomimic powers, and intimated in dumb show that he did not know where the composer was hidden, but almost simultaneously with this, there appeared the handsome head in which the ghosts had originated, at the rail of the upper balcony, and Mr. Nikisch pointed out the star, high up in the firmament, all of which was charmingly informal, and only added to the good humor which prevailed after the composer had made the public's flesh creep with his eerie tone-picture.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

MUSIC.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The programme of the third Symphony concert was as follows:

Suite in A minor, op. 42..... Mac Dowell
(First time in Boston.)
Concerto for Violoncello in A minor..... Volkmann
Symphony No. 4, in E minor..... Brahms

Mr. MacDowell's Suite was played for the first time at the Worcester Festival Sept. 24, by an orchestra under the direction of Mr. Zerrahn. It then made a most pleasing impression upon musicians and laymen. Played last Saturday evening, it met with even a more flattering reception, and the long continued applause at the end of the work was not the mere formal and conventional expression of kindly feeling towards the composer who honors the town of his adoption; it was rather the open manifestation of delight at hearing a composition of such genuine beauty and skilful workmanship.

The composer has given fanciful names to the movements of his suite, as "In a Haunted Forest," "Summer Idyl," "The Shepherdess Song," and "Forest Spirits," but here he stops. He does not add to his music a printed programme as minute as an auctioneer's bill of sale. He suggests to the hearer a mood, and he allows the fancy of the hearer to roam at will. Even if he had not given his titles, if he had simply numbered the movements, the music would give just as much pleasure.

Here is an American composer, a young man, who is not an echo. He has a voice of his own. Although he has evidently studied all the means of expression, he conceals his studies in the apparent spontaneity and freedom of his art. His melodies are fresh; his harmonies are often exquisite, often striking; and his command of the resources of the orchestra is sure.

Indeed the instrumentation is thoroughly delightful throughout. This suite is as noticeable from what Mr. Mac Dowell reserves and omits as from the actual evidence submitted by him. When he gains an effect, he is content with it, and he dismisses it from his mind, instead of caressing it and introducing it on all occasions until the hearer is vexed and begins to question its value. He is also content with a simple statement, and he realizes the danger of over-elaboration. He is able to stand apart from his work and look at it, judge it, condemn, reject. There is here no trace of worship of a self-carved idol. His good sense saves him from youthful extravagance; he is sane even when he is bizarre. And, O rarest of musical virtues!—he knows when he has finished his speech.

The symphony was the fourth of Brahms. It would be idle to deny the solidity of the materials, the cunning of the workmanship, or the fine proportions. But the building is simply the work of the builder. No inspiration vivifies the mass.

It is the prevailing custom when a stranger enters the orchestra and takes a commanding position, to give him his opportunity for display. This custom is a pleasure to the audience, for the personality of the player wins more attention, even in symphony concerts, than the impersonality of the orchestra. It was Mr. Alwin Schroeder's turn, and his choice was the Volkmann 'cello concerto in A minor, an unfortunate choice. The composition is respectably dull and might be signed by any Professor Schultz or Mueller. It served, however, to show many of the excellent qualities that were recognized in Mr. Schroeder's playing at the late Kneisel concert. He is a careful and conscientious player; a thoughtful musician without virtuosic blood in his veins. The audience was pleased with his scholarly performance, and he was twice recalled.

The orchestra played the symphony with more vigor than discretion, and the suite was given with an appreciation of its many beauties. The wind instruments were not entirely satisfactory. Such eminent players as Mr. Mole and certain of his brethren have fallen into careless ways, and the horns have apparently lost their characteristic quality. Too often they sound like a new and attempted compromise between noisy members of the brass. It should be remembered that the horn is a "noble and melancholy instrument" and does not brook angry attacks upon it.

The programme of the concert of Saturday evening, Oct. 31, is as follows: Symphonic poem "Don Juan," Richard Strauss (first time in Boston); Rubinstein's Pianoforte Concerto in D minor; and Beethoven's "Pastorale" Symphony. Mr. Alfred Grunfeld will be the soloist.

PHILIP HALE.

MUSIC.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The programme of the third Symphony concert was as follows:

Suite in A minor, op. 42..... Mac Dowell
(First time in Boston.)
Concerto for Violoncello in A minor..... Volkmann
Symphony No. 4, in E minor..... Brahms

Mr. MacDowell's Suite was played for the first time at the Worcester Festival Sept. 24, by an orchestra under the direction of Mr. Zerrahn. It then made a most pleasing impression upon musicians and laymen. Played last Saturday evening, it met with even a more flattering reception, and the long continued applause at the end of the work was not the mere formal and conventional expression of kindly feeling towards the composer who honors the town of his adoption; it was rather the open manifestation of delight at hearing a composition of such genuine beauty and skilful workmanship.

The composer has given fanciful names to the movements of his suite, as "In a Haunted Forest," "Summer Idyl," "The Shepherdess Song," and "Forest Spirits," but here he stops. He does not add to his music a printed programme as minute as an auctioneer's bill of sale. He suggests to the hearer a mood, and he allows the fancy of the hearer to roam at will. Even if he had not given his titles, if he had simply numbered the movements, the music would give just as much pleasure.

Here is an American composer, a young man, who is not an echo. He has a voice of his own. Although he has evidently studied all the means of expression, he conceals his studies in the apparent spontaneity and freedom of his art. His melodies are fresh; his harmonies are often exquisite, often striking; and his command of the resources of the orchestra is sure.

Indeed the instrumentation is thoroughly delightful throughout. This suite is as noticeable from what Mr. Mac Dowell reserves and omits as from the actual evidence submitted by him. When he gains an effect, he is content with it, and he dismisses it from his mind, instead of caressing it and introducing it on all occasions until the hearer is vexed and begins to question its value. He is also content with a simple statement, and he realizes the danger of over-elaboration. He is able to stand apart from his work and look at it, judge it, condemn, reject. There is here no trace of worship of a self-carved idol. His good sense saves him from youthful extravagance; he is sane even when he is bizarre. And, O rarest of musical virtues!—he knows when he has finished his speech.

The symphony was the fourth of Brahms. It would be idle to deny the solidity of the materials, the cunning of the workmanship, or the fine proportions. But the building is simply the work of the builder. No inspiration vivifies the mass.

It is the prevailing custom when a stranger enters the orchestra and takes a commanding position, to give him his opportunity for display. This custom is a pleasure to the audience, for the personality of the player wins more attention, even in symphony concerts, than the impersonality of the orchestra. It was Mr. Alwin Schroeder's turn, and his choice was the Volkmann 'cello concerto in A minor, an unfortunate choice. The composition is respectably dull and might be signed by any Professor Schultz or Mueller. It served, however, to show many of the excellent qualities that were recognized in Mr. Schroeder's playing at the late Kneisel concert. He is a careful and conscientious player; a thoughtful musician without virtuosic blood in his veins. The audience was pleased with his scholarly performance, and he was twice recalled.

The orchestra played the symphony with more vigor than discretion, and the suite was given with an appreciation of its many beauties. The wind instruments were not entirely satisfactory. Such eminent players as Mr. Mole and certain of his brethren have fallen into careless ways, and the horns have apparently lost their characteristic quality. Too often they sound like a new and attempted compromise between noisy members of the brass. It should be remembered that the horn is a "noble and melancholy instrument" and does not brook angry attacks upon it.

The programme of the concert of Saturday evening, Oct. 31, is as follows: Symphonic poem "Don Juan," Richard Strauss (first time in Boston); Rubinstein's Pianoforte Concerto in D minor; and Beethoven's "Pastorale" Symphony. Mr. Alfred Grunfeld will be the soloist.

PHILIP HALE.

MUSICAL.

The Symphony Concert.

Last night's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra opened with Mr. E. A. Macdowell's Suite for Orchestra in A-minor, op. 42; a work delightful throughout in the refined grace of its themes, and the delicacy, and the beauty of its tone color. If the suite have a fault, it is on the side of the brevity of its movements, which are dealt with so concisely that their subjects are scarcely set forth before the end comes—a surprise and disappointment. What there is, however, is very dainty and full of charm. The musicianship of the composer is manifested with unmistakable clearness, not only in the easy flow of his harmonies and their treatment, but in the richness and brilliancy of his instrumentation, which is masterly alike in its discretion and in the thorough knowledge it shows of the resources of the modern orchestra. The work was wholly gratifying in the hearing, was listened to with great interest, and at its close, met with hearty applause that was equally appreciative and deserved, and that was prolonged until the composer modestly bowed his acknowledgments from the upper balcony. It was carefully and sympathetically played, though the wind instruments were not beyond reproach in respect to intonation. The soloist was Mr. Alwin Schroeder, who played Volkmann's concerto, in A-minor, op. 33, for violoncello. It had been heard here before, and it did not improve on a second hearing. It is somewhat tedious and uninteresting and is much in the Kapellmeister vein. Mr. Schroeder is unquestionably an artist of excellent skill and taste. His tone is not large, but it is round and pure; his technique is able and ample. He was at his best, however, in his cantabile playing, which is delightfully broad, refined and artistic. He made a very favorable impression, was vigorously applauded and twice recalled. The concert ended with Brahms's libored and on the whole, noisy fourth symphony, and of which the third and last movements are the most interesting. We were less impressed by it on a second hearing than we were when it was given before at these concerts. It was spiritedly but somewhat coarsely and monoto-nously played, and apparently gave much pleasure to half the audience, while it unmistakably bored the other half. The programme for the next concert is: Symphonic poem, "Don Juan," Richard Strauss (first time); Concerto for piano, D minor, Rubinstein; and Symphony No. 6 (Pastorale), Beethoven. The soloist is to be Mr. Alfred Grunfield.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.—The third Symphony concert was chiefly remarkable for the performance of Mr. E. A. MacDowell's orchestral suite in A minor. It was played last week for the first time in Boston, and its very first performance was at the Worcester (Mass.) Festival, September 24, by an orchestra under the direction of Mr. Carl Zerrahn. When Mr. MacDowell's symphonic poem "Lancelot and Elaine" was played here nearly two years ago, it seemed like a succession of rapidly dissolving views and the moods of the person gazing changed rapidly with the views till fatigue drove out pleasure. Not that it was not an imaginative, poetical work, which showed the sensitiveness of the composer; but it was intentionally and in the full meaning of the words "program music."

And now Mr. MacDowell comes before the public with his suite, but he is content to let the music suggest to the hearer or remind him, according to the individuality of the hearer. To be sure he calls his movements, "In a Haunted Forest," "Summer Idyl," "The Shepherdess Song" and "Forest Spirits." He does not, however, tell his ghosts by name, or identify trees or give the geological formation of the rocks or the direction of the wind. The hearer can dream as he pleases. There are people who do not enjoy music unless they fancy it is imitative. There are people—and estimable people—who do not enjoy a tune per se, and only tolerate its presence because it may be so used in thematic development that they have great difficulty in detecting it. But Mr. MacDowell in this work did not deliberately appeal to hunters after the mimetic or the seekers after intellectuality in music. He has written musical poetry, pleasing in thought, and most charmingly sung. First of all it was orchestrally thought out; it was not originally and laboriously built with the help of the piano forte and then scored experimentally for this or that combination of instruments. His harmonies presented themselves in variegated orchestral dress; his effects were suggested by a cunning knowledge of the capabilities and limitations of each instrument. The instrumentation throughout is that of a master, and not the perfunctory task of a scholar. How delightful for instance is the use of the flutes, and the cold tones of the bassoons. How skilfully are the different choirs contrasted, how well nourished are the inner parts. This suite is free from artificial morbidity, from straining after effect, from self-consciousness. Self restraint is seen in the wildest passages, and the fantasy leaps from a healthy brain. Taught in foreign schools, Mr. MacDowell has chosen the best characteristics of the French and German; but he is not a mere gatherer of samples, a collector of mosaics. His is a genuine poetic spirit, finely trained and happy in expression. The audience was quick to recognize the beauties of the work. Applause was most hearty, and it continued until Mr. MacDowell twice bowed his acknowledgments from the upper gallery.

Mr. Alvin Schroeder made his first appearance in Boston as a solo-player, and he chose the concerto for 'cello in A minor by Volkmann, a very tedious composition. He is not a virtuoso in the common acceptance of the word, but he is a musician of refined taste who plays his instrument carefully. His phrasing was excellent throughout, and his proper place is in the orchestra or quartet. He was loudly applauded. The symphony was the fourth of Brahms. It was read theatrically by the director and played roughly by the orchestra. PHILIP HALE.

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The third concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, brought the following programme:

MacDowell: Suite in A minor, op. 42:

1. In a Haunted Forest.
2. Summer Idyl.
3. The Shepherdess's Song.
4. Forest Spirits.

Volkmann: Violoncello concerto in A minor, op. 33.

Brahms: Symphony No. 4, in E minor, op. 98.

Mr. Alvin Schroeder was the 'cellist.

Mr. MacDowell's new suite seems, at least as far as one can judge from a single hearing, the most important orchestral work he has yet brought out. Artistic importance is not to be measured either by the square or linear yard, neither does it, in music, always depend directly upon the magnitude or dignity of the musical form employed. This suite of Mr. MacDowell's acquires especial importance in our eyes from the fact that in it the composer follows what is evidently the natural, instinctive bent of his talent more unreservedly than heretofore, and also walks in his chosen domain of the poetic and the imaginative with far firmer step. One may differ with him diametrically in artistic point of view, one may even find faults enough in this his latest work; but one must none the less recognize with hardly diminished pleasure the conspicuous power he exhibits of doing what he tries to do.

Take, to begin with, the way he handles the orchestra; it is really masterly, and, little as one would expect anything like originality in a field that has been so well explored as this of orchestration has of late years, one finds no little originality in Mr. MacDowell's scoring, and originality of a very delightful sort, at that. His treatment of the orchestra seems, in general, to be a further and more modern development of Raff's—in a pupil of Raff's this might almost go without saying—but one finds in it also pretty plain signs of contemporary French influence. Still, in his study of German and French models, Mr. MacDowell has shown the fine artistic instinct to appropriate to himself only what is best in either school; he has fallen into the mere routine mannerisms of neither. His scoring is free from that rather monotonous richness and volume of tone which is to be deplored in writers like Goldmark and Dvorák; it has the French variety, the French piquancy and aroma. Yet his German training has saved him from falling in with the orchestral vulgarity of many contemporary French composers, whose fortissimo passages for full orchestra too often amount to little else than brass-band writing, with strings and reeds ripieni. One also sees the good results of his being brought up in a genuinely symphonic school, in the way he has of treating the orchestra almost continually in a polyphonic style, and in not lapsing every now and then into that "song-without-words" vein, that quasi-operatic melody with accompaniment, which has, from the beginning, been the bane of the French orchestral school. Of course his freedom from this last fault has to do, in great measure, with his style of writing in general, and does not reside in his orchestration alone. Still, his orchestration has something to do with it, for his scoring has the greatest virtue that scoring, as such, can possibly have—greater than sensuous beauty and richness of tone, greater than power or delicacy, greater even than clearness—the virtue which we find conspicuous in the scoring of all the great classic masters, in the somewhat clumsy orchestral writing of Schumann as in the ideally expert orchestration of Mozart or Mendelssohn: a certain fine unity of conception which leads the composer to treat all the various instruments of the orchestra as component members of one and the same body, valuable only in so far as each one of them acts in proper cooperation with the others. Mr. MacDowell has really achieved this feat of so combining the component elements of his orchestra into one organic whole that, no matter what temporary prominence he may give to this or that instrument, or group of instruments, it has the effect of a particular quality of tone rising, for the moment, to the surface of the orchestra, but not that very different effect of a particular instrument, or group of instruments, severing the bond of federation between itself and the others, and playing an actual solo. No matter what variety of tone-color he may produce, no matter how sharp the contrast between different groups of instruments may be in their successive entries, there is something in his scoring that makes for unity of impression, and binds the successive phrases together as with a band of steel.

Masterly orchestration is, however, by no means the only merit to be described in this suite. Quite apart from orchestral coloring, there is a rare unity of artistic motive apparent in each one of the four movements. To be sure, this motive seems throughout, even in the "Summer Idyl" and the "Shepherdess's Song," more of an imaginative and picturesque than of an intrinsically musical nature. Subsequent hearings of the suite may very possibly serve to reverse our opinion; but for the present we cannot see that Mr. MacDowell had any other object in view than to embody and illustrate in tones the ideas suggested by the titles of his four movements in what most vividly suggestive and picturesque way he could. What of essentially musical form and development these movements may possess seemed to us on Saturday evening so slight and evanescent that we found it next to impossible to recognize it at all; not that we deny the existence of essentially musical construction in these movements, but that we have not as yet been able to discover it. Until we do, we must, with all our admiration for Mr. MacDowell's cleverness and ability, view his work with a certain coldness, for it makes no appeal to our musical sympathy. Merely picturesque and imaginative writing cannot in the end but seem trivial and not worth doing; especially when it calls into play such vast orchestral resources as are employed in this suite. One would fain have this wealth of orchestral means reserved, and kept sacred for tasks of higher dignity and deeper import than mere nously played, and apparently gave much pleasure to half the audience, while it unmistakably bored the other half. The programme for the next concert is: Symphonic poem, "Don Juan," Richard Strauss (first time); Concerto for piano, D minor, Rubinstein; and Symphony No. 6 (Pastorale), Beethoven. The soloist is to be Mr. Alfred Grunfeld.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.—The third Symphony concert was chiefly remarkable for the performance of Mr. E. A. MacDowell's orchestral suite in A minor. It was played last week for the first time in Boston, and its very first performance was at the Worcester (Mass.) Festival, September 24, by an orchestra under the direction of Mr. Carl Zerrahn. When Mr. MacDowell's symphonic poem "Lancelot and Elaine" was played here nearly two years ago, it seemed like a succession of rapidly dissolving views and the moods of the person gazing changed rapidly with the views till fatigue drove out pleasure. Not that it was not an imaginative, poetical work, which showed the sensitiveness of the composer; but it was intentionally and in the full meaning of the words "program music."

And now Mr. MacDowell comes before the public with his suite, but he is content to let the music suggest to the hearer or remind him, according to the individuality of the hearer. To be sure he calls his movements, "In a Haunted Forest," "Summer Idyl," "The Shepherdess Song" and "Forest Spirits." He does not, however, tell his ghosts by name, or identify trees or give the geological formation of the rocks or the direction of the wind. The hearer can dream as he pleases. There are people who do not enjoy music unless they fancy it is imitative. There are people—and estimable people—who do not enjoy a tune per se, and only tolerate its presence because it may be so used in thematic development that they have great difficulty in detecting it. But Mr. MacDowell in this work did not deliberately appeal to hunters after the mimetic or the seekers after intellectuality in music. He has written musical poetry, pleasing in thought, and most charmingly sung. First of all it was orchestrally thought out; it was not originally and laboriously built with the help of the piano forte and then scored experimentally for this or that combination of instruments. His harmonies presented themselves in variegated orchestral dress; his effects were suggested by a cunning knowledge of the capabilities and limitations of each instrument. The instrumentation throughout is that of a master, and not the perfunctory task of a scholar. How delightful for instance is the use of the flutes, and the cold tones of the bassoons. How skilfully are the different choirs contrasted, how well nourished are the inner parts. This suite is free from artificial morbidity, from straining after effect, from self-consciousness. Self restraint is seen in the wildest passages, and the fantasy leaps from a healthy brain. Taught in foreign schools, Mr. MacDowell has chosen the best characteristics of the French and German; but he is not a mere gatherer of samples, a collector of mosaics. His is a genuine poetic spirit, finely trained and happy in expression. The audience was quick to recognize the beauties of the work. Applause was most hearty, and it continued until Mr. MacDowell twice bowed his acknowledgments from the upper gallery.

Mr. Alvin Schroeder made his first appearance in Boston as a solo-player, and he chose the concerto for 'cello in A minor by Volkmann, a very tedious composition. He is not a virtuoso in the common acceptance of the word, but he is a musician of refined taste who plays his instrument carefully. His phrasing was excellent throughout, and his proper place is in the orchestra or quartet. He was loudly applauded.

The symphony was the fourth of Brahms. It was read theatrically by the director and played roughly by the orchestra. PHILIP HALE.

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The third concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, brought the following programme:

MacDowell: Suite in A minor, op. 42:

1. In a Haunted Forest.
2. Summer Idyl.
3. The Shepherdess's Song.
4. Forest Spirits.

Volkmann: Violoncello concerto in A minor, op. 33.
Brahms: Symphony No. 4, in E minor, op. 98.

Mr. Alvin Schroeder was the 'cellist.

Mr. MacDowell's new suite seems, at least as far as one can judge from a single hearing, the most important orchestral work he has yet brought out. Artistic importance is not to be measured either by the square or linear yard, neither does it, in music, always depend directly upon the magnitude or dignity of the musical form employed. This suite of Mr. MacDowell's acquires especial importance in our eyes from the fact that in it the composer follows what is evidently the natural, instinctive bent of his talent more unreservedly than heretofore, and also walks in his chosen domain of the poetic and the imaginative with far firmer step. One may differ with him diametrically in artistic point of view, one may even find faults enough in this his latest work; but one must none the less recognize with hardly diminished pleasure the conspicuous power he exhibits of doing what he tries to do.

Take, to begin with, the way he handles the orchestra; it is really masterly, and, little as one would expect anything like originality in a field that has been so well explored as this of orchestration has of late years, one finds no little originality in Mr. MacDowell's scoring, and originality of a very delightful sort, at that. His treatment of the orchestra seems, in general, to be a further and more modern development of Raff's—in a pupil of Raff's this might almost go without saying—but one finds in it also pretty plain signs of contemporary French influence. Still, in his study of German and French models, Mr. MacDowell has shown the fine artistic instinct to appropriate to himself only what is best in either school; he has fallen into the mere routine mannerisms of neither. His scoring is free from that rather monotonous richness and volume of tone which is to be deplored in writers like Goldmark and Dvorák; it has the French variety, the French piquancy and aroma. Yet his German training has saved him from falling in with the orchestral vulgarity of many contemporary French composers, whose fortissimo passages for full orchestra too often amount to little else than brass-band writing, with strings and reeds ripianti. One also sees the good results of his being brought up in a genuinely symphonic school, in the way he has of treating the orchestra almost continually in a polyphonic style, and in not lapsing every now and then into that "song-without-words" vein, that quasi-operatic melody with accompaniment, which has, from the beginning, been the bane of the French orchestral school. Of course his freedom from this last fault has to do, in great measure, with his style of writing in general, and does not reside in his orchestration alone. Still, his orchestration has something to do with it, for his scoring has the greatest virtue that scoring, as such, can possibly have—greater than sensuous beauty and richness of tone, greater than power or delicacy, greater even than clearness—the virtue which we find conspicuous in the scoring of all the great classic masters, in the somewhat clumsy orchestral writing of Schumann as in the ideally expert orchestration of Mozart or Mendelssohn: a certain fine unity of conception which leads the composer to treat all the various instruments of the orchestra as component members of one and the same body, valuable only in so far as each one of them acts in proper co-operation with the others. Mr. MacDowell has really achieved this feat of so combining the component elements of his orchestra into one organic whole that, no matter what temporary prominence he may give to this or that instrument, or group of instruments, it has the effect of a particular quality of tone rising, for the moment, to the surface of the orchestra, but not that very different effect of a particular instrument, or group of instruments, severing the bond of federation between itself and the others, and playing an actual solo. No matter what variety of tone-color he may produce, no matter how sharp the contrast between different groups of instruments may be in their successive entries, there is something in his scoring that makes for unity of impression, and binds the successive phrases together as with a band of steel.

Masterly orchestration is, however, by no means the only merit to be described in this suite. Quite apart from orchestral coloring, there is a rare unity of artistic motive apparent in each one of the four movements. To be sure, this motive seems throughout, even in the "Summer Idyl" and the "Shepherdess's Song," more of an imaginative and picturesque than of an intrinsically musical nature. Subsequent hearings of the suite may very possibly serve to reverse our opinion; but for the present we cannot see that Mr. MacDowell had any other object in view than to embody and illustrate in tones the ideas suggested by the titles of his four movements in what most vividly suggestive and picturesque way he could. What of essentially musical form and development these movements may possess seemed to us on Saturday evening so slight and evanescent that we found it next to impossible to recognize it at all; not that we deny the existence of essentially musical construction in these movements, but that we have not as yet been able to discover it. Until we do, we must, with all our admiration for Mr. MacDowell's cleverness and ability, view his work with a certain coldness, for it makes no appeal to our musical sympathy. Merely picturesque and imaginative writing cannot in the end but seem trivial and not worth doing; especially when it calls into play such vast orchestral resources as are employed in this suite. One would fain have this wealth of orchestral means reserved, and kept sacred for tasks of higher dignity and deeper import than mere fantastic jeu d'esprit: people do not write vers de société in blank verse or Alexandrines—the disproportion between the matter and the vehicle is too great. And we cannot call purely instrumental music in which picturesque and suggestive items occupy the whole ground, or else preponderate largely over the element of organic musical construction, much more than a jeu d'esprit. It has to do only with the outside and surface of things. A truly profound emotion seeks another and more intrinsic sort of musical expression. The suite was admirably played, and most enthusiastically received, the applause at the close being hearty and prolonged. It only ceased when it had become evident that Mr. MacDowell could not be prevailed upon to respond from his seat in the upper gallery.

Mr. Schroeder, the new 'cellist, made a distinctly fine impression in the Volkmann concerto. His tone is rich, warm and pure, his technique brilliant; finest of all is the artistic, natural quality of his phrasing. He is one of the too few 'cellists we have heard with whom the rhythmical accent seems to result solely from a musical conception of the phrase, and does not depend upon a more or less involuntary, automatic movement of the arm and wrist. In a word, he phrases as a good singer sings, and not merely according to the sweet will of his bow. If any playing could reconcile one to the tedium of hearing Volkmann's concerto, his could.

The Brahms symphony was strongly played, and made the profoundest impression. Ah, that was music!

The next programme is: Richard Strauss, symphonic poem, "Don Juan;" Rubinstein, pianoforte concerto in D minor; Beethoven, symphony No. 6, in F major ("pastorale"). Mr. Alfred Grünfeld will be the pianist.

THE SYMPHONIES.

THIRD CONCERT.

The audience was tardy in coming in at the third concert, Saturday evening, Oct. 24; and when Conductor Nikisch gave the signal for the orchestra to begin Macdowell's Suite in A, the hall was not more than two thirds full. At the end of the first movement opportunity was given the late comers to get to their seats, when the music was resumed. We saw nothing to remind us of Ghosts in the Forest, though some of the music is quite pretty, if not mysterious and deep. Good music can be just as effective and pretty without great mystery as when shrouded in it; in fact, the less the mystery the better the music is apt to be. "Summer Idyl" might just as well have been called Fall or Winter so far as suggestiveness to any season is concerned. No exception is taken to the music, for it proved pleasantly attractive. "The Shepherdess Song" proved quite like what its name implies, attracting attention, interest and applause. The last movement, "Forest Spirits," is really an effective piece of writing, showing Mr. Macdowell to be well versed in the resources of orchestration. The author escaped being ovated by remaining in some hidden location, while the audience continued to applaud till Mr. Nikisch shrugged his shoulders in characteristic German style, as much as to say, "I don't know where he is!" Then the applause ceased. It may be remarked that Mr. Macdowell bore his honors with rare modesty.

Much interest centred in the first appearance of Mr. Alvin Schroeder, the first 'cello player. Mr. Schroeder was evidently very nervous when he commenced his Concerto, for he scratched a little; later on, however, he evinced more command over himself. His technique is considerable, but with this one hearing we are not quite prepared to stamp him as the equal of either of his predecessors. Perhaps if he had played a more musical composition than the Volkmann Concerto proved, our impressions would be more favorably inclined. The Concerto is a dry composition at most, barring its orchestration, which is the most interesting part of it.

Brahms's Fourth Symphony, E minor, is undoubtedly a great work. It has been played here before, but many confess inability to understand or appreciate it, so far. Like everything else, full of science and learning, a vast amount of study and special preparation is required to analyze their beauties to clear, appreciative understanding. Brahms, like Beethoven, composed music for the future, but it will be considerably in the future before Brahms becomes as popular as Beethoven. In the main, the orchestra did their work as well, as could be expected, considering the difficulties with which the Symphony abounds.

Many people left the hall between the different movements of the Symphony, so when the last one was concluded, only about half the audience were left. Don't this show that the people have not quite learned to love Brahms yet? A few do; some profess to, but can't give a reason for so doing, while a large majority do not, and are not afraid to say so. What a contrast there is between Haydn's, Mozart's, Beethoven's and Brahms's symphonies! But it is not a difficult matter to tell which of these masters comes nearest the human heart.

JAMES M. TRACY.

THE SYMPHONY.

The programme of the third Symphony rehearsal and concert, like that of the preceding one, had a suite for its opening number, E. A. MacDowell's opus 42, in A minor, which was performed for the first time in public at the Worcester Festival in September. This highly gifted young musician, who was the intimate friend of Raff, and of Heymann, the marvelous German pianist, and who was favored as few were by Liszt, has in all his published works shown himself a devoted adherent of that form of composition called programme music. Nearly all of his large number of pianoforte pieces are headed with mottoes or expressive titles suggesting the thoughts that inspired their writing. These pieces, as well as his orchestral works, the symphonic poems, "Lancelot and Elaine," "Hamlet," and "Ophelia," the concertos, and the suite just performed, clearly indicate this decided trend of his nature. In his earliest pieces may be discerned the love of romance, the vivid imagination, the refined poetical taste with which his latest works are instinct; while strong indications of his now well developed constructive and contrapuntal skill, his artistic independence of conventional forms, and his remarkable talent for tone-painting are by no means lacking. Although his music shows no dearth of original melody pure and simple, its strength lies more in its novel and expressive harmonies, and its picturesque orchestration; which is true also of most of the music of contemporary composers.

The suite has five movements, the first bearing the title, "In a haunted forest." The first notes of the slow and short introduction come from the horns, which, with a pianissimo roll on the tympani and a still softer tap at intervals on the great drum, form a long-sustained accompaniment to a short theme given out by the fagotti, 'celli and double basses in unison. Brief development of this theme leads to a fortissimo climax, which, quickly falling off again to pianissimo, leads to an allegro furioso. The treatment of this movement, built upon several short figures, is largely chromatic in its nature, and contains many picturesque orchestral effects. Its climax is reached when the theme of the introduction reappears maestoso, scored for the full strength of the orchestra; after which the movement ends as quietly as it began. The second movement, "A Summer Idyl," in F sharp minor, is a short, dainty bit of writing. The orchestration of its extended melody is mostly confined to the strings and woodwind, with which the horns are occasionally combined, and is charmingly descriptive of its subject. "The Shepherdess Song" (the third movement) is also short, and has two quaint, characteristic themes, the first lying principally with the clarinet and oboe, the second with the horns. The principal figures of both are prettily alternated, and there is much graceful modulation and delicate instrumental treatment. The finale, "Forest Spirits," has two well-defined themes, and is molto allegro, presto, and prestissimo in tempo. Near its close, the theme of the introduction is effectively brought in pianissimo, in the original tempo, with woodwind and muted strings, only for a few measures, however. The presto quickly returns, and with a whirling, tarantella-like figure the movement ends brilliantly.

The work is an excellent example of what may be done with the modern orchestra without recourse to the straining for effect that is apt to prevail in many orchestral compositions of today. Although the scoring of the extreme movements includes trombones, tuba, great drum and cymbals, these instruments are discreetly used, leaving no trace of coarseness or cheapness. It is, in a word, programme music of a delightful kind; of a kind that stands securely on its own feet, without requiring any catalogue of the emotions or scenes it is intended to express or picture. It has moreover, the merit of not being unduly long, the performance lasting less than half an hour. It was in the main, excellently read and played. There was a tendency to too rapid tempi throughout, except at the close of the last movement, which seemed slow. The second was played decidedly too fast, its sentiment and the delicacy of its technical treatment being materially changed in consequence. It was heartily received, and long continued applause followed its close.

The new violoncellist, Mr. Alvin Schroeder was next heard, for the first time as a soloist in Boston, in Volkmann's concerto in A minor, opus 33. With his artistic playing at the Kneisel Quartet concert of Monday evening in mind, that at this concert was disappointing. His middle and lower tones were warm and full, but those in the upper register were somewhat thin in quality. His slow, sustained playing was more satisfying than was his execution of the bravura passages, his technical work in this respect being hardly in the style of a virtuoso. It is possible, however, that Mr. Schroeder was not wholly at his ease; and it would not be at all surprising if the uninteresting concerto acted as an effectual damper on his spirits. But the symphony audiences are proverbially courteous to soloists, and he was warmly applauded and recalled.

The concert closed with an uneven performance of Brahms's marvelous fourth symphony—marvelous in its abstruseness and ugliness. It may be that this composer's blind adherents find comfort and inspiration even from this opus 98. But even its analyst in the programme book confesses that the first movement is a "hard nut to crack," although he thinks that "the listener who has thoroughly digested what has gone before will have little difficulty in following it to the end." Just what he means by this last expression of forced hopefulness is hard to make out. But one thing is certain; the blind adherents just mentioned, after having struggled heroically to digest this and a few other dishes of a granite-like nature that their master has at times past set before them, must experience involuntary feelings of disgust at discovering through the comparatively enchanting string quintet, opus 111, that he to all appearances likes his cakes and wine as well as most people do. It is safe to say that the symphony contains little that appeals to the sympathies of even the cultivated listener, if the last part of the andante and certain effects in the third movement be excepted. T. P. CURRIER.

Mr. Nikisch received on Saturday by cable the news of the death of his mother. A sincere sympathy will be felt by a numerous host of friends of the accomplished musician in his great affliction.

fantastic jeux d'esprit; people do not write vers de société in blank verse or Alexandrines—the disproportion between the matter and the vehicle is too great. And we cannot call purely instrumental music in which picturesque and suggestive items occupy the whole ground, or else preponderate largely over the element of organic musical construction, much more than a jeu d'esprit. It has to do only with the outside and surface of things. A truly profound emotion seeks another and more intrinsic sort of musical expression. The suite was admirably played, and most enthusiastically received, the applause at the close being hearty and prolonged. It only ceased when it had become evident that Mr. MacDowell could not be prevailed upon to respond from his seat in the upper gallery.

Mr. Schroeder, the new 'cellist, made a distinctly fine impression in the Volkmann concerto. His tone is rich, warm and pure, his technique brilliant; finest of all is the artistic, natural quality of his phrasing. He is one of the too few 'cellists we have heard with whom the rhythmical accent seems to result solely from a musical conception of the phrase, and does not depend upon a more or less involuntary, automatic movement of the arm and wrist. In a word, he phrases as a good singer sings, and not merely according to the sweet will of his bow. If any playing could reconcile one to the tedium of hearing Volkmann's concerto, his could.

The Brahms symphony was strongly played, and made the profoundest impression. Ah, that was music!

The next programme is: Richard Strauss, symphonic poem, "Don Juan;" Rubinstein, pianoforte concerto in D minor; Beethoven, symphony No. 6, in F major ("pastorale"). Mr. Alfred Grünfeld will be the pianist.

THE SYMPHONIES.

THIRD CONCERT.

The audience was tardy in coming in at the third concert, Saturday evening, Oct. 24; and when Conductor Nikisch gave the signal for the orchestra to begin Macdowell's Suite in A, the hall was not more than two thirds full. At the end of the first movement opportunity was given the late comers to get to their seats, when the music was resumed. We saw nothing to remind us of Ghosts in the Forest, though some of the music is quite pretty, if not mysterious and deep. Good music can be just as effective and pretty without great mystery as when shrouded in it; in fact, the less the mystery the better the music is apt to be. "Summer Idyl" might just as well have been called Fall or Winter so far as suggestiveness to any season is concerned. No exception is taken to the music, for it proved pleasantly attractive. "The Shepherdess Song" proved quite like what its name implies, attracting attention, interest and applause. The last movement, "Forest Spirits," is really an effective piece of writing, showing Mr. Macdowell to be well versed in the resources of orchestration. The author escaped being ovated by remaining in some hidden location, while the audience continued to applaud till Mr. Nikisch shrugged his shoulders in characteristic German style, as much as to say, "I don't know where he is!" Then the applause ceased. It may be remarked that Mr. Macdowell bore his honors with rare modesty.

Much interest centred in the first appearance of Mr. Alvin Schroeder, the first 'cello player. Mr. Schroeder was evidently very nervous when he commenced his Concerto, for he scratched a little; later on, however, he evinced more command over himself. His technique is considerable, but with this one hearing we are not quite prepared to stamp him as the equal of either of his predecessors. Perhaps if he had played a more musical composition than the Volkmann Concerto proved, our impressions would be more favorably inclined. The Concerto is a dry composition at most, barring its orchestration, which is the most interesting part of it.

Brahms's Fourth Symphony, E minor, is undoubtedly a great work. It has been played here before, but many confess inability to understand or appreciate it, so far. Like everything else, full of science and learning, a vast amount of study and special preparation is required to analyze their beauties to clear, appreciative understanding. Brahms, like Beethoven, composed music for the future, but it will be considerably in the future before Brahms becomes as popular as Beethoven. In the main, the orchestra did their work as well as could be expected, considering the difficulties with which the Symphony abounds.

Many people left the hall between the different movements of the Symphony, so when the last one was concluded, only about half the audience were left. Don't this show that the people have not quite learned to love Brahms yet? A few do; some profess to, but can't give a reason for so doing, while a large majority do not, and are not afraid to say so. What a contrast there is between Haydn's, Mozart's, Beethoven's and Brahms's symphonies! But it is not a difficult matter to tell which of these masters comes nearest the human heart.

JAMES M. TRACY.

THE SYMPHONY.

The programme of the third Symphony rehearsal and concert, like that of the preceding one, had a suite for its opening number, E. A. MacDowell's opus 42, in A minor, which was performed for the first time in public at the Worcester festival in September. This highly gifted young musician, who was the intimate friend of Raff, and of Heymann, the marvelous German pianist, and who was favored as few were by Liszt, has in all his published works shown himself a devoted adherent of that form of composition called programme music. Nearly all of his large number of pianoforte pieces are headed with mottoes or expressive titles suggesting the thoughts that inspired their writing. These pieces, as well as his orchestral works, the symphonic poems, "Lancelot and Elaine," "Hamlet," and "Ophelia," the concertos, and the suite just performed, clearly indicate this decided trend of his nature. In his earliest pieces may be discerned the love of romance, the vivid imagination, the refined poetical taste with which his latest works are instinct; while strong indications of his now well developed constructive and contrapuntal skill, his artistic independence of conventional forms, and his remarkable talent for tone-painting are by no means lacking. Although his music shows no dearth of original melody pure and simple, its strength lies more in its novel and expressive harmonies, and its picturesque orchestration; which is true also of most of the music of contemporary composers.

The suite has five movements, the first bearing the title, "In a haunted forest." The first notes of the slow and short introduction come from the horns, which, with a pianissimo roll on the tympani and a still softer tap at intervals on the great drum, form a long-sustained accompaniment to a short theme given out by the fagotti, 'celli and double basses in unison. Brief development of this theme leads to a fortissimo climax, which, quickly falling off again to pianissimo, leads to an allegro furioso. The treatment of this movement, built upon several short figures, is largely chromatic in its nature, and contains many picturesque orchestral effects. Its climax is reached when the theme of the introduction reappears maestoso, scored for the full strength of the orchestra; after which the movement ends as quietly as it began. The second movement, "A Summer Idyl," in F sharp minor, is a short, dainty bit of writing. The orchestration of its extended melody is mostly confined to the strings and woodwind, with which the horns are occasionally combined, and is charmingly descriptive of its subject. "The Shepherdess Song" (the third movement) is also short, and has two quaint, characteristic themes, the first lying principally with the clarinet and oboe, the second with the horns. The principal figures of both are prettily alternated, and there is much graceful modulation and delicate instrumental treatment. The finale, "Forest Spirits," has two well-defined themes, and is molto allegro, presto, and prestissimo in tempo. Near its close, the theme of the introduction is effectively brought in pianissimo, in the original tempo, with woodwind and muted strings, only for a few measures, however. The presto quickly returns, and with a whirling, tarantella-like figure the movement ends brilliantly.

The work is an excellent example of what may be done with the modern orchestra without recourse to the straining for effect that is apt to prevail in many orchestral compositions of today. Although the scoring of the extreme movements includes trombones, tuba, great drum and cymbals, these instruments are discreetly used, leaving no trace of coarseness or cheapness. It is, in a word, programme music of a delightful kind; of a kind that stands securely on its own feet, without requiring any catalogue of the emotions or scenes it is intended to express or picture. It has moreover, the merit of not being unduly long, the performance lasting less than half an hour. It was in the main, excellently read and played. There was a tendency to too rapid tempi throughout, except at the close of the last movement, which seemed slow. The second was played decidedly too fast, its sentiment and the delicacy of its technical treatment being materially changed in consequence. It was heartily received, and long continued applause followed its close.

The new violoncellist, Mr. Alvin Schroeder was next heard, for the first time as a soloist in Boston, in Volkmann's concerto in A minor, opus 33. With his artistic playing at the Kneisel Quartet concert of Monday evening in mind, that at this concert was disappointing. His middle and lower tones were warm and full, but those in the upper register were somewhat thin in quality. His slow, sustained playing was more satisfying than was his execution of the bravura passages, his technical work in this respect being hardly in the style of a virtuoso. It is possible, however, that Mr. Schroeder was not wholly at his ease; and it would not be at all surprising if the uninteresting concerto acted as an effectual damper on his spirits. But the symphony audiences are proverbially courteous to soloists, and he was warmly applauded and recalled.

The concert closed with an uneven performance of Brahms's marvelous fourth symphony—marvelous in its abstruseness and ugliness. It may be that this composer's blind adherents find comfort and inspiration even from this opus 98. But even its analyst in the programme book confesses that the first movement is a "hard nut to crack," although he thinks that "the listener who has thoroughly digested what has gone before will have little difficulty in following it to the end." Just what he means by this last expression of forced hopefulness is hard to make out. But one thing is certain; the blind adherents just mentioned, after having struggled heroically to digest this and a few other dishes of a granite-like nature that their master has at times past set before them, must experience involuntary feelings of disgust at discovering through the comparatively enchanting string quintet, opus 111, that he to all appearances likes his cakes and wine as well as most people do. It is safe to say that the symphony contains little that appeals to the sympathies of even the cultivated listener, if the last part of the andante and certain effects in the third movement be excepted. T. P. CURRIER.

Mr. Nikisch received on Saturday by cable the news of the death of his mother. A sincere sympathy will be felt by a numerous host of friends of the accomplished musician in his great affliction.

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1891-92.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

IV. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 31, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

RICHARD STRAUSS. SYMPHONIC POEM. "Don Juan."
(First time in Boston.)

RUBINSTEIN. CONCERTO FOR PIANOFORTE in D minor, No. 4,
op. 70.
Moderato,—Moderato assai.—Allegro assai.

BEETHOVEN. SYMPHONY No. 6. "Pastoral."
Allegro ma non troppo,—Andante molto moto.—
Allegro; Allegro; Allegretto.

SOLOIST:

MR. ALFRED GRUENFELD.

The Piano used is a Knabe.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

ADV.

The Symphony Concert.

It was an interesting programme, although it swept from bombast to simplicity, from musical pepper to musical peasantry. The atmosphere seemed clearest when Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony was reached, although this is by no means the greatest of the nine symphonies of the master. The concert of Saturday began with "Don Juan," a symphonic poem, by that young musical radical, Richard Strauss. It is an easy matter to attack a work of this kind, for it is overswollen and full of roarings, whether of ecstasy or pain it would be hard to determine. It is in "King Cambyse's vein" from the very start, for the composer plunges in, with all possible brasses, as much kettledrum as the muscularity of the percussive artist can furnish, an active triangle, piccolo, glockenspiel and cymbals over and above the ordinary orchestra.

But if one pardons the extravagant ardor of youth, and concedes a little to the "Sturm und Drang" period, there will be found in the work a sufficiency of musical thought and a grand working-up of climaxes. The work is crowded with ideas, many of which jostle each other, and none of which seem to come to a legitimate conclusion, but better wealth than poverty in this direction, and the extreme richness of thought as well as of orchestration gives plenty of promise, even while little of actual fulfilment has yet been attained. The work seems better than the Italian symphony in which Boston first made the acquaintance of the composer, a few years ago, for in that work the sumptuous treatment of a simple Neapolitan folk song was as out of place as the clothing of a Vesuvian guide in silk and velvet would have been.

There are no such incongruities in this composition, but the number of climaxes is rather bewildering, and the following of tender oboe themes (the oboe played very well too) by gruesome dissonances, is rather a meaningless contrast. The modern orchestral tricks are too often resorted to; the muted tones of the horn, the ugliest effects one can evoke from the orchestra, are used with lavish hand, and the theatrical vein was added to by an exaggeration of the rests and the dynamic marks. It was something to go through so difficult a work without an upset, but there was more of enthusiasm than of precision in the performance, and while the two or three catastrophes, and the half dozen explosions with which the work is garnished, were dramatically done, the wind instruments were neither united in attack nor well intoned, and the horn in these days is a very persistent sinner, often overblowing, and trying to make itself into a trombone, like the toad that wanted to be an ox. But we ought to be thankful at least that the work was placed on the programme, for it is in the hearing of all the more recent orchestral works (even if they are not all commendable) that we may expect to evoke a spirit of musical comparison and consequent growth.

After the musical tempest came Alfred Gruenfeld, but with no intention of pouring oil on the troubled waters, for he is a species of Jupiter Tonans and swings his thunderbolts and his arms as freely as Rubinstein himself. If he had lived in the days when Domenico Scarlatti wrote everlasting staccato effects for the clavicembalo (which could not produce a legato), I think that he would have been the greatest artist of the world; but in the 19th century, and particularly at this end of it, there are passages that require other modes of execution. Even the pianissimo passages were at times rapped out with a clear precision and power that gave an impression of a coldly brilliant technique. Of course there were no blurs to condone, but blurring would have been less irritating than the never-ending demi-staccato.

Sometimes, as if suddenly conscious of this defect, the artist would drop into an almost inaudible softness, but this was only semi-occasionally, and there was little shading between. Once this fault is censured, the reviewer can unreservedly praise. Mr. Gruenfeld's wrist action is something remarkable, and his octave and heavy chord work is a model to every pianist. When a work suits his style he is very great in it, and it was this which caused the slow movement of the Rubinstein concerto in D minor to seem very prosaic, while the first and last movements were absolute triumphs of artistic brilliancy. No one could have caught up the hearty animal spirits of the finale (reminding of the finale of Beethoven's eighth symphony, both in theme and in style) more brightly and effectively, and the enthusiastic recalls which ensued were certainly deserved.

Now came that Beethoven work which is more written about, more orated upon, more frequently poetized than any other, simply because it gives a tangible ground for litterateur, orator and poet to hang definite remarks upon. This definiteness, however, makes the sixth weaker than its sister symphonies which speak the vaguer, but more soulful, language of pure music. But its simplicity shows forth the latent defects of an orchestra with startling clearness. If a bill of specifications of the present faults of our orchestra is desired, here it is:—

In the coda of the first movement, where the chief theme appears in full harmonies' the ensemble was very poor and the effect was muddy.

In the Scene by the Brook the clarinet was poor, and the rest of the woodwind, which has such important work to do, was uncertain in pitch.

In the scherzo the unison passages, which begin the movement, were unsteady, and even the players in the village band were weak and too irregular in their simple measures.

In the storm there was no careful shading in the gradual diminuendo effects with which the tempest passes away.

In the finale the horn was unclear, and it made slips in the preceding movements as well.

Per contra, the reading of the storm was commendably energetic, and certain parts of the scherzo, as for example, the entrance of the mountaineers, were powerful and effective.

But the performance as a whole still leaves a balance on the wrong side of the artistic ledger. Gladly do I acknowledge a

After virility, a wilder abandon, than ever before, but these qualities are not always called into requisition. In a classical work, often a perfect balance, a true intonation, a united attack, a refined grading of dynamic effects, outweigh a bold and fiery, or an excited and enthusiastic, rendering. Much as we all prized the first named qualities, we cannot afford them at the expense of the others. If it is impossible to restore the former wonderful ensemble of our orchestra, we shall have lost the supremacy in this field which it cost so much time, labor and generous outlay of money, to establish.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

Music.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The program of the fourth Symphony concert opened with a Symphonic Poem, "Don Juan," by Richard Strauss, which was performed for the first time in this city. The old legend of the Spanish libertine has been for years a favorite stage-subject. Operas, plays, ballets and puppet shows have told of the loves of the dashing blade and shown to gaping crowds the vengeance of angry Heaven. The rake and the statue have fascinated the poet, the essayist, and the painter. The gentle Washington Irving and the morbid Bandelaire have looked upon "Don Juan" with ill-disguised admiration, and Nikolaus Lenau has turned him into a philosopher who speculates, and explains his life. Now Richard Strauss has taken the poem of Lenau and treated it musically. Strauss is the son of a Munich horn player, and he is only twenty-seven years old. He wrote a symphony which was performed under Levy's direction in 1881, and since then he has written many pieces, among them "Italia," "Macbeth," "Don Juan" and "Death and Explanation." He was at first a believer in Brahms, but for some time he has swung round to the theories of Liszt and Wagner, and he now is a maker of program-music. In setting Lenau's poem, it was the purpose of Strauss to give musically the poet's conception of Don Juan's summing up of his life. Now if this were possible in music, the two elements apparent in the composition should be sensuousness and wild regret. The music, however, suggests neither one of the two. The only touch of voluptuousness is an echo of Wagner's Venusberg music, and percussion instruments are freely used; but the music itself is not sensuous or sensual. Nor is there any trace of terror or great woe as an antithesis. The work is labored, verbose and incoherent. It is weak in invention, and though the elaboration is often ingenious in instrumentation, the disciple borrows from his masters. It is made music, the rhetorical contrivings of a man that has really little to say. The poem was played with spirit, and it was favorably received by the audience.

Mr. Alfred Gruenfeld made his first appearance in Boston as a pianist, and he chose the Rubinstein Concerto in D minor. Mr. Gruenfeld has won his reputation in Europe by playing compositions of a very different nature, in which the elegance of his performance is said to give the pieces themselves an exaggerated value. The Rubinstein concerto is not among them, but it demands a player like the composer or Franz Rummel, or D'Albert or Sophie Menter. It would then be unfair to judge Mr. Gruenfeld from his playing of last Saturday, particularly as he will be heard in four recitals. It may be said here, however, that he has ample technique, that he plays with great clearness and accuracy, but that he occasionally seeks inartistic contrasts by following metallic harshness with sensational pianissimos derived from the soft pedal. He plays with elegance—the elegance of the salon, with its artificial lights, its artificial courtliness, its artificial conversation. But it is better to wait until he is heard in recitals that perhaps favor more his musical characteristics. He was very loudly applauded.

The symphony was Beethoven's Pastoral, so loved by many for its imitations of bird-calls and thunder storms. Many who are tempted to doze through the first three movements, pinch themselves that they may not miss the quail, the nightingale and the cuckoo; and when they hear the imitations they are pleased and say "Is it not wonderful!" But Johannes Weber hit the nail upon the head when he wrote: "Beethoven has imitated the cuckoo's song by means of the clarinet; but the notes of this bird differ materially from the tones of the clarinet; and, besides, the cuckoo does not always give the interval of a major third." The enthusiasm shown whenever imitations occur in musical compositions, sometimes leads one to think that after all it is not music itself which pleases many, but what they find in it, external and foreign.

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the fourth concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was—

Richard Strauss: Symphonic Poem, "Don Juan."
Rubinstein: Concerto for pianoforte, in D minor, Op. 70.
Beethoven: Symphony No. 6, in F ("Pastorale"), Op. 68.

Mr. Alfred Grünfeld was the pianist.

Richard Strauss's symphonic poem is one of those compositions about which it is excessively hard to make up one's mind after a single hearing. Many works produce a vague enough impression while one is listening to them for the first time; but they leave a certain imprint on the hearer's memory, and he wakes up next morning to find that what sounded confused enough the night before, now seems orderly, coherent and comprehensible. Not so with this "Don Juan;" two nights' sleep and a day's rumination have—in our case, at least—thrown no new light upon it. Indeed, it seems vaguer and more confused to us now than it did last Saturday evening. All that remains distinct in our mind is that the work is a marvel of rich and brilliant orchestration, and has passages in it of exuberant passionate force. In the matter of instrumentation, indeed, the composer seems to have gone farther in the direction of spendthrift lavishness than anyone we have yet heard. Not that he has indulged himself in any unusual excesses in the composition of his orchestra—like Berlioz, in the "Danrémont" Requiem, or Wagner, in the "Nibelungen"—but that he employs the means he has chosen with a prodigality that seems at moments very like squandering. With him everything makes for richness and volume of tone; he has out-Wagnered Wagner in the fullness of his scoring. Yet, we are much mistaken if he has not overshot the mark. He shows wellnigh unexampled skill in using his brass to give weight of tone in strong passages, without allowing it to drown out the rest of the orchestra; his fortissimos do not sound brassy. But, after using his trumpets and trombones like mere clarinets and bassoons, and blending them so beautifully with the other instruments that they no longer sound like brass, he finds himself powerless to produce the characteristic trenchant effects that are associated with trumpets and trombones. The single pair of trumpets in a Mozart score has more brilliancy of effect than all Strauss's seven brass instruments together. When he wishes to put an extra cutting edge to his orchestra he has nothing for it but to take to the cymbals. Looking at the work from another point of view than the merely orchestral one, we seem to find a corresponding extravagance in the general style of writing; there is a constant strenuousness, a being at 90° in the shade all the time, that overreaches itself. It becomes monotonous and oppressive. One cannot believe in such music wearing well. Naturally this is a question to be settled only by trial—by repeated performances of the work.

Mr. Grünfeld's playing of Rubinstein's fourth concerto was one of the most completely satisfying performances we have listened to for a long time. The day is past for wondering at the technique of pianists; what once was a nine-days' wonder is now a sine qua non, and technique is the common property of pianists who know their business. But Mr. Grünfeld has one great merit in common with the astounding player who wrote the concerto he played: physical avoirdupois; and this is by no means common, as pianists go. It fits him admirably for just the task he selected, for playing this concerto of Rubinstein's. He can get volume and force of tone from the pianoforte by sheer weight, and can keep his muscular strength for higher artistic purposes, such as shading, accent and contrast. His phrasing is simply beautiful, his style at once dignified and flexible, brilliant and artistlike. He plays, too, with admirable warmth of feeling—with how much real depth of emotion one could not well determine, for there is little in the concerto to call this forth—but of one thing one could be certain: the quality of his feeling was entirely adequate to the music. A finer performance one can hardly wish to hear.

The orchestra played the Strauss poem admirably. The Beethoven symphony might have been done more delicately, but it was played with a warmth and unity of feeling that let the glorious music make its full effect. As we are often at loggerheads with Mr. Nikisch about questions of tempo, it is doubly a pleasure to note the admirable tempo at which he took the Andante molto moto; it is only once in a dog's age that one hears this movement go fast enough!

The next programme is: Haydn, symphony No. 1 [B. & H.], in E-flat; Beethoven, pianoforte concerto No. 4, in G major; Schumann, overture, scherzo and finale. Mr. Ferruccio Busoni will be the pianist.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The announcement that Mr. Alfred Grünfeld, the celebrated pianist, was to act as soloist at Saturday night's symphony, occasioned considerable interest and much expectation, so that an artist of less ability could only have disappointed those who at once recognized the talented musician, whom Von Bulow considers deserving "a foremost place among those virtuosos whom it is really worth while considering in earnest." Mr. Grünfeld's fine physique and strong face commanded instant attention, and when his fingers touched the keyboard the audience felt a magnetic thrill as though some magic power controlled them. His clear, incisive tones were given with a decision in the first movement in the concerto that emphasized the impression already made, and the moderato throughout was performed in a most masterly manner.

Perhaps it would be interesting to know that Mr. Grünfeld began to study when he was only five years of age, and at twelve gave his first concert, when he earned for himself the name of "wonder child." His career since then has won for him an enviable reputation and the praise of the highest musical authorities. In strong contrast to the first theme came the second movement, which was played with such sweetness and tenderness, such delicacy of touch, that Rubinstein himself could scarcely have failed to appreciate it.

greater virility, a wilder abandon, than ever before, but these qualities are not always called into requisition. In a classical work, often a perfect balance, a true intonation, a united attack, a refined grading of dynamic effects, outweigh a bold and fiery, or an excited and enthusiastic, rendering. Much as we all prized the first named qualities, we cannot afford them at the expense of the others. If it is impossible to restore the former wonderful ensemble of our orchestra, we shall have lost the supremacy in this field which it cost so much time, labor and generous outlay of money, to establish.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

Music.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The program of the fourth Symphony concert opened with a Symphonic Poem, "Don Juan," by Richard Strauss, which was performed for the first time in this city. The old legend of the Spanish libertine has been for years a favorite stage-subject. Operas, plays, ballets and puppet shows have told of the loves of the dashing blade and shown to gaping crowds the vengeance of angry Heaven. The rake and the statue have fascinated the poet, the essayist, and the painter. The gentle Washington Irving and the morbid Bandelaire have looked upon "Don Juan" with ill-disguised admiration, and Nikolaus Lenau has turned him into a philosopher who speculates, and explains his life. Now Richard Strauss has taken the poem of Lenau and treated it musically. Strauss is the son of a Munich horn player, and he is only twenty-seven years old. He wrote a symphony which was performed under Levy's direction in 1881, and since then he has written many pieces, among them "Italia," "Macbeth," "Don Juan" and "Death and Explanation." He was at first a believer in Brahms, but for some time he has swung round to the theories of Liszt and Wagner, and he now is a maker of program-music. In setting Lenau's poem, it was the purpose of Strauss to give musically the poet's conception of Don Juan's summing up of his life. Now if this were possible in music, the two elements apparent in the composition should be sensuousness and wild regret. The music, however, suggests neither one of the two. The only touch of voluptuousness is an echo of Wagner's Venusberg music, and percussion instruments are freely used; but the music itself is not sensuous or sensual. Nor is there any trace of terror or great woe as an antithesis. The work is labored, verbose and incoherent. It is weak in invention, and though the elaboration is often ingenious in instrumentation, the disciple borrows from his masters. It is made music, the rhetorical contrivings of a man that has really little to say. The poem was played with spirit, and it was favorably received by the audience.

Mr. Alfred Gruenfeld made his first appearance in Boston as a pianist, and he chose the Rubinstein Concerto in D minor. Mr. Gruenfeld has won his reputation in Europe by playing compositions of a very different nature, in which the elegance of his performance is said to give the pieces themselves an exaggerated value. The Rubinstein concerto is not among them, but it demands a player like the composer or Franz Rummel, or D'Albert or Sophie Menter. It would then be unfair to judge Mr. Gruenfeld from his playing of last Saturday, particularly as he will be heard in four recitals. It may be said here, however, that he has ample technique, that he plays with great clearness and accuracy, but that he occasionally seeks inartistic contrasts by following metallic harshness with sensational pianissimos derived from the soft pedal. He plays with elegance—the elegance of the salon, with its artificial lights, its artificial courtliness, its artificial conversation. But it is better to wait until he is heard in recitals that perhaps favor more his musical characteristics. He was very loudly applauded.

The symphony was Beethoven's Pastoral, so loved by many for its imitations of bird-calls and thunder storms. Many who are tempted to doze through the first three movements, pinch themselves that they may not miss the quail, the nightingale and the cuckoo; and when they hear the imitations they are pleased and say "Is it not wonderful!" But Johannes Weber hit the nail upon the head when he wrote: "Beethoven has imitated the cuckoo's song by means of the clarinet; but the notes of this bird differ materially from the tones of the clarinet; and, besides, the cuckoo does not always give the interval of a major third." The enthusiasm shown whenever imitations occur in musical compositions, sometimes leads one to think that after all it is not music itself which pleases many, but what they find in it, external and foreign.

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the fourth concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was—

Richard Strauss: Symphonic Poem, "Don Juan."
Rubinstein: Concerto for pianoforte, in D minor, Op. 70.
Beethoven: Symphony No. 6, in F ("Pastorale"), Op. 68.

Mr. Alfred Grünfeld was the pianist.

Richard Strauss's symphonic poem is one of those compositions about which it is excessively hard to make up one's mind after a single hearing. Many works produce a vague enough impression while one is listening to them for the first time; but they leave a certain imprint on the hearer's memory, and he wakes up next morning to find that what sounded confused enough the night before, now seems orderly, coherent and comprehensible. Not so with this "Don Juan;" two nights' sleep and a day's rumination have—in our case, at least—thrown no new light upon it. Indeed, it seems vaguer and more confused to us now than it did last Saturday evening. All that remains distinct in our mind is that the work is a marvel of rich and brilliant orchestration, and has passages in it of exuberant passionate force. In the matter of instrumentation, indeed, the composer seems to have gone farther in the direction of spendthrift lavishness than anyone we have yet heard. Not that he has indulged himself in any unusual excesses in the composition of his orchestra—like Berlioz, in the "Danrémont" Requiem, or Wagner, in the "Nibelungen"—but that he employs the means he has chosen with a prodigality that seems at moments very like squandering. With him everything makes for richness and volume of tone; he has out-Wagnered Wagner in the fullness of his scoring. Yet, we are much mistaken if he has not overshot the mark. He shows wellnigh unexampled skill in using his brass to give weight of tone in strong passages, without allowing it to drown out the rest of the orchestra; his fortissimos do not sound brassy. But, after using his trumpets and trombones like mere clarinets and bassoons, and blending them so beautifully with the other instruments that they no longer sound like brass, he finds himself powerless to produce the characteristic trenchant effects that are associated with trumpets and trombones. The single pair of trumpets in a Mozart score has more brilliancy of effect than all Strauss's seven brass instruments together. When he wishes to put an extra cutting edge to his orchestra he has nothing for it but to take to the cymbals. Looking at the work from another point of view than the merely orchestral one, we seem to find a corresponding extravagance in the general style of writing; there is a constant strenuousness, a being at 90° in the shade all the time, that overreaches itself. It becomes monotonous and oppressive. One cannot believe in such music wearing well. Naturally this is a question to be settled only by trial—by repeated performances of the work.

Mr. Grünfeld's playing of Rubinstein's fourth concerto was one of the most completely satisfying performances we have listened to for a long time. The day is past for wondering at the technique of pianists; what once was a nine-days' wonder is now a sine qua non, and technique is the common property of pianists who know their business. But Mr. Grünfeld has one great merit in common with the astounding player who wrote the concerto he played: physical avoirdupois; and this is by no means common, as pianists go. It fits him admirably for just the task he selected, for playing this concerto of Rubinstein's. He can get volume and force of tone from the pianoforte by sheer weight, and can keep his muscular strength for higher artistic purposes, such as shading, accent and contrast. His phrasing is simply beautiful, his style at once dignified and flexible, brilliant and artistlike. He plays, too, with admirable warmth of feeling—with how much real depth of emotion one could not well determine, for there is little in the concerto to call this forth—but of one thing one could be certain: the quality of his feeling was entirely adequate to the music. A finer performance one can hardly wish to hear.

The orchestra played the Strauss poem admirably. The Beethoven symphony might have been done more delicately, but it was played with a warmth and unity of feeling that let the glorious music make its full effect. As we are often at loggerheads with Mr. Nikisch about questions of tempo, it is doubly a pleasure to note the admirable tempo at which he took the Andante molto moto; it is only once in a dog's age that one hears this movement go fast enough!

The next programme is: Haydn, symphony No. 1 [B. & H.], in E-flat; Beethoven, pianoforte concerto No. 4, in G major; Schumann, overture, scherzo and finale. Mr. Ferruccio Busoni will be the pianist.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The announcement that Mr. Alfred Grünfeld, the celebrated pianist, was to act as soloist at Saturday night's symphony, occasioned considerable interest and much expectation, so that an artist of less ability could only have disappointed those who at once recognized the talented musician, whom Von Bulow considers deserving "a foremost place among those virtuosos whom it is really worth while considering in earnest." Mr. Grünfeld's fine physique and strong face commanded instant attention, and when his fingers touched the keyboard the audience felt a magnetic thrill as though some magic power controlled them. His clear, incisive tones were given with a decision in the first movement in the concerto that emphasized the impression already made, and the moderato throughout was performed in a most masterly manner.

Perhaps it would be interesting to know that Mr. Grünfeld began to study when he was only five years of age, and at twelve gave his first concert, when he earned for himself the name of "wonder child." His career since then has won for him an enviable reputation and the praise of the highest musical authorities. In strong contrast to the first theme came the second movement, which was played with such sweetness and tenderness, such delicacy of touch, that Rubinstein himself could scarcely have failed to appreciate it.

Such prominence is rarely given to the piano-forte as was asserted in the last allegro assai. The fire, force and magnetism of a strong musical nature marked the expression of the finale, and brought to a close one of the most thoroughly satisfactory performances listened to for a long time, as the audience promptly attested by the ovation that followed.

The orchestral contributions consisted of Strauss's symphonic poem, "Don Juan," and the ever beautiful Pastoral Symphony No. 6, by Beethoven. At times, in the former, the instruments seemed to throb with emotion, which stirred the very depths of one's nature, and again they would glide away in idyllic phrases, only to return once more to a most brilliant and inspiring interpretation of the noble poem.

Who can resist the wonderful charm of Nature's musical interpreter? Beethoven's melodic pictures seemed as clear and real to the imaginative mind as the most famous painting of the Louvre to the admiring eye.

Every emotion is played upon, and when the storm breaks upon one's senses it is difficult to tell which is truly the most divine, the real or this powerful expression of the same. So many good things coming together on the same programme almost bewilder one with delight, and perhaps it would not be unbecoming to award Director Nikisch a word of praise for this most excellent programme.

The coming concert announces Mr. Ferruccio B. Busoni, soloist, in Beethoven's concerto for pianoforte, No. 4 in G major, with orchestral selections from Haydn and Schumann.

OTHER CONCERTS.

The second concert of the series given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Sanders Theatre took place last evening. The programme was as follows:

Overture, "Hebrides," Mendelssohn
Aria, "La Reine de Saba," Gounod
Suite, op. 55, Tchaikowsky
Song, "The Erl King," Schubert
Overture, "Euryanthe," Weber

The Mendelssohn overture still keeps its romantic freshness, and the Tchaikowsky suite made a profound impression. A second hearing confirms the opinion lately expressed in these columns that the first and last movements are the work of a master of instrumentation and a composer of great fancy, while the other movements suffer from a clever display of eccentricity that takes the place of true musical thought. Mrs. Lillian Norton was the singer, and she was very heartily applauded. But her singing of the two arias was chiefly characterized by its heartlessness.

A large audience in Music Hall last evening was delighted throughout the concert of the Austrian Juvenile Band by the remarkable precision, swing and full, rich tone of the players under Mr. Steiner's lead. The band, as in the previous concert, was particularly happy in the performance of waltzes and national music. There will be two more of these exceedingly interesting concerts, this evening and Sunday evening, and no one should fail to hear these young players before they leave the town.

MUSICAL.

The Symphony Concert.

The fourth concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Music Hall, last evening, was listened to by a large audience. The performances opened with a symphonic poem, "Don Juan," by Richard Strauss. What it meant as music, pure and simple, we failed to discover. Judging by the poem by Lenau, which is said to have suggested it, the intention of the composer was to depict the emotions of the Spanish libertine as he looks back, "flying from surfeit and from rapture's cloy." According to the composer, Don Juan's feelings under these circumstances were exceedingly uncomfortable. They were not exactly coherent, and such reminiscences must have carried their own punishment with them. The agony they caused him were evidently depicted in the fearful caterwauling of the wind instruments. Now and then he has a soothing moment in the shape of a generous bit of melody, but it does not last long and the roaring and the growling and the moral colic seize on him again and render him utterly miserable. The music is ultra modern, full of sound and fury, and as music means nothing. In point of style it is a mingling of Liszt, Wagner and Saint Saëns. Everything is sacrificed to tone color, noise and sensationalism in instrumentation predominating. The whole thing has been done, and better done, by Wagner in the music of the Venusberg in "Tannhauser," of which this is too often a glaring plagiarism. When it was all over, we felt that if Don Juan experienced anything like the fearful agonies that the music indicated, the devil would have been short-sighted to lug him away at last to what must necessarily have been a lighter torture. The work was vigorously, even brilliantly played, but with much roughness in the strings and much of false intonation in the wind. Then came Rubinstein's Concerto in D minor, for piano, the solo part played by Mr. Alfred Grunfeld. The artist has a technique of great fluency, precision and elegance; he plays with ease and elasticity, and with perfect clearness; but he has one or two tricks that seem to be mannerisms, and they are repeated over and over again, until at last they give a tiresome monotony to his playing. One of these was especially prominent in the andante, and took the form of a sudden and unmeaningly distinct or detached thump, that was invariably followed by an extreme pianissimo, the result being inartistic, and producing an effect of mechanical coldness. The finale was given with great dash and brilliancy, and had many fine moments of technical display, but the performance of the concerto as a whole was characterized more by finger-work than by any deeper qualities. Judging by his performance of last night, we should say that Mr. Grunfeld would be heard to much better advantage in a smaller hall and in lighter music. Whether this be so or not it is certain that despite the energy and brilliancy that marked his playing of the concerto, the performance as a whole was tricky and cold. He was applauded with immense enthusiasm and was twice recalled. The concert ended with Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony, which was read somewhat stiffly and unsympathetically in the opening movement, and with an almost sickly sugariness in the andante. The roughness that has of late characterized the playing of the strings was unpleasantly prominent, and the untunefulness of the wind instruments, notably of the first clarinet in its solos in the andante, was distressing. The programme for the next concert is: Symphony in E flat, Haydn (No. 1, B. & H.); Concerto for piano in G, Beethoven, and Overture, Scherzo and Finale, Schumann. The soloist is to be Mr. F. B. Busoni.

Symphony Hearers Greet Pianist Grunfeld.

ALFRED GRUNFELD, a pianist of great European repute and the possessor of endless decorations from music loving potentates, was the soloist at last evening's Symphony concert. He came with the further prestige of two successful concerts in New York, so it was natural that he should have received a cordial greeting when he appeared at the Friday rehearsal.

There is nothing striking in the personal appearance of Mr. Grunfeld; he seems genial and unaffected, giving no signs in either look or manner of the peculiarities which are commonly supposed to be associated with a highly developed artistic temperament.

His playing did not stir his audience to any great degree of excitement, yet he was listened to with profound attention and twice recalled at the conclusion of his performance.

He is not in any sense a showy player, and it was, possibly, because of the entire absence of sensational devices that no greater enthusiasm was created. While not particularly magnetic in manner, there is often a deal of fervor in his playing, as well as constant evidence of keen artistic appreciation of the beauties of the compositions which he interprets.

Rubinstein's concerto for pianoforte in D minor, No. 4, op. 70, was the selection he chose for first performance here, and was one well adapted to displaying his sober, thoughtful style of playing.

More brilliant pianists have been heard here in the past, but it is safe to say that very few have given greater pleasure to the musical student. His technique is, of course, well nigh perfect. No pianist could, in these days, gain distinction who was not a master of the mechanics of his art. In his playing there is none of that aggressive violence so noticeable in the work of many famous performers. Yet there is no lack of strength in his forte passages, as was well shown in the brilliant final movement of Rubinstein's concerto.

His touch is of rare delicacy and marked precision. Particularly delightful is his pianissimo, and also of uncommon excellence is his phrasing and contrasts of tone color.

Mr. Grunfeld is announced shortly to give a series of piano recitals here, which will offer greater opportunities for judging of his virtuosity.

A novelty on Mr. Nikisch's programme was the performance of Richard Strauss' symphonic poem, "Don Juan." It is an exceedingly showy work, bright in unique effects, skillfully contrived and richly harmonized. The composition, however, is not of even excellence.

There are a few passages which are meaningless and blatant, but they may readily be forgotten in the remembrance of the exquisitely sentimental and suggestive themes which are so delightfully stated by the wood and string instruments. Mr. Nikisch's interpretation was generally pleasing, but more gentleness in his treatment of the brasses would have been welcome.

Beethoven's magnificent pastoral symphony No. 6 held the rapt attention of the audience until the close of the concert. It is always a rare treat to hear this wonderful tone picture, and yesterday Mr. Nikisch was particularly happy in setting forth its innumerable beauties.

There will be no concert this week. The announcements for Nov. 13 and 14 are Haydn, Symphony No. 1 (B. and H.), in E-flat; Beethoven concerto for pianoforte, No. 4, in G major; Schumann, overture, Scherzo, and finale; soloist, Mr. Ferruccio B. Busoni.

The Symphony Concert, Soloist Alfred Grunfeld.

The Pianist Heartily Welcomed and Given a Grand Ovation—Manager Mapleson Announces a Great Concert—Notable Events Near at Hand—The Austrian Boy's Coming—Notes.

The success attending the first appearance in this city at last evening's symphony concert of Mr. Alfred Grunfeld, the pianist, was most emphatic, and this talented artist may confidently count upon a reliable following here in Boston during the season.

Mr. Grunfeld chose the concerto in D minor by Rubinstein for his contribution to the programme, and the selection was an excellent one, its strongly contrasted movements serving admirably to display the pianist's varied gifts. His playing of the opening movement instantly arrested and held the attention of the audience, the clean clear execution, the pure limped tone, and the admirable taste shown in this portion of the work, gaining an instant recognition of the player's masterly skill and command over his instrument.

A remarkably fine interpretation of the moderate assai followed, in which the lovely theme was sung upon the piano with faultless grace and rare expression, the pianissimo passages being given like the whisper of falling leaves, and with a dainty touch that surprised and delighted all hearers. The bold, free style of the final allegro was caught with equal success, and the concerto brought to a brilliant ending that called out a great ovation for the pianist and gave him a well merited recognition of his grand abilities.

Mr. Nikisch introduced his programme for the concert with the first performance here of the symphonic poem "Don Juan," by Richard Strauss, and ended it with Beethoven's "Pastorale" symphony.

The "Don Juan" poem affords ample scope for the imaginative composer in reproducing the amorous scenes depicted by Nicolaus Lenau, its author, and the richly scored tone pictures of Strauss afford a fascinating study. The poem was splendidly played, and a very successful interpretation of the familiar "Pastorale" symphony ended the concert.

The next concert comes on the evening of Nov. 14, when Mr. Ferruccio B. Busoni, pianist, will be the soloist, and the programme will be Haydn's symphony No. 1 in E flat, Beethoven's concerto No. 4 in G major, and Schumann's overture, scherzo and finale.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

Reflection made, the one thing which deserves praise and remembrance out of the last Symphony concert, is Mr. Albert Grünfeld's Boston debut in the Rubinstein D-minor concerto for pianoforte. While this work and its reading cannot have shown all the qualities which the new pianist possesses, and very likely did not show him in altogether the most favorable light, it nevertheless proved him to be a man of mark, who has won by substantial and straightforward work the eminent position and complimentary titles which are his in Europe. He belongs among the executants rather than the interpreters, and his command of the key-board is remarkable for its force and also for its finesse—thus touching the extremes of technical pianism—and also being both bold and sure in meeting all the other tests to which a virtuoso of this day must respond. It is true that this force is sometimes abused and that finesse displayed fantastically, as it is also apparent that sweetness of sound is often substituted for suavity of sentiment. But Mr. Grünfeld's peculiar excellences—which will undoubtedly shine most clearly in a diversified programme of music more nearly approaching the chamber style—are so many that it would be unreasonable to complain because in his concerto he did not supply something, the lack of which was evidently due to his temperament and the general course of his art work. The concert began with a turgid and tumultuous thing by young Richard Strauss, who calls it a symphonic poem, and bases it upon some verses about Don Juan, by Lenau. The poem does not mean much and the music less. It is noisily rich, soundingly sensuous, clamorous to the top of all the brazen lungs of the orchestra, demonstrative with almost every known instrument of percussion and imitative of nearly all the fantastic or vociferous authors of the time. It has some pretty melodies, some splendid instrumental effects and some big climaxes; but it has no more consistency and meaning than a turbulent sunset full of huge clouds and vapors resplendent with all the fierce, full colors of the celestial palette. That it might be made to appear at least as meaning more, is possible; for Mr. Nikisch did not manage with it as if he understood it himself, being a great part of the time from a half-beat to a whole one behind the orchestra and having no power to prevent false entrances and improvised dissonances. Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony ended the evening in a performance which ranged from the acceptable and mediocre to the absolutely bad.

MUSIC.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The programme of the fourth Symphony Concert was as follows:

Symphonic Poem, "Don Juan"..... R. Strauss.
Concerto for pianoforte in D minor..... Rubinstein.
Symphony No. 6, "Pastoral"..... Beethoven.

Nikolaus Lenau took our old friend Don Juan de Tenorio and made him over into a cross between Faust and the Preacher of Jerusalem, and Richard Strauss has chosen Lenau's poem for the text of a musical sermon. Young Strauss started in life as a disciple of Johannes Brahms and a believer in absolute music; but he journeyed from Vienna, and as he came near Weimar he saw suddenly a great light. Ever since he has embraced the belief of Liszt, and he now uses music as the vehicle of expressing everything but music; for he has little invention, and his musical thoughts are of little worth. This symphonic poem is supposed to portray in music the recollections and regrets of a jaded voluptuary. Now, granting that music is capable of doing this, what do we find in this composition? There are recollections, not of Don Juan, but of Liszt and of Wagner. There are also regrets, but the regrets come from the hearers. There is plenty of fuss and fuming; there are passages of brilliant instrumentation, some of them original, some of them borrowed; there is a dramatic effect near the close; but is there any genuine passion or any real terror from the beginning to the end? The hero of Strauss is not the rake-hally man of the legend, the sneering scoundrel of Molière or the impassive figure in Baudelaire's poem who assumes such gigantic proportions after he has given Charon the demanded coin. Nor does the music echo even faintly the passion of Lenau. Besides, Don Juan was more direct in his methods. His wooing was as sudden and as violent as his descent to the lower regions. According to Strauss, he was verbose, fond of turning corners, something of a metaphysician, and a good deal of a bore. When he made love he beat upon a triangle, and when he was dyspeptic he confided his woes to instruments that moaned in sympathy.

There was once a German who wrote an Italian opera for Italian singers. When "Don Juan" is mentioned to musician or theatre-goer, he remembers a dashing Spaniard killing an old man and chucking Zerlina under the chin, running away from his wife and loving Donna Anna, mocking the Statue, but welcoming the awful steps outside the banquet hall, although he then anticipates eternal flames. And humming immortal strains, he thinks of Mozart, nor does he breathe the name of Richard Strauss. If it be said that the work of the one is an opera and that of the other a symphonic poem, and therefore they are not to be named together, there remains the overture to "Don Giovanni," in which the life of a libertine with its dash and sparkle and the inevitable horrors of the end, is more musically suggested.

This symphonic poem, played for the first time in Boston, was loudly applauded by the audience, and probably in spite of occasional roughness the orchestra made the most of the composition. Still greater applause was given to Mr. Alfred Gruenfeld, who made his first appearance in this city as a pianist. He was heard in the Rubinstein concerto in D minor.

As Mr. Gruenfeld will give a series of recitals in Music Hall, it is perhaps safer to reserve judgment. It may be said, however, that he certainly has great technique; but technique in these days runs in the streets of Paris, Vienna and Berlin. He played in the concerto with clearness, ease and precision. But singularly enough, although a man of such technique, his forte was often extremely metallic, and his pianissimo seemed to depend entirely upon the use of the "soft" pedal. According to the criticisms of foreigners of authority, Mr. Gruenfeld is heard to greater advantage in compositions of a very different class that demand a smaller hall. Now while there were admirable features in his performance of Saturday evening, there was a lack of the true virility that includes unaffected tenderness. The playing of this concerto in the spirit of the composer is not akin to the cutting of cameos or the painting of perfumed fans.

The symphony was the "Pastoral." The first movement was played with metronomic rigidity, and the second lulled the hearers, who waited confidently for the appearance of the nightingale, quail, cuckoo and thunder storm.

The programme of the concert Nov. 14 will include Haydn's Symphony No. 1 in E flat; Beethoven's Pianoforte Concerto in G major, and Schumann's Overture, Scherzo and Finale. Mr. F. B. Busoni will be the pianist.

PHILIP HALE.

A Pair of Fine Musicians.

[Special Correspondence of the Transcript.]

NEW YORK, Oct. 24, 1891.

The first appearance in America of the Grünfeld brothers took place last evening in the Madison Square Garden Concert Hall. The fact that Alfred Grünfeld was long court pianist to the emperors of Austria and Germany, that his brother Heinrich was violoncellist to the emperor of Germany, and that both were great favorites of the Vienna and Berlin public, has raised the expectations of connoisseurs. It is no exaggeration to say that the audience was in a condition of continually growing enthusiasm throughout the concert. A touch like that of Alfred Grünfeld, whose pianissimo is a breath, but is heard in every part of the extensive hall, and whose fortissimo will rival that of any pianist, without any of the attendant hardness which we so often hear, has rarely been heard in New York. In Liszt's arrangement of Isolde's great aria one might believe he heard an entire orchestra with all its gradations of strength and variety of color. Other selections played were Beethoven's andante favori, Schubert's impromptu in B-flat, the romance and Träumerei by Schumann, and several original pieces. After the last one of these, a Hungarian Rhapsody, in which certain cymbal effects are imitated to perfection, the audience vociferously demanding an encore, Mr. Grünfeld played an original arrangement of Strauss's waltzes, which nearly set the audience to dancing. Heinrich Grünfeld possesses an exceedingly warm and sympathetic tone, and a facility to produce every possible effect. In selections from Moskowski, Schumann and Popper, as well as in a Beethoven sonata which he played with his brother, he showed a fine conception and feeling.

MUSICUS.

for the imaginative composer in reproducing the amorous scenes depicted by Nikolaus Lenau, its author, and the richly scored tone pictures of Strauss afford a fascinating study. The poem was splendidly played, and a very successful interpretation of the familiar "Pastorale" symphony ended the concert.

The next concert comes on the evening of Nov. 14, when Mr. Ferruccio B. Busoni, pianist, will be the soloist, and the programme will be Haydn's symphony No. 1 in E flat, Beethoven's concerto No. 4 in G major, and Schumann's overture, scherzo and finale.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

Reflection made, the one thing which deserves praise and remembrance out of the last Symphony concert, is Mr. Albert Grünfeld's Boston debut in the Rubinstein D-minor concerto for pianoforte. While this work and its reading cannot have shown all the qualities which the new pianist possesses, and very likely did not show him in altogether the most favorable light, it nevertheless proved him to be a man of mark, who has won by substantial and straightforward work the eminent position and complimentary titles which are his in Europe. He belongs among the executants rather than the interpreters, and his command of the key-board is remarkable for its force and also for its finesse—thus touching the extremes of technical pianism—and also being both bold and sure in meeting all the other tests to which a virtuoso of this day must respond. It is true that this force is sometimes abused and that finesse displayed fantastically, as it is also apparent that sweetness of sound is often substituted for suavity of sentiment. But Mr. Grünfeld's peculiar excellences—which will undoubtedly shine most clearly in a diversified programme of music more nearly approaching the chamber style—are so many that it would be unreasonable to complain because in his concerto he did not supply something, the lack of which was evidently due to his temperament and the general course of his art work. The concert began with a turgid and tumultuous thing by young Richard Strauss, who calls it a symphonic poem, and bases it upon some verses about Don Juan, by Lenau. The poem does not mean much and the music less. It is noisily rich, soundingly sensuous, clamorous to the top of all the brazen lungs of the orchestra, demonstrative with almost every known instrument of percussion and imitative of nearly all the fantastic or vociferous authors of the time. It has some pretty melodies, some splendid instrumental effects and some big climaxes; but it has no more consistency and meaning than a turbulent sunset full of huge clouds and vapors resplendent with all the fierce, full colors of the celestial palette. That it might be made to appear at least as meaning more is possible; for Mr. Nikisch did not manage with it as if he understood it himself, being a great part of the time from a half-beat to a whole one behind the orchestra and having no power to prevent false entrances and improvised dissonances. Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony ended the evening in a performance which ranged from the acceptable and mediocre to the absolutely bad.

MUSIC.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The programme of the fourth Symphony Concert was as follows:

Symphonic Poem, "Don Juan," R. Strauss.
Concerto for pianoforte in D minor..... Rubinstein.
Symphony No. 6, "Pastoral"..... Beethoven.

Nikolaus Lenau took our old friend Don Juan de Tenorio and made him over into a cross between Faust and the Preacher of Jerusalem, and Richard Strauss has chosen Lenau's poem for the text of a musical sermon. Young Strauss started in life as a disciple of Johannes Brahms and a believer in absolute music; but he journeyed from Vienna, and as he came near Weimar he saw suddenly a great light. Ever since he has embraced the belief of Liszt, and he now uses music as the vehicle of expressing everything but music; for he has little invention, and his musical thoughts are of little worth. This symphonic poem is supposed to portray in music the recollections and regrets of a jaded voluptuary. Now, granting that music is capable of doing this, what do we find in this composition? There are recollections, not of Don Juan, but of Liszt and of Wagner. There are also regrets, but the regrets come from the hearers. There is plenty of fuss and fuming; there are passages of brilliant instrumentation, some of them original, some of them borrowed; there is a dramatic effect near the close; but is there any genuine passion or any real terror from the beginning to the end? The hero of Strauss is not the rake-helly man of the legend, the sneering scoundrel of Molière or the impulsive figure in Baudelaire's poem who assumes such gigantic proportions after he has given Charon the demanded coin. Nor does the music echo even faintly the passion of Lenau. Besides, Don Juan was more direct in his methods. His wooing was as sudden and as violent as his descent to the lower regions. According to Strauss, he was verbose, fond of turning corners, something of a metaphysician, and a good deal of a bore. When he made love he beat upon a triangle, and when he was dyspeptic he confided his woes to instruments that moaned in sympathy.

There was once a German who wrote an Italian opera for Italian singers. When "Don Juan" is mentioned to musician or theatre-goer, he remembers a dashing Spaniard killing an old man and chucking Zerlina under the chin, running away from his wife and loving Donna Anna, mocking the Statue, but welcoming the awful steps outside the banquet hall, although he then anticipates eternal flames. And humming immortal strains, he thinks of Mozart, nor does he breathe the name of Richard Strauss. If it be said that the work of the one is an opera and that of the other a symphonic poem, and therefore they are not to be named together, there remains the overture to "Don Giovanni," in which the life of a libertine with its dash and sparkle and the inevitable horrors of the end is more musically suggested.

This symphonic poem, played for the first time in Boston, was loudly applauded by the audience, and probably in spite of occasional roughness the orchestra made the most of the composition. Still greater applause was given to Mr. Alfred Grünfeld, who made his first appearance in this city as a pianist. He was heard in the Rubinstein concerto in D minor.

As Mr. Grünfeld will give a series of recitals in Music Hall, it is perhaps safer to reserve judgment. It may be said, however, that he certainly has great technique; but technique in these days runs in the streets of Paris, Vienna and Berlin. He played in the concerto with clearness, ease and precision. But singularly enough, although a man of such technique, his forte was often extremely metallic, and his pianissimo seemed to depend entirely upon the use of the "soft" pedal. According to the criticisms of foreigners of authority, Mr. Grünfeld is heard to greater advantage in compositions of a very different class that demand a smaller hall. Now while there were admirable features in his performance of Saturday evening, there was a lack of the true virility that includes unaffected tenderness. The playing of this concerto in the spirit of the composer is not akin to the cutting of cameos or the painting of perfumed fans.

The symphony was the "Pastoral." The first movement was played with metronomic rigidity, and the second lulled the hearers, who waited confidently for the appearance of the nightingale, quail, cuckoo and thunder storm.

The programme of the concert Nov. 14 will include Haydn's Symphony No. 1 in E flat; Beethoven's Pianoforte Concerto in G major, and Schumann's Overture, Scherzo and Finale. Mr. F. B. Busoni will be the pianist.

PHILIP HALE.

A Pair of Fine Musicians.

[Special Correspondence of the Transcript.]

NEW YORK, Oct. 24, 1891.

The first appearance in America of the Grünfeld brothers took place last evening in the Madison Square Garden Concert Hall. The fact that Alfred Grünfeld was long court pianist to the emperors of Austria and Germany, that his brother Heinrich was violoncellist to the emperor of Germany, and that both were great favorites of the Vienna and Berlin public, has raised the expectations of connoisseurs. It is no exaggeration to say that the audience was in a condition of continually growing enthusiasm throughout the concert. A touch like that of Alfred Grünfeld, whose pianissimo is a breath, but is heard in every part of the extensive hall, and whose fortissimo will rival that of any pianist, without any of the attendant hardness which we so often hear, has rarely been heard in New York. In Liszt's arrangement of Isolde's great aria one might believe he heard an entire orchestra with all its gradations of strength and variety of color. Other selections played were Beethoven's andante favori, Schubert's impromptu in B-flat, the romance and Träumerei by Schumann, and several original pieces. After the last one of these, a Hungarian Rhapsody, in which certain cymbal effects are imitated to perfection, the audience vociferously demanding an encore, Mr. Grünfeld played an original arrangement of Strauss's waltzes, which nearly set the audience to dancing. Heinrich Grünfeld possesses an exceedingly warm and sympathetic tone, and a facility to produce every possible effect. In selections from Moskowski, Schumann and Popper, as well as in a Beethoven sonata which he played with his brother, he showed a fine conception and feeling.

MUSICUS.

ION COMMONWEALTH.

MUSIC OF THE WEEK.

The fourth Symphony concert began with Richard Strauss's setting of Lenau's poem, 'Don Juan.' Richard, who is of a different family from the tricky Edouard and the dapper Johann of Vienna, puts his thoughts into the form of the 'symphonic poem'. While he is testing his strength in composition, the 'symphonic poem' is just the vehicle for his experiments; for it is formless and does not demand musical sequence of any sort, so that, if a young composer is prolific of ideas and has not the technique and restraint to make a master work, symmetrical, artistic and beautiful, he can lose himself in the mazes of this convenient and nondescript concoction. Richard has ideas, millions of them, and his 'Don Juan,' as a piece of instrumentation, is as startling and suggestive as it is incoherent and elusive. The public can afford to bear with this young man during his sprouting period; for 'Don Juan' is an improvement over 'Italy,' the ambitious production with which Mr. Gericke introduced the young man to Boston. His next work will be calmer and more artistic than 'Don Juan'. It is inevitable: in music as in life there exists a wild oats period. Strauss has a natural bent in instrumentation and delights in gorgeous combinations. Lenau's poem is a little too sensual for Richard, who is first of all barbaric and robust. The piece was splendidly played.

Alfred Grünfeld was the pianist at the concert, playing Rubinstein's D-minor concerto. He has a prodigious technique and a finger-grip like iron; his touch, too, is remarkably clear; but whether he has sentiment and the fine poetic temperament remains to be seen. His playing was well received, and, after the concert, various and contrary were the expressions of opinion. Grünfeld gives a series of recitals very soon. Beethoven's 'Pastoral' symphony completed the fourth programme, and Mr. Nikisch made its familiar measures interesting.

THE SYMPHONY.

The very interesting programme of the fourth symphony rehearsal and concert had for its first concert one of the many new works that were promised at the commencement of the season: Richard Strauss's symphonic poem, "Don Juan."

Young Strauss's career during the past ten years appears to have been an enviably successful one. To have succeeded Von Bulow as director of the famous Meiningen Orchestra, and to have received the appointment as court conductor in Liszt's old stronghold, Weimar, is to have greater good fortune than most young musicians, even of unusual talent, enjoy nowadays. "Don Juan" is quite in the vein of modern orchestral writing. Suggested to the composer by an extremely sensuous poem of Nicolas Lenau, the music, like its inscription, is of a strongly passionate nature. Still, tropical as it is, there is not discoverable in it any tendency towards coarseness or noise. Without introductory measures, the work starts off with a brilliant, impetuous theme given out by the full orchestra, excepting the heavy brass instruments. This, and a broad, sustained melody, in structure and treatment vividly recalling Wagner, constitute the principal subjects. The orchestration is rich and suggestive, the use of the strings being particularly effective. The grand climax near the end is splendidly worked up; and the close is gloomy enough to arouse feelings of satisfaction in the breast of the most pessimistic of beings. Altogether, "Don Juan" is musically attractive and is clearly the product of strong, well disciplined talent. How it would strike the ear after repeated hearings can only be guessed at. But important works, especially of a dramatic nature, may surely be expected in the near future from the hand that penned this brilliant orchestral piece. It was finely played. Mr. Nikisch's genius as a dramatic conductor was evident throughout, and hearty applause followed its conclusion.

Mr. Alfred Gruenfeld, the celebrated Viennese pianist, was the soloist, and the work he performed was Rubinstein's D minor concerto. Mr. Gruenfeld bears the reputation of being one of the most finished and elegant pianists of Europe. His touch is famous for its wonderful clearness, delicacy and elasticity, and his command over all the varieties of tone of which the pianoforte is capable is said to be complete. In view of these well established facts, then, it would be unreasonable to ascribe that which was unsatisfactory in his performance to anything more than miscalculation as to the amount of strength he needed to expend in order to fill Music Hall. In point of tempi, energy, phrasing, free and clear execution, the concerto was splendidly played. Accent and rhythm too were expressive, and artistically maintained; and though there was a slightly military air about his musical conception, it was at least free from all traces of sentimentality. The one disappointing feature was the hardness of touch displayed by the pianist. Mr. Gruenfeld's digital strength is simply enormous. If every note was not distinctly heard in the furthest recesses of the hall, it was through no fault of his; and it must be said that though of clearness there was no lack, both delicacy and that Rubinstein-like warmth and breadth of style that the work demands were conspicuous by their absence. There can be no doubt, however, that further acquaintance with Music Hall will enable Mr. Gruenfeld to calculate his dynamic effects more accurately. He was given a cordial reception and several enthusiastic recalls.

Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony was the closing number and evidently gave that pleasure which it must always give to any cultivated audience when it is well played, for it received close attention. The work of the orchestra was notably better than it has been of late, the pianissimo playing being especially good. Mr. Nikisch's reading was sympathetic and well balanced, except that the tempo of the last movement, as it seemed to us, was too slow throughout.

T. P. CURRIER.

THE SYMPHONIES.

FOURTH CONCERT.

At the fourth Symphony concert at Music hall this season, Saturday evening, Oct. 31, this was the programme:

- | | |
|------------------|--|
| Richard Strauss. | Symphonic Poem — "Don Juan." (First time in Boston.) |
| Rubinstein. | Concerto for Pianoforte in D minor, No. 4, op. 70. Moderato.—Moderato assai. —Allegro assai. |
| Beethoven. | Symphony No. 6. "Pastoral." Allegro ma non troppo.—Andante molto moto.—Allegro; Allegro; Allegretto. |

The first of the two novelties presented were Symphonic Poem—"Don Juan" by Richard Strauss. The great brilliancy of this highly colored tone-picture cannot be denied. It must be conceded that its author possesses the knowledge of and has succeeded in bringing the whole power of the modern orchestra to his assistance in this poem. It does seem, however, as if he was aiming more for stunning effect, than for pure, unalloyed, pleasurable music. The wood, brass, parchment and everything else in the orchestra visible to the eye was brought into requisition to help swell the tonal, noisy effect. But it seemed as if there was too much of this wholesale tone business. The horns, so beautiful in tone quality when carefully played, were so overblown as to produce a coarse, unpleasant impression of their real utility, and so with some of the other instruments. From an out-door standpoint, the rendition and effect of the piece was fine, but too much of it in a hall is too severe on the ears. We doubt if Strauss, or Von Bülow, if they were conducting this piece, would permit quite so much volume to come forth from the orchestra. But perhaps Mr. Strauss intended it for such purpose.

Mr. Alfred Grünfeld was the second novelty. He is a pianist who occupies a high position in the capital of Austria as one of the greatest of modern pianists: that means a good deal in these days of numerous great pianists. Yet there is no question but his position is equal to the foremost of them.

ION COMMONWEALTH.

MUSIC OF THE WEEK.

The fourth Symphony concert began with Richard Strauss's setting of Lenau's poem, 'Don Juan.' Richard, who is of a different family from the tricky Edouard and the dapper Johann of Vienna, puts his thoughts into the form of the 'symphonic poem'. While he is testing his strength in composition, the 'symphonic poem' is just the vehicle for his experiments; for it is formless and does not demand musical sequence of any sort, so that, if a young composer is prolific of ideas and has not the technique and restraint to make a master work, symmetrical, artistic and beautiful, he can lose himself in the mazes of this convenient and nondescript concoction. Richard has ideas, millions of them, and his 'Don Juan,' as a piece of instrumentation, is as startling and suggestive as it is incoherent and elusive. The public can afford to bear with this young man during his sprouting period; for 'Don Juan' is an improvement over 'Italy,' the ambitious production with which Mr. Gericke introduced the young man to Boston. His next work will be calmer and more artistic than 'Don Juan'. It is inevitable: in music as in life there exists a wild oats period. Strauss has a natural bent in instrumentation and delights in gorgeous combinations. Lenau's poem is a little too sensual for Richard, who is first of all barbaric and robust. The piece was splendidly played.

Alfred Grünfeld was the pianist at the concert, playing Rubinstein's D-minor concerto. He has a prodigious technique and a finger-grip like iron; his touch, too, is remarkably clear; but whether he has sentiment and the fine poetic temperament remains to be seen. His playing was well received, and, after the concert, various and contrary were the expressions of opinion. Grünfeld gives a series of recitals very soon. Beethoven's 'Pastoral' symphony completed the fourth programme, and Mr. Nikisch made its familiar measures interesting.

THE SYMPHONY.

The very interesting programme of the fourth symphony rehearsal and concert had for its first concert one of the many new works that were promised at the commencement of the season: Richard Strauss's symphonic poem, "Don Juan."

Young Strauss's career during the past ten years appears to have been an enviably successful one. To have succeeded Von Bülow as director of the famous Meiningen Orchestra, and to have received the appointment as court conductor in Liszt's old stronghold, Weimar, is to have greater good fortune than most young musicians, even of unusual talent, enjoy nowadays. "Don Juan" is quite in the vein of modern orchestral writing. Suggested to the composer by an extremely sensuous poem of Nicolas Lenau, the music, like its inscription, is of a strongly passionate nature. Still, tropical as it is, there is not discoverable in it any tendency towards coarseness or noise. Without introductory measures, the work starts off with a brilliant, impetuous theme given out by the full orchestra, excepting the heavy brass instruments. This, and a broad, sustained melody, in structure and treatment vividly recalling Wagner, constitute the principal subjects. The orchestration is rich and suggestive, the use of the strings being particularly effective. The grand climax near the end is splendidly worked up; and the close is gloomy enough to arouse feelings of satisfaction in the breast of the most pessimistic of beings. Altogether, "Don Juan" is musically attractive and is clearly the product of strong, well disciplined talent. How it would strike the ear after repeated hearings can only be guessed at. But important works, especially of a dramatic nature, may surely be expected in the near future from the hand that penned this brilliant orchestral piece. It was finely played. Mr. Nikisch's genius as a dramatic conductor was evident throughout, and hearty applause followed its conclusion.

Mr. Alfred Grünfeld, the celebrated Viennese pianist, was the soloist, and the work he performed was Rubinstein's D minor concerto. Mr. Grünfeld bears the reputation of being one of the most finished and elegant pianists of Europe. His touch is famous for its wonderful clearness, delicacy and elasticity, and his command over all the varieties of tone of which the pianoforte is capable is said to be complete. In view of these well established facts, then, it would be unreasonable to ascribe that which was unsatisfactory in his performance to anything more than miscalculation as to the amount of strength he needed to expend in order to fill Music Hall. In point of tempi, energy, phrasing, free and clear execution, the concerto was splendidly played. Accent and rhythm too were expressive, and artistically maintained; and though there was a slightly military air about his musical conception, it was at least free from all traces of sentimentality. The one disappointing feature was the hardness of touch displayed by the pianist. Mr. Grünfeld's digital strength is simply enormous. If every note was not distinctly heard in the furthest recesses of the hall, it was through no fault of his; and it must be said that though of clearness there was no lack, both delicacy and that Rubinstein-like warmth and breadth of style that the work demands were conspicuous by their absence. There can be no doubt, however, that further acquaintance with Music Hall will enable Mr. Grünfeld to calculate his dynamic effects more accurately. He was given a cordial reception and several enthusiastic recalls.

Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony was the closing number and evidently gave that pleasure which it must always give to any cultivated audience when it is well played, for it received close attention. The work of the orchestra was notably better than it has been of late, the pianissimo playing being especially good. Mr. Nikisch's reading was sympathetic and well balanced, except that the tempo of the last movement, as it seemed to us, was too slow throughout.

T. P. CURRIER.

THE SYMPHONIES.

FOURTH CONCERT.

At the fourth Symphony concert at Music hall this season, Saturday evening, Oct. 31, this was the programme:

Richard Strauss.	Symphonic Poem — "Don Juan." (First time in Boston.)
Rubinstein.	Concerto for Pianoforte in D minor, No. 4, op. 70. Moderato.—Moderato assai. —Allegro assai.
Beethoven.	Symphony No. 6. "Pastoral." Allegro ma non troppo.—Andante molto moto.—Allegro; Allegro; Allegretto.

The first of the two novelties presented were Symphonic Poem—"Don Juan" by Richard Strauss. The great brilliancy of this highly colored tone-picture cannot be denied. It must be conceded that its author possesses the knowledge of and has succeeded in bringing the whole power of the modern orchestra to his assistance in this poem. It does seem, however, as if he was aiming more for stunning effect, than for pure, unalloyed, pleasurable music. The wood, brass, parchment and everything else in the orchestra visible to the eye was brought into requisition to help swell the tonal, noisy effect. But it seemed as if there was too much of this wholesale tone business. The horns, so beautiful in tone quality when carefully played, were so overblown as to produce a coarse, unpleasant impression of their real utility, and so with some of the other instruments. From an out-door standpoint, the rendition and effect of the piece was fine, but too much of it in a hall is too severe on the ears. We doubt if Strauss, or Von Bülow, if they were conducting this piece, would permit quite so much volume to come forth from the orchestra. But perhaps Mr. Strauss intended it for such purpose.

Mr. Alfred Grünfeld was the second novelty. He is a pianist who occupies a high position in the capital of Austria as one of the greatest of modern pianists: that means a good deal in these days of numerous great pianists. Yet there is no question but his position is equal to the foremost of them.

76

The Rubenstein Concerto in D is of great difficulty, requiring the strength of a Sampson, the delicacy of an elf, and the technique of Rubenstein himself to bring it out in all its glory. Mr. Grünfeld succeeded in doing all this to the satisfaction of those interested in the performance of this colossal concerto. Mr. Grünfeld possesses the necessary physique, as well as the self-consciousness of being able to do what he attempts; for his wrists, hands and fingers possess the strength and velocity for the playing of any pianoforte music written. This was demonstrated in the last movement of the Concerto, where all the powers of a great pianist are brought into requisition. We thought at first he was going to prove a "pounder" but were happily disappointed for he used power for the purpose of bringing out the required musical effects. Mr. Grünfeld knows how to play staccato, legato and how to begin and end a musical phrase in a proper finished manner. While at times his tone seemed somewhat dry and hard, it was on the whole satisfactory, showing him to be a most wonderful, fascinating artist. We hope to hear him in a wider field, when he will have full opportunity to show what he can really do.

The "Pastoral" symphony, barring a few slips, was well played according to Mr. Nikisch's interpretation. There was a slight improvement noticeable in two or three crescendos of the orchestra, and the strings appeared to do a little better than usual, but the brass is still too brassy. The thunder storm in the last movement might be considerably bettered.

JAMES M. TRACY.

77

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1891-92.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

V. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 14, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

HAYDN.

SYMPHONY No. 1, (B. & H.), in E flat.

Adagio; Allegro con spirito.—
Andante.—Minuet.—Finale.

BEETHOVEN.

CONCERTO for PIANOFORTE, No. 4, in G major.
op. 50.

Allegro moderato.—Andante con moto.—Rondo.
(Cadenzas by BUSONI.)

SCHUMANN,

OVERTURE, SCHERZO, and FINALE. op. 50.

SOLOIST:

MR. FERRUCCIO B. BUSONI.

The Piano used is a Steinway.

76

The Rubenstein Concerto in D is of great difficulty, requiring the strength of a Sampson, the delicacy of an elf, and the technique of Rubenstein himself to bring it out in all its glory. Mr. Grünfeld succeeded in doing all this to the satisfaction of those interested in the performance of this colossal concerto. Mr. Grünfeld possesses the necessary physique, as well as the self consciousness of being able to do what he attempts; for his wrists, hands and fingers possess the strength and velocity for the playing of any pianoforte music written. This was demonstrated in the last movement of the Concerto, where all the powers of a great pianist are brought into requisition. We thought at first he was going to prove a "pounder" but were happily disappointed for he used power for the purpose of bringing out the required musical effects. Mr. Grünfeld knows how to play staccato, legato and how to begin and end a musical phrase in a proper finished manner. While at times his tone seemed somewhat dry and hard, it was on the whole satisfactory, showing him to be a most wonderful, fascinating artist. We hope to hear him in a wider field, when he will have full opportunity to show what he can really do.

The "Pastoral" symphony, barring a few slips, was well played according to Mr. Nikisch's interpretation. There was a slight improvement noticeable in two or three crescendos of the orchestra, and the strings appeared to do a little better than usual, but the brass is still too brassy. The thunder storm in the last movement might be considerably bettered.

JAMES M. TRACY.

77

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1891-92.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

V. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 14, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

HAYDN.

SYMPHONY No. 1, (B. & H.), in E flat.

Adagio; Allegro con spirito.—
Andante.—Minuet.—Finale.

BEETHOVEN.

CONCERTO for PIANOFORTE, No. 4, in G major.
op. 50.

Allegro moderato.—Andante con moto.—Rondo.
(Cadenzas by BUSONI.)

SCHUMANN,

OVERTURE, SCHERZO, and FINALE. op. 50.

SOLOIST:

MR. FERRUCCIO B. BUSONI.

The Piano used is a Steinway.

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the fifth symphony concert was as follows:

Haydn: Symphony in E-flat (B. & H. No. 1).
Beethoven: Pianoforte Concerto No. 4, in G major, op. 58.

Schumann: Overture, Scherzo and Finale, op. 50.

Ms. Ferruccio B. Busoni was the pianist.

One of the most delightful concerts the Symphony Orchestra has yet given! How long is it since Haydn's E-flat symphony has been heard here? It seems an age. It used to be one of the regular standbys in the old Harvard Musical days, as it is one of the finest of the composer's works in this form. It is full of originality, of things that were very new in its time. Take the effect with which the introductory Adagio sets out, those unisons (not octaves) of the bassoons, 'celli and double-basses: it sounds wonderfully modern. Then that piling up of glory upon glory in parts of the Finale; that is a foretaste of Beethoven in one of his finest and most characteristic moods. One finds throughout the work, besides and added to the true Haydn geniality and sense for beauty, a strength, a largeness of forms such as the master did not always see fit to employ. The performance was admirable, in fine sympathy with the spirit of the work; Mr. Kneisel's playing of the little solo variation in the Andante was especially exquisite.

In Schumann's Overture, Scherzo and Finale, Mr. Nikisch and the orchestra fairly outdid themselves. For one, technical, point, such exact playing of dotted triplets as was to be heard in the Scherzo is very rare. There is a goodish story about this point in orchestral performance. One day when a noted musician—we think it was Liszt, but of this we are not sure—made the trip from Cologne to Leipzig, he was met at the Leipzig station by Julius Rietz, then conductor at the Gewandhaus. After the first greetings, Liszt said to Rietz: "You look all worn out! What is the matter? Are you ill?" "No," answered Rietz, "I am well enough, thank God, only I am very tired; I have been rehearsing at the Gewandhaus all the afternoon, trying to make the orchestra play a dotted triplet, and I can't get them to do it!" "Curious!" rejoined Liszt, "the last thing Ferdinand Hiller said to me this morning in Cologne, as he was seeing me off at the station, was that he had just been having the very same trouble with his orchestra and with the same result!" But the good dotted triplet was only one point in last Saturday's performance of Schumann's work; all three movements were played with a fire, a precision and a well-timed variety of light and shade that left nothing to be desired. It was admirable from beginning to end.

Mr. Busoni's playing of the immortal G major concerto amply fulfilled the expectations aroused by his playing of the opus 111 sonata in Sleeper Hall some weeks ago. A more self-concentrated player, one more devoted to his task, and to nothing else, were hard to imagine. The beauty of his conception of the noble music, the excellent clearness and coherence with which he realized it, his sterling purity and simplicity of style, free as it was of all tricks and affectations, his genuine depth of emotion, and un-failing sense for musical beauty made his performance of the work one of the most enjoyable we have ever heard. Still, with all its excellences and beauties, one could not but feel that a certain something was lacking. There was no academic dryness in Mr. Busoni's playing; it was warm and emotional to a high degree; but it was not highly magnetic. He failed to reveal the full magic of some of Beethoven's wonderful passages, there was not quite the lion's paw there. One admired and enjoyed, but one was not elated and irresistibly carried away. The work done by the orchestra in the accompaniment was not of the best, and in some places Mr. Nikisch seemed to refuse to adapt himself to the pianist's tempo. Mr. Busoni's cadenzas, albeit not quite in character with the work, are brilliant and interesting; they aim at something more than mere display.

The next programme is: Lalo, overture to "Le Roi d'Ys"; Aria: C. M. Loeffler, suite for violin and orchestra, "Les veillées de l'Ukraine"; Songs with pianoforte; Raff, symphony No. 5, in E major ("Lenore") op. 177. Miss Marguerite Hall will be the singer and Mr. C. M. Loeffler the violinist.

DRAMATIC AND MUSICAL.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

An apparently hungry audience, after its two weeks' musical fast, welcomed Conductor Nikisch and his splendid corps of musicians, bearing fresh laurels from New York and Baltimore, where they met with a "pronounced and unequivocal artistic success."

The programme Saturday evening was of an order classical enough to suit the most fastidious, including Haydn's Symphony No. 1 (B. and H.) in E flat, Beethoven's concerto for pianoforte with original cadenzas by the evening's soloist, Mr. Ferruccio B. Busoni, and Schumann's overture, scherzo and finale, op. 50. The Haydn symphony moved with the dignified solemnity of a funeral cortege, as though in honor of some such glorious hero as the devout and profound composer himself. The sacred harmony and religious sentiment expressed were superb, and the exquisite interpolation of the single voice from Franz Kneisel's artistic, plaintive violin came like the pleading of some pure spirit. Beethoven's beautiful sonata introduced another new claimant for excellent work, both as a composer and pianist. Mr. Busoni was warmly welcomed and merited the high standard for excellence so quickly awarded him. He was especially felicitous in his cadenza of the second movement when the trying ordeal of a first appearance had disappeared and he had become thoroughly warmed up to his subject. His execution is very even and fluent, and, although not an extraordinary performer, he impresses one with an idea of his thoroughness as a musician. Schumann's overture, symphonic in character, was admirably interpreted and played with the usual characteristic care and skill.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The programme of the fifth Symphony concert, given Saturday evening in Music Hall, was as follows:

Symphony No. 1 (B and H) in E flat.....Haydn
Concerto for pianoforte No. 4.....Beethoven
Overture, Scherzo and Finale op. 50.....Schumann

It was a great pleasure to hear the Haydn symphony. Its melodies have not grown stale. The art displayed is still surprising. Its sorrows are not morbid. Its joys are wholesome. To be sure it is nothing but music, pure and simple. There is no attempt to portray the emotions of a "storm-tossed soul," or to make music do the task of a sister art. Tunes came into Haydn's head; the "Gradus" of Fux had taught him how best to treat them; and such was his genius that his skilful use of the instruments and his sense of contrasts brought out effects which many modern composers with their gigantic orchestras can not gain, even when they invoke the aid of the army of brass and the batteries of all manner of pulsatiles. It is also a pleasure to add that the symphony was discreetly read by the conductor and carefully played by the orchestra. The trio of the menuetto might have been given with more delicacy, and perhaps there was an occasional over accentuation in the andante, but the performance as a whole was satisfactory. Conductors are too apt to forget that the forte of Haydn, with his orchestra of a limited number of strings, becomes in our day a fortissimo, unless great care is exercised, and so too all nuances are often exaggerated without deliberate intent. The symphony was heartily relished by the large audience, and Mr. Kneisel was applauded for his tasteful delivery of the solo.

The pianist was Mr. Ferruccio B. Busoni. When, at the age of 9, he appeared in 1876 in Vienna as a "wonder-child," the critics praised his playing on account of the evidences of his genuine musical feeling and uncommon memory. The prophecies then made concerning his future have been more than fulfilled, and his name as a composer and pianist is known throughout Europe. His appearance Saturday evening was naturally awaited with more than ordinary curiosity. Experience has shown that it is not fair to pronounce a definite judgement upon a pianist after hearing him in music hall and in a composition in which he is accompanied by an orchestra. The size of the hall forbids the intimate relationship that should exist between player and hearer, and the rivalry between the pianoforte and the orchestra often incites the pianist to force the tone and forget the limitations of his instrument. It is safer to record impressions. But it may be stated at once that Mr. Busoni gave a very thoughtful and a very sincere reading of the concerto. There was not the slightest trace of affectation. Indeed, the modesty of his bearing and the simplicity of his performance won immediately the respect of his hearers. He evidently thought of Beethoven's music when he played and not of the possible effect upon the audience. His phrasing was musician-like, his technique met the severe demands. He played with eminent clearness and precision;

he never offended by extravagance in tone or reading; and there was a delightful sense of repose throughout his performance. At the same time his tone was small, and it seemed to lack warmth. He seemed to stand between the extremes of virility and effeminacy. Thus he avoided to be sure, the reproach of either, but his playing was also without marked individuality—unless the individuality of cold elegance be awarded him. He too seemed to shun the legato, as do many modern players; and his employment of the pedals in running passages was not always to be commended. Too often song passages were unsung. At times the keys beneath the striking fingers clicked metallically. And yet the performance as a whole seemed admirable—as an intellectual feat that commands respectful admiration but does not sway the heart.

Mr. Busoni played his own cadenzas, which were ingenious, but not in sympathy with the concerto itself. The orchestral accompaniment was badly played. It was wanting in precision and in the observance of the degrees of dynamic force; in a word, it was slovenly.

The closing number was played with fire and fury, and neither the performance nor the work itself calls for more extended notice.

The programme of the next concert is as follows: Overture, "Le Roi d'Ys," Lalo; Suite for violin and orchestra by C. M. Loefler, in which the solo part will be played by the composer, and Raff's "Leonore" symphony. Miss Marguerite Hall will sing.

PHILIP HALE.

Sante MUSICAL.

The Symphony Concert.

The programme of last night's Symphony Concert was a well-balanced one, beginning with Haydn's Symphony No. 1 (B. & H.) in E-flat, which was, on the whole, sympathetically read and admirably played, barring a certain lack of essential delicacy now and then. It was followed by Beethoven's Concerto for piano, No. 4, in G. Mr. F. B. Busoni performing the solo part. This artist may be praised with the greatest heartiness and sincerity for his charming reading and beautiful performance of the work. He entered into its spirit with the finest sympathy, and the results were as delightful as they were refreshing. His technique is thorough, his touch true and musical, and his phrasing eminently artistic. Grace and elegance of style, musicianly intelligence and sincere devotion to his task characterized the effort throughout. He has not a large tone, but we have had over much of large tone of late, and the change was a relief. There were a Hummel-like repose, delicacy and fluency, and an absence of all attempt at display in the performance that made it full of pleasure in the hearing. The cadenzas were by Mr. Busoni, but these we did not fancy much, as they are too modern in quality to be in harmony with the work. For the rest, however, we have nothing but commendation. The artist was applauded with great enthusiasm, and received two tumultuous recalls. The work of the orchestra in the performance was lacking in precision and finish; in fact, was reprehensibly rough and ragged. The concert ended with Schumann's Overture, Scherzo, and Finale, op. 50, which was read and played in a manner that made it one of the most satisfying efforts that the orchestra has made this season. The programme of the next concert is: Overture, "Le Roi d'Ys," Lalo; Suite for violin and orchestra, C. M. Loefler, the solo part in which will be played by the composer; and Raff's symphony, "Leonore." Miss Marguerite Hall will also appear as a soloist.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The programme of the fifth Symphony concert, given Saturday evening in Music Hall, was as follows:

Symphony No. 1 (B and H) in E flat..... Haydn
Concerto for pianoforte No. 4..... Beethoven
Overture, Scherzo and Finale op. 50..... Schumann

It was a great pleasure to hear the Haydn symphony. Its melodies have not grown stale. The art displayed is still surprising. Its sorrows are not morbid. Its joys are wholesome. To be sure it is nothing but music, pure and simple. There is no attempt to portray the emotions of a "storm-tossed soul," or to make music do the task of a sister art. Tunes came into Haydn's head; the "Gradus" of Fux had taught him how best to treat them; and such was his genius that his skilful use of the instruments and his sense of contrasts brought out effects which many modern composers with their gigantic orchestras can not gain, even when they invoke the aid of the army of brass and the batteries of all manner of pulsatiles. It is also a pleasure to add that the symphony was discreetly read by the conductor and carefully played by the orchestra. The trio of the minuetto might have been given with more delicacy, and perhaps there was an occasional over accentuation in the andante, but the performance as a whole was satisfactory. Conductors are too apt to forget that the forte of Haydn, with his orchestra of a limited number of strings, becomes in our day a fortissimo, unless great care is exercised, and so too all nuances are often exaggerated without deliberate intent. The symphony was heartily relished by the large audience, and Mr. Kneisel was applauded for his tasteful delivery of the solo.

The pianist was Mr. Ferruccio B. Busoni. When, at the age of 9, he appeared in 1876 in Vienna as a "wonder-child," the critics praised his playing on account of the evidences of his genuine musical feeling and uncommon memory. The prophecies then made concerning his future have been more than fulfilled, and his name as a composer and pianist is known throughout Europe. His appearance Saturday evening was naturally awaited with more than ordinary curiosity. Experience has shown that it is not fair to pronounce a definite judgement upon a pianist after hearing him in music hall and in a composition in which he is accompanied by an orchestra. The size of the hall forbids the intimate relationship that should exist between player and hearer, and the rivalry between the pianoforte and the orchestra often incites the pianist to force the tone and forget the limitations of his instrument. It is safer to record impressions. But it may be stated at once that Mr. Busoni gave a very thoughtful and a very sincere reading of the concerto. There was not the slightest trace of affectation. Indeed, the modesty of his bearing and the simplicity of his performance won immediately the respect of his hearers. He evidently thought of Beethoven's music when he played and not of the possible effect upon the audience. His phrasing was musician-like, his technique met the severe demands. He played with eminent clearness and precis on;

he never offended by extravagance in tone or reading; and there was a delightful sense of repose throughout his performance. At the same time his tone was small, and it seemed to lack warmth. He seemed to stand between the extremes of virility and femininity. Thus he avoided to be sure, the reproach of either, but his playing was also without marked individuality—unless the individuality of cold elegance be awarded him. He too seemed to shun the legato, as do many modern players; and his employment of the pedals in running passages was not always to be commended. Too often song passages were unsung. At times the keys beneath the striking fingers clicked metallically. And yet the performance as a whole seemed admirable—as an intellectual feat that commands respectful admiration but does not sway the heart.

Mr. Busoni played his own cadenzas, which were ingenious, but not in sympathy with the concerto itself. The orchestral accompaniment was badly played. It was wanting in precision and in the observance of the degrees of dynamic force; in a word, it was slovenly.

The closing number was played with fire and fury, and neither the performance nor the work itself calls for more extended notice.

The programme of the next concert is as follows: Overture, "Le Roi d'Ys," Lalo; Suite for violin and orchestra by C. M. Loeffler, in which the solo part will be played by the composer, and Raff's "Leonore" symphony. Miss Marguerite Hall will sing.

PHILIP HALE.

Suite

MUSICAL.

The Symphony Concert.

The programme of last night's Symphony Concert was a well-balanced one, beginning with Haydn's Symphony No. 1 (B. & H.) in E-flat, which was, on the whole, sympathetically read and admirably played, barring a certain lack of essential delicacy now and then. It was followed by Beethoven's Concerto for piano, No. 4, in G, Mr. F. B. Busoni performing the solo part. This artist may be praised with the greatest heartiness and sincerity for his charming reading and beautiful performance of the work. He entered into its spirit with the finest sympathy, and the results were as delightful as they were refreshing. His technique is thorough, his touch true and musical, and his phrasing eminently artistic. Grace and elegance of style, musicianly intelligence and sincere devotion to his task characterized the effort throughout. He has not a large tone, but we have had over much of large tone of late, and the change was a relief. There were a Hummel-like repose, delicacy and fluency, and an absence of all attempt at display in the performance that made it full of pleasure in the hearing. The cadenzas were by Mr. Busoni, but these we did not fancy much, as they are too modern in quality to be in harmony with the work. For the rest, however, we have nothing but commendation. The artist was applauded with great enthusiasm, and received two tumultuous recalls. The work of the orchestra in the performance was lacking in precision and finish; in fact, was reprehensibly rough and ragged. The concert ended with Schumann's Overture, scherzo, and Finale, op. 50, which was read and played in a manner that made it one of the most satisfying efforts that the orchestra has made this season. The programme of the next concert is: Overture, "Le Roi d'Ys," Lalo; Suite for violin and orchestra, C. M. Loeffler, the solo part in which will be played by the composer; and Raff's symphony, "Leonore." Miss Marguerite Hall will also appear as a soloist.

WORLD OF MUSIC.

Echoes of Pleasing Symphony Offerings.

Famous Artists in Long Array—Recitals Past and Coming.

Popular Concerts Tonight—"War in Song"—Gossip and Announcements.

FERRUCCIO BUSONI.

HE programme of the fifth symphony concert was not notable for variety, but the three offerings were evidently thoroughly enjoyed by the large audiences at both afternoon rehearsal and evening concert. Very cordial was the greeting given the conductor and his band on their return from a two weeks' absence, and there was more than the usual warmth in the applause accorded the performance of the programme.

Haydn's symphony No. 1, in E flat, Beethoven's concerto for piano, No. 4, in G major, and Schumann's overture, scherzo and final, op. 50, were the selections.

The symphony was heard for the first time at these concerts, and Mr. Nikisch's reading was received with cordial favor. It is for the most part a sad, dreamy composition, but its sadness is lovey and its dreamy passages delightfully suggest the imaginative and artistic temperament of the master who gave it birth.

Haydn is noted for his fondness for the drum, and this much-abused instrument is given considerable prominence in his E-flat symphony, rather more, by the way, than Mr. Nikisch allowed to appear at yesterday's performance.

If the same restraining influence was often placed upon the brass instruments, symphony audiences would have much cause for expressing their gratitude.

There are four movements, adagio, andante, minuet and final. The opening melody is broad and solemn and suggests the character of the whole work. A sweetly mournful melody pervades the andante, brightened occasionally by quickening the rhythm. The minuet is richly harmonized, and the final is most impressive in its solemn grandeur. The latter movement was finely played, the shading of contrasted themes being particularly good.

A delicious passage for solo violin in the andante was charmingly played by Mr. Kneisel, and received merited recognition from the audience.

Schumann's overture, scherzo and final, which was played as the closing number of the concert, won many tokens of approval. Its cheerfulness was very welcome, and the spirited graceful interpretation given by the band was most commendable. The brilliant scherzo was admirably played, but the vigorous coda of the final might have been given with greater smoothness by the strings.

The Beethoven concerto served to introduce to symphony audiences a pianist of excellent talent who has recently come to Boston, and who is now a professor at the New England Conservatory of Music. He naturally received a very cordial greeting, for Conservatory pupils were numerous in the audience, but the hearty applause which rewarded his playing was by no means undeserved.

Mr. Ferruccio Busoni impresses one as a scholarly musician, thoughtful and conscientious to a degree. His playing is thoroughly enjoyable, and while he may not be entitled to take high rank among some of the pianists who have come here from abroad for concert tours, he is certainly among the best of resident players. There is refreshing wholesomeness in his unaffected manner, and refinement and artistic feeling is evident in his playing. He is also an exact player, something that cannot be truthfully said of many more famous pianists.

His execution is occasionally lacking in strength, but absence of sonorosity is largely compensated for by rare daintiness and sureness of touch, exquisite delicacy of shading and general smoothness of technique. The cadenzas of Mr. Busoni's own composition, which he introduced in the opening and final movements of the Beethoven concerto, gave pleasing evidence of his ability as a composer.

The programme for the next Symphony concert will be as follows: Lalo, overture, "Le Roi d'Ys," first time; C. M. Loeffler, "Les Veillees de l'Ukraine," suite in four movements for violin and orchestra, first time; songs with piano; Raff, symphony, "Lenore," soloists, Miss Marguerite Hall and Mr. C. M. Loeffler.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Symphony Concert.

A new pianist was the chief feature of Saturday's concert. Most wonderful of all, this pianist neither pounds nor attempts to stun the auditor with his brilliancy, but seems to exert himself wholly to give the meaning of the work he is playing, and to sink his own personality into that of the composer. This is what Ferruccio Busoni did at this concert, in the fourth Beethoven concerto, and his playing possessed a delicacy that has long been absent from our concert-rooms, and seemed to bring us back towards the times when legato work was held more musical than thundering fortissimi, when furious double octaves were not the entire end and aim of a pianist's existence. Yet brilliancy was not lacking here either, only it became a means, not an end, and the end of the first movement was as coruscating as the most exacting virtuoso could desire.

But the chief charm of it all lay in the fact that there was no exaggeration either to the loud or the soft side of dynamic effect, and there was sincerity as well as capability in every measure. The orchestral support was very rough, and at times hindered the pianist rather than supported him. There were mistakes in the woodwind and careless attacks in the strings, while the power was by no means graded to the soloist, who was often obliged to forego a delicate touch rather than run the risk of becoming inaudible. The two cadenzas were composed by the pianist, and showed a skilful working-up of the principal themes. They were full of technical difficulties, all of which were bravely overcome; but they were rather too modern to consort well with the classical playing of the rest of the work, and the last one rather slighted Beethoven's request—"La Cadenza sia Corta."

Mr. Nikisch deserved praise for the manner in which he repressed his fiery nature in the reading of the Haydn symphony, and he gave the tempi of this work with an appreciation of the fact that all the early symphonists used the expressions of speed in a more moderate sense than we do at present. Mr. Kneisel's violin obligato won a hearty round of applause, and the audience seemed to show by their general appreciation, that the name of Haydn is still one to conjure with.

The finest orchestral work of the concert, however, and, for the matter of that, of the entire season, was displayed in the "overture, scherzo and finale," that free symphony by Schumann. This was given in noble style and only proves again what has frequently been stated, that when our conductor is good he is "very, very good," and the resemblance to the little girl of the poem might be carried still further. Perhaps a Stuyvesant after a Wouter van Twiller might seem too fiery and restless, but it is never wrong to have a little of the suaviter in modo mingled with the enthusiasm (and sensation) of the modern vein.

The excellent reading and the steady performance of this Schumann work deserves chronicling, particularly as it stood in vivid contrast with the coarse performance of the Beethoven concerto in its orchestral portions. It might perhaps be well, and it is an idea sometimes carried out in Europe, to diminish the number of the performers in the passages where the piano is present, in a concerto using the full orchestra only in tutti passages. Too often, at present, the concertos become a struggle between piano and orchestra rather than a uniting of the two.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

MUSIC.

THE CAMBRIDGE CONCERT.

The first of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts of this season at the Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, was given last evening. The symphony, Beethoven's in F No. 8, was the first number, and it is to be wished that Mr. Nikisch would arrange his programme in Music Hall in a similar manner. The most important number should come first or second before the ear is tired and the mind begins to wander. The performance of the symphony last evening was characterized by swing and vehemence rather than by precision and delicacy; but it was evidently enjoyed by the large audience. The playing of the Prelude, Adagio and Gavotte for strings, arranged from Bach by Bachrich, was more heartily to be praised, however, from the standpoint of the musician. The final orchestral number was Schumann's "Genoveva" Overture.

Mr. Elliot Hubbard, who was the soloist, is well-known and a favorite in our concert halls. His selections last night showed both the strength and the weakness of his art. The aria "An jenem Tag" from "Hans Heiling" demands a baritone of full, rich voice with a firm control of the resources of dramatic expression. Now Mr. Hubbard is an agreeable parlor singer with a voice of limited range and of more than ordinary taste. The aria was beyond his grasp, and when he tried to treat his theme dramatically, the voice was not equal to the task, and spasmodic sforzatos took the place of passion hinted or plainly shown. But in the three songs by Brahms, Franz and Schumann, to which Mr. Nikisch played very pleasing accompaniments, he was more successful and he deserved the sincere recall. For these songs, "Minneted," "Sommer Morgen" and "Fruehlingsnacht," are intended to suggest a mood rather than to affect the hearer objectively. All the songs were sung in German. Perhaps this is an unnecessary statement, for German dominates our concert stage. It is to be hoped that there will some day be a revolt and a return to English, which is after all our national language.

The next concert will be given Thursday, Nov. 12. Mrs. Nordica will sing.

PHILIP HALE.

Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, if correctly reported, said in an interview published in the Globe, that she "confines my own newspaper reading, as does Mr. Nikisch, to New York and German journals, to avoid being disturbed by local criticism, which we think so contradictory as to be of no help, and in any case powerless to inspire more earnest endeavor than personal love for our work already dictates." And yet it is not easy to see how the perusal of New York and German journals can aid Mr. Nikisch in taking advantage of Boston critical opinion regarding his work. As for the "contradictory" aspect of "local criticism" we cannot recall when there has been a closer approach to unanimity in the criticisms on the Symphony concerts than there has been this season, and such unanimity is shown in the censures cast on the performances thus far. Perhaps that accounts for it, and hinc illa lacrymae! Neighbor Verges was a good map, but he would be talking.

WORLD OF MUSIC.

Echoes of Pleasing Symphony Offerings.

Famous Artists in Long Array—Recitals Past and Coming.

Popular Concerts Tonight—"War in Song"—Gossip and Announcements.

FERRUCCIO BUSONI.

more than the usual warmth in the applause accorded the performance of the programme.

Haydn's symphony No. 1, in E flat, Beethoven's concerto for piano, No. 4, in G major, and Schumann's overture, scherzo and final, op. 50, were the selections.

The symphony was heard for the first time at these concerts, and Mr. Nikisch's reading was received with cordial favor. It is for the most part a sad, dreamy composition, but its sadness is lovey and its dreamy passages delightfully suggest the imaginative and artistic temperament of the master who gave it birth.

Haydn is noted for his fondness for the drum, and this much-abused instrument is given considerable prominence in his E-flat symphony, rather more, by the way, than Mr. Nikisch allowed to appear at yesterday's performance.

If the same restraining influence was often placed upon the brass instruments, symphony audiences would have much cause for expressing their gratitude.

There are four movements, adagio, andante, minuet and final. The opening melody is broad and solemn and suggests the character of the whole work. A sweetly mournful melody pervades the andante, brightened occasionally by quickening the rhythm. The minuet is richly harmonized, and the final is most impressive in its solemn grandeur. The latter movement was finely played, the shading of contrasted themes being particularly good.

A delicious passage for solo violin in the andante was charmingly played by Mr. Kneisel, and received merited recognition from the audience.

Schumann's overture, scherzo and final, which was played as the closing number of the concert, won many tokens of approval. Its cheerfulness was very welcome, and the spirited graceful interpretation given by the band was most commendable. The brilliant scherzo was admirably played, but the vigorous coda of the final might have been given with greater smoothness by the strings.

The Beethoven concerto served to introduce to symphony audiences a pianist of excellent talent who has recently come to Boston, and who is now a professor at the New England Conservatory of Music. He naturally received a very cordial greeting, for Conservatory pupils were numerous in the audience, but the hearty applause which rewarded his playing was by no means undeserved.

Mr. Ferruccio Busoni impresses one as a scholarly musician, thoughtful and conscientious to a degree. His playing is thoroughly enjoyable, and while he may not be entitled to take high rank among some of the pianists who have come here from abroad for concert tours, he is certainly among the best of resident players. There is refreshing wholesomeness in his uneffected manner, and refinement and artistic feeling is evident in his playing. He is also an exact player, something that cannot be truthfully said of many more famous pianists.

His execution is occasionally lacking in strength, but absence of sonorosity is largely compensated for by rare daintiness and sureness of touch, exquisite delicacy of shading and general smoothness of technique. The cadenzas of Mr. Busoni's own composition, which he introduced in the opening and final movements of the Beethoven concerto, gave pleasing evidence of his ability as a composer.

The programme for the next Symphony concert will be as follows: Lalo, overture, "Le Roi d'Ys," first time; C. M. Loeffler, "Les Veillees de l'Ukraine," suite in four movements for violin and orchestra, first time; songs with piano; Raff, symphony, "Lenore," soloists, Miss Marguerite Hall and Mr. C. M. Loeffler.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Symphony Concert.

A new pianist was the chief feature of Saturday's concert. Most wonderful of all, this pianist neither pounds nor attempts to stun the auditor with his brilliancy, but seems to exert himself wholly to give the meaning of the work he is playing, and to sink his own personality into that of the composer. This is what Ferruccio Busoni did at this concert, in the fourth Beethoven concerto, and his playing possessed a delicacy that has long been absent from our concert-rooms, and seemed to bring us back towards the times when legato work was held more musical than thundering fortissimi, when furious double octaves were not the entire end and aim of a pianist's existence. Yet brilliancy was not lacking here either, only it became a means, not an end, and the end of the first movement was as coruscating as the most exacting virtuoso could desire.

But the chief charm of it all lay in the fact that there was no exaggeration either to the loud or the soft side of dynamic effect, and there was sincerity as well as capability in every measure. The orchestral support was very rough, and at times hindered the pianist rather than supported him. There were mistakes in the woodwind and careless attacks in the strings, while the power was by no means graded to the soloist, who was often obliged to forego a delicate touch rather than run the risk of becoming inaudible. The two cadenzas were composed by the pianist, and showed a skilful working-up of the principal themes. They were full of technical difficulties, all of which were bravely overcome; but they were rather too modern to consort well with the classical playing of the rest of the work, and the last one rather slighted Beethoven's request—"La Cadenza sia Corta."

Mr. Nikisch deserved praise for the manner in which he repressed his fiery nature in the reading of the Haydn symphony, and he gave the tempi of this work with an appreciation of the fact that all the early symphonists used the expressions of speed in a more moderate sense than we do at present. Mr. Kneisel's violin obligato won a hearty round of applause, and the audience seemed to show by their general appreciation, that the name of Haydn is still one to conjure with.

The finest orchestral work of the concert, however, and, for the matter of that, of the entire season, was displayed in the "overture, scherzo and finale," that free symphony by Schumann. This was given in noble style and only proves again what has frequently been stated, that when our conductor is good he is "very, very good," and the resemblance to the little girl of the poem might be carried still further. Perhaps a Stuyvesant after a Wouter van Twiller might seem too fiery and restless, but it is never wrong to have a little of the suaviter in modo mingled with the enthusiasm (and sensation) of the modern vein.

The excellent reading and the steady performance of this Schumann work deserves chronicling, particularly as it stood in vivid contrast with the coarse performance of the Beethoven concerto in its orchestral portions. It might perhaps be well, and it is an idea sometimes carried out in Europe, to diminish the number of the performers in the passages where the piano is present, in a concerto using the full orchestra only in tutti passages. Too often, at present, the concertos become a struggle between piano and orchestra rather than a uniting of the two.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

MUSIC.

THE CAMBRIDGE CONCERT.

The first of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts of this season at the Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, was given last evening. The symphony, Beethoven's in F No. 8, was the first number, and it is to be wished that Mr. Nikisch would arrange his programme in Music Hall in a similar manner. The most important number should come first or second before the ear is tired and the mind begins to wander. The performance of the symphony last evening was characterized by swing and vehemence rather than by precision and delicacy; but it was evidently enjoyed by the large audience. The playing of the Prelude, Adagio and Gavotte for strings, arranged from Bach by Bachrich, was more heartily to be praised, however, from the standpoint of the musician. The final orchestral number was Schumann's "Genoveva" Overture.

Mr. Eliot Hubbard, who was the soloist, is well-known and a favorite in our concert halls. His selections last night showed both the strength and the weakness of his art. The aria "An jenem Tag" from "Hans Heiling" demands a baritone of full, rich voice with a firm control of the resources of dramatic expression. Now Mr. Hubbard is an agreeable parlor singer with a voice of limited range and of more than ordinary taste. The aria was beyond his grasp, and when he tried to treat his theme dramatically, the voice was not equal to the task, and spasmodic sforzatos took the place of passion hinted or plainly shown. But in the three songs by Brahms, Franz and Schumann, to which Mr. Nikisch played very pleasing accompaniments, he was more successful and he deserved the sincere recall. For these songs, "Minneted," "Sommer Morgen" and "Fruehlingsnacht," are intended to suggest a mood rather than to affect the hearer objectively. All the songs were sung in German. Perhaps this is an unnecessary statement, for German dominates our concert stage. It is to be hoped that there will some day be a revolt and a return to English, which is after all our national language.

The next concert will be given Thursday, Nov. 12. Mrs. Nordica will sing.

PHILIP HALE.

Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, if correctly reported, said in an interview published in the Globe, that she "confines my own newspaper reading, as does Mr. Nikisch, to New York and German journals, to avoid being disturbed by local criticism, which we think so contradictory as to be of no help, and in any case powerless to inspire more earnest endeavor than personal love for our work already dictates." And yet it is not easy to see how the perusal of New York and German journals can aid Mr. Nikisch in taking advantage of Boston critical opinion regarding his work. As for the "contradictory" aspect of "local criticism" we cannot recall when there has been a closer approach to unanimity in the criticisms on the Symphony concerts than there has been this season, and such unanimity is shown in the censures cast on the performances thus far. Perhaps that accounts for it, and hinc ille lachrymæ! Neighbor Verges was a good man, but he would be talking.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

Symphony Concert, Soloist Mr. Ferruccio B. Busoni.

A Season of Italian Opera at the Boston Theatre—The Austrian Juvenile Band's Farewell—Great Interest in the "Artists' Concert"—The Grunfeld Recitals—Philharmonic Matinee.

Still another pianist was introduced to a Boston audience at last evening's symphony concert, this newcomer being Mr. Ferruccio B. Busoni, who has recently become a resident teacher. His appearance was made in a performance of Beethoven's concerto for pianoforte No. 4, in G major, op. 50, to which the player added some original cadenzas. Mr. Busoni is a player who impresses an audience more by the eminent attainments he displays as a musician than by his brilliancy as a pianist. He is evidently well grounded in the science of his chosen profession, and he commanded the respect and admiration of his audience by the well-studied performance he gave of the familiar work. His own embellishments, in the cadenzas, were a further evidence of his skill and good taste, and his merits, both as a player and composer, found a ready recognition.

Mr. Nikisch introduced his programme with a highly interesting performance of the Haydn symphony No. 1 (B. & H.), in B flat, and ended the evening's concert with a very enjoyable interpretation of the overture, scherzo and finale, op. 50, by Schumann.

Next Saturday evening Mr. C. M. Loeffler, the violinist, is to appear, both as composer and soloist, his contribution to the programme consisting of a suite for orchestra, "Les Veillées de l'Ukraine." Miss Marguerite Hall is to sing some songs, and the "Leonore" symphony, by Raff, and Lalo's overture, "Le Roi d'Ys," are to be played.

Music.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The fifth Symphony concert was devoted to absolute music. Haydn, Beethoven, and Schumann were the composers represented, and their works were read for the most part discreetly, and romanticism was not recklessly injected into the classical body to give an unnatural flush and a feverish animation. The Haydn Symphony was the one in E flat No. 1 (B. and H.), and singular to relate, although it is one of the most familiar, and although it has been undoubtedly pounded out for years in this very city by four hands upon the pianoforte, it was given last week for the first time at these concerts. And it gave genuine pleasure to the hearers. Time has not staled its freshness, and indeed parts of the work are eminently modern in spirit and in treatment. Spontaneity and art go hand in hand from the beginning to the end, and the healthy tone of the symphony, even in its darker passages, is refreshing in these days of musical dyspeptic pessimism. It is also a pleasure to add that both in respect of tempo and observance of the nuances, Mr. Nikisch gave a very careful and intelligent reading. The different numbers were much enjoyed by the large audience, and Mr. Kneisel was applauded for his exquisite performance of the violin solo in the andante. That species of unfinished symphony of Schumann known as "Overture, Scherzo, and Finale" was given with great fire, and the rhythmic difficulties were mastered so that—unusual thing in this work—the rhythm did not halt or stagger blindly.

The pianist was Mr. Ferruccio B. Busoni, and he played the solo part of Beethoven's concerto No. 4 in G major. As is perhaps well known in this city, Mr. Busoni was a wonder-child, and he appeared in Vienna as a player and a composer at a tender age. He was then loudly praised, and glowing prophecies were made concerning his future, and these prophecies have certainly been fulfilled; for his recent triumph in composition is fresh in the minds of all. He is now a fellow-townsmen, and a most valuable addition to the role of musicians of this city. Naturally his appearance was eagerly awaited, and in many ways he did not disappoint the high hopes of his hearers. He played with rare thoughtfulness, and with remarkable self-control. He thoroughly subordinated self, and Beethoven's music was apparently the one thing thought of. His playing was distinguished by precision, singular clearness, unostentatious but more than sufficient mastery of mechanism, and modest elegance of bearing. At the same time it must be confessed that there was a lack of that indefinable quality called variously, temperament, or magnetism, or what-you-will, that sways the hearer even against his judgment. But it must be remembered that the size of the hall almost forbids the close approach of player and hearer, and it must be confessed that Mr. Busoni was seriously hampered by the poor accompaniment of the orchestra. Mr. Nikisch constantly differed with the pianist in matters of tempo and degrees of force, and the accompaniment throughout was coarse and unmusical. Mr. Busoni was most heartily applauded and twice recalled.

FIFTH CONCERT.

The programme of the fifth Symphony concert in Music hall, Saturday evening, Nov. 14, was:

Haydn. Symphony No. 1, (B. & H.) in E flat. Adagio; Allegro con spirito.—Andante.—Minuet.—Finale.
Beethoven. Concerto for Pianoforte, No. 4, in G major, op. 50. Allegro moderato.—Andante con moto.—Rondo. (Cadenzas by Busoni)
Schumann. Overture, Scherzo, and Finale. Op. 50.

Soloist: Mr. Ferruccio B. Busoni.

It is always a pleasure, a delightful one, to listen to any of Haydn's symphonies, for they all contain melody and harmony which reach into the hidden recesses of the heart and soul. There are no harsh sevenths or other discordant harmonies to be sensationally resolved, to startle and shatter the nervous system, to drive one into hysterics, but beautiful melodies, quiet, soothing harmonies, that bring with them the comforting, satisfying pleasure one seeks at such concerts, but seldom afforded in modern works. Yes, we love old father Haydn's music, even with the modern, brilliant coloring it receives at the hands of our Boston orchestra.

The orchestra has improved considerably since its first concert, and though there is a wide difference in regard to its interpretations and excellent work, there was not much fault to be found with it at this concert. The difference is mostly in the matter of Conductor Nikisch's readings. That is a matter that cannot easily be satisfactorily settled.

Haydn wrote his symphonies when strings predominated, before the present brass quality was known or demanded. If he had lived in our time, or foreseen to what extent Wagner would carry his tremendous tonal, noisy quality into nearly all his orchestral writings, perhaps, he might have injected more breezy effects into some of his symphonies. But he did not live in our time, did not know of Wagner, Brahms or Strauss, therefore, his music ought not to be forced with modern coloring, because it is unfitted for it, was not constructed for such a purpose. Now the finale of the symphony, though played brilliantly well, was never intended to represent a tragedy, nor a brass band; but such was Mr. Nikisch's interpretation of it. The audience enjoyed the symphony greatly and we heard a number remark, "How beautiful!" and wondering why more such music was not given. Evidently they forgot it takes all kinds to make a world.

The concerto, played by Mr. Busoni, created a favorable impression of his abilities as a pianist. Mr. Busoni is quite a young man, pleasing in appearance, but looks more like a student than a full grown artist. He gave the impression that he was nervous and excited. However, his playing showed no symptoms of excitement or nervousness; on the other hand, there he was perfectly at home. His entire performance, as a carefully studied, well prepared public lesson, was a fine success. Mr. Busoni has well trained fingers; some of his scales were truly delicious, presenting a contrast to his octave playing and chords, which were stiff and hard. He made the concerto musical, and showed himself a musician of good parts in the cadenzas of his own he introduced. Further, the orchestra subordinated itself to him to a greater degree than we have ever heard it before to any soloist. He was heartily applauded and recalled. It was apparent the orchestra took a deep interest in the pianist, for they showed it demonstratively. Thus, Mr. Busoni's path is strewn with flowers, and his success here made secure.

The Schumann overture, scherzo and finale was remarkably well played, showing this composer in one of his happiest moods, the leading of which, by Mr. Nikisch, was admirable in nearly all respects. This concert proved the most satisfactory of any so far this season.

JAMES M. TRACY.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The chief interest of the last Symphony concert attached to the debut of Mr. Ferruccio Busoni, who played Beethoven's third piano concerto to that acceptance which expresses itself in a triple recall. It was a delightful performance, because the artist played for the sake of the music and not to display himself. A little lacking in warmth and sturdiness, Mr. Busoni yet plays with the insight of a musician, the touch of a gentle, considerate man and the taste of a sensitive artist. His technique is rather ample than astonishing, and he evidently inclines to delicate gradations in suggestion rather than to emphasis in assertion. He added in the proper places cadenzas of his own, which were nicely studied and composed, but smacked too much of current styles. The evening began with Haydn's first symphony—better played than any other symphonic number of the season—and ended with the Overture, Scherzo and Finale, of Schumann, which had less commendable treatment than the accompaniment to the concerto, Mr. Nikisch not keeping the men to his beat, nor keeping the beat to the rhythm of the soloist. Tonight Raff's "Leonore" will be the symphony; the overture will be Lalo's "Roi d'Ys," new here, and between these will be played a suite for violin and orchestra, written and to be played by Mr. C. M. Loeffler, who has entitled it "Les Veillées de l'Ukraine." Miss Margaret Hall is also to sing a concert aria and some songs.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

Symphony Concert, Soloist Mr. Ferruccio B. Busoni.

A Season of Italian Opera at the Boston Theatre—The Austrian Juvenile Band's Farewell—Great Interest in the "Artists' Concert"—The Grunfeld Recitals—Philharmonic Matinee.

Still another pianist was introduced to a Boston audience at last evening's symphony concert, this newcomer being Mr. Ferruccio B. Busoni, who has recently become a resident teacher. His appearance was made in a performance of Beethoven's concerto for pianoforte No. 4, in G major, op. 50, to which the player added some original cadenzas. Mr. Busoni is a player who impresses an audience more by the eminent attainments he displays as a musician than by his brilliancy as a pianist. He is evidently well grounded in the science of his chosen profession, and he commanded the respect and admiration of his audience by the well-studied performance he gave of the familiar work. His own embellishments, in the cadenzas, were a further evidence of his skill and good taste, and his merits, both as a player and composer, found a ready recognition.

Mr. Nikisch introduced his programme with a highly interesting performance of the Haydn symphony No. 1 (B. & H.), in B flat, and ended the evening's concert with a very enjoyable interpretation of the overture, scherzo and finale, op. 50, by Schumann.

Next Saturday evening Mr. C. M. Loeffler, the violinist, is to appear, both as composer and soloist, his contribution to the programme consisting of a suite for orchestra, "Les Veillees de l'Ukraine." Miss Marguerite Hall is to sing some songs, and the "Leonore" symphony, by Raff, and Lalo's overture, "Le Roi d'Ys," are to be played.

Music.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The fifth Symphony concert was devoted to absolute music. Haydn, Beethoven, and Schumann were the composers represented, and their works were read for the most part discreetly, and romanticism was not recklessly injected into the classical body to give an unnatural flush and a feverish animation. The Haydn Symphony was the one in E flat No. 1 (B. and H.), and singular to relate, although it is one of the most familiar, and although it has been undoubtedly pounded out for years in this very city by four hands upon the pianoforte, it was given last week for the first time at these concerts. And it gave genuine pleasure to the hearers. Time has not staled its freshness, and indeed parts of the work are eminently modern in spirit and in treatment. Spontaneity and art go hand in hand from the beginning to the end, and the healthy tone of the symphony, even in its darker passages, is refreshing in these days of musical dyspeptic pessimism. It is also a pleasure to add that both in respect of tempo and observance of the nuances, Mr. Nikisch gave a very careful and intelligent reading. The different numbers were much enjoyed by the large audience, and Mr. Kneisel was applauded for his exquisite performance of the violin solo in the andante. That species of unfinished symphony of Schumann known as "Overture, Scherzo, and Finale" was given with great fire, and the rhythmic difficulties were mastered so that—unusual thing in this work—the rhythm did not halt or stagger blindly.

The pianist was Mr. Ferruccio B. Busoni, and he played the solo part of Beethoven's concerto No. 4 in G major. As is perhaps well known in this city, Mr. Busoni was a wonder-child, and he appeared in Vienna as a player and a composer at a tender age. He was then loudly praised, and glowing prophecies were made concerning his future, and these prophecies have certainly been fulfilled; for his recent triumph in composition is fresh in the minds of all. He is now a fellow-townsmen, and a most valuable addition to the role of musicians of this city. Naturally his appearance was eagerly awaited, and in many ways he did not disappoint the high hopes of his hearers. He played with rare thoughtfulness, and with remarkable self-control. He thoroughly subordinated self, and Beethoven's music was apparently the one thing thought of. His playing was distinguished by precision, singular clearness, unostentatious but more than sufficient mastery of mechanism, and modest elegance of bearing. At the same time it must be confessed that there was a lack of that indefinable quality called variously, temperament, or magnetism, or what-you-will, that sways the hearer even against his judgment. But it must be remembered that the size of the hall almost forbids the close approach of player and hearer, and it must be confessed that Mr. Busoni was seriously hampered by the poor accompaniment of the orchestra. Mr. Nikisch constantly differed with the pianist in matters of tempo and degrees of force, and the accompaniment throughout was coarse and unmusical. Mr. Busoni was most heartily applauded and twice recalled.

FIFTH CONCERT.

The programme of the fifth Symphony concert in Music hall, Saturday evening, Nov. 14, was:

Haydn.	Symphony No. 1, (B. & H.) in E flat. Adagio; Allegro con spirito.—Andante.—Minuet.—Finale.
Beethoven.	Concerto for Pianoforte, No. 4, in G major, op. 50. Allegro moderato.—Andante con moto.—Rondo. (Cadenzas by Busoni)
Schumann.	Overture, Scherzo, and Finale. Op. 50.

Soloist: Mr. Ferruccio B. Busoni.

It is always a pleasure, a delightful one, to listen to any of Haydn's symphonies, for they all contain melody and harmony which reach into the hidden recesses of the heart and soul. There are no harsh sevenths or other discordant harmonies to be sensationally resolved, to startle and shatter the nervous system, to drive one into hysterics, but beautiful melodies, quiet, soothing harmonies, that bring with them the comforting, satisfying pleasure one seeks at such concerts, but seldom afforded in modern works. Yes, we love old father Haydn's music, even with the modern, brilliant coloring it receives at the hands of our Boston orchestra.

The orchestra has improved considerably since its first concert, and though there is a wide difference in regard to its interpretations and excellent work, there was not much fault to be found with it at this concert. The difference is mostly in the matter of Conductor Nikisch's readings. That is a matter that cannot easily be satisfactorily settled.

Haydn wrote his symphonies when strings predominated, before the present brass quality was known or demanded. If he had lived in our time, or foreseen to what extent Wagner would carry his tremendous tonal, noisy quality into nearly all his orchestral writings, perhaps, he might have injected more breezy effects into some of his symphonies. But he did not live in our time, did not know of Wagner, Brahms or Strauss, therefore, his music ought not to be forced with modern coloring, because it is unfitted for it, was not constructed for such a purpose. Now the finale of the symphony, though played brilliantly well, was never intended to represent a tragedy, nor a brass band; but such was Mr. Nikisch's interpretation of it. The audience enjoyed the symphony greatly and we heard a number remark, "How beautiful!" and wondering why more such music was not given. Evidently they forgot it takes all kinds to make a world.

The concerto, played by Mr. Busoni, created a favorable impression of his abilities as a pianist. Mr. Busoni is quite a young man, pleasing in appearance, but looks more like a student than a full grown artist. He gave the impression that he was nervous and excited. However, his playing showed no symptoms of excitement or nervousness; on the other hand, there he was perfectly at home. His entire performance, as a carefully studied, well prepared public lesson, was a fine success. Mr. Busoni has well trained fingers; some of his scales were truly delicious, presenting a contrast to his octave playing and chords, which were stiff and hard. He made the concerto musical, and showed himself a musician of good parts in the cadenzas of his own he introduced. Further, the orchestra subordinated itself to him to a greater degree than we have ever heard it before to any soloist. He was heartily applauded and recalled. It was apparent the orchestra took a deep interest in the pianist, for they showed it demonstratively. Thus, Mr. Busoni's path is strewn with flowers, and his success here made secure.

The Schumann overture, scherzo and finale was remarkably well played, showing this composer in one of his happiest moods, the leading of which, by Mr. Nikisch, was admirable in nearly all respects. This concert proved the most satisfactory of any so far this season.

JAMES M. TRACY.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The chief interest of the last Symphony concert attached to the debut of Mr. Ferruccio Busoni, who played Beethoven's third piano concerto to that acceptance which expresses itself in a triple recall. It was a delightful performance, because the artist played for the sake of the music and not to display himself. A little lacking in warmth and sturdiness, Mr. Busoni yet plays with the insight of a musician, the touch of a gentle, considerate man and the taste of a sensitive artist. His technique is rather ample than astonishing, and he evidently inclines to delicate gradations in suggestion rather than to emphasis in assertion. He added in the proper places cadenzas of his own, which were nicely studied and composed, but smacked too much of current styles. The evening began with Haydn's first symphony—better played than any other symphonic number of the season—and ended with the Overture, Scherzo and Finale, of Schumann, which had less commendable treatment than the accompaniment to the concerto, Mr. Nikisch not keeping the men to his beat, nor keeping the beat to the rhythm of the soloist. Tonight Raff's "Leonore" will be the symphony; the overture will be Lalo's "Roi d'Ys," new here, and between these will be played a suite for violin and orchestra, written and to be played by Mr. C. M. Loeffler, who has entitled it "Les Veillees de l'Ukraine." Miss Margaret Hall is also to sing a concert aria and some songs.

A Protest from Cleveland.

NOVEMBER 2, 1891.

Editors Musical Courier:

I READ with interest your recent editorial concerning the appropriation of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's title by the "Orchestral Club," and heartily agreed with your idea that there should be something to prevent such thieving. I was more than ever convinced of this when I read the inclosed advertisement in our two principal newspapers yesterday morning. It speaks for itself, and one glance at it is enough for a great many people to buy a ticket, only to find they have been duped by a misleading title. Their advertising is plainly on the same line as their plagiarism of the name.

I do not wish to take up your space, as I am not a regular correspondent, but I would like to say a word about the first concert of the season of the Philharmonic Orchestra. It was decided to work on a somewhat larger scale this year; to give concerts in Music Hall and engage some noted soloist to assist at each concert. The opening was on last Tuesday evening, the 27th ult., the enlarged orchestra (seventy members) being assisted by Fursch-Madi.

While the audience was not as large as was desired, it was an appreciative one and made up in enthusiasm what it lacked in numbers. Furthermore, it remained seated until the close of the last number, and even applauded that number heartily, a very rare procedure with Cleveland concert goers. The orchestra was in excellent condition. The handling of the widely varying numbers of the opening program showed to a marked degree the advancement they have made under the careful and painstaking, but ever progressive leadership of Emil Ring. Of course it shows room for improvement; that would be expected. There was noticeable at times a want of unity among the woodwinds; also now and then a tendency of the other parts to overpower the strings. But this was not to such an extent that rendered it disagreeable—only a reminder of what may be expected to be remedied in the future. I will not attempt to mention any particular numbers of the program further than to say that probably the best all round work was on the Schubert symphony. Mascagni's intermezzo was very well played with organ accompaniment, and, it is hardly necessary to say, was redemanded.

Fursch-Madi was very well received and pleased the audience. I have heard a few complain because she did not respond to encores, but this is perhaps due to a habit we have fallen into.

Emil Ring conducted the whole orchestral program without score or notes of any kind, and he, like the orchestra, was at his best.

The general verdict was that the concert was the best the Philharmonic Orchestra has yet given in Cleveland.

The handsome face and exquisite playing of John Marquardt are absent, however.

FIRST CONCERT IN STAR COURSE, SEASON 1891
AND 1892.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

Orchestral Club, Mr. Arthur Laseur, violoncello; Mons. Louis Kapp, first violin; Mr. Frederick E. Hahn, second violin; Mons. Fr. Rucquoy, flute; Angermeunde, contra bass; Herman Burkhardt, violin and cornet; Miss Laura Burnham, Prima Donna Soprano; Mr. John Lloyd, Tenor. General admission, 25c., 50c. and $1. Get season tickets at B. Dreher's Sons', Arcade.

[The above is an exact copy of the advertisement sent to us by our correspondent. It does indeed "speak for itself."—EDS. MUSICAL COURIER.]

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1891-92.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

VI. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 21, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

LALO.	OVERTURE. "Le Roi d'Ys." (First time in Boston).
HENSOHEL.	BALLAD. "There was an Ancient King." for CONTRALTO and ORCHESTRA. (First time in Boston.)
C. M. LOEFFLER.	SUITE in four movements for VIOLIN and ORCHESTRA. "Les Veillées de l'Ukraine." Introduction and Pastorale.—Rune.—Dumka.—Finale. (First time.)
SCHUBERT.	SONGS with PIANO. a) LIEBESBOTSCHAFT. b) AN DIE LEYER. c) RASTLOSE LIEBE.
RAFF.	SYMPHONY in E. "Lenore." No. 5, op. 177. LOVE'S HAPPINESS. I. Allegro. SEPARATION. II. Andante quasi Larghetto. REUNION IN DEATH. III. March tempo. IV. Introduction and Ballad. (Allegro.) (After G. Buerger's "Lenore.")

SOLOISTS:

MISS MARGUERITE HALL.

MR. C. M. LOEFFLER.

The Piano used is a Steinway.

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

Rev. Eve. Trans. 11/23/91

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the sixth concert was:

Lalo: Overture to "Le Roi d'Ys."
Henschel: Ballad, "There was an ancient king," for contralto and orchestra.
Loeffler: Suite, "Des Veillées de l'Ukraine," for violin and orchestra.

Schubert: Songs with pianoforte:

Liebesbotschaft.

An die Leyer.

Rastlose Liebe.

Raff: Symphony No. 5, in E major, "Lenore," Op. 177.

Miss Marguerite Hall was the singer, and Mr. C. M.
Loeffler the violinist.

Lalo's "Roi d'Ys" overture is a brilliant piece of writing, gorgeously scored; when one has said this one has said about all. It was finely played. Mr. Loeffler's suite shows us this excellent young artist in a new light. The work is in four movements: Introduction and Pastoral; Rune; Dumka; Finale. The thematic material is Russian, perhaps in origin, certainly in character, throughout; yet it is noticeable that the characteristic Slavonic accent of the music is somewhat toned down, and cured of its savagery. Mr. Loeffler's work shows what an advantage it is to a composer, no matter how poetic and imaginative his spirit may be, to have a care to express himself in a coherent musical form. The music gains thereby, just as the most fanciful poetry gains from perfection of rhyme and rhythm. This suite is remarkable, both for the inherent charm of its themes and the excellence of its musical workmanship. The handling of the orchestra, too, is admirable, although the young composer may seem at moments a little by the head with the orchestral riches at his command, and rather lavish in his coloring. The solo part might easily have been given more prominence by being shown against a more neutral background. Still one can hardly quarrel with a composer-virtuoso for voluntary self-effacement. Mr. Loeffler played admirably as ever, and was as admirably seconded by the orchestra. Composition and performance were equally, and highly, enjoyable. Bravissimo!

Raff's "Lenore" was splendidly played. The great length of this symphony, coupled with its not very conspicuous strength, makes it rather a large dose to take at the end of an already long programme. But what could be done for it, under the circumstances, was done by Mr. Nikisch and the orchestra.

Mr. Henschel's ballad made a rather indeterminate impression. One could feel it to be essentially musical, with now and then a dramatic touch; but, upon the whole, it seemed lacking in true effectiveness. Neither did Miss Hall's singing add much life to it. But she recouped herself wonderfully in the Schubert songs. We had almost given up all hope of hearing such singing of Schubert, and were completely carried away. That is true Lieder-singing! True and warm in sentiment, and always lyric in style.

The next programme is: Gluck, overture to "Iphigénie en Aulide"; Brahms, violin concerto in D, op. 77; Schubert, symphony in C. Mr. Adolph Brodsky will be the violinist.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

11/22/91

The Symphony Concert---Novelties on the Programme.

Miss Marguerite Hall and Mr. C. M.

Loeffler the Soloists—Great Success

The symphony concert programme of last evening fairly shone with new compositions, and Conductor Nikisch gave his audience an abundance of subjects for thought and reflection.

After affording a first hearing of Lalo's bright, tuneful and fascinating overture to "Le Roi d'Ys," a composition fully realizing all expectations, Miss Marguerite Hall was introduced in a ballad, "There Was an Ancient King," written by Georg Henschel for contralto and orchestra.

Miss Hall's singing in local concerts two seasons ago was so enjoyable that her reappearance promised to make a pleasant feature of the evening's programme, and, although this promise was not fully realized, the singer had good cause for satisfaction in the recognition her merits gained. Mr. Henschel's work demands larger and broader treatment than Miss Hall's present abilities make possible for her, but she sung the charming ballad with such taste and expression that her audience was justified in giving the applause which followed this number.

Mr. Loeffler, who shares the leading desk of the orchestra with Mr. Kneisel, was then heard in his own suite for violin and orchestra, "Les Veillées de l'Ukraine." The work is in four movements, the themes of which gave evidences of being founded upon the Russian folk songs so little known and so fascinating in their quaint beauty when they are known. Though the suite makes the fourth important work completed by Mr. Loeffler, its performance made his introduction to a Boston audience as a composer, and it is pleasant to say that he gained as favorable an indorsement for his suite as he had formerly received in these concerts as a player. The solo instrument is not given great prominence, save in the finale, but Mr. Loeffler's playing was at all times enjoyable, and in the final movement his brilliant performance of the difficult passages for the solo instrument gave new and conclusive evidence of his skill as a virtuoso.

Miss Hall was heard again at the piano, with Mr. Nikisch as accompanist, where she sang Schubert's "Liebesbotschaft," "An die Leyer," and "Rastlose Liebe," in a very pleasing fashion, winning a great deal of applause and a recall.

Mr. Nikisch ended his programme with a highly interesting performance of Raff's "Lenore" symphony, in which the tone pictures were given in a way to delight the audience.

Next Saturday the soloist is to be Mr. Adolph Brodsky, the new leading violin of the Damrosch orchestra, and the programme will be Gluck's overture, "Iphigénie en Aulis" (Wagner's ending); Brahms' concerto for violin in D major, op. 77, and Schubert's symphony in C major.

The sixth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall on the evening of the 21st inst., presented several novelties. First was Lalo's overture to "Le Roi d'Ys," a thoroughly unconventional work, unquestionably strong and effective, but not easy to understand on a single hearing. It is carefully written throughout, and the labor that has been bestowed on it obtrudes itself constantly. The opening portions of the overture are no doubt expressive of the gloomy color of the story they illustrate, and heard before the opera, may prepare the hearer for what is to come; but heard in the concert-room as music pure and simple, they say nothing edifying. There are, however, some exquisite moments of beauty in the work, notably the lovely cello theme, which is appealingly tender and refined. The orchestration is rich, and the skill of a master is shown in the discreet and impressive use of tone color. It was well played, and met with a favorable reception. Another novelty was Mr. C. M. Loeffler's "Les Vieilles de l'Ukraine," a suite for violin and orchestra, and inspired by some stories by the eccentric and debased Russian author Gogol. There are four movements, the first an introduction and pastorate, easy in its melodic flow, delightful in its rhythmic devices, inspiring in its graceful swing, and musicianlike in all things. It is, perhaps, spun out to somewhat to great a length; in fact, with the exception of the finale, the various movements would be benefited by compression. The second and third movements, though abundant in fine feeling, charming harmonies, and admirable instrumental color are, in their general color, too much alike, and it must be confessed that they result in producing the effect of monotony, despite the beauties in which they abound. The finale is full of life, and brings the whole to an inspiring conclusion. From beginning to end Mr. Loeffler has shown unerring artistic taste, and the work gives him a prominent place among the best of our young resident composers. It is the achievement of a thorough musician, and the same refined judgment that is manifested in the rest of the suite is shown in the writing of the solo part, which is not given up to deliberate virtuoso display, but takes its place in preserving the due balance of the whole. This is a rare virtue in a soloist who composes his own music, and deserves the heartiest recognition. There is one important thing that still remains to be mentioned, and that is the inaudibility of the solo part through a great part of the performance. Mr. Loeffler is not lacking in a fine and searching violin tone, as has been amply evidenced by his playing on Music Hall stage; but on this occasion it did not make itself felt. It is true that the orchestra steadily played over-loud, but the fault is not there. It is to be found in the orchestration, and is to be attributed to the persistent use of the oboe when the solo part is written on the upper part of the violin, and to the equally persistent use of the horn when the solo lies on the lower notes of the violin. In both cases the wind instruments are so closely in sympathy with the violin that they absorb and neutralize its tones when they are kept on the same plane with it, and it is peculiar that nearly all through the work the oboe has been made to prevail when the violin is playing what may be called oboe tones, and the horn when the violin is playing what may in turn be called horn tones. A revision of the score in this respect would, we are sure, restore to the violin the prominence it should maintain, and the work would profit accordingly. The solo part, it will be taken for granted, was played with that elegant finish, warmth of feeling and charm of style that make Mr. Loeffler's performances always interesting and delightful. The artist was welcomed with cordial heartiness, and at the end of the suite was greeted with enthusiastic applause and impetuously recalled. The concert ended with Raff's "Lenore" symphony, which was, on the whole, sympathetically read and acceptably played. Miss Marguerite Hall appeared as a soloist and sang a setting for voice and orchestra of Heine's poem, "There was an Ancient King," by Mr. Georg Henschel. Of the music there is not much to be said in the way of praise. The simple verses are treated in a pretentious style wholly out of keeping with their simple character, and the effect of the work was dull, dry and unimpressive. There was over much of heavy orchestration, and not enough of genuine feeling. Miss Hall's voice is not of an order to impart force and interest to the ballad and a failure was the result. Later in the evening she sang a group of songs by Schubert, and here again her selection was not intelligent, for the songs are among the least pleasing of their composer's efforts. In them, however, she was heard to slightly better advantage, though her voice is hardly of the calibre to produce any striking effect in a large concert room.

MUSIC.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The programme of the sixth Symphony concert, given in Music Hall, Saturday evening, was as follows:

- Overture, "Le Roi d'Ys".....Lalo
(First time in Boston.)
"There Was an Ancient King".....Henschel
(First time in Boston.)
"Les Vieilles de l'Ukraine".....Loeffler
(First time.)
(a) Liebesbotschaft }.....Schubert
(b) An die Leier }
(c) Rastlose Liebe }
Symphony in E "Lenore".....Raff

It will be seen by a glance that the programme was rich in novelties. It is well to gratify legitimate musical curiosity, to give our audiences an opportunity of hearing works that excite attention in foreign cities, to encourage composers of our own town when it can be done with safety. As to the intrinsic value of the compositions that were heard last week for the first time,—that is another matter. And although it may seem ungracious, there is no denying the fact that the concert was too long.

Lalo, a composer of strong convictions, won success with exceeding difficulty. The history of the composition and production of "Le Roi d'Ys" is a long story of the composer's labor, independence, trials and tribulations. He finally conquered, and since the opera was brought out at the Opéra-Comique in 1888 it has had at least 130 representations in Paris. Before it gained the stage extracts were heard in the concert halls of Paris and the overture became popular. The concert version of this overture, it is said, is more elaborate than the one that now serves as a prelude to the opera, but the clarinet solo, the cello phrase, and the finale are practically unchanged. It seems doubtful whether the overture of Saturday evening will be a favorite concert number. Detached from the opera that follows, it must be viewed as pure music without suggestion of textual programme. The great majority of the audience were unacquainted with the plot of the libretto, for the story told in the programme book is the old legend, and the story of the opera is a different one. Therefore the themes did not suggest characters or situations. An opera overture is apt to suffer dramatically when played as a concert number. To be sure, there are a few exceptions, but even the "Freischuetz" is made more glorious by its hints at Samiel and Agathe, and the Prelude to Carmen is an epitome of the opera—only the operas must be first known before the overtures can be fully appreciated. It would then be unfair to judge of the merits of the overture of "Le Roi d'Ys" from the dramatic standpoint. As music pure and simple it seems to be a very carefully constructed work, laboriously thought out and deliberately built up. The themes are sombre and the coloring of the thematic development is dark. Strength is more noticeable than brilliancy, although the cello episode and the finale are very effective. It was finely played and well received. Mr. C. M. Loeffler, the well-known and deservedly esteemed violinist, studied composition in Berlin and Paris, and his works are as yet in manuscript. The suite played last week shows that his studies were neither perfunctory nor idle. It is called after a collection of stories by Gogol, in which tales of Little Russia are told, grave and gay, and even in the gaiety, sadness enters. The wanderings of the stories are reflected in the music of Mr. Loeffler, for the suite is undeniably diffuse. It perplexes also in this; it is full of contrasts which do not contrast; there is also much thematic treatment that singularly enough does not strike the bearer as thematic development. For instance, the first movement abounds in most musician-like devices to vary rhythm and harmony, but it is so elaborate in its detail that the whole barely escapes the reproach of monotony. The two numbers that follow are unlike and yet they are alike, and the contrasts are so subtly devised that they pass unnoticed, especially as there is nearly the same character in the themes and nearly the same orchestral color throughout the three movements. With the finale comes a welcome change. There are delightful episodes throughout the work and many traces of the skilled musician. With its rhythmic shiftings, its very diffuseness, its predominating gray, its jollity which is momentary and its melancholy which is tinged with irony, it is very close to the spirit of Gogol. Mr. Loeffler has also shown himself the conscientious musician in the writing of the solo violin part. He has dismissed from his mind the cheap glories of virtuosity, and the solo is a necessary part of the whole. It is never obtrusive and the player must think of the composer and not merely of himself. It is needless to add that the solo part was admirably played and the accompaniment of the orchestra was sympathetic. Mr. Loeffler was most warmly welcomed when he stood upon the stage and very heartily applauded after the finale.

Such romantic symphonies as the "Lenore" appeal strongly to the musical nature of Mr. Nikisch, and in leading them he is generally successful. And so though exceptions might have been taken here and there to readings, and though the performance was not technically perfect, still the symphony was given with such passion and with such an appreciation of its beauties, that it would be perhaps captious to dwell upon the slight blemishes. I have spoken of the beauties of the work which are many; alas, there are also waste places, tedious digressions, cheap effects and open vulgarity. Still it will remain as a favorable example of the writings of a man of no ordinary degree of talent.

Miss Marguerite Hall sang Henschel's setting of Heine's simple and pathetic verses, which have already tempted Grieg and Rubinstein. Henschel's version for contralto and orchestra is ambitious and ineffective. Bombastic platitudes drive out dramatic directness and the intense simplicity of genuine passion. Nor has Miss Hall the voice and breadth of style to ennoble the intrinsically commonplace. Her other songs, though they are not among the more interesting of Schubert's muse, gave her a better opportunity. But Miss Hall is not at home in a room of the size of Music Hall.

The programme of the next concert is as follows: Gluck's overture to "Iphigenie en Aulis"; Brahms' concerto for violin in D major; and Schubert's C major symphony. Mr. Brodsky will be the violinist.

PHILIP HALE.

THE SYMPHONIES.

Sunday Times

SIXTH CONCERT.

The programme of the sixth Symphony concert in Music hall Saturday evening, Nov. 21 was:

- Lalo Overture, "Le Roi d'Ys."
(First time in Boston).
Henschel. Ballad, "There was an Ancient King," for contralto and orchestra.
(First time in Boston).
C. M. Loeffler. Suite in four movements for Violin and orchestra, "Les Veillées de l'Ukraine." Introduction and Pastorale.—Rune.—Dumka.—Finale.
(First time.)
Schubert. Songs with Piano.
a) Liebesbotschaft.
b) An die Leyer.
c) Rastlose Liebe.
Raff. Symphony in E. "Lenore."
No. 5, op. 177.
Love's Happiness. I. Allegro.
II. Andante quasi Larghetto.
Separation. III. March tempo.
Reunion in Death. IV. Introduction and Ballad. (Allegro.)
(After G. Buerger's "Lenore.")
Soloists: Miss Marguerite Hall, Mr. C. M. Loeffler.

This new overture, "Le Roi d'Ys," is fully as sensational as the story upon which it is founded. Mr. Lalo, if this overture is an earnest of his writing, certainly is a vigorous one. The explanatory notes of the programme tell us Lalo has no academical education, but this overture shows him to have been a good student, and that Wagner has been his master. here are several passages in the overture which, if not exactly like some in Tannhauser, are strongly remindful of them. The overture is brilliant throughout and while interesting to some, is extremely tiresome to others, because of too much noise and therefore confusing. As a new composition it may be hailed with pleasure as something to think about.

Mr. Henschel's song, as sung by Miss Hall, failed to add much pleasure or satisfaction. The song itself is doleful, and Miss Hall made it still more so. Miss Hall is an attractive young lady, has had the advantage of the best instruction, is, no doubt, a successful drawing-room singer, but Music hall is entirely unsuited to her style and voice. The orchestra, too, entirely overpowered her best efforts, and she suffered in consequence. Miss Hall was richly dressed.

The suite in four movements for violin by Mr. Loeffler may be considered fairly successful, so far as orchestral writing is concerned, but viewed as a violin solo it possesses no distinctive characteristic features. Mr. Loeffler is a good musician, a careful, painstaking but effeminate violinist; a modest gentleman and an especial favorite with all classes of Boston's musicians.

The three Schubert songs sang by Miss Hall call for no particular mention. She sang them in an acceptable manner. Mr. Nikisch accompanied her in his incomparable way on the piano.

The Raff symphony which closed the evening's programmes has been played better here several times. The Thomas orchestra, which, we believe, was the first to play it in Boston, did it far better than it was done Saturday evening. The march, as a whole, was played much too loud; there was wanting that fine quality of pianissimo, with its crescendo and diminuendo effects given it when Mr. Gericke had command over this orchestra. They were conspicuously absent at this concert. The rest of the symphony, especially the last movement, was well played.

JAMES M. TRACY.

DRAMATIC AND MUSICAL.

Journal

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

An apparently hungry audience, after its two weeks' musical fast, welcomed Conductor Nikisch and his splendid corps of musicians, bearing fresh laurels from New York and Baltimore, where they met with a "pronounced and unequivocal artistic success."

The programme Saturday evening was of an order classical enough to suit the most fastidious, including Haydn's Symphony No. 1 (B. and H.) in E flat, Beethoven's concerto for pianoforte with original cadenzas by the evening's soloist, Mr. Ferruccio B. Busoni, and Schumann's overture, scherzo and finale, op. 50. The Haydn symphony moved with the dignified solemnity of a funeral cortege, as though in honor of some such glorious hero as the devout and profound composer himself. The sacred harmony and religious sentiment expressed were superb, and the exquisite interpolation of the single voice from Franz Kneisel's artistic, plaintive violin came like the pleading of some pure spirit. Beethoven's beautiful sonata introduced another new claimant for excellent work, both as a composer and pianist. Mr. Busoni was warmly welcomed and merited the high standard for excellence so quickly awarded him. He was especially felicitous in his cadenza of the second movement when the trying ordeal of a first appearance had disappeared and he had become thoroughly warmed up to his subject. His execution is very even and fluent, and, although not an extraordinary performer, he impresses one with an idea of his thoroughness as a musician. Schumann's overture, symphonic in character, was admirably interpreted and played with the usual characteristic care and skill.

A very interesting programme is announced for Nov. 21, in which Miss Marguerite Hall appears as vocal soloist and Mr. C. M. Loeffler as composer of a suite for violin and orchestra, entitled "Les Veillées de l'Ukraine," as well as soloist. Other numbers are Lalo's overture "Le Roi d'Ys," and Raff's "Leonore."

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Symphony Concert.

It was a long programme, that of Saturday night, but so varied that no sense of ennui could have been felt by any catholic-minded auditor. The overture to Lalo's "Roi d'Ys" was an interesting piece of scoring, and its sharp contrasts and fiery moods suited excellently to Mr. Nikisch's brilliancy of reading. It had a superabundance of brass and kettledrum, against which the very dainty touches of woodwind harmony came like flowers in a desert. It was pleasant to hear the horn played like a horn again, and not in the trombone-like manner of recent concerts. The boast has been made that our conductor never reads a Boston criticism, but to all appearances the musicians of the orchestra do—and sometimes profit by it, since no one seated in an orchestra can judge of the effects he produces, so well as an auditor seated at a reasonable distance from the centre of disturbance. The cello obligato in this overture was beautifully played by Mr. Schroeder.

Miss Marguerite Hall has not been heard in our concert halls since she became a London favorite. Her voice is sweet and sympathetic, but scarcely competent to cope with an entire orchestra, and therefore her group of Schubert lieder, with piano accompaniment, was much better than the rather pretentious setting of "Der Alte Koenig" by Henschel. One cannot help preferring the simpler legendary setting by Grieg. The charming personality of the singer, and her direct and unaffected style, won the heartiest applause, which was certainly deserved in the Schubert songs. But when Mr. Loeffler appeared to play the solo part in his own latest composition there was what is generally termed "an ovation." And the violinist immediately set himself to earning this advance payment of appreciation. To speak of his performance first;—it was perfect in almost every detail, sometimes lacking a little in force, but even this was not to be said of the broad G string passages of the second movement, while the end was scintillating and dashing in the highest degree.

As a composition the work seemed fluent and at times very characteristic, but a trifle too long for what it had to say. There was a lack of thematic material after the second movement, and the second and third movements were not in much contrast with each other. The first two movements are the best part of the work, although the folk-dance vein of the finale also calls for praise. The beginning of the composition (I had almost forgotten to state that its title is "Les Veillées de l'Ukraine") is excellent, and the folk-music element is strongly represented, as it ought to be, around a Ukrainian fireside. Kettledrums at the very first bar hold the attention, and the pastoral musette, which is of course apporportioned to the oboe, is very dainty and in keeping with the spirit of the scene.

Altogether the composer shows considerable grace and ease in his treatment of the woodwind passages. The second movement is a Rune. "Runes are the Scandinavian alphabet," says Carlyle in his "Hero Worship," but they are also more; they are the dark and mysterious legends that have come down even from the ancient days of Odin; less majestic than the Saga, they are impressive in a different manner, as a ghost story differs from an epic. The oboe was again prominent here, and its phrases were imitated on the solo violin—a pleasant conversation, but one missed the sombre tints with which a Grieg would have invested the legend.

The third movement was a Dumka, the dignified northern dance. It would have been better to have had either the Russian Kamarinskaia or the Bohemian Furiant here to contrast with the contemplative character of what had preceded. The union introduction was characteristic enough, and the passages in harmonics were brilliant, and brilliantly played, yet this movement could be shortened to advantage. The fire and brío of the last movement made some amends, and one can congratulate the composer on having added a new work to the repertoire, and the violinist on having performed his own composition so well.

Now came the end of the concert with Raff's "Lenore" symphony. If "Im Walde" is Raff's best symphony, "Lenore" is certainly his most popular one, and the public never wearies of hearing the march which bears such a curious resemblance to one of Franz Lachner's. The symphony was the best piece of work that the orchestra have done this season; there was fire and "Schwung" in every measure, and for once one can compliment the precision and shading. The flutist deserves a word of especial commendation for smooth work in the second movement. The great crescendo and diminuendo of the march could scarcely have been improved upon, and the spectral ride of the finale was all that heart could wish.

Yet it is not so great as that other ride of ghosts, in the finale of the "Im Walde" symphony, and, for the matter of that, no supernatural horse-flesh will ever seem wonderful in music after the whinneyings of Wagner's "Ride of the Walkyries," while in the domain of downright terror, Berlioz's "Ride to Hades" must always take the horrific palm. To be sure, the "Lenore" is not the most difficult or subtle work in the world to play, but the statement must be made that it was played magnificently.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

Musical Note.

Owing to advertising pressure on our columns, our notice of last night's Symphony Concert is deferred until next week. Mr. C. M. Loeffler's Suite for the violin was the principal point of interest in the concert, and showed Mr. Loeffler in not only his familiar aspect as a delightful artist, but as a gifted and able composer. This work, and the other novelties on the programme, Lalo's overture "Le Roi d'Ys," and a ballad by Mr. Georg Henschel, for contralto and orchestra, demand more consideration than we have the space to give them in this issue.

THE SYMPHONIES.

Sunday Times

SIXTH CONCERT.

The programme of the sixth Symphony concert in Music hall Saturday evening, Nov. 21 was:

- Lalo Overture. "Le Roi d'Ys."
(First time in Boston).
Henschel. Ballad. "There was an Ancient King," for contralto and orchestra.
(First time in Boston).
C. M. Loeffler. Suite in four movements for Violin and orchestra. "Les Veillées de l'Ukraine." Introduction and Pastorale.—Rune.—Dumka.—Finale.
(First time.)
Schubert. Songs with Piano.
a) Liebesbotschaft.
b) An die Leyer.
c) Rastlose Liebe.
Raff. Symphony in E. "Lenore."
No. 5, op. 177.
Love's Happiness. I. Allegro.
II. Andante quasi Larghetto.
Separation. III. March tempo.
Reunion in Death. IV. Introduction and Ballad. (Allegro.)
(After G. Buerger's "Lenore.")
Soloists: Miss Marguerite Hall, Mr. C. M. Loeffler.

This new overture, "Le Roi d'Ys," is fully as sensational as the story upon which it is founded. Mr. Lalo, if this overture is an earnest of his writing, certainly is a vigorous one. The explanatory notes of the programme tell us Lalo has no academical education, but this overture shows him to have been a good student, and that Wagner has been his master. here are several passages in the overture which, if not exactly like some in Tannhauser, are strongly remindful of them. The overture is brilliant throughout and while interesting to some, is extremely tiresome to others, because of too much noise and therefore confusing. As a new composition it may be hailed with pleasure as something to think about.

Mr. Henschel's song, as sung by Miss Hall, failed to add much pleasure or satisfaction. The song itself is doleful, and Miss Hall made it still more so. Miss Hall is an attractive young lady, has had the advantage of the best instruction, is, no doubt, a successful drawing-room singer, but Music hall is entirely unsuited to her style and voice. The orchestra, too, entirely overpowered her best efforts, and she suffered in consequence. Miss Hall was richly dressed.

The suite in four movements for violin by Mr. Loeffler may be considered fairly successful, so far as orchestral writing is concerned, but viewed as a violin solo it possesses no distinctive characteristic features. Mr. Loeffler is a good musician, a careful, painstaking but effeminate violinist; a modest gentleman and an especial favorite with all classes of Boston's musicians.

The three Schubert songs sung by Miss Hall call for no particular mention. She sang them in an acceptable manner. Mr. Nikisch accompanied her in his incomparable way on the piano.

The Raff symphony which closed the evening's programmes has been played better here several times. The Thomas orchestra, which, we believe, was the first to play it in Boston, did it far better than it was done Saturday evening. The march, as a whole, was played much too loud; there was wanting that fine quality of pianissimo, with its crescendo and diminuendo effects given it when Mr. Gericke had command over this orchestra. They were conspicuously absent at this concert. The rest of the symphony, especially the last movement, was well played.

JAMES M. TRACY.

DRAMATIC AND MUSICAL.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

An apparently hungry audience, after its two weeks' musical fast, welcomed Conductor Nikisch and his splendid corps of musicians, bearing fresh laurels from New York and Baltimore, where they met with a "pronounced and unequivocal artistic success."

The programme Saturday evening was of an order classical enough to suit the most fastidious, including Haydn's Symphony No. 1 (B. and H.) in E flat, Beethoven's concerto for pianoforte with original cadenzas by the evening's soloist, Mr. Ferruccio B. Busoni, and Schumann's overture, scherzo and finale, op. 50. The Haydn symphony moved with the dignified solemnity of a funeral cortege, as though in honor of some such glorious hero as the devout and profound composer himself. The sacred harmony and religious sentiment expressed were superb, and the exquisite interpolation of the single voice from Franz Kneisel's artistic, plaintive violin came like the pleading of some pure spirit. Beethoven's beautiful sonata introduced another new claimant for excellent work, both as a composer and pianist. Mr. Busoni was warmly welcomed and merited the high standard for excellence so quickly awarded him. He was especially felicitous in his cadenza of the second movement when the trying ordeal of a first appearance had disappeared and he had become thoroughly warmed up to his subject. His execution is very even and fluent, and, although not an extraordinary performer, he impresses one with an idea of his thoroughness as a musician. Schumann's overture, symphonic in character, was admirably interpreted and played with the usual characteristic care and skill.

A very interesting programme is announced for Nov. 21, in which Miss Marguerite Hall appears as vocal soloist and Mr. C. M. Loeffler as composer of a suite for violin and orchestra, entitled "Les Veillées de l'Ukraine," as well as soloist. Other numbers are Lalo's overture "Le Roi d'Ys," and Raff's "Leonore."

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Symphony Concert.

It was a long programme, that of Saturday night, but so varied that no sense of ennui could have been felt by any catholic-minded auditor. The overture to Lalo's "Roi d'Ys" was an interesting piece of scoring, and its sharp contrasts and fiery moods suited excellently to Mr. Nikisch's brilliancy of reading. It had a superabundance of brass and kettledrum, against which the very dainty touches of woodwind harmony came like flowers in a desert. It was pleasant to hear the horn played like a horn again, and not in the trombone-like manner of recent concerts. The boast has been made that our conductor never reads a Boston criticism, but to all appearances the musicians of the orchestra do—and sometimes profit by it, since no one seated in an orchestra can judge of the effects he produces, so well as an auditor seated at a reasonable distance from the centre of disturbance. The cello obligato in this overture was beautifully played by Mr. Schroeder.

Miss Marguerite Hall has not been heard in our concert halls since she became a London favorite. Her voice is sweet and sympathetic, but scarcely competent to cope with an entire orchestra, and therefore her group of Schubert Lieder, with piano accompaniment, was much better than the rather pretentious setting of "Der Alte Koenig" by Henschel. One cannot help preferring the simpler legendary setting by Grieg. The charming personality of the singer, and her direct and unaffected style, won the heartiest applause, which was certainly deserved in the Schubert songs. But when Mr. Loeffler appeared to play the solo part in his own latest composition there was what is generally termed "an ovation." And the violinist immediately set himself to earning this advance payment of appreciation. To speak of his performance first—it was perfect in almost every detail, sometimes lacking a little in force, but even this was not to be said of the broad G string passages of the second movement, while the end was scintillating and dashing in the highest degree.

As a composition the work seemed fluent and at times very characteristic, but a trifle too long for what it had to say. There was a lack of thematic material after the second movement, and the second and third movements were not in much contrast with each other. The first two movements are the best part of the work, although the folk-dance vein of the finale also calls for praise. The beginning of the composition (I had almost forgotten to state that its title is "Les Veillées de l'Ukraine") is excellent, and the folk-music element is strongly represented, as it ought to be, around a Ukrainian fireside. Kettledrums at the very first bar hold the attention, and the pastoral musette, which is of course apportioned to the oboe, is very dainty and in keeping with the spirit of the scene.

Altogether the composer shows considerable grace and ease in his treatment of the woodwind passages. The second movement is a Rune. "Runes are the Scandinavian alphabet," says Carlyle in his "Hero Worship," but they are also more; they are the dark and mysterious legends that have come down even from the ancient days of Odin; less majestic than the Saga, they are impressive in a different manner, as a ghost story differs from an epic. The oboe was again prominent here, and its phrases were imitated on the solo violin—a pleasant conversation, but one missed the sombre tints with which a Grieg would have invested the legend.

The third movement was a Dumka, the dignified northern dance. It would have been better to have had either the Russian Kamarinskaia or the Bohemian Furiant here to contrast with the contemplative character of what had preceded. The unison introduction was characteristic enough, and the passages in harmonics were brilliant, and brilliantly played, yet this movement could be shortened to advantage. The fire and brio of the last movement made some amends, and one can congratulate the composer on having added a new work to the repertoire, and the violinist on having performed his own composition so well.

Now came the end of the concert with Raff's "Lenore" symphony. If "Im Walde" is Raff's best symphony, "Lenore" is certainly his most popular one, and the public never wearies of hearing the march which bears such a curious resemblance to one of Franz Lachner's. The symphony was the best piece of work that the orchestra have done this season; there was fire and "Schwung" in every measure, and for once one can compliment the precision and shading. The flutist deserves a word of especial commendation for smooth work in the second movement. The great crescendo and diminuendo of the march could scarcely have been improved upon, and the spectral ride of the finale was all that heart could wish.

Yet it is not so great as that other ride of ghosts, in the finale of the "Im Walde" symphony, and, for the matter of that, no supernatural horse-flesh will ever seem wonderful in music after the whinneys of Wagner's "Ride of the Walkyries," while in the domain of downright terror, Berlioz's "Ride to Hades" must always take the horrific palm. To be sure, the "Lenore" is not the most difficult or subtle work in the world to play, but the statement must be made that it was played magnificently.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

Musical Note.

Owing to advertising pressure on our columns, our notice of last night's Symphony Concert is deferred until next week. Mr. C. M. Loeffler's Suite for the violin was the principal point of interest in the concert, and showed Mr. Loeffler in not only his familiar aspect as a delightful artist, but as a gifted and able composer. This work, and the other novelties on the programme, Lalo's overture "Le Roi d'Ys," and a ballad by Mr. Georg Henschel, for contralto and orchestra, demand more consideration than we have the space to give them in this issue.

DRAMATIC AND MUSICAL.

Home Journal 11/23/91
THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

When Conductor Nikisch was called to preside over and direct the Boston Symphony Orchestra it was understood that "home talent" should be encouraged, and that American compositions worthy of attention should be given a hearing. This most desirable decision was brought into effect Saturday night, when Mr. C. M. Loeffler, one of the original members of the Symphony Orchestra, was honored with a composer's and soloist's place on the evening's programme. Although Boston cannot strictly claim him as her own, still he has become so thoroughly identified with the best musical efforts and interests of the Hub that his claim upon us voluntarily occasions a reciprocal feeling. The spontaneous outburst of appreciation that welcomed him when he mounted the platform was proof positive of the numberless admirers and friends he has in our musical community. His suite for violin and orchestra founded upon the Russian author, Gogol's series of short stories, shows the effect that such sketches can produce on the musician's mind. We speak of the originality of certain productions, but no one can tell the degree of influence that the author has upon the composer, the composer upon the poet or the poet upon the artist. So, too, the simple, enjoyable fireside tales that Mr. Loeffler portrayed in sweet sounds, in the four movements of his work, might inspire some hard to tell his story in a little better way, and so the influence of really good works has no limit.

Miss Marguerite Hall, the first contralto soloist heard in this season's symphonies, and a very prepossessing young singer, was heard most favorably in the cluster of German songs with Mr. Nickisch presiding at the piano.

She received much applause, a recall and a beautiful floral offering. She possesses a voice of good quality, and sings with excellent taste and expression.

The ballad, "There Was an Ancient King," for contralto and orchestra, by Henschel, although disappointingly short, demanded the powers of a great artist, which she was unable to meet with satisfaction, yet with study and maturity her voice gives promise of much ability. The orchestral numbers, Lalo's overture of "Le Roi d'Ys," opening the programme, and heard for the first time in Boston, together with the closing symphony of Raff's "Lenore" in E, were given an excellent interpretation, the tone pictures, harmony and exquisite feeling of the latter being worthy of special commendation. Somewhat in contrast to the evening's programme is the one announced for next week, which comprises Gluck's overture of "Iphigenie en Aulis," Brahms's concerto for violin in D major and Schubert's symphony in C major. Mr. Adolph Brodsky, the superb violinist and newly imported concert master of the New York Symphony Orchestra, will be the soloist.

Home Journal Music.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The program of the sixth concert contained two entire novelties, the overture to Lalo's opera, "Le Roi d'Ys," and a suite for violin and orchestra, "Les Veillées de l'Ukraine," by C. M. Loeffler. The Lalo overture is effectively and brilliantly scored for the full modern orchestra, and was in the main well played. It is an intensely dramatic work in which the composer has given free scope to his romantic genius. It abounds in climaxes which, heard for the first time, seem somewhat startling. Of its worth as a composition there can be no question, but that it is music for the theater and not for the concert room is equally true. It was entirely wise and just in Mr. Nikisch to let it be heard at a symphony concert, although he will hardly add it to his repertoire of classical overtures.

The announcement that Mr. Loeffler was to play an original composition was a surprise to a majority of the Symphony Orchestra patrons, although to the knowing ones his talent as a composer has been known for several years. "Les Veillées de l'Ukraine" is a wholly delightful work abounding in weird Russian melodies, which the composer has most skilfully woven together and ingeniously elaborated upon. It was beautifully played by Mr. Loeffler, who before and after its performance was accorded a veritable ovation. Much of the time the accompaniment of the orchestra was ever loud, frequently making it utterly impossible for the solo violin to be heard. Miss Marguerite Hall sang the ballad "There was an Ancient King," by Henschel and three songs by Schubert. Her voice has lost much of the vibrato that was formerly so noticeable in her singing, and her efforts were painstaking and intelligent, still both voice and style are inadequate to so large a place as Music Hall. The symphony was the ever popular "Lenore" by Raff, and with the exception of the second movement was finely played. The indecision in the attack, so noticeable earlier in the season, owing undoubtedly to the numerous changes in the personnel of the orchestra, was not so apparent. The second movement of the symphony was completely slaughtered by the new French horn player imported this season, and who on this occasion gave a most forcible illustration of how the French horn should not be played.

The program for the next concert will be: Overture, "Iphigenie en Aulis" (Wagner's ending), Gluck; Concerto for Violin in D major, op. 77, Brahms; Symphony in C major, Schubert; soloist, Mr. Adolph Brodsky.

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1891-92.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

VII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 28, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

GLUCK.

OVERTURE. "Iphigenie en Aulis."
(with Wagner's ending.)

BRAHMS.

CONCERTO for VIOLIN and ORCHESTRA in D,
op. 77.

Allegro non troppo.—Adagio.—
Rondo.—Allegro giocoso, ma non troppo vivace.

SCHUBERT.

SYMPHONY in C major, No. 9.

Andante; Allegro ma non troppo.—
Scherzo (Allegro vivace).—
Andante con moto.—Finale (Allegro vivace.)

SOLOIST:

MR. ADOLPH BRODSKY.

DRAMATIC AND MUSICAL.

Review Journal 11/23/91
THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

When Conductor Nikisch was called to preside over and direct the Boston Symphony Orchestra it was understood that "home talent" should be encouraged, and that American compositions worthy of attention should be given a hearing. This most desirable decision was brought into effect Saturday night, when Mr. C. M. Loeffler, one of the original members of the Symphony Orchestra, was honored with a composer's and soloist's place on the evening's programme. Although Boston cannot strictly claim him as her own, still he has become so thoroughly identified with the best musical efforts and interests of the Hub that his claim upon us voluntarily occasions a reciprocal feeling. The spontaneous outburst of appreciation that welcomed him when he mounted the platform was proof positive of the numberless admirers and friends he has in our musical community. His suite for violin and orchestra founded upon the Russian author, Gogol's series of short stories, shows the effect that such sketches can produce on the musician's mind. We speak of the originality of certain productions, but no one can tell the degree of influence that the author has upon the composer, the composer upon the poet or the poet upon the artist. So, too, the simple, enjoyable fireside tales that Mr. Loeffler portrayed in sweet sounds, in the four movements of his work, might inspire some bard to tell his story in a little better way, and so the influence of really good works has no limit.

Miss Marguerite Hall, the first contralto soloist heard in this season's symphonies, and a very prepossessing young singer, was heard most favorably in the cluster of German songs with Mr. Nickisch presiding at the piano.

She received much applause, a recall and a beautiful floral offering. She possesses a voice of good quality, and sings with excellent taste and expression.

The ballad, "There Was an Ancient King," for contralto and orchestra, by Henschel, although disappointingly short, demanded the powers of a great artist, which she was unable to meet with satisfaction, yet with study and maturity her voice gives promise of much ability. The orchestral numbers, Lalo's overture of "Le Roi d'Ys," opening the programme, and heard for the first time in Boston, together with the closing symphony of Raff's "Lenore" in E, were given an excellent interpretation, the tone pictures, harmony and exquisite feeling of the latter being worthy of special commendation. Somewhat in contrast to the evening's programme is the one announced for next week, which comprises Gluck's overture of "Iphigenie en Aulis," Brahms's concerto for violin in D major and Schubert's symphony in C major. Mr. Adolph Brodsky, the superb violinist and newly imported concert master of the New York Symphony Orchestra, will be the soloist.

Music.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The program of the sixth concert contained two entire novelties, the overture to Lalo's opera, "Le Roi d'Ys," and a suite for violin and orchestra, "Les Veillées de l'Ukraine," by C. M. Loeffler. The Lalo overture is effectively and brilliantly scored for the full modern orchestra, and was in the main well played. It is an intensely dramatic work in which the composer has given free scope to his romantic genius. It abounds in climaxes which, heard for the first time, seem somewhat startling. Of its worth as a composition there can be no question, but that it is music for the theater and not for the concert room is equally true. It was entirely wise and just in Mr. Nikisch to let it be heard at a symphony concert, although he will hardly add it to his repertoire of classical overtures.

The announcement that Mr. Loeffler was to play an original composition was a surprise to a majority of the Symphony Orchestra patrons, although to the knowing ones his talent as a composer has been known for several years. "Les Veillées de l'Ukraine" is a wholly delightful work abounding in weird Russian melodies, which the composer has most skilfully woven together and ingeniously elaborated upon. It was beautifully played by Mr. Loeffler, who before and after its performance was accorded a veritable ovation. Much of the time the accompaniment of the orchestra was over loud, frequently making it utterly impossible for the solo violin to be heard. Miss Marguerite Hall sang the ballad "There was an Ancient King," by Henschel and three songs by Schubert. Her voice has lost much of the vibrato that was formerly so noticeable in her singing, and her efforts were painstaking and intelligent, still both voice and style are inadequate to so large a place as Music Hall. The symphony was the ever popular "Lenore" by Raff, and with the exception of the second movement was finely played. The indecision in the attack, so noticeable earlier in the season, owing undoubtedly to the numerous changes in the personnel of the orchestra, was not so apparent. The second movement of the symphony was completely slaughtered by the new French horn player imported this season, and who on this occasion gave a most forcible illustration of how the French horn should not be played.

The program for the next concert will be: Overture, "Iphigenie en Aulis" (Wagner's ending), Gluck; Concerto for Violin in D major, op. 77, Brahms; Symphony in C major, Schubert; soloist, Mr. Adolph Brodsky.

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1891-92.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

VII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 28, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

GLUCK.

OVERTURE. "Iphigenie en Aulis."
(with Wagner's ending.)

BRAHMS.

CONCERTO for VIOLIN and ORCHESTRA in D,
op. 77.

Allegro non troppo.—Adagio.—
Rondo.—Allegro giocoso, ma non troppo vivace

SCHUBERT.

SYMPHONY in C major, No. 9.

Andante; Allegro ma non troppo.—
Scherzo (Allegro vivace).—
Andante con moto.—Finale (Allegro vivace.)

SOLOIST:

MR. ADOLPH BRODSKY.

MUSICAL MATTERS. a 4v

The Symphony Concert.

One could scarcely sympathize very much with the ultra-dramatic Gluck who appeared on the programme on Saturday; the overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis" was over swollen, and an effort was made to introduce modern sensationalism into what should have been a classical specimen of the dawn of dramatic music. It was not the Wagnerian ending which gave this effect to the work, for the great master of dramatic music has evidently written a coda entirely in the vein of his predecessor but it was the palpable desire to make the work more intense than its contents, the effort to give a 19th century color to a composition that should have suggested a purer and more primitive vein, that led to this result. The ensemble was not good, and at times the attacks were very ragged.

Now followed Brahms' violin concerto in D, with Mr. Adolph Brodsky as soloist. The new violinist made an excellent impression. His surety was almost marvelous, the great difficulties of the work considered; his intonation was pure and reliable, even in the highest positions, in the most difficult double-stopped passages, and in the artificial harmonics. There was a solidity about his work that suited the Brahms' style well, and yet there was a sufficiency of feeling displayed in the pastoral simplicity of the second movement. The only fault one could find was that, for the evidently heavy bowing of the artist, there was at times rather a scratchy than a broad tone produced. The orchestral support was demoralized in the second movement, but good in the first, and excellent in the last movement. The concert closed with the great instrumental masterpiece, the C major symphony by Schubert.

Schubert charms, not by any especial development of themes (the musician's delight, and the cornerstone of symphonic treatment) but by beautiful melodies and tasteful contrasts, and therefore his work is always most keenly appreciated by the general public, and is in fact, the neutral ground where musician and non-musician can meet. The symphony is full to the brim with Hungarian touches, a result of Schubert's stay at Zelesz. The horn which began the introduction was played too loudly, and dropped very abruptly from this dynamic force into a pianissimo end, a suddenness of shading which Schubert never contemplated. The grand effect of the trombones in the coda (Schubert certainly understood the use of those instruments better than any of his contemporaries or predecessors, except Mozart) was at first unequal, but ended triumphantly enough; this noble antiphony between tenor and bass trombones is as inspiring as the sound of the clash of warriors' swords. Our orchestra is fortunate in having the proper instruments to give such phrases with (although one might demand a better bass trombone) for many orchestras try to produce the passage with two tenor trombones,—a poor makeshift. The final augmentation of the horn phrase of the introduction, for the movement symmetrically ends as it began, was broadly, but not very unitedly given.

In the second movement the first oboe won the honors, and played its important theme with much delicacy. One need not quarrel with the conductor for having used the blue pencil in this movement, and eliminating one appearance of the chief theme, for the work only gained by the excision; since Schubert often repeated themes unnecessarily. The finale was taken at a furious pace, which bore bad fruit towards the end of it, but at first the strings, upon whom the brunt of the work falls, stood it well. The terrific figure of four accented notes was given with all possible force; it is remarkable to note the way in which Schubert has here reproduced the central thought of the first movement of Beethoven's violin concerto.

Summing up the performance of the whole symphony, one can emphatically say that it was an epitome of all the merits and effects of our orchestra as it is at present. There was all possible dash and energy, every iota of the Hungarian spice was preserved, and even added to, and all the delicate refinements of shading were lost. There was plenty of enthusiasm and very little of precision; there was the maximum of breadth, but the minimum of balance. At times the sub-themes disappeared altogether, and the scherzo and its trio were the acme of roughness.

Yet it would be folly to ignore the great value of the fiery and brilliant reading, only the public, which is very prone to value musical pepper above everything else, must learn to know that there are other, subtler, qualities which must not be lost in the obtaining of it. Excess in either direction is to be deprecated; one can also have too much of precision; I can recall a perfectly symmetrical performance of the first movement of Beethoven's Ninth symphony which was spoilt because of its precision, and which would have been glorious with some of that abandon which our present conductor knows so well how to impart to a work, but there seems to be no need that this abandon should cause our orchestra to lose the elegance of performance which it was so many years in acquiring.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

As the season advances, Conductor Nikisch seems to be gradually approaching a climax of interest in the make-up of his programmes. So, when he chose Mr. Adolph Brodsky, the new concert master of the New York Damrosch Symphony Orchestra, to act as soloist for last Saturday evening it seemed as though, according to the opinions of musical critics elsewhere, he was the one artist to fill the step next to the phenomenal and only Paderewski, who will bring to Boston next week more originality and genius than has been carried in the head and heart of any musical artist since the appearance of Rubinstein. Mr. Brodsky is a jovial, good-natured, whole-souled looking man, as though he were on the best of terms with his violin and the world, but scarcely impresses one as the student who would resign everything for the perfection of his art; so in his rendition of the severely difficult test of an artist's depth of feeling and expression that is found in the Brahms concerts in D, op. 77, there appeared a certain mixture of worldliness, if one may use such a term, and art that disappointed the ear and mind patiently waiting to be inspired and uplifted beyond the interest of accuracy, fine technique and skillful performance.

The labyrinth of difficulties to be overcome with ease in this concerto is an acquirement to be reached only by a violinist of unusual ability, but beyond that one felt a lack of true greatness.

His cadenza in the allegro more nearly approached the ideal performance than any of the other movements, and the audience showed their approval of his work by giving him three hearty recalls. The orchestral work in Gluck's Iphigenia, with Wagner's ending, was given with a glowing warmth of interpretation and nicety of finish that our magnetic director always draws forth from his responsive co-artists, and the Schubert Symphony in C major No. 9 was rendered in a most masterly manner, all the delightful beauties of composition and original orchestral coloring being given with true appreciation, never overstepping the bounds of a classic or unduly exaggerating an effect.

Every music lover will be on the qui vive to hear Mr. Ignace J. Paderewski, the incomparable pianist, who will play a concerto of his own, as well as solos from Chopin and Liszt next week, and for a background to this exceptional performer the orchestra will give Beethoven's Symphony No. 4, Svendsen's Carnival in Paris and Weber's overture "Euryanthe." Journal

After the riot of latter-day romantic music a fortnight ago, Mr. Nikisch's programme last Saturday seemed a severely classic one. Gluck's music is much too seldom heard in America, and the overture to 'Iphigenia in Aulis' was most welcome. It was artistically, warmly and dramatically played—a bit too warmly perhaps; for somehow, with all its appeal to the emotions, Gluck's music has a touch of austerity, a sort of unworldly purity and severe beauty, akin to that of the Greek drama and especially difficult of interpretation. Mr. Nikisch, moreover, chose to use Wagner's amended score. It was well enough, perhaps, for Wagner to add a coda; but why, forsooth, should he tinker Gluck? 'There were kings before Agamemnon.' The more familiar symphony (No. 9 in C) by Schubert, in its gentleness, tenderness, occasional playfulness and pervading delicacy was an excellent foil to the overture. Its performance, however, was sadly uneven, now thoroughly good and now condemnably careless. Mr. Adolf Brodsky, the first violin of Mr. Damrosch's orchestra, played the Brahms concerto, a work better suited to his powers than to those of most violinists. His technique, of which, it goes without saying, the concerto gave ample proof, is excellent, at times even brilliant; he understands and interprets the abstract and purely intellectual qualities of Brahms's music; but he is manifestly deficient in warmth of feeling. Commonwealth

MUSIC. Continued

THE SYMPHONY.

Nothing in the shape of novel works was presented at the seventh Symphony rehearsal and concert. Nevertheless, one can go home from a concert, after listening to Schubert's great ninth Symphony in C, and to a splendid performance of Brahms' Violin Concerto, opus 77, by one of the greatest violinists now resident in this country, with the feeling that his time has not been ill-spent.

The soloist was Mr. Adolph Brodsky, the noted virtuoso, whom Mr. Walter Damrosch was far-seeing enough to secure as concert-master for his new "Symphony Orchestra, of New York." Mr. Brodsky's large, well shaped head, agreeable yet determined cast of countenance, and massive physique, indicating immense reserve force, at once told plainly that the modern Beethoven's tortuous difficulties could have no terrors for him.

Brahms' first thought, when he settles himself for composition, is not to write "thankful" passages. That sounds ambiguous; but it is likely to prove true which ever way it may be construed. Careful consideration of the many murderously difficult mechanical combinations that he has put into his larger works for solo only leaves one in a state of perplexity as to whether his chief aim was to give what he conceived to be adequate expression to certain colossal ideas, or whether it was to create obstacles that would surely stagger all contemporary virtuosos. There are passages in this concerto, for example, that even Mr. Brodsky's strong and skillful hand could not make really musical in effect; that is, unless we throw over all preconceived notions of musical effect which have become second nature through a long season of contact with older and less angular masters and accept Brahms as the only true combiner of musical sounds.

We willingly recognize the nobility of his thought, the greatness of purpose that give to almost every page of his music a character that prevents their being passed over lightly. There is something in even the obscurest of them that enchains the attention, that fascinates, as an ugly yet characterful face first repels and finally enslaves. It is possible that Brahms' creations are the true type of the music of the future. No doubt Beethoven shocked the ears and reason of the great majority of his listeners with equal facility; and as for Schumann, even the present generation is not yet wholly reconciled to his dissonances. But with the Schubert symphony ringing in one's ears, it is hard to believe that Brahms is the true prophet.

Mr. Brodsky's playing was strong, fluent and masterful. There was no lack of courage evinced in attacking some much-to-be-dreaded portions of the concerto, and no apparent evasion of the greatest difficulties. His tone in melodious and sustained passages was full and warm, and his rendering of the last movement was fiery in accent and brilliant in execution. He was enthusiastically applauded, and was recalled several times.

The symphony was on the whole splendidly performed, though some of the playing here and there seemed rather perfunctory than zealous in character. The scherzo was especially well given, and from beginning to end Mr. Nikisch gave an emphasis to the dramatic side of the work, and threw into relief its gorgeous tone coloring with the sure hand of a born leader. Gluck's overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis" was the first number, its style contrasting well with the concerto which followed.

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the Seventh Symphony Concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Gluck: Overture to "Iphigénie en Aulide."

Brahms: Violin Concerto in D, Op. 77.

Schubert: Symphony No. 9, in C.

Mr. Adolph Brodsky was the violinist.

Wagner did more things than one for the overture to Gluck's "Iphigénie en Aulide;" he wrote a coda to it—the overture, in its original shape, having no ending, but joining on to the first number of the opera—and he invented a theory about the proper way of playing it. Wagner had pet theories about the performing of several classic compositions, some of them being based upon purely technical points in the text. His arguments were always plausible, but, unluckily, seldom convincing. He tried to prove that a certain sforzando mark in the "Freischütz" overture was really a diminuendo mark, and that consequently the coda of the overture ought to begin piano, instead of fortissimo. He noticed that Gluck had not written the word "allegro" after a double bar in the overture to "Iphigénie en Aulide," and argued that the movement that had always been played allegro ought to go much slower. Other people argued that the omission of the word allegro in the score was only an oversight of Gluck's, who was notoriously careless in his writing. Last Saturday evening Mr. Nikisch gave us an approximate sample of Wagner's idea, and we must say that the notion seems utterly untenable. Gluck could not have meant the movement to go so slowly; it is more than flesh and blood can stand.

The great Schubert Symphony is always a welcome guest; it is not an immaculate work, but it is unquestionably a great one. Except for the last movement, not much is to be said in favor of the performance on Saturday evening. The wind instruments were not in tune, and played roughly; the strings were by no means up to their habitual mark of precision. The Finale, however, was splendidly read, and some of the short, quick crescendos in the strings were immensely effective.

Mr. Brodsky played the wonderful Brahms concerto in a way that showed him to be an artist of very superior ability. His technique, if not to the highest degree polished, is sure, brilliant and facile; his tone is beautiful, except now and then in passages of an impetuous character, in which he is a little liable to scrape. But, intellectually and emotionally, his playing is on a very high plane, as it also has the virtue of holding the attention fast. The audience was rapturous in its applause.

The next programme is: Beethoven, symphony No. 4, in B-flat; Paderewski, pianoforte concerto; Svendsen, "Carnival in Paris;" Chopin, impromptu, valse; Liszt, rhapsodie hongroise; Weber, overture to "Euryanthe." Mr. Ignace J. Paderewski will be the pianist.

concerto in D, op. 77, there appeared a certain mixture of worldliness, if one may use such a term, and art that disappointed the ear and mind patiently waiting to be inspired and uplifted beyond the interest of accuracy, fine technique and skillful performance.

The labyrinth of difficulties to be overcome with ease in this concerto is an acquirement to be reached only by a violinist of unusual ability, but beyond that one felt a lack of true greatness.

His cadenza in the allegro more nearly approached the ideal performance than any of the other movements, and the audience showed their approval of his work by giving him three hearty recalls. The orchestral work in Gluck's Iphigenia, with Wagner's ending, was given with a glowing warmth of interpretation and nicety of finish that our magnetic director always draws forth from his responsive co-artists, and the Schubert Symphony in C major No. 9 was rendered in a most masterly manner, all the delightful beauties of composition and original orchestral coloring being given with true appreciation, never overstepping the bounds of a classic or unduly exaggerating an effect.

Every music lover will be on the qui vive to hear Mr. Ignace J. Paderewski, the incomparable pianist, who will play a concerto of his own, as well as solos from Chopin and Liszt next week, and for a background to this exceptional performer the orchestra will give Beethoven's Symphony No. 4, Svendsen's Carnival in Paris and Weber's overture "Euryanthe." Journal

After the riot of latter-day romantic music a fortnight ago, Mr. Nikisch's programme last Saturday seemed a severely classic one. Gluck's music is much too seldom heard in America, and the overture to 'Iphigenia in Aulis' was most welcome. It was artistically, warmly and dramatically played—a bit too warmly perhaps; for somehow, with all its appeal to the emotions, Gluck's music has a touch of austerity, a sort of unworldly purity and severe beauty, akin to that of the Greek drama and especially difficult of interpretation. Mr. Nikisch, moreover, chose to use Wagner's amended score. It was well enough, perhaps, for Wagner to add a coda; but why, forsooth, should he tinker Gluck? 'There were kings before Agamemnon.' The more familiar symphony (No. 9 in C) by Schubert, in its gentleness, tenderness, occasional playfulness and pervading delicacy was an excellent foil to the overture. Its performance, however, was sadly uneven, now thoroughly good and now condemnably careless. Mr. Adolf Brodsky, the first violin of Mr. Damrosch's orchestra, played the Brahms concerto, a work better suited to his powers than to those of most violinists. His technique, of which, it goes without saying, the concerto gave ample proof, is excellent, at times even brilliant; he understands and interprets the abstract and purely intellectual qualities of Brahms's music; but he is manifestly deficient in warmth of feeling. Commonwealth

MUSIC.

THE SYMPHONY.

Nothing in the shape of novel works was presented at the seventh Symphony rehearsal and concert. Nevertheless, one can go home from a concert, after listening to Schubert's great ninth Symphony in C, and to a splendid performance of Brahms' Violin Concerto, opus 77, by one of the greatest violinists now resident in this country, with the feeling that his time has not been ill-spent.

The soloist was Mr. Adolph Brodsky, the noted virtuoso, whom Mr. Walter Damrosch was far-seeing enough to secure as concert-master for his new "Symphony Orchestra, of New York." Mr. Brodsky's large, well shaped head, agreeable yet determined cast of countenance, and massive physique, indicating immense reserve force, at once told plainly that the modern Beethoven's tortuous difficulties could have no terrors for him.

Brahms' first thought, when he settles himself for composition, is not to write "thankful" passages. That sounds ambiguous; but it is likely to prove true which ever way it may be construed. Careful consideration of the many murderously difficult mechanical combinations that he has put into his larger works for solo only leaves one in a state of perplexity as to whether his chief aim was to give what he conceived to be adequate expression to certain colossal ideas, or whether it was to create obstacles that would surely stagger all contemporary virtuosos. There are passages in this concerto, for example, that even Mr. Brodsky's strong and skillful hand could not make really musical in effect; that is, unless we throw over all preconceived notions of musical effect which have become second nature through a long season of contact with older and less angular masters and accept Brahms as the only true combiner of musical sounds.

We willingly recognize the nobility of his thought, the greatness of purpose that give to almost every page of his music a character that prevents their being passed over lightly. There is something in even the obscurest of them that enchains the attention, that fascinates, as an ugly yet characterful face first repels and finally enslaves. It is possible that Brahms' creations are the true type of the music of the future. No doubt Beethoven shocked the ears and reason of the great majority of his listeners with equal facility; and as for Schumann, even the present generation is not yet wholly reconciled to his dissonances. But with the Schubert symphony ringing in one's ears, it is hard to believe that Brahms is the true prophet.

Mr. Brodsky's playing was strong, fluent and masterful. There was no lack of courage evinced in attacking some much-to-be-dreaded portions of the concerto, and no apparent evasion of the greatest difficulties. His tone in melodious and sustained passages was full and warm, and his rendering of the last movement was fiery in accent and brilliant in execution. He was enthusiastically applauded, and was recalled several times.

The symphony was on the whole splendidly performed, though some of the playing here and there seemed rather perfunctory than zealous in character. The scherzo was especially well given, and from beginning to end Mr. Nikisch gave an emphasis to the dramatic side of the work, and threw into relief its gorgeous tone coloring with the sure hand of a born leader. Gluck's overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis" was the first number, its style contrasting well with the concerto which followed.

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the Seventh Symphony Concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Gluck: Overture to "Iphigénie en Aulide."

Brahms: Violin Concerto in D, Op. 77.

Schubert: Symphony No. 9, in C.

Mr. Adolph Brodsky was the violinist.

Wagner did more things than one for the overture to Gluck's "Iphigénie en Aulide;" he wrote a coda to it—the overture, in its original shape, having no ending, but joining on to the first number of the opera—and he invented a theory about the proper way of playing it. Wagner had pet theories about the performing of several classic compositions, some of them being based upon purely technical points in the text. His arguments were always plausible, but, unluckily, seldom convincing. He tried to prove that a certain sforzando mark in the "Freischütz" overture was really a diminuendo mark, and that consequently the coda of the overture ought to begin piano, instead of fortissimo. He noticed that Gluck had not written the word "allegro" after a double bar in the overture to "Iphigénie en Aulide," and argued that the movement that had always been played allegro ought to go much slower. Other people argued that the omission of the word allegro in the score was only an oversight of Gluck's, who was notoriously careless in his writing. Last Saturday evening Mr. Nikisch gave us an approximate sample of Wagner's idea, and we must say that the notion seems utterly untenable. Gluck could not have meant the movement to go so slowly; it is more than flesh and blood can stand.

The great Schubert Symphony is always a welcome guest; it is not an immaculate work, but it is unquestionably a great one. Except for the last movement, not much is to be said in favor of the performance on Saturday evening. The wind instruments were not in tune, and played roughly; the strings were by no means up to their habitual mark of precision. The Finale, however, was splendidly read, and some of the short, quick crescendos in the strings were immensely effective.

Mr. Brodsky played the wonderful Brahms concerto in a way that showed him to be an artist of very superior ability. His technique, if not to the highest degree polished, is sure, brilliant and facile; his tone is beautiful, except now and then in passages of an impetuous character, in which he is a little liable to scrape. But, intellectually and emotionally, his playing is on a very high plane, as it also has the virtue of holding the attention fast. The audience was rapturous in its applause.

The next programme is: Beethoven, symphony No. 4, in B-flat; Paderewski, pianoforte concerto; Svendsen, "Carnival in Paris;" Chopin, impromptu, valse; Liszt, rhapsodie hongroise; Weber, overture to "Euryanthe." Mr. Ignace J. Paderewski will be the pianist.

MUSICAL. Gazette

The Symphony Concert.

The seventh concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall last night attracted a large audience. The performances began with Gluck's noble overture to "Iphigenie en Aulis." It was badly read, and proved, on the whole, one of the worst perversions of a composer's plain and unmistakable intentions that Mr. Nikisch has as yet ventured upon. The opening bars of the allegro were pumped out at an inexcusably slow pace, and without discernible meaning, except the conductor's desire for new readings of old masters at any cost. Not only this, but it was played with miserable roughness, the group of three notes that occur in the opening bars of the allegro and that are repeated so often, being given in a clumsy, "catch it as you can" fashion that would have done no credit to an ordinary theatre orchestra. The playing of this fine orchestra has steadily degenerated until it is but a shadow of what it once was in regard to finish, precision and purity. Coarseness has become a characteristic of the strings and bad intonation a feature of the wind. There is no longer unity of attack on the part of either strings or wind, owing probably in a large measure to the indecisive but showy way in which the conductor uses his baton. There is too much stick flourishing; too persevering an effort to play the music with the baton instead of using it decisively to beat the time and mark the rhythm; and the consequence is that the players are confused instead of led. In brief, there is too much personal display on the part of the conductor at the expense of the most desirable musical results. But whatever may be the cause, it is certain that the orchestra has sadly deteriorated in style from what it was. Schubert's Symphony in C—the great one—ended the concert. It was fairly read, but here again the playing was lacking in finish, and was rough and noisy. It would seem as if the nucleus of the orchestra had been sustained musically thus far on the magnificent state of discipline in which it had been left by Mr. Gericke, and that it has slowly and surely depreciated until it has reached the unsatisfactory condition in which it now is. The change is inexpressibly saddening. The soloist of the occasion was Mr. Adolph Brodsky, who gave a masterly reading of Brahms's concerto. His intonation is exquisitely true, his bowing is admirable in its freedom and largeness, and his technique is equal to any demands that may be made on it. Every note comes out with perfect clearness, and the artist plays with equal brilliancy and precision. His cantabile playing is beautiful in its broad simplicity. On the other hand, he is lacking in elegance, his style, though pure, is stolid and pedantic, and his tone, though full, is too often marred by rasping and scratching. At his best, however, he proved to be an artist well worth the hearing, and his success was overwhelming. He was applauded with immense enthusiasm, and recalled three times with tremendous fervor. The programme for the next concert is: Symphony No. 4, Beethoven; "Carnival in Paris," Svendsen (first time); Overture, "Euryanthe," Weber. Mr. Ignace J. Paderewski is to be the soloist, and will play a concerto of his own composition, a waltz and impromptu by Chopin, and a Liszt "Rhapsodie Hongroise."

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

At the seventh of the season's concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, in Music Hall, last evening, Mr. Nikisch gave Mr. Adolph Brodsky, concert master of the Damrosch orchestra of New York, an introduction to Boston, and the selection he made was the concerto for violin and orchestra in D, op. 77, by Brahms.

Possibly the advance information supplied in regard to the new player led to an excessive estimate of his abilities. Certain it is that there was a feeling of disappointment as he concluded his task. He is a remarkably accurate player, and is easily the master of even the maze of technical difficulties which Brahms has introduced into the opening and final movements of this concerto. He met the requirements of the opening allegro most satisfactorily, though at times his tone was pushed beyond a musical quality, and became far from pleasing. The adagio, while being given with mechanical accuracy, lacked the expression, sentiment and refinement demanded for a perfect interpretation of its beauty, and the playing in the rondo had little of the brilliancy which should characterize its performance. Mr. Brodsky has no reason to complain of the reception given him, however, and he was complimented with the usual recalls after the concerto.

Mr. Nikisch began his programme with Gluck's overture, "Iphigenie en Aulis" (with Wagner's ending), which he read with excellent taste, and ended it with an admirable performance of the ever enjoyable C major symphony No. 9, by Schubert.

Next week's concert will introduce Mr. Ignace J. Paderewski, the Polish pianist, as soloist, in an original concerto and solo numbers by Chopin and Liszt.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Violinist Adolph Brodsky Receives Favorable Consideration.

The seventh in the series of symphony concerts was given in Music Hall last evening, and cordial plaudits were won from an audience which, as usual, taxed the capacity of the hall. The programme offered no novelties, but Bostonians heard for the first time Mr. Adolph Brodsky, a violinist who recently came from Russia to become the concert master of the New York Symphony Society.

He played the exacting but not always enjoyable Brahms concerto for violin and orchestra in D. Only an artist of conscious ability would care to essay the performance of such a work before the Symphony orchestra. To state that he won enthusiastic applause and three recalls is a stronger endorsement of his playing than could be given in the few words of review possible in the limited space obtainable in this morning's paper.

His technique is, of course, above reproach, for no violinist could at this day obtain distinction who had not mastered the mechanics of his art. His tone is good, and he phrases with artistic effect and musicianly judgment.

Gluck's overture, "Iphigenia in Aulis," with Wagner's ending, and Schubert's symphony in C, No. 9, were the welcome offerings by the orchestra. More pleasing readings of this lovely symphony have been heard here than were offered yesterday by Mr. Nikisch, but the performance was generally satisfactory.

Following is the programme for the next concert: Symphony No. 4, Beethoven; concerto for pianoforte, Paderewski; carnival in Paris, Svendsen; solos for piano, impromptu, Chopin; waltz, Chopin; rhapsodie Hongroise, Liszt; overture "Euryanthe," Weber. Soloist, Mr. Ignace J. Paderewski.

Home Town: Music. Dec 5/91

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The seventh concert was given before the usual magnificent audience. The program was: Overture, "Iphigenia in Aulis," Gluck; concerto for violin and orchestra, op. 77, Brahms; symphony in C major, Schubert. Mr. Adolph Brodsky was the soloist.

The performance of the overture was the least satisfactory of any rendering of an important work yet given by Mr. Nikisch. The exceeding roughness of the strings, the untunefulness of the wood wind and the entire lack of precision in the brass throughout the concert, call to mind painfully the extraordinary precision in the attack and beautiful tonal quality of the orchestra under Mr. Gericke. The opening bars of the overture were taken so slowly that the effect was a sentimentality entirely foreign to all traditional readings of the work. The allegro though taken at the proper tempo was greatly marred by the rasping fortissimos in which the various sections of strings seemed to vie with one another.

Mr. Brodsky is a violinist of magnificent parts. His tone is broad and full, his bowing remarkably free, his intonation all but perfect, and his technique fully equal to the demands of the amazing difficulties of the Brahms concerto, but much harm is done to the many fine qualities here enumerated by an over inclination to roughness, which in the cadenza of the first movement (Mr. Brodsky's own we believe) very seriously marred the effect of the entire allegro non troppo. Mr. Brodsky's best work was in the adagio, which was given with rare grace and that breadth only possessed by the greatest virtuosos. His success was unqualified and he was three times recalled. Mr. Nikisch redeemed himself by a fine reading of Schubert's great symphony in C major. The opening theme played in unison by the two horns was perfectly done, being in striking contrast to the coarse work of the horns in the Lenore symphony last week. The clumsiness of the heavy brass instruments is becoming proverbial. Their sound is articulated evidently an instant later than that of the rest of the orchestra. This was very evident throughout the symphony and was a severe blemish upon what would otherwise have been a notably fine rendition. Mr. Nikisch wisely omitted the long repetitions in the first and last movements. The program of the eighth concert will be as follows:

Beethoven.....Symphony No. 4
Paderewski.....Concerto for Pianoforte
Svendsen.....Carnival in Paris
(FIRST TIME.)
Soli for Piano.

a Chopin.....Impromptu
b Chopin.....Valse
c Liszt.....Rhapsodie Hongroise
Weber.....Overture, "Euryanthe"

Soloist, Mr. Ignace J. Paderewski.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The special interest of last Saturday's concert was a personal one, found in the debut of Mr. Adolph Brodsky, who has come from being concert-master of the Gewandhaus orchestra to take a similar position with Mr. Damrosch's forces and to lead the new string quartette which that director has organized for New York. He was set down to play Brahms's violin concerto in D-major, and when his burly figure presented itself at the soloist's place a handsome Boston reception was accorded him. He is an artist of good, but not exceptional, parts, qualified to do solid, substantial work, an able, intelligent player, but one who does not seem to be of the finest grain, and with probably more sense than sentiment, more steadiness than elegance. He began the concerto rather dryly and uninterestingly, his tone being hard and sharp and his intonation occasionally faulty; but he improved as he went on, the edginess of his tone softening down and his manner warming. His execution was clear and easy and his intelligent care brought his themes constantly to perception. He pleased his audience thoroughly and was recalled three times, having deserved so much by his square, honest work, even though we must say that there are home violinists who have the same substantial qualities as he showed and possess a grace and suavity which he did not show. Gluck's "Iphigenia" overture, according to Wagner's rearrangement of it in what he thought its true tempi, began the concert, and the only other number was the great C-major Symphony of Schubert, both of which, were excellently played in all respects. If only some conductor would have the courage to omit most of the repeats in this latter work, which, superbly beautiful as it is, is yet too long and too extended by reiterations!

Tonight Mr. Paderewski, of whom something is said elsewhere, will make his first appearance in Boston, playing with the orchestra his own concerto, and as solos an impromptu and waltz from Chopin and one of Liszt's Hungarian Rhapsodies. The symphony, which is Beethoven's fourth, will be at the head of the programme, and at the foot Weber's "Euryanthe" overture. The middle place is assigned to Svendsen's "Carnival in Paris," which is new in Boston.

Mme. Nordica showed great strength of character and courage of will in keeping her engagement with Mr. C. A. Ellis, her manager, at Cincinnati Monday night. She had only heard of the sudden death of her mother in London late on Saturday, and took the train Sunday for Boston to meet her sister, Mrs. Baldwin, returning in time for the concert, Monday. There was something very pathetic in her solos, never more beautifully sung than on that night, which touched her audience deeply, although but few knew of the pain she was suffering. She was exquisitely gowned in black lace, the front of the skirt of flashing jet.

MUSICAL. Sarette

The Symphony Concert.

The seventh concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall last night attracted a large audience. The performances began with Gluck's noble overture to "Iphigenie en Aulis." It was badly read, and proved, on the whole, one of the worst perversions of a composer's plain and unmistakable intentions that Mr. Nikisch has as yet ventured upon. The opening bars of the allegro were pumped out at an inexcusably slow pace, and without discernible meaning, except the conductor's desire for new readings of old masters at any cost. Not only this, but it was played with miserable roughness, the group of three notes that occur in the opening bars of the allegro and that are repeated so often, being given in a clumsy, "catch it as you can" fashion that would have done no credit to an ordinary theatre orchestra. The playing of this fine orchestra has steadily degenerated until it is but a shadow of what it once was in regard to finish, precision and purity. Coarseness has become a characteristic of the strings and bad intonation a feature of the wind. There is no longer unity of attack on the part of either strings or wind, owing probably in a large measure to the indecisive but showy way in which the conductor uses his baton. There is too much sick flourishing; too persevering an effort to play the music with the baton instead of using it decisively to beat the time and mark the rhythm; and the consequence is that the players are confused instead of led. In brief, there is too much personal display on the part of the conductor at the expense of the most desirable musical results. But whatever may be the cause, it is certain that the orchestra has sadly deteriorated in style from what it was. Schubert's Symphony in C—the great one—ended the concert. It was fairly read, but here again the playing was lacking in finish, and was rough and noisy. It would seem as if the nucleus of the orchestra had been sustained musically thus far on the magnificent state of discipline in which it had been left by Mr. Gericke, and that it has slowly and surely depreciated until it has reached the unsatisfactory condition in which it now is. The change is inexpressibly saddening. The soloist of the occasion was Mr. Adolph Brodsky, who gave a masterly reading of Brahms's concerto. His intonation is exquisitely true, his bowing is admirable in its freedom and largeness, and his technique is equal to any demands that may be made on it. Every note comes out with perfect clearness, and the artist plays with equal brilliancy and precision. His cantabile playing is beautiful in its broad simplicity. On the other hand, he is lacking in elegance, his style, though pure, is stolid and pedantic, and his tone, though full, is too often marred by rasping and scratching. At his best, however, he proved to be an artist well worth the hearing, and his success was overwhelming. He was applauded with immense enthusiasm, and recalled three times with tremendous fervor. The programme for the next concert is: Symphony No. 4, Beethoven; "Carnival in Paris," Svendsen (first time); Overture, "Euryanthe," Weber. Mr. Ignace J. Paderewski is to be the soloist, and will play a concerto of his own composition, a waltz and impromptu by Chopin, and a Liszt "Rhapsodie Hongroise."

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

At the seventh of the season's concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, in Music Hall, last evening, Mr. Nikisch gave Mr. Adolph Brodsky, concert master of the Damrosch orchestra of New York, an introduction to Boston, and the selection he made was the concerto for violin and orchestra in D, op. 77, by Brahms.

Possibly the advance information supplied in regard to the new player led to an excessive estimate of his abilities. Certain it is that there was a feeling of disappointment as he concluded his task. He is a remarkably accurate player, and is easily the master of even the maze of technical difficulties which Brahms has introduced into the opening and final movements of this concerto. He met the requirements of the opening allegro most satisfactorily, though at times his tone was pushed beyond a musical quality, and became far from pleasing. The adagio, while being given with mechanical accuracy, lacked the expression, sentiment and refinement demanded for a perfect interpretation of its beauty, and the playing in the rondo had little of the brilliancy which should characterize its performance. Mr. Brodsky has no reason to complain of the reception given him, however, and he was complimented with the usual recalls after the concerto.

Mr. Nikisch began his programme with Gluck's overture, "Iphigenie en Aulis" (with Wagner's ending), which he read with excellent taste, and ended it with an admirable performance of the ever enjoyable C major symphony No. 9, by Schubert.

Next week's concert will introduce Mr. Ignace J. Paderewski, the Polish pianist, as soloist, in an original concerto and solo numbers by Chopin and Liszt.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Violinist Adolph Brodsky Receives Favorable Consideration.

The seventh in the series of symphony concerts was given in Music Hall last evening, and cordial plaudits were won from an audience which, as usual, taxed the capacity of the hall. The programme offered no novelties, but Bostonians heard for the first time Mr. Adolph Brodsky, a violinist who recently came from Russia to become the concert master of the New York Symphony Society.

He played the exacting but not always enjoyable Brahms concerto for violin and orchestra in D. Only an artist of conscious ability would care to essay the performance of such a work before the Symphony orchestra. To state that he won enthusiastic applause and three recalls is a stronger endorsement of his playing than could be given in the few words of review possible in the limited space obtainable in this morning's paper.

His technique is, of course, above reproach, for no violinist could at this day obtain distinction who had not mastered the mechanics of his art. His tone is good, and he phrases with artistic effect and musicianly judgment.

Gluck's overture, "Iphigenie en Aulis," with Wagner's ending, and Schubert's symphony in C, No. 9, were the welcome offerings by the orchestra. More pleasing readings of this lovely symphony have been heard here than were offered yesterday by Mr. Nikisch, but the performance was generally satisfactory.

Following is the programme for the next concert: Symphony No. 4, Beethoven; concerto for pianoforte, Paderewski; carnival in Paris, Svendsen; solos for piano, impromptu, Chopin; waltz, Chopin; rhapsodie Hongroise, Liszt; overture "Euryanthe," Weber. Soloist, Mr. Ignace J. Paderewski.

Music. Dec 5/91

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The seventh concert was given before the usual magnificent audience. The program was: Overture, "Iphigenia in Aulis," Gluck; concerto for violin and orchestra, op. 77, Brahms; symphony in C major, Schubert. Mr. Adolph Brodsky was the soloist.

The performance of the overture was the least satisfactory of any rendering of an important work yet given by Mr. Nikisch. The exceeding roughness of the strings, the untunefulness of the wood wind and the entire lack of precision in the brass throughout the concert, call to mind painfully the extraordinary precision in the attack and beautiful tonal quality of the orchestra under Mr. Gericke. The opening bars of the overture were taken so slowly that the effect was a sentimentality entirely foreign to all traditional readings of the work. The allegro though taken at the proper tempo was greatly marred by the rasping fortissimos in which the various sections of strings seemed to vie with one another.

Mr. Brodsky is a violinist of magnificent parts. His tone is broad and full, his bowing remarkably free, his intonation all but perfect, and his technique fully equal to the demands of the amazing difficulties of the Brahms concerto, but much harm is done to the many fine qualities here enumerated by an over inclination to roughness, which in the cadenza of the first movement (Mr. Brodsky's own we believe) very seriously marred the effect of the entire allegro non troppo. Mr. Brodsky's best work was in the adagio, which was given with rare grace and that breadth only possessed by the greatest virtuosos. His success was unqualified and he was three times recalled. Mr. Nikisch redeemed himself by a fine reading of Schubert's great symphony in C major. The opening theme played in unison by the two horns was perfectly done, being in striking contrast to the coarse work of the horns in the Lenore symphony last week. The clumsiness of the heavy brass instruments is becoming proverbial. Their sound is articulated evidently an instant later than that of the rest of the orchestra. This was very evident throughout the symphony and was a severe blemish upon what would otherwise have been a notably fine rendition. Mr. Nikisch wisely omitted the long repetitions in the first and last movements. The program of the eighth concert will be as follows:

Beethoven.....Symphony No. 4
Paderewski.....Concerto for Pianoforte
Svendsen.....Carnival in Paris

(FIRST TIME.)

Soli for Piano.

a Chopin.....Impromptu
b Chopin.....Valse
c Liszt.....Rhapsodie Hongroise

Weber.....Overture, "Euryanthe"

Soloist, Mr. Ignace J. Paderewski.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The special interest of last Saturday's concert was a personal one, found in the debut of Mr. Adolph Brodsky, who has come from being concert-master of the Gewandhaus orchestra to take a similar position with Mr. Damrosch's forces and to lead the new string quartette which that director has organized for New York. He was set down to play Brahms's violin concerto in D-major, and when his burly figure presented itself at the soloist's place a handsome Boston reception was accorded him. He is an artist of good, but not exceptional, parts, qualified to do solid, substantial work, an able, intelligent player, but one who does not seem to be of the finest grain, and with probably more sense than sentiment, more steadiness than elegance. He began the concerto rather dryly and uninterestingly, his tone being hard and sharp and his intonation occasionally faulty; but he improved as he went on, the edginess of his tone softening down and his manner warming. His execution was clear and easy and his intelligent care brought his themes constantly to perception. He pleased his audience thoroughly and was recalled three times, having deserved so much by his square, honest work, even though we must say that there are home violinists who have the same substantial qualities as he showed and possess a grace and suavity which he did not show. Gluck's "Iphigenia" overture, according to Wagner's rearrangement of it in what he thought its true tempi, began the concert, and the only other number was the great C-major Symphony of Schubert, both of which, were excellently played in all respects. If only some conductor would have the courage to omit most of the repeats in this latter work, which, superbly beautiful as it is, is yet too long and too extended by reiterations!

Tonight Mr. Paderewski, of whom something is said elsewhere, will make his first appearance in Boston, playing with the orchestra his own concerto, and as solos an impromptu and waltz from Chopin and one of Liszt's Hungarian Rhapsodies. The symphony, which is Beethoven's fourth, will be at the head of the programme, and at the foot Weber's "Euryanthe" overture. The middle place is assigned to Svendsen's "Carnival in Paris," which is new in Boston.

—Mme. Nordica showed great strength of character and courage of will in keeping her engagement with Mr. C. A. Ellis, her manager, at Cincinnati Monday night. She had only heard of the sudden death of her mother in London late on Saturday, and took the train Sunday for Boston to meet her sister, Mrs. Baldwin, returning in time for the concert, Monday. There was something very pathetic in her solos, never more beautifully sung than on that night, which touched her audience deeply, although but few knew of the pain she was suffering. She was exquisitely gowned in black lace, the front of the skirt of flashing jet.

IGNACE J. PADEREWSKI
THE GREAT PIANIST

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1891-92.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

VIII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 5, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

BEETHOVEN.

SYMPHONY No. 4, in B flat.

Adagio; Allegro vivace.—Adagio.—Minuet.—
Allegro ma non troppo.

PADEREWSKI.

CONCERTO for PIANO and ORCHESTRA, in A minor, op. 17.

Allegro.—Romanza (Andante).—
Allegro molto vivace.

SVENDSEN.

EPISODE. "Carnival in Paris."
(First time at these Concerts.)

SOLI for PIANO.

a) CHOPIN.

IMPROMPTU.

b) CHOPIN.

VALE.

c) LISZT.

RHAPSODIE HONGROISE.

WEBER.

OVERTURE, "Euryanthe."

SOLOIST:

Mr. IGNACE J. PADEREWSKI.

The Piano used is a Steinway.

IGNACE J. PADEREWSKI
THE GREAT PIANIST

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1891-92.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

VIII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 5, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

BEETHOVEN.

SYMPHONY No. 4, in B flat.
Adagio: Allegro vivace.—Adagio.—Minuet.—
Allegro ma non troppo.

PADEREWSKI.

CONCERTO for PIANO and ORCHESTRA, in A
minor, op. 17.
Allegro.—Romanza (Andante) —
Allegro molto vivace.

SVENDSEN.

EPISODE. "Carnival in Paris."
(First time at these Concerts.)

SOLI for PIANO.

a) CHOPIN.

IMPROMPTU.

b) CHOPIN.

VALE.

c) LISZT.

RIHAPSODIE HONGROISE.

WEBER.

OVERTURE, "Euryanthe."

SOLOIST:

Mr. IGNACE J. PADEREWSKI.

The Piano used is a Steinway.

A LOST ATTRACTION—THE LION HAS ESCAPED.

PADEREWSKI.

Journal

The Thin Man From Poland Conquers Boston.

Unbounded Enthusiasm at the Symphony Concert.

The eighth Symphony Concert was given Saturday evening in Music Hall. The programme included Beethoven's symphony No. 4, Paderewski's concerto for pianoforte, Svendsen's "Carnival in Paris" and Weber's overture "Euryanthe." Mr. Paderewski was the pianist, and he was heard in his own concerto as well as in the Chopin Impromptu in F sharp, the Chopin waltz in C sharp minor and the twelfth rhapsodie and the "Campanella" of Liszt, which latter piece was played in response to the unbounded applause.

The fact that the concert of Saturday evening was primarily a symphony concert was apparently forgotten. Orchestra, director and purely orchestral music were all absorbed in the display of the personality of Ignace Jan Paderewski. Many fretted through the symphony, for they waited for Paderewski. Svendsen's "Carnival" was heard for the first time, and with its charming episodes and its ingenious instrumentation it would no doubt have excited attention on any other occasion, but Paderewski followed it, and it was nought. Even the fiery opening of the overture seemed tame after the Hungarian tumult that had just shaken the keys of the pianoforte. Nor is all this surprising, nor is it to be deplored. For the scene of excitement was not merely a triumph of virtuosity; it was the revelation of an extraordinary individuality.

Pianists rise constantly above the musical horizon. Some shine with a steady and a serene light. Others dazzle for a season, "wandering stars, to whom is reserved the blackness of darkness forever." And even the greatest of them differ, as one star differeth from another star in glory. Perfection of mechanism, absolute technique, massive chords and electrical bravura—these no longer compel extraordinary admiration; they are expected, they are demanded. But the manner in which the mechanism is used, the physical and mental character of the man that stands as an interpreter between the composer and the hearer—these distinguish a pianist of to-day and set him apart. It is individuality, or temperament, or call it what you will, that exalts a few above their fellows. Now the individuality of Paderewski is unnatural, almost supernatural.

We all heard of this man before he crossed the ocean. The trumpet of his fame was blown with no uncertain sound. The story of his triumphs was shouted from the house tops. Yet these triumphs were not without alloy. The Berlin critics, who too often look at strangers askew, whispered in his ear that he was mortal. They argued from the arrangement of his hair that he was a dealer in the sensational. He was the lion of the season in Paris; and some—as Pougin—were bold enough to say that occasionally in his playing he shook a mane twisted in curl papers and showed neatly trimmed claws that he might not frighten the women who crowded the hall to hear him roar. In London he swept everything before him, and he received the honor of a caricature in Punch.

At last he came upon the stage of Music Hall, this strange being whose fiery temperament seems to have been poured into a frail body as a dangerous liquid into a Venetian glass. A romantic player, he recalls the legends loved by the old romantic school; the unknown teacher of the Sirens; the tamer of were-wolves; Hunold Singuf, who charmed the rats and the women and children of Hameln; Rath Krespel, who broke open violins and hunted their souls. Tall, thin, with eyes that seem to shed no light, with prominent cheek-bones and an apologetic chin, with a nimbus of hair of "orange shading into old gold," with feline step and bearing—here is one whom Hoffman might have dreamed of when at midnight the spirits tried to stop his pen. Without affectation, for no designed eccentricity could accentuate his personality; modest, for he knows full well his power—he could spare a little of his mechanism without throwing dice for success.

He was heard in works of the modern and the romantic school, and it is possible, nay probable, that as all other pianists, he has his limitations; but he is none the less remarkable, if this turns out to be true. Surely last Saturday he gave abundant evidence in support of his reputation. But how is it possible to describe his playing? Take down all the adjectives of praise from the shelf, dust them and arrange them properly; they are not worth a pure, full and liquid tone of his cantabile or a flash of his bravura. Prismatic words grow dull and pale, and the devices of the rhapsodist are in vain. Or put it under the microscope, or subject it to analytical tests. Call attention to his marvelous use of the pedals; point out the devitalization of certain portions of the arms by which he gains effects, or tell of any of his mechanical processes; can you thus convey to one that did not hear him, the strength, the beauty, the charm of his performance? Let it be admitted that he occasionally pounded, as in the rhapsodie; that in the waltz, delightful as it was, there was perhaps too great a desire to say something new; what then is left to the severest critic as a legitimate subject for fault-finding? This androgynous pianist combines the qualities most esteemed in man and woman—strength and beauty, manliness and grace. His phrasing is that of a born composer; he has the poet's taste; and his great mechanism serves simply to present adequately his thoughts, that they may be understood.

This much is certainly true of his first performance, and the scenes of enthusiasm that followed each and every number are of rare occurrence in this town. But Paderewski has not yet been heard here in the works of Beethoven or Schumann or their predecessors. He will give several recitals, the first this afternoon. The opening chapters of his continued story are strong and impressive. A final judgment should not be pronounced before all of his characters are introduced and play their parts to the end.

PHILIP HALE.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

Paderewski at the Symphony Concert.

There were none of the effects and impressions of an orthodox symphony concert in Music Hall Saturday evening. There was a Paderewski concert, and this to be sure is a very new kind of concert. It is a concert in which the man Paderewski might easily upset almost any rules of music that have heretofore fettered the human mind, and his divine right to do so would be accepted with but the slightest questioning. Such indeed was Paderewski with the music that he played. It is not of present import that he did not play any such representative work as appeals to the understanding, such for example as Beethoven's op. 53, 57 or 106, the great Mozart concerto in D minor, or the equally great Brahms concerto in B minor. To judge an artist from the point of view of any such art work as he does not attempt to perform, and to either praise or condemn him accordingly, is a habit that prevails among certain young students in this vicinity, who are too apt to leave a concert hall after hearing a great artist just as though they "know everything"—to quote our country store philosopher, the late Josh Billings—"but who really know nothing, except how to spill 'vittles' on their clothes." So, if there are any of these barnacle critics in this city just at the present time, as there have been upon so many occasions when great artists have been here, it is to be hoped that they may respect the pianoforte playing of Paderewski none the less as they bear in mind the very opportune suggestion of the late Mr. Billings.

It should be stated, furthermore, that the Paderewski who played in New York to Boston musicians and a New York audience, on Nov. 24, and the Paderewski who played in Music Hall Saturday evening, are in no spiritual acceptance of the term quite the same. Not to be too paradoxical the fault of the Paderewski of the first occasion seemed with just such individualism for Bach, Beethoven, and Schumann as was then both superfluous and inartistic, but that for Paderewski, the composer, and Chopin and Liszt on Saturday evening was superbly meritorious. The Latin word genius had a particular application to him at the concert referred to in New York, in that the word originally signified the divine nature which is innate in all human beings.

In a far broader sense is Paderewski a genius, for he proved himself equal on Saturday evening to an inherently able interpretation of just the divine nature that one finds imbedded in any great art-work. There can be no two opinions as to the merit of the artist's first appearance before a Boston audience. With his own concerto, and none the less with the music of Chopin and Liszt, he magnificently set forth that he has something more than "talent which is in man's possession." He also has, to quote the lamented James Russell Lowell, the very "genius in whose possession man is."

We should not forget that this man's genius made its first Boston appearance many months ago, when Mme. Julie Rivé-King most ably played his concerto at one of the symphony concerts, and with all respect to any performer who might have played it before, one can but feel that the work was heard here for the first time from the composer himself on Saturday evening. This work plainly addresses itself to the imagination through the senses. In it there is far greater symmetry of form than one is apt to find in almost any other modern concerto. Either one of the concertos of Liszt, for example, is simply a virtuoso's concertos. Quite to the reverse, there will abundantly be found in the work that was performed on Saturday evening just such art-contents, as in the proper adjustment of the high and the low, the long and the short tones of music, is a charming masterpiece.

Even the hypercritical Heraclitus of old might easily perceive the fundamental art-principles upon which this concerto is founded; for the fundamental principles of art have been the same for ages, and are much the same in sculpture and painting as in music. The work is neither strange nor bold. It is a normal art work. The time has passed, let us bear in mind, when one can reasonably expect that there will be created any musical composition that is really and completely new. Now Paderewski is by no means fastidious in aiming for the mere effects of originality. He prefers instead to invest his creations with just such charms of naturalness as are at least synonyms of some actual newness in art. The first allegro, perhaps, bears less the impress of deep thought than of real sentiment. In the second movement especially there is a fine, broad and original vein of melody which, with all its heart feeling, is wonderfully supported by the artistic skill of a real master.

Of the three movements it seems but natural that the finale should have been most favorably received, as its spirit throughout with all its lively, fresh and vigorous rhythms is exceedingly lighthearted and joyous. Here, as in other portions of the work, the composer has had his say in a perfectly natural and straightforward manner, yet with all the musical genius, and no less with all the vigor, skill and propriety of a whole souled and superbly educated musician. The performance of it was correspondingly great, whether or not when rated by the extraordinary technique that the pianist displayed, or from the psychologist's standpoint. In polyphonic passages especially, Mr. Paderewski is amazingly successful in bringing out the theme whenever it appears. Not only with his own concerto, but later in the evening his ecstatic embrace of some of the most uncompromising difficulties was no less effective than was the swaying, swinging, piquant, buoyancy with which for example he treated the waltz in C sharp minor by Chopin. With Liszt's Campanella which he played for an encore, there was the nicest elasticity, promptness and accuracy noticeable in his treatment of the skips.

Paderewski's fortissimos it is true are occasionally somewhat harsh and bawdy. On the other hand, no such perfectly clear, limpid, far reaching and ethereal pianissimi were probably never heard in a Boston music hall as on Saturday evening, not even from Thalberg. An inexplicable feature of his success, too, is that his virtuosic resources are on such intimate terms with his will. Yes, his pearly, drop-like whispering touch often responds with ethereal effect to the delicately fine and artistic feeling of the singing artist that he unquestionably is.

Last season a phenomenal pianist with a "one story intellect" created an extraordinary sensation at one of the symphonies. It is a pleasure to bear record that he is followed this year by a far greater pianist with the "three story intellect," of the pianist, musician and composer. Paderewski created the most impressive sensation on Saturday evening that Boston has experienced from any musical artist since Rubinstein was here. The concert began with Beethoven's fourth symphony, which was delightfully played, and the programme also included the "Carnival of Paris," music by Saint Saens, and Weber's overture to Euryanthe.

C. L. CAPEN.

Post Dec 24.
MORNING, DECEMBER

APART FROM THE MUSIC.

A TALK WITH PADEREWSKI

In the Artists' Room of Music
Hall After the Concert
Was Over,

WHILE ADMIRERS BEGGED AN AUTOGRAPH.

He Doesn't Like to Be Interviewed, but Talks Very Entertainingly Just the Same—How He Lives at Home—
Never Omits Practising.

After the concert was all over, and the applause that would not cease had sought him out in the artists' room, and he had again and again gone back to the stage and bowed and retired, and, finally, seeing that the audience simply would not leave their chairs he consented to return and dash off another masterful gem, and again bowed, bowing, away to his room—even then he could not escape. There was a crowd of personal friends already there, and singly and in pairs and trios his lady admirers, who were strangers, followed him in, and some with confidence and others with timid bashfulness, but all with his photographs, they asked him to write his name.

And, smilingly, through the blue smoke of a cigarette, he would wipe the perspiration from his forehead and lean over the table strewn with pictures and cards and musical programmes and invitations, and write the name.

A man about five feet seven, slim; a Prince Albert buttoned close about him; a bright necktie; a long but round and full neck; a very pale, thin face, the features of which are regular, and all save the eyes large; the eyes also pale and long but inclined to remain about half closed; a faint white mustache, a mere suggestion of a goatee, same lack of color, and then, crowning all, a shock of bright red hair which, in all the world, is Paderewski's own. It grows in tropical luxuriance all about his head and seeks its own methods unrestrained and unchecked. At utter variance with the pompadour style affected by musical artists, as a rule it hangs over and stands like a lion's mane out from his white forehead, observing a scarcely distinguishable part and seemingly at its own sweet will.

And there, still feeling the ecstasy of Liszt, surrounded by his enraptured friends, and a thin, blue, poetic haze of cigarette smoke, the conversation, when a new Post man dropped in last evening, was just what he came to hear.

Paderewski does not like to be quoted in newspapers. He does not think it in good form for an artist to talk about himself for publication. But though born in Poland and living in Paris, he does talk English and reads all criticisms upon himself—says he does and says that through them he is gaining a mastery of the language.

He is quartered in a suite of four elegant rooms on the first floor of the Brunswick. There he has music and sleeping rooms, and there he practices for hours and hours daily. Although pursued and raved about by women, Paderewski does not affect their society, but seeks that of men, and in which he is very popular. He expresses himself as particularly pleased with his reception by the St. Botolph and Tavern clubs. His habits are necessarily irregular. He sleeps and eats according to his engagements, but starves himself before his recitals because, he says, he can not play upon a full stomach—and that's not said in a joke. He eats but one square meal a day, and that after his performances. For the balance he lives on tea and lemons and soda, and perhaps in the morning an egg.

He practises unremittently—say eight to ten hours a day. Previous to his initial performance in this country, in New York last November, he played every day at Steinway Hall, one day carrying his "practice vigil," as he calls them, through fifteen hours without intercession and without food, other than a little lemon, and until his attendants fell asleep through exhaustion.

"Yes, I like Boston very much," he said in the course of the running conversation. "I felt at home here from the first. I have been made to feel so by its hospitable people. I wish to express to you my very high admiration for Boston's Symphony Orchestra. I consider it the best orchestra in the world—not excepting the orchestra of the Conservatoire in Paris. There are some few better instruments in the Conservatoire, but as a whole the Symphony stands above it. It is very fortunate in its director, for Mr. Nikisch is very much superior to that of the Conservatoire. After the performance of my Concerto in Brooklyn, in which Nikisch directed the accompaniment, I declared I would never play the piece again, and I will not—as its perfection may not be reached again."

Paderewski is but 31 years of age. He was married at 19 and his wife died one year later, when a son was born. The child is an invalid, having an affection of the spine. He is 11 years old and remains with friends and under constant treatment in Paris.

Paderewski has created the greatest sensation and attracted the largest audiences of any pianist who ever visited this country. His audience, netting $2291 at Madison Square Garden, is said to be the high water mark in this respect. He was compelled to seek more room there and went to Music Hall. From Boston he goes to Chicago and at the end of March returns to England. In June he sails for Australia. He has had a very enticing offer for the Chicago Fair of '93 but has not accepted it as yet.

In playing, Paderewski sits erectly before the instrument and presents a very graceful figure, his eyes resting apparently upon the keys before him. "I see everyone in the audience, however," he says, "and when I feel that they are following me it increases my inspiration. Often I note some individual who I can feel is especially sympathetic and I play to that one—but I do not like to have you print those things."

His secretary and agent say that one of their chief troubles is his disinclination to be interviewed. He is extremely companionable, however, and can take and tell a joke as well as anybody. He tells of an imitator he has at Tony Pastor's, New York, who is described as a gaunt, red-haired individual with flute-like legs, who plays the piano in a remarkable way. He reaches his climax by running the A minor arpeggio up the keyboard very rapidly, and quite accurately at that, and when he reaches the last A on the keyboard he rolls off the stool and turns flipflaps and cart wheels down to the footlights, where he rises up, his red hair scattered all over his face, and exclaims, "that one I have on 'Paddy-whiskers!'"

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The sensation of the eighth Symphony concert was the début of Paderewski. The hall was packed and the sale of admission tickets had been stopped some days before the concert. The young Polish composer and artist was received with warmth and recalled after his performance with an intense and sustained enthusiasm such as Boston rarely manifests, and was now nobly won by him in his double capacity. His own concerto in A-minor, which he had chosen for his entrée, is replete with beauty, proportionate in its elements, poetic and logical. It was not unknown to all the audience, because Mme. Rivé-King had played it on a Philharmonic evening in March last. The fact is interesting that Paderewski proposed to devote himself to composition long before he discovered such an eminent ability and love for the piano, and his concerto has therefore the characteristics of a general writer rather than those of a specialist. True it is that the solo part is so treated that any but a pianist of the first rank must come quickly to confusion in it; but the orchestra is no less strongly, brilliantly and feelingly displayed, and there are many bits of obligato which must gratify by their grace, their vivacity, or their pointedness the bandmen to whom they fall as the work proceeds. The piano part, as delivered by its author, was resplendent with all the resources of display in figure or in force; its audacious octaves, its scintillating double trills, its flying scales, its sweeping arpeggios, its thunderous chords and its wild leaps from peak to peak of phrase were magnificent exhibitions of the most sure and lucent technique of the time, while its cantabile, the subdued gracefulness of its lighter adornment and the perfect consideration of its passages of accompaniment, demonstrated that the player was not merely a virtuoso of unfaltering fingers, nerves of elastic steel and fatigueless wrists, but an artist with poetic fancies and pulsating sympathies. For this stupendous technique seemed to come without thought and without exertion, and to be the most natural and unaffected means to the end of making the music most true and telling. The orchestra seconded Paderewski admirably. Later in the evening he gave three solo numbers—two from Chopin, and one, a Hungarian rhapsody, from Liszt, and evoked no less ardent delight than before, being by turns captivating and dominant. The new number of the programme was Svendsen's gay, hurly-burly-ish "Paris Carnival," a clever picture of the eager, hurrying, mercurial moods which sway the most volatile of cities in the hour of its greatest freedom and abandon. Beethoven's fourth symphony, in an unexceptionable rendering, begun the evening, and a good reading of Weber's "Euryanthe" overture ended a programme which was a half-hour too long. Tonight the orchestra will be away, but on next Saturday evening the centenary of Mozart's death—December 5, 1791—will be honored by a programme drawn wholly from his writing. The band will play the "Magic Flute" overture and the E-flat symphony, Messrs. Loeffler and Kneisel will play the first movement of the symphonic concerto for violin and viola, and Mme. Fursch-Madi will sing two large airs.

HIS HAIR IS NOT PIANO.

What's the useski,
Paderewski,
Of your phalangeal skill,
When you're playing
Goes sasshaying
With your frontal hirsute frill?

You're no so-so
Virtuoso
But a reg'lar, 'way up player;
Still your phrasing
'S not amazing
As your perturbing hair.

You can churn the
Sweet nocturne,
Of th' andante you've the hang:
But your pounding
Lacks the sounding
Timbre of your towzled bang.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the eighth symphony concert was as follows:

Beethoven: Symphony No. 4, in B-flat, op. 60.
Paderewski: Concerto in A minor, op. 17.
Svendsen: Episode, "Carnival in Paris."
Chopin: Impromptu in F-sharp, op. 38.
Chopin: Valse in C-sharp minor, op. 64, No. 2.
Liszt: Rhapsodie hongroise No. 2, in C-sharp minor.
Weber: Overture to "Euryanthe."

Mr. Ignace J. Paderewski was the pianist.

A memorable concert! The ever beautiful B-flat symphony made a noble beginning. There was, now and then, a little roughness in the playing, but the performance as a whole was an excellent one. The Adagio was especially well given: never have we heard the violins and violas creep in so imperceptibly, adding their warmth of color to the wooden wind, in the wonderful cadence that comes just before the entrance of the "conclusion theme."

Svendsen's "Carnival" shows, if nothing else, good grounds for the great popularity he enjoyed in Paris during his sojourn there; it certainly has most of the vices of modern French music, the characteristics which delight the Parisian concert-goer today. It suggested to us some thoughts on descriptive and picturesque music in general. We could not help thinking what an exceedingly ephemeral life a composition of this sort must have, if its life is to depend mainly upon its descriptive or suggestive virtue. So much depends upon the point of view of this or that age! Take this piece of Svendsen's; suppose (if you can) that it could have been heard in Father Haydn's day! It would then indubitably have been set down as a daring tone painting of hell-fire and brimstone. Come down a few generations, say to Berlioz's time, and you would find it recognized as a musical picture of a witches' Sabbath. Today it calls itself a representation of carnival revelry and merriment; but who knows, if it live to be heard by our grandchildren, that they will not find in it a vivid suggestion of five o'clock tea? So do things lose their savor with time! To us last Saturday evening the piece suggested mainly a troop of intoxicated undergraduates trying to sing the march in the "Fille du Régiment," and not being able quite to catch the tune. It was exceedingly brilliantly played.

The "Euryanthe" overture was grandly given; we were especially glad to find Mr. Nikisch take the cantabile second theme not so very much slower than the principal tempo.

And Paderewski? Ah, there is a man like few! During the last two or three days we have heard many people insist upon it that he was a poet. This reminds us a little of what Robert Browning once said to a lady who asked him to read a certain sermon by Theodore Parker, telling him that he would find it a perfect prose-poem. "For heaven's sake don't bring me any prose-poems," cried Browning: "that is a genre for which we poets have no respect at all!" We have had so many "poets" of the pianoforte of late years that the term has lost a good deal of its dignity. These gentry have, as a rule, had one grave failing in common; in becoming "poets" they have too often ceased to be musicians; their playing has been so very poetic that it has well-nigh knocked all the music out of the compositions they played. Let us not rank Paderewski with such as these. We will admit freely that he is as poetic as you please; but he is mainly and predominantly a musician, and this is—in his circumstances—far more important. He comes to us both as composer and pianist; let us take the composer first—a tout seigneur tout honneur!

In his A minor concerto it is probably the poetic, imaginative side that presents itself most strongly to the average hearer; but the more careful, experienced listener is struck far more forcibly with the way in which he has made his glowing poetic imagination obedient to normal musical conditions. In this beautiful work he has given to the world something a thousand times higher and better than a tone-poem, namely, a really poetic composition. Note the wealth of healthy melodic invention in the work; the stout, natural, organic construction of each one of the three movements. Note, not merely the richness and variety, but the well-considered balance of the orchestral coloring, the careful minding of what painters would call the values. His orchestration is as truly organic as his musical form; there are no random flashes of color, but every shade shows its connection with, and dependence upon, something else. This is music, and all the better for being poetic music; it is no mere half musical imaginative Pfuscherei. In a word, this concerto seems to us one of the finest of its kind we have heard for some time.

As a pianist Paderewski naturally belongs to the hors concours class. Whatever respect one may have for adjectives, one need have no hesitation in calling him great. A highly poetic player he certainly is; but what we admire most in his playing, as in his writing, is its fine musical quality. There is infinite variety of light and shade in it, a well-nigh unparalleled warmth of feeling, an ideal poetic quality; but there is also a fine sense for musical beauty—beauty of tone, beauty of outline, beauty of relation—such as is all too rare today. In the power of exciting enthusiasm, of carrying an audience along with him unresisting, he is second to no pianist we have ever heard. His phrasing is a marvel of perfection. We had rather have had him leave the second Liszt rhapsody to young ladies' seminaries, and must say that his giving the Liszt-Paganini "Campanella" was out of place at a symphony concert—wonderfully as he played it. But his playing of his own concerto and of the two things by Chopin was a pure delight not soon to be forgotten. Only a genius can play so.

The next programme (Dec. 19) is: Overture to "Die Zauberflöte;" symphonic concerto for violin and viola; symphony in E-flat; two arias—all by Mozart. Mme. Fursch-Madi will be the singer. Mr. C. M. Loeffler the violinist, and Mr. Franz Kneisel the violist.

M. Paderewski considers the Boston Symphony Orchestra the finest in the world, not excepting the orchestra of the Conservatoire in Paris. There are some better instruments in the French orchestra, but as a whole the American one is superior. So well did the orchestra perform M. Paderewski's concerto in Brooklyn that the composer then declared he would never play the piece again, as such perfection might not again be reached.

108
room there and went to Music Hall. From Boston he goes to Chicago and at the end of March returns to England. In June he sails for Australia. He has had a very enticing offer for the Chicago Fair of '93 but has not accepted it as yet.

In playing, Paderewski sits erectly before the instrument and presents a very graceful figure, his eyes resting apparently upon the keys before him. "I see everyone in the audience, however," he says, "and when I feel that they are following me it increases my inspiration. Often I note some individual who I can feel is especially sympathetic and I play to that one—but I do not like to have you print these things."

His secretary and agent say that one of their chief troubles is his disinclination to be interviewed. He is extremely companionable, however, and can take and tell a joke as well as anybody. He tells of an imitator he has at Tony Pastor's, New York, who is described as a gaunt, red-haired individual with flute-like legs, who plays the piano in a remarkable way. He reaches his climax by running the A minor arpeggio up the keyboard very rapidly, and quite accurately at that, and when he reaches the last A on the keyboard he rolls off the stool and turns flipflaps and cart wheels down to the footlights, where he rises up, his red hair scattered all over his face, and exclaims, "that one I have on 'Paddy-whiskers!'"

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The sensation of the eighth Symphony concert was the début of Paderewski. The hall was packed and the sale of admission tickets had been stopped some days before the concert. The young Polish composer and artist was received with warmth and recalled after his performance with an intense and sustained enthusiasm such as Boston rarely manifests, and was now nobly won by him in his double capacity. His own concerto in A-minor, which he had chosen for his entrée, is replete with beauty, proportionate in its elements, poetic and logical. It was not unknown to all the audience, because Mme. Rivé-King had played it on a Philharmonic evening in March last. The fact is interesting that Paderewski proposed to devote himself to composition long before he discovered such an eminent ability and love for the piano, and his concerto has therefore the characteristics of a general writer rather than those of a specialist. True it is that the solo part is so treated that any but a pianist of the first rank must come quickly to confusion in it; but the orchestra is no less strongly, brilliantly and feelingly displayed, and there are many bits of obligato which must gratify by their grace, their vivacity, or their pointedness the bandsmen to whom they fall as the work proceeds. The piano part, as delivered by its author, was resplendent with all the resources of display in figure or in force; its audacious octaves, its scintillating double trills, its flying scales, its sweeping arpeggios, its thunderous chords and its wild leaps from peak to peak of phrase were magnificent exhibitions of the most sure and lucent technique of the time, while its cantabile, the subdued gracefulness of its lighter adornment and the perfect consideration of its passages of accompaniment, demonstrated that the player was not merely a virtuoso of unfaltering fingers, nerves of elastic steel and fatigueless wrists, but an artist with poetic fancies and pulsating sympathies. For this stupendous technique seemed to come without thought and without exertion, and to be the most natural and unaffected means to the end of making the music most true and telling. The orchestra seconded Paderewski admirably. Later in the evening he gave three solo numbers—two from Chopin, and one, a Hungarian rhapsody, from Liszt, and evoked no less ardent delight than before, being by turns captivating and dominant. The new number of the programme was Svendsen's gay, hurly-burly-ish "Paris Carnival," a clever picture of the eager, hurrying, mercurial moods which sway the most volatile of cities in the hour of its greatest freedom and abandon. Beethoven's fourth symphony, in an unexceptionable rendering, begun the evening, and a good reading of Weber's "Euryanthe" overture ended a programme which was a half-hour too long. Tonight the orchestra will be away, but on next Saturday evening the centenary of Mozart's death—December 5, 1791—will be honored by a programme drawn wholly from his writing. The band will play the "Magic Flute" overture and the E flat symphony, Messrs. Loeffler and Kneisel will play the first movement of the symphonic concerto for violin and viola, and Mme. Fursch-Madi will sing two large airs.

HIS HAIR IS NOT PIANO.

What's the useski,
Paderewski,
Of your phalangial skill,
When you're playing
Goes sasshaying
With your frontal hirsute frill?

You're no so-so
Virtuoso
But a reg'lar, 'way up player;
Still your phrasing
'S not amazing
As your perturbing hair.

You can churn the
Sweet nocturne,
Of th' andante you've the hang:
But your pounding
Lacks the sounding
Timbre of your towzled bang.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the eighth symphony concert was as follows:

Beethoven: Symphony No. 4, in B-flat, op. 60.
Paderewski: Concerto in A minor, op. 17.
Svendsen: Episode, "Carnival in Paris."
Chopin: Impromptu in F-sharp, op. 36.
Chopin: Valse in C-sharp minor, op. 64, No. 2.
Liszt: Rhapsodie hongroise No. 2, in C-sharp minor.
Weber: Overture to "Euryanthe."

Mr. Ignace J. Paderewski was the pianist.

A memorable concert! The ever beautiful B-flat symphony made a noble beginning. There was, now and then, a little roughness in the playing, but the performance as a whole was an excellent one. The Adagio was especially well given; never have we heard the violins and violas creep in so imperceptibly, adding their warmth of color to the wooden wind, in the wonderful cadence that comes just before the entrance of the "conclusion theme."

Svendsen's "Carnival" shows, if nothing else—good grounds for the great popularity he enjoyed in Paris during his sojourn there; it certainly has most of the vices of modern French music, the characteristics which delight the Parisian concert-goer today. It suggested to us some thoughts on descriptive and picturesque music in general. We could not help thinking what an exceedingly ephemeral life a composition of this sort must have, if its life is to depend mainly upon its descriptive or suggestive virtue. So much depends upon the point of view of this or that age! Take this piece of Svendsen's; suppose (if you can) that it could have been heard in Father Haydn's day! It would then indubitably have been set down as a daring tone painting of hell-fire and brimstone. Come down a few generations, say to Berlioz's time, and you would find it recognized as a musical picture of a witches' Sabbath. Today it calls itself a representation of carnival revelry and merriment; but who knows, if it live to be heard by our grandchildren, that they will not find in it a vivid suggestion of five o'clock tea? So do things lose their savor with time! To us last Saturday evening the piece suggested mainly a troop of intoxicated undergraduates trying to sing the march in the "Fille du Regiment," and not being able quite to catch the tune. It was exceedingly brilliantly played.

The "Euryanthe" overture was grandly given; we were especially glad to find Mr. Nikisch take the cantabile second theme not so very much slower than the principal tempo.

And Paderewski? Ah, there is a man like few! During the last two or three days we have heard many people insist upon it that he was a poet. This reminds us a little of what Robert Browning once said to a lady who asked him to read a certain sermon by Theodore Parker, telling him that he would find it a perfect prose-poem. "For heaven's sake don't bring me any prose-poems," cried Browning: "that is a genre for which we poets have no respect at all!" We have had so many "poets" of the pianoforte of late years that the term has lost a good deal of its dignity. These gentry have, as a rule, had one grave failing in common; in becoming "poets" they have too often ceased to be musicians; their playing has been so very poetic that it has well-nigh knocked all the music out of the compositions they played. Let us not rank Paderewski with such as these. We will admit freely that he is as poetic as you please; but he is mainly and predominantly a musician, and this is—in his circumstances—far more important. He comes to us both as composer and pianist; let us take the composer first—a tout seigneur tout honneur!

109

In his A minor concerto it is probably the poetic, imaginative side that presents itself most strongly to the average hearer; but the more careful, experienced listener is struck far more forcibly with the way in which he has made his glowing poetic imagination obedient to normal musical conditions. In this beautiful work he has given to the world something a thousand times higher and better than a tone-poem, namely, a really poetic composition. Note the wealth of healthy melodic invention in the work; the stout, natural, organic construction of each one of the three movements. Note, not merely the richness and variety, but the well-considered balance of the orchestral coloring, the careful minding of what painters would call the values. His orchestration is as truly organic as his musical form; there are no random flashes of color, but every shade shows its connection with, and dependence upon, something else. This is music, and all the better for being poetic music; it is no mere half-musical imaginative Pfuscheret. In a word, this concerto seems to us one of the finest of its kind we have heard for some time.

As a pianist Paderewski naturally belongs to the hors concours class. Whatever respect one may have for adjectives, one need have no hesitation in calling him great. A highly poetic player he certainly is; but what we admire most in his playing, as in his writing, is its fine musical quality. There is infinite variety of light and shade in it, a well-nigh unparalleled warmth of feeling, an ideal poetic quality; but there is also a fine sense for musical beauty—beauty of tone, beauty of outline, beauty of relation—such as is all too rare today. In the power of exciting enthusiasm, of carrying an audience along with him unresisting, he is second to no pianist we have ever heard. His phrasing is a marvel of perfection. We had rather have had him leave the second Liszt rhapsody to young ladies' seminaries, and must say that his giving the Liszt-Paganini "Campanella" was out of place at a symphony concert—wonderfully as he played it. But his playing of his own concerto and of the two things by Chopin was a pure delight not soon to be forgotten. Only a genius can play so.

The next programme (Dec. 19) is: Overture to "Die Zauberflöte;" symphonic concerto for violin and viola; symphony in E-flat; two arias—all by Mozart. Mme. Fursch-Madi will be the singer. Mr. C. M. Loeffler the violinist, and Mr. Franz Kneisel the violist. Drawn Dec. 7-91

M. Paderewski considers the Boston Symphony Orchestra the finest in the world, not excepting the orchestra of the Conservatoire in Paris. There are some better instruments in the French orchestra, but as a whole the American one is superior. So well did the orchestra perform M. Paderewski's concerto in Brooklyn that the composer then declared he would never play the piece again, as such perfection might not again be reached.

Boston Symphony Concert.

Phil. Dec 12/91

It is not often that the delicate duties of a critic are facilitated by an admission of that which in general should be kept out of criticism, viz: comparison; the quick succession of two important concerts, each introducing a pianist of significance, and both playing the same work—this is so uncommon an event that comparison on the part of the critic is perfectly justified. But—alas! for the critics ill luck!—now, that for once he could have compared, there was no comparison! Grünfeld proved in every way so far superior to Paderewski, that a comparison would be almost unfair. The Rubinstein concerts in D minor, is massively conceived and offers greater temptations for “paunding” to the pianist, than any other, and—alackaday—Paddy Russky could not resist them, while Grünfeld refrained from the display of brutal force. From beginning to end the Concerto was a noble work of art in the hands of Grünfeld; technically finished, beautifully phrased, and in the cantilena parts he showed great warmth and true sentiment, (not slavish morbidity).

The considerations for which Gruenfeld was pronounced the lesser of the two by the New York musical press have no validity here, and when we judge an artist in this city, we judge him by his merits alone, uninfluenced by a manufactured enthusiasm; this may serve as a reply to our esteemed contemporary the Musical Courier, who questions our right to our opinion.

The orchestra was all that its name and reputation implied and the difference between it and the one we heard last Monday was most strikingly noticeable in the accompaniment of the piano concerto; however free the pianist moved, Nikisch's baton was with him as promptly as his shadow, and the same promptness of attack, the same refinement in shading, the same clear pronunciation of every essential little motive, was noticeable in all the works on the program, especially in the A major symphony. A word or two could be said about the idea of orchestration of the Bach pieces (not that the orchestration was not clever, but the idea seems so anachronistic), but they were so beautifully and daintily played, that for once we will not object to Bach in modern costume.

MUSICAL. Sentinel

The Symphony Concert.

There was an enormous audience at Music Hall, last evening, the occasion being the first appearance here of Mr. Ignace J. Paderewski, to whom the immense attendance was undoubtedly due. As he came forward to take his place at the piano, he was greeted with much enthusiasm and whatever may have been his confidence in his powers, such a reception could not but have steadied it by convincing him that he was about to play before a company friendly to him from the very outset. The personal presence of the artist caused a buzz of interest to pass through the hall. He is tall and slim, pallid of countenance, his face is long and thin, and with sharply-cut features. His hair, which is profuse, is of a reddish hue, and stands up as if it were electrified. A slight moustache decks his upper lip, and a very long neck protrudes above his collar—a peculiar and striking individuality generally; almost uncanny in the effect it produces at first sight, but tempered by a quiet, modest and dignified bearing. He played his own concerto in A-minor, a work that was heard at these concerts in March last, when it was performed by Mrs. Julia Klve-Kling. It is built on the traditional model, and has little if any affinity with the modern concerto. In other words, the composer has not attempted to blend the piano and the orchestra equally, but has given full prominence to the solo part for the display of the artist's skill. The style is wholly modern, and so is the color; but it is lucid, melodious and free from that contemporaneous striving after mere novelty at the expense of all that is pleasing in art. It is abundant in life, is always clear, and is admirable in the richness and the varied contrasts of its effects. The orchestration is of a high order, and the work, as a whole, is impressive in its fine and well- sustained vigor and its genuine musical interest. It illustrates the most advanced stage of modern piano technique and that it is tremendously difficult will go without saying. Of the artist's marvellous performance of his work it is not easy to write with moderation. His technique is extraordinary in its scope and perfection; but technique of the most brilliant order has become of late so far from uncommon that we have learned to expect it rather than to be surprised at it—wonder or admiration over it; and were this all that made Paderewski's playing memorable, the subject could be easily dismissed, despite the beauty of his touch, the extraordinary evenness and pearliness of his scale runs, the pure singing quality he draws from the piano, and the utter freedom from all trickery that marks his playing. Those who went to be dazzled by mere finger work had enough and to spare in the way of the astonishing; but there is vastly more than finger-play in Paderewski; there are infinite purity of style, poetic feeling, deep artistic intelligence, grace and tenderness in equal measure with fire and power; youthful fervor leavened with mature and refined sentiment. His octave playing is almost bewilderingly free and impetuous; his bravura is exciting in its swing and sweep. An occasional tendency in him to thump the piano unmercifully causes a shock, and emphasizes the sad reflection that nothing is perfect in this world; but he soon causes you to forget the fault in some rare beauty of expression or caressing grace of feeling that follows. The playing of the concerto aroused a furor of enthusiasm the like of which has not been often heard in Music Hall. The applause was deafening, and did not cease until the artist had been recalled four times. Later in the evening he played an Impromptu and Waltz by Chopin and a Liszt Rhapsodie Hongroise, No. 12, if we are not mistaken. His Chopin playing, in its chaste poetic feeling, its elegant phrasing and its delicate warmth, was indescribably fine. The sentiment was never overwrought, the taste was always pure, while a fine intellectuality dominated the whole. His reading differed from any that we had heard before, but they were so natural that they seemed as if they must be just what the composer intended. The waltz especially was given with a bewitching beauty and finish. The vulgar and brutal Liszt Rhapsody jarred on the senses after these; and it must be confessed that the artist here sank to the vulgarity and brutality of the work; for he pounded the instrument unmercifully at times, producing anything but a musical tone from it.

Any other piano than a Steinway would have given way under such treatment. The display of technique at other times was dazzling but it did not atone for the noise and thumping. Again the audience went wild over him, and recalled him four times in a fury of applause, to which he responded the last time, with a fascinatingly delicate and brilliant performance of Liszt's “Campanella.” His success through the whole concert was overwhelming. He fairly earned and fully deserved it. The orchestral performances were Beethoven's fourth symphony, an episode, “Carnival in Paris,” by Svendsen, given for the first time at these concerts, and brilliant in its orchestration, though not clear in its meaning; and Weber's Euryanthe overture. The next concert is to be in memory of Mozart, and will be devoted wholly to that composer's music. The soloists are to be Mme. Fursch-Madl, Mr. C. M. Loeffler and Mr. Franz Kaelzel.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the eighth symphony concert was as follows:

Beethoven: Symphony No. 4, in B-flat, op. 60.
Paderewski: Concerto in A minor, op. 17.
Svendsen: Episode, “Carnival in Paris.”
Chopin: Impromptu in F-sharp, op. 36.
Chopin: Valse in C-sharp minor, op. 64, No. 2.
Liszt: Rhapsodie hongroise No. 2, in C-sharp minor.
Weber: Overture to “Euryanthe.”

Mr. Ignace J. Paderewski was the pianist.

Svendsen's “Carnival” shows, if nothing else—good grounds for the great popularity he enjoyed in Paris during his sojourn there; it certainly has most of the vices of modern French music, the characteristics which delight the Parisian concert-goer today. It suggested to us some thoughts on descriptive and picturesque music in general. We could not help thinking what an exceedingly ephemeral life a composition of this sort must have, if its life is to depend mainly upon its descriptive or suggestive virtue. So much depends upon the point of view of this or that age! Take this piece of Svendsen's; suppose (if you can) that it could have been heard in Father Haydn's day! It would then indubitably have been set down as a daring tone painting of hell-fire and brimstone. Come down a few generations, say to Berlioz's time, and you would find it recognized as a musical picture of a witches' Sabbath. Today it calls itself a representation of carnival revelry and merriment; but who knows, if it live to be heard by our grandchildren, that they will not find in it a vivid suggestion of five o'clock tea? So do things lose their savor with time! To us last Saturday evening the piece suggested mainly a troop of intoxicated undergraduates trying to sing the march in the “Fille du Régiment,” and not being able quite to catch the tune.

And Paderewski? Ah, there is a man like few! In his A minor concerto it is probably the poetic, imaginative side that presents itself most strongly to the average hearer; but the more careful, experienced listener is struck far more forcibly with the way in which he has made his glowing poetic imagination obedient to normal musical conditions. In this beautiful work he has given to the world something a thousand times higher and better than a tone-poem, namely, a really poetic composition. Note the wealth of healthy melodic invention in the work; the stout, natural, organic construction of each one of the three movements. Note, not merely the richness and variety, but the well-considered balance of the orchestral coloring, the careful minding of what painters would call the values.

Boston Symphony Concert.

Phila. Dec 12/91

It is not often that the delicate duties of a critic are facilitated by an admission of that which in general should be kept out of criticism, viz: comparison; the quick succession of two important concerts, each introducing a pianist of significance, and both playing the same work—this is so uncommon an event that comparison on the part of the critic is perfectly justified. But—alas! for the critics ill luck!—now, that for once he could have compared, there was no comparison! Grünfeld proved in every way so far superior to Paderewski, that a comparison would be almost unfair. The Rubinstein concerts in D minor, is massively conceived and offers greater temptations for “paunding” to the pianist, than any other, and—alackaday—Paddy Russky could not resist them, while Grünfeld refrained from the display of brutal force. From beginning to end the Concerto was a noble work of art in the hands of Grünfeld; technically finished, beautifully phrased, and in the cantilena parts he showed great warmth and true sentiment, (not slavish morbidity).

The considerations for which Gruenfeld was pronounced the lesser of the two by the New York musical press have no validity here, and when we judge an artist in this city, we judge him by his merits alone, uninfluenced by a manufactured enthusiasm; this may serve as a reply to our esteemed contemporary the Musical Courier, who questions our right to our opinion.

The orchestra was all that its name and reputation implied and the difference between it and the one we heard last Monday was most strikingly noticeable in the accompaniment of the piano concerto; however free the pianist moved, Nikisch's baton was with him as promptly as his shadow, and the same promptness of attack, the same refinement in shading, the same clear pronunciation of every essential little motive, was noticeable in all the works on the program, especially in the A major symphony. A word or two could be said about the idea of orchestration of the Bach pieces (not that the orchestration was not clever, but the idea seems so anachronistic), but they were so beautifully and daintily played, that for once we will not object to Bach in modern costume.

MUSICAL. Scritta

The Symphony Concert.

There was an enormous audience at Music Hall, last evening, the occasion being the first appearance here of Mr. Ignace J. Paderewski, to whom the immense attendance was undoubtedly due. As he came forward to take his place at the piano, he was greeted with much enthusiasm and whatever may have been his confidence in his powers, such a reception could not but have steadied it by convincing him that he was about to play before a company friendly to him from the very outset. The personal presence of the artist caused a buzz of interest to pass through the hall. He is tall and slim, pallid of countenance, his face is long and thin, and with sharply-cut features. His hair, which is profuse, is of a reddish hue, and stands up as if it were electrified. A slight moustache decks his upper lip, and a very long neck protrudes above his collar—a peculiar and striking individuality generally; almost uncanny in the effect it produces at first sight, but tempered by a quiet, modest and dignified bearing. He played his own concerto in A-minor, a work that was heard at these concerts in March last, when it was performed by Mrs. Julia Kive-King. It is built on the traditional model, and has little if any affinity with the modern concerto. In other words, the composer was not attempted to blend the piano and the orchestra equally, but has given full prominence to the solo part for the display of the artist's skill. The style is wholly modern, and so is the color; but it is lucid, melodious and free from that contemporaneous striving after mere novelty at the expense of all that is pleasing in art. It is abundant in life, is always clear, and is admirable in the richness and the varied contrasts of its effects. The orchestration is of a high order, and the work, as a whole, is impressive in its fine and well- sustained vigor and its genuine musical interest. It illustrates the most advanced stage of modern piano technique and that it is tremendously difficult will go without saying. Of the artist's marvellous performance of his work it is not easy to write with moderation. His technique is extraordinary in its scope and perfection; but technique of the most brilliant order has become of late so far from uncommon that we have learned to expect it rather than to be surprised into wonder or admiration over it; and were this all that made Paderewski's playing memorable, the subject could be easily dismissed, despite the beauty of his touch, the extraordinary evenness and pearliness of his scale runs, the “pure singing” quality he draws from the piano, and the utter freedom from all trickery that marks his playing. Those who went to be dazzled by mere finger work had enough and to spare in the way of the astonishing; but there is vastly more than finger-play in Paderewski; there are infinite purity of style, poetic feeling, deep artistic intelligence, grace and tenderness in equilibrium with fire and power; youthful fervor leavened with mature and refined sentiment. His octave playing is almost bewilderingly free and impetuous; his bravura is exciting in its swing and sweep. An occasional tendency in him to thump the piano unmercifully causes a shock, and emphasizes the sad reflection that nothing is perfect in this world; but he soon causes you to forget the fault in some rare beauty of expression or caressing grace of feeling that follows. The playing of the concerto aroused a furor of enthusiasm the like of which has not been often heard in Music Hall. The applause was deafening, and did not cease until the artist had been recalled four times. Later in the evening he played an Impromptu and Waltz by Chopin and a Liszt Rhapsody Hongroise, No. 12. If we are not mistaken. His Chopin playing, in its chaste poetic feeling, its elegant phrasing and its delicate warmth, was indelibly fine. The sentiment was never overwrought; the taste was always pure, while a fine intellectuality dominated the whole. His readings differed from any that we had heard before, but they were so natural that they seemed as if they must be just what the composer intended. The waltz especially was given with a bewitching beauty and finish. The vulgar and brutal Liszt Rhapsody jarred on the senses after these; and it must be confessed that the artist here sank to the vulgarity and brutality of the work; for he pounded the instrument unmercifully at times, producing anything but a musical tone from it.

Any other piano than a Steinway would have given way under such treatment. The display of technique at other times was dazzling but it did not atone for the noise and thumping. Again the audience went wild over him, and recalled him four times in a flurry of applause, to which he responded the last time, with a fascinatingly delicate and brilliant performance of Liszt's “Campanella.” His success through the whole concert was overwhelming. He fairly earned and fully deserved it. The orchestral performances were Beethoven's fourth symphony, an episode, “Carnival in Paris,” by Svendsen, given for the first time at these concerts, and brilliant in its orchestration, though not clear in its meaning; and Weber's Euryanthe overture. The next concert is to be in memory of Mozart, and will be devoted wholly to that composer's music. The soloists are to be Mrs. Fursch-Madi, Mr. C. M. Loeffler and Mr. Franz Kiesel.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the eighth symphony concert was as follows:

Beethoven: Symphony No. 4, in B-flat, op. 60.
Paderewski: Concerto in A minor, op. 17.
Svendsen: Episode, “Carnival in Paris.”
Chopin: Impromptu in F-sharp, op. 36.
Chopin: Valse in C-sharp minor, op. 64, No. 2.
Liszt: Rhapsodie hongroise No. 2, in C-sharp minor.
Weber: Overture to “Euryanthe.”

Mr. Ignace J. Paderewski was the pianist.

Svendsen's “Carnival” shows, if nothing else—good grounds for the great popularity he enjoyed in Paris during his sojourn there; it certainly has most of the vices of modern French music, the characteristics which delight the Parisian concert-goer today. It suggested to us some thoughts on descriptive and picturesque music in general. We could not help thinking what an exceedingly ephemeral life a composition of this sort must have, if its life is to depend mainly upon its descriptive or suggestive virtue. So much depends upon the point of view of this or that age! Take this piece of Svendsen's; suppose (if you can) that it could have been heard in Father Haydn's day! It would then indubitably have been set down as a daring tone painting of hell-fire and brimstone. Come down a few generations, say to Berlioz's time, and you would find it recognized as a musical picture of a witches' Sabbath. Today it calls itself a representation of carnival revelry and merriment; but who knows, if it live to be heard by our grandchildren, that they will not find in it a vivid suggestion of five o'clock tea? So do things lose their savor with time! To us last Saturday evening the piece suggested mainly a troop of intoxicated undergraduates trying to sing the march in the “Fille du Régiment,” and not being able quite to catch the tune.

And Paderewski? Ah, there is a man like few! In his A minor concerto it is probably the poetic, imaginative side that presents itself most strongly to the average hearer; but the more careful, experienced listener is struck far more forcibly with the way in which he has made his glowing poetic imagination obedient to normal musical conditions. In this beautiful work he has given to the world something a thousand times higher and better than a tone-poem, namely, a really poetic composition. Note the wealth of healthy melodic invention in the work; the stout, natural, organic construction of each one of the three movements. Note, not merely the richness and variety, but the well-considered balance of the orchestral coloring, the careful minding of what painters would call the values.

As a pianist Paderewski naturally belongs to the hors concours class. Whatever respect one may have for adjectives, one need have no hesitation in calling him great. A highly poetic player he certainly is; but what we admire most in his playing, as in his writing, is its fine musical quality. There is infinite variety of light and shade in it, a well-nigh unparalleled warmth of feeling, an ideal poetic quality; but there is also a fine sense for musical beauty—beauty of tone, beauty of outline, beauty of relation—such as is all too rare today. In the power of exciting enthusiasm, of carrying an audience along with him unresisting, he is second to no pianist we have ever heard. His phrasing is a marvel of perfection. We had rather have had him leave the second Liszt rhapsody to young ladies' seminaries, and must say that his giving the Liszt-Paganini "Campanella" was out of place at a symphony concert—wonderfully as he played it. But his playing of his own concerto and of the two things by Chopin was a pure delight not soon to be forgotten. Only a genius can play so.

THE SYMPHONIES.

EIGHTH CONCERT.

This was the programme for the eighth Symphony concert in Music hall, Saturday evening, December 5:

Beethoven.	Symphony No. 4, in B flat. Adagio; Allegro vivace.—Adagio.—Minuet.—Allegro ma non troppo.
Paderewski.	Concerto for Piano and Orchestra, in A minor, op. 17. Allegro. — Romanza (Andante).—Allegro molto vivace.
Svendsen.	Episode, "Carnival in Paris." (First time at these Concerts.) Soli for Piano. Impromptu.
a) Chopin.	Valse.
b) Chopin.	Rhapsodie Hongroise.
c) Liszt.	Overture, "Euryanthe."
Weber.
Soloist: Mr. Ignace J. Paderewski.

Boston music people turned out in full numbers to hear the famous pianist, Ignace J. Paderewski, at his first appearance here. So much has been written of and said about this remarkable man that Bostonians were ablaze with curiosity, not to say excitement, to see and hear this veritable wizard of the pianoforte keyboard. The personality of this man is striking, if not attractive. He is not small, but somewhat below the average weight. He came on the stage in an undemonstrative manner, first bowing to his audience, then the orchestra, and lastly, but not least, to the pianoforte. We are told he always does this, because he thinks the instrument is a part of himself, human, and deserving recognition just as much as his audience. Once seated at the pianoforte, he adjusts himself to it for the ordeal of the work in hand. A good look at his face shows rather a sad expression at first, which lights up wonderfully as he proceeds, becoming more and more animated, until his face grows radiant with the fire of genius from every point. The color and bristly appearance of his hair gives rather undue prominence to the size of his head, but proves attractive than otherwise, and helps to stamp his great personality.

Paderewski is unlike any other pianist who has visited us, therefore not subject to any comparisons. To illustrate: Within a few weeks we have heard two other good pianists at Music hall. One was an artist in every sense, so far as technique and a finished performance of his work was concerned. He also possessed the physique to enable him to accomplish any amount of difficulties, which he did with apparent ease. Yet, he was only a skilled artist. The other also was an artist in the sense of technical education, playing correctly, like a student who had learned his lesson thoroughly well. There was no special attractiveness about either of the above pianists, except their technical and artistic excellence. Paderewski possesses ample technique for his purposes, but of a different kind,—original, inspired, so to speak, though not so infallibly certain as that of some others heard here. But Paderewski is more than a "technician," a machine, an artist; he is a born genius of the most pronounced stamp.

His Concerto is interestingly constructed, richly orchestrated, and with him in the title rôle commanded the closest attention and created the greatest enthusiasm. He was many times called out. Each time he was recalled he bowed to his pianoforte! He also shook hands with conductor Nikisch for the fine manner in which his orchestra accompanied him.

The solo numbers, "Impromptu in F sharp," as also the "C sharp minor waltz" of Chopin, were most fascinatingly played. The "Second Liszt Rhapsodie" received a notable and original interpretation. There are some doubts if Paderewski ever plays this Rhapsodie twice alike. He made it brilliant, taking, highly interesting, riveting attention from beginning to end, though it was nothing like the traditional interpretation we have many times heard. However, with a genius like Paderewski, there is no use in taking exception to anything he may play, for he is a power unto himself, no doubt, playing just as he feels at the moment. There is, really, no accounting for the playing of such a man.

It would be an act of injustice not to speak of the excellent work of the orchestra. They merit nothing but words of praise. The Symphony was well read, and well played, with but few minor points to criticise. The Episode of Svendsen was certainly interesting from any standpoint.

WELCOME TO PADEREWSKI.

A Famous Pianist Enthusiastically Applauded at the Symphony Concert—"Cavalleria Rusticana" Sung by the Minnie Hauk Company.

Bostonians have at last had an opportunity of passing judgment upon the piano playing of Ignace J. Paderewski, an artist who has probably been more written and talked about in American musical circles during the last few weeks than was any pianist who has come to this country since the visit of Rubinstein.

It was only a few months ago that the name of Paderewski was almost unknown here, but so extensively was his coming advertised, and so eulogistic were the advance praises of his talents, that his appearance was awaited as the most important event in our musical world for many seasons.

His first concert in New York fairly electrified the piano enthusiasts of the metropolis, and the several recitals that he has given there not only sustained but rather increased the fever of enthusiasm aroused over his playing.

His successes there naturally awakened much interest here, so it was not surprising that the capacity of Music Hall should have been taxed at both the Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts of the Symphony orchestra. Indeed many hundred people were refused even admission tickets to these concerts, so general was the desire to hear this wonderful master of the pianoforte.

The uncommon demand upon space in the columns of this morning's paper makes it impossible to give an extended review of his performance last evening. His successes in New York have already been chronicled in THE GLOBE, so an idea of his ability may be suggested by stating that the Boston Symphony audiences seemed to heartily indorse all the eulogisms regarding his playing which have come from New York.

It is not often that the usually sedate and reserved Symphony patrons are stirred to demonstrative expressions of approval, but precedents were forgotten yesterday. The audience not only applauded but actually cheered Paderewski's performance, and insisted upon an encore number being added to his programme announcements.

Some admirer sent him a huge wreath of laurel decked with the Polish national colors and bearing in letters of gold words of homage. This was something unusual at a Symphony concert, but the audience gave cord approval.

Mr. Paderewski first played a concerto for piano and orchestra of his own composition. It was the first concerto that he has written, and while it may not be entitled to a very high rank among the many concertos that have been written by masters of other days, it is a piece which commands admiration for its display of musicianly attainments, sympathetic and poetic sentiment and command of orchestral resources. Its melodies are Polish in character, suggestive of folk songs, and are delightfully fresh and devoid of affectation in treatment. The finale movement is the most brilliant, both for solo instrument and orchestra. It is a work that can be repeatedly heard with pleasure.

Mr. Paderewski also played three short solos, an impromptu and a waltz, by Chopin, and a rhapsodie by Liszt. His performance of the impromptu, although technically flawless, did not make a marked impression. The difficult little waltz, however, created a sensation.

It has already been stated in these columns that Mr. Paderewski was more at home in the interpretation of Liszt than in presenting the works of Chopin. Last evening's performance served to confirm this statement.

Several pianists have recently been heard here whose playing possesses certain qualities not excelled by Mr. Paderewski's art, but few, if any, have shown such general ability in interpreting the works of the widely different classes of music composed for the pianoforte.

If Mr. Paderewski is not the greatest of living pianists, his rank is so near the first that it requires exceedingly exact discrimination to properly place him.

The programme offered by Director Nikisch consisted of Beethoven's fourth symphony, Svendsen's "Carnival of Paris" (a novelty here) and Weber's "Euryanthe" overture. The orchestra gave a very satisfactory performance of all these selections.

The next concert will be exclusively of Mozart's music, and the soloists will be Mme. Fursch-Mardi, C. M. Loetler and Franz Kneizel.

PADEREWSKI'S TRIUMPH.

The appearance of Paderewski, the pianist, at last evening's concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Arthur Nikisch, conductor, called out an audience that tested the fullest capacity of Music Hall.

It was the first appearance of this pianist here, and all present were evidently eager to determine individually the correctness of the extravagant claims put forward regarding the player. The term "extravagant" is used advisedly, for the supply of English adjectives has been completely exhausted in the press comments of this country and Europe upon this pianist's performances, and there is absolutely not a complimentary phrase left for those who are compelled, at this late day, to express an opinion regarding Paderewski's abilities.

As a matter of fact, words lose their value in any attempt to use them to convey a correct impression of the results got by this player, and there is a decided inclination to say "go and hear him," rather than to make any effort to say what his playing is like.

His own concerto in A minor, op. 17, heard here a couple of seasons ago, was the work he selected for his introduction to Boston, and it was a bit curious to see the development of the enthusiasm of the audience as its performance progressed. Paderewski's entrance was so quiet and unpretentious, and he went about his work in such a businesslike fashion, that there was a disposition to suspend judgment for a time and await evidence justifying concurrence in the opinions of other musical centres concerning the gifts of the newcomer.

This inclination vanished, however, after the pianist had played his opening passages in the concerto, and at the close of the first movement he had Boston at his feet, and from that onward it was but a question of degree in the enthusiastic recognition of his abilities by his first audience here.

The opening movement gave a hint of the singular purity of tone which he produces at all times, and a suggestion of his technical attainments. It remained for the beautiful romance making the second movement to serve as an exhibition of the wonderful delicacy, refinement and expression of his playing and the rare faculty he has of making the instrument sing under his skilful touch. The final allegro then served as an illustration of his absolute mastery of the keyboard and his ability in the line of pyrotechnical piano playing that has dazzled the publics of all the great cities abroad.

He is a pianist who knows to a nicety his power over his audience, and he mastered all who heard him with as much certainty as though each and every one had been his only listener. Great as was his triumph in the concerto it was not until he was heard as a solo player in a Chopin impromptu and valse and a Liszt rhapsodie that the audience fully realized the genius of the pianist. His playing of Chopin is fairly fascinating for the grace and beauty of his interpretation and the delicacy of his tone tints in such compositions surpasses all description and gives the listener most rapturous delight. The Liszt rhapsodie again revealed the skill and resources of this veritable giant, and his brilliant playing of this number made a fitting climax to his evening's triumph.

Mr. Paderewski has no cause to complain of the Boston public in the reception given him, and it is gratifying that his first hearing here should so effectually settle the position he is to be accorded by local music lovers. His future here is one of conquest, and his recitals will unquestionably show how well the Boston public appreciates such a genius.

Lack of space prevents comment upon the very enjoyable orchestral programme arranged for the evening by Mr. Nikisch. It included the fourth of the Beethoven symphonies, Weber's "Euryanthe" overture, and, as a pleasing novelty, Svendsen's "Carnaval in Paris."

[For the Transcript.]

PADEREWSKI PLAYING.

(HOW IT IMPRESSED JONES.)

Jones is a cynic! At the Symphony
Lost in an arid wilderness of sound
Sits Jones, and nods, and eyes his neighbor's score.

And though of music-hearing day and night
He wearies not, he growls, "Why don't they play

As if the thing—heart, brain and hands—would say,

Must say itself to music?" Most irreverent
Is Jones—sometimes profane—therefore we wondered,

That night we watched young Paderewski smite

The key-board, listening to those dalcet tones,
"How will this strike the tympanum of Jones?"

And all the while you should have seen Jones stare;

He has a German's scent for music—ne'er
A finer, keener, longer nose! you'd swear
Jones drank sound through his nostrils, watching him;

And once or twice his spectacles grew dim
That night, and I distinctly heard Jones sigh—
A sigh that moved one, like that priceless tear,
That unwept tear that troubled Heine so—
It was a sigh of such supreme content,
So musical, so deep, so eloquent!

And as I talked with Jones last Saturday
I asked him, "Have you read this Century?
No? Say, then—How does Paderewski play?"

He snarled, "The critics told you. Don't ask me!"

Derisively he added, "Any nose
May ravage with impunity a rose!
[The one line from Sordello that Jones knows!]
And fools find wit like that obscure!" mocks he.

But when I pleaded, "Such a rhapsody
Of words!" he told me why he sighed that night—

Great thoughts were born in him, and fancies light

Trooped to him, tales of old-world chivalry,
Music of battlefields, rumors of war.

He saw the face of many a Polish knight,
And bright, fair, flowerlike women he beheld,
Then a vast panorama painted o'er

With moving living armies! there went by Hetman and banneret! wild Slavonic music
Rose rhythmic, rude and sad—whirling of winds,

Clashing of arms, warring of elements;
And he remembered a dear book of fiction,
Heard its long peals of deep Homeric laughter;

Stout Pan Zagloba with Falstaffian strut
Praised his own deeds; then saw he that fierce knight

Brave Pan Volodyovski! his swift sabre
Flashed for a moment—and the foeman fell.

And then forgotten were the days of fiction.
The faces faded, and he heard no more
That martial music, but a theme of Chopin's.

With strange, sweet-haunting minor cadences.
It seemed no human touch—they sang themselves!

The genius of a nation smote the lyre.
It throbbed and throbbed! as if an immortal fire
Could fuse the poet's and the player's soul in one.

Chopin's or his, that revelation?

Beatitude upon beatitude
Piled Jones, the while he rhapsodized to me.
"For there!" that cynic said exultantly,
"The thing that heart and hands and brain would say Did say itself in music!" and he ended:

"It was as when on a still sultry noon
One comes upon a summer solitude
Where skyward leaps some clear cool crystal fountain,

That breaks into a million soft-hued rainbows,
Sparkling and dancing! storing floods of sunshine

Within each tiny sphere—and then I listened Breathless unto that perfect poem of sound
Straining the inner sense, as one who hearkens,

All the dumb heart of things grown audible,
And hears a dewdrop or a roseleaf fall!"

AGNES GERARD.

TRUE TO THE BRIDE OF HIS YOUTH.

Paderewski Prefers the Piano, Pool and Poker to the Women who Fall In Love with His Wondrous Samsonian Mane.

uresque and genteel—such a man has the elements of a successful lion.

And when the lion is adorned with a marvellous mane as big as a load of hay, dark red and all frowled and tousled, he becomes simply irresistible.

That's why Ignatius John Paderewski—pianist and poker player—has conquered the coldness of Boston and established himself here as a fad, just as he has in Paris, London and New York.

THIS IS PADEREWSKI.

Not that Paderewski's popularity is exactly due to that wonderful head of hair, in which you can see all the glories of the aurora borealis, and the incarnadined hues of the rose, but one can't help wondering whether he would make such a furor among the unmusical if he were bald-headed and fat and elderly.

Paderewski not only looks like a genius with a large G, but he is one in reality, and if his "specialty" were whistling or clog dancing or swallowing swords or eating glass, it would bear the impress of his master mind.

Tall, slender, well-proportioned, with chest broad and deep, and muscular neck, peaked features and healthy complexion, a light moustache and a still lighter goatee—that is the outward Paderewski. Although he doesn't run to whiskers, yet the hair on the top of his head would make the Circassian girl in the dime museum down sick with envy.

But Paderewski—and, by the way, he pronounces himself Padderesske—isn't "travelling on his shape" or on that incomparable headgear. He's modest and quiet and very well-bred—not too well-bred, but just well-bred enough—and tactful and full of common sense.

Flattery has not turned his head, and he doesn't "pose."

Paderewski's social success in Boston, as in London and New York, has been complete and overwhelming. When here, he stays at the Hotel Brunswick, and is always accompanied by his manager, Count Hugo Gerlitz. He frequents the clubs a good deal, going often to the St. Botolph and the Tavern. The two Adamowskis are his low-countrymen, and the three are much together.

Although Paderewski is under contract with the Steinways, who give him $500 for every public performance, yet he is permitted to play in private houses. On Sunday evening, for instance, he gave a recital in the music room of Mr. J. M. Sears for the benefit of the family and a few guests. Mr. Sears gave him $1000 for the evening.

Paderewski is adored by women, who often make their adoration so clear that he can't help seeing it. This may be the reason why the worship is not mutual. To be quite plain about it Paderewski doesn't like women at all. They say that he lives in dreams of the past—that he is true to the memory of his loved wife, who died when he was but 19 years old. And that lends the glamour of romance to his life. Her death is said to have nearly caused his own.

It was only about four years ago that Paderewski came out as a piano virtuoso. That was in Berlin, and he made a distinguished failure there. The German critics never would concede him high rank as a pianist. In fact, they even said he was seeking to gain notoriety by means of his hair. They were probably jealous.

Paderewski then went to Paris, where the women raved about him. His male critics there were not extravagant in their eulogies.

Two seasons in London followed. Here his success was instantaneous. English men as well as English women went wild over his playing, and honors were lavished on him from all sides.

His greatest triumphs, however, have been achieved in New York and Boston. Nevertheless, Paderewski doesn't like America. He complains, in the first place, of the intense heat in the houses and hotels. He can't sleep nights, he says, because his room is too hot, and, like most foreigners, he is afraid to keep his window open at night. So he sleeps in the daytime when he can. But this is rather unsatisfactory, as he only gets from three to five hours' sleep.

When in New York he goes to Steinway's and practises from 11 p. m. until about 4 or 5 a. m.

Paderewski is very abstemious. He takes no intoxicating liquor of any kind. But he smokes cigarettes, and good ones, too. Pool is his especial weakness, but he also fences, rides and shoots, and can play a mighty fine game of poker. Nothing delights him more man to drop in at Billy Apthorp's and take a hand in a game.

Paderewski's present object is to accumulate as many American dollars as possible, so as to be able to give up playing and devote himself wholly to composition.

He is a very well-informed man, and speaks five or six languages fluently. His English is not perfect, but it is far superior to most of the Boston French that is fired at him. His own French is very fine.

He is an excellent story-teller, and a most graceful after-dinner speaker.

He was recently asked why he had not learned to play the violin. His reply was that when he was a boy in Poland he had gone to a famed teacher of the violin, but had been sent away on the ground that he would never make a musician!

If there is no music in your soul, it will nevertheless pay you to go and see his hair the next time he plays in Boston.

A professional interviewer who, either in imagination or reality, recently had a session with Paderewski, and then wrote for his paper says: "He shakes your hand in a welcome squeeze, and when the anaconda effect has passed off you wonder why you ever thought him at all effeminate. The truth is that no 2-year-old ever trained for the Futurity stakes as does this comet for the pianistic sweepstakes, and the odds in the artistic world in his favor are growing heavier every day. He does not know whether he likes America or not, as he has only been around in Philadelphia. In this city he spends his time practising the piano, sleeping, smoking cigarettes and appearing in public. Naturally I asked him if he admired the harbor and the Statue of Liberty, but received an evasive answer to the effect that American pianos are the best in the world. I realized that here was a votary of art for art's sake, one to whom the ordinary sights and scenes of life were not of paramount interest, so I tacked in another direction. "And the New York girls," I queried. "They are all beautiful," he replied, and lighted a fresh cigarette. Then I knew that a supreme mastery of the piano did not preclude diplomatic gifts of the highest order. I questioned him closely about the "long foreground" of his career, as Walt Whitman would say, and received but little satisfaction. Yes, he had studied, but not with many masters; had never heard Liszt; played for Rubinstein but once, and for an answer received an ursine growl from the great Muscovite.

MUSIC.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Ignace Jean Paderewski made his first appearances in Boston at the eighth rehearsal and concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. His success was complete and overwhelming. No other pianist, except De Pachmann, has aroused a symphony audience to such a pitch of genuine enthusiasm since the concerts were instituted, if memory serves us right.

Paderewski is a tremendously advertised artist; and doubtless Boston's interest in the brilliant Pole, first aroused by little Otto Hegner's exquisite performance of the now famous "Menuet a l'Antique," and since constantly kept warm by the reports that have been freely circulated concerning his astonishing triumphs in Europe, had not a little to do with his reception. But this interest, bordering on curiosity, was not the real cause of his success. Paderewski is undeniably a genius; there could have been few out of the vast audience that filled every seat and every foot of standing room on Friday afternoon who were not strongly impressed with this fact.

Besides this gift Paderewski possesses a personality which instantly calls out the sympathies of his listeners. His modest, winning appearance; his graceful bearing; his slender, supple figure; his fine, well-poised head covered with a mass of soft, curly hair of reddish hue; his well cut features, delicate to the verge of effeminacy; his amiable though serious expression, all command instant attention. And by the time he has finished his own concerto, many other things are revealed. One realizes with a throb of pleasure that here at last is a great musical performer who has not yet lost the indescribable enthusiasm of youth. He plays for dollars, perhaps, but surely for the love of his art. Moreover, the music he plays is to him fraught with meaning. His phrasing is not the phrasing of a player of mere talent; his fitting together of the parts of a musical composition is not that of the cultivated artisan. His readings of the works of the masters are instinct with the imagination, the poetic fervor, the true fire of a born musician. When he plays something that appeals to his nature with unusual force, his countenance is as much a study as are his readings, or his technical feats. When he gave that unforgettable performance of the Schubert-Liszt "Erl King" for an encore Friday afternoon, the pathos and intensity expressed in his face were almost as thrilling as was his playing.

Paderewski's touch is wholly beautiful. His singing tone is unsurpassed; his scale-playing is exquisitely clear and pearly in quality; his pianissimo is wonderful; his fortissimo is full and resonant; and his bravura is glittering and dazzling, but withal is never unmusical. Without doubt he has his limitations. When we heard him at a recital in New York the other day, we thought we discovered weaknesses that seemed inherent. Whether this may eventually prove to be the case or not, there were no such indications in his performance of his own concerto, or the Chopin impromptu in F sharp, the waltz in C sharp minor, and the twelfth rhapsodie of Liszt.

Paderewski's fame does not rest wholly upon his pianoforte playing. His concerto is a strong work, full of ideas which are clearly, poetically and brilliantly expressed; and it will undoubtedly become a favorite with pianists when it is better known. In the pianoforte part its composer has shown a conservatism as regards modern technical difficulties that is surprising. There is no attempt to create obstacles of this sort merely for the sake of affording opportunities for the display of virtuosity. Nevertheless it shows a knowledge of the resources of the pianoforte which only a skilful pianist can possess; while the instrumentation evinces an equally clear understanding of the nature of orchestral instruments, and their proper combinations. His many smaller piano pieces too are full of poetic charm; and it is rumored that he is the composer of unpublished works for orchestra of much greater importance than any that he has yet given out.

Between the concerto and the solos came a work by Svendsen, new to Boston, an episode "Carnival in Paris." It is a brilliant piece of orchestral scoring and suggests in a marked degree the various characteristics of the kind of scene it attempts to depict in tone. The symphony, which came first, was Beethoven's fourth and the closing number was the overture to Euryanthe. The orchestral playing was generally fine, the accompaniment to the concerto being given with unusual care and finish.

— Mr. Paderewski, of course, returns in the fall. He must have earned about $60,000 in his four months' stay, and much territory is still unvisited. For the same number of concerts, no pianist that has visited the United States in the past ever received so large a sum of money, although it is likely that Casimir Hoffman's receipts would have quite equalled, had he had held out, Mr. Paderewski's. Receipts, however, have nothing to do with a man's place in art, and while I cheerfully concede that the Polish virtuoso's strength, precision, and earnestness are astounding, that his memory is extraordinary, and that his personality is most interesting, I cannot coincide with, at least, one of my confreres, who proclaims him the greatest performer of his age. As a poet musician, Mr. Paderewski stands far beneath Anton Rubinstein. As a Beethoven player, he ranks after Bülow and D'Albert. As an interpreter of the graceful and filmy compositions of Chopin and Henselt, and as a Mozart player, he cannot be compared with De Pachmann. Withal, he is an executant of enormous talent, and possessed of a magnetism that has thus far been irresistible. I do not fancy that his work has taught his auditors much, and in this respect his visit will have been far less fruitful than were the tournées of some of his predecessors. It is positive, however, that his exceptional success has revived a very general interest in piano-playing, and its good results, if secured in a somewhat indirect fashion, are no less valuable on that account.—Town Topics.

De Pachmann and Paderewski, men of widely differing genius, find that their most devoted admirers are women. Few men will go eagerly to recital after recital, for they echo the saying of the Englishman, "Life would be tolerable were it not for its pleasures." The two pianists should remember the fate of Orpheus and tremble. If historians are worthy of belief, Orpheus was the inventor of recitals. Armed with his lyre he went from town to town; he was greeted with enthusiasm; women followed in his train. In a Thracian village he gave his last recitals. Possibly he finally exhausted the patience of the hearers; possibly he attempted to give an "historical cyclus," or perhaps he insisted on playing opus 110 or opus 111 of some contemporary Beethoven. At any rate, the very women that had in former days fawned on him and pelted him with flowers attacked him and tore him limb from limb.

PHILIP HALE.

MUSIC.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Ignace Jean Paderewski made his first appearances in Boston at the eighth rehearsal and concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. His success was complete and overwhelming. No other pianist, except De Pachmann, has aroused a symphony audience to such a pitch of genuine enthusiasm since the concerts were instituted, if memory serves us right.

Paderewski is a tremendously advertised artist; and doubtless Boston's interest in the brilliant Pole, first aroused by little Otto Hegner's exquisite performance of the now famous "Menuet a l'Antique," and since constantly kept warm by the reports that have been freely circulated concerning his astonishing triumphs in Europe, had not a little to do with his reception. But this interest, bordering on curiosity, was not the real cause of his success. Paderewski is undeniably a genius; there could have been few out of the vast audience that filled every seat and every foot of standing room on Friday afternoon who were not strongly impressed with this fact.

Besides this gift Paderewski possesses a personality which instantly calls out the sympathies of his listeners. His modest, winning appearance; his graceful bearing; his slender, supple figure; his fine, well-poised head covered with a mass of soft, curly hair of reddish hue; his well cut features, delicate to the verge of effeminacy; his amiable though serious expression, all command instant attention. And by the time he has finished his own concerto, many other things are revealed. One realizes with a throb of pleasure that here at last is a great musical performer who has not yet lost the indescribable enthusiasm of youth. He plays for dollars, perhaps, but surely for the love of his art. Moreover, the music he plays is to him fraught with meaning. His phrasing is not the phrasing of a player of mere talent; his fitting together of the parts of a musical composition is not that of the cultivated artisan. His readings of the works of the masters are instinct with the imagination, the poetic fervor, the true fire of a born musician. When he plays something that appeals to his nature with unusual force, his countenance is as much a study as are his readings, or his technical feats. When he gave that unforgettable performance of the Schubert-Liszt "Erl King" for an encore Friday afternoon, the pathos and intensity expressed in his face were almost as thrilling as was his playing.

Paderewski's touch is wholly beautiful. His singing tone is unsurpassed; his scale-playing is exquisitely clear and pearly in quality; his pianissimo is wonderful; his fortissimo is full and resonant; and his bravura is glittering and dazzling, but withal is never unmusical. Without doubt he has his limitations. When we heard him at a recital in New York the other day, we thought we discovered weaknesses that seemed inherent. Whether this may eventually prove to be the case or not, there were no such indications in his performance of his own concerto, or the Chopin impromptu in F sharp, the waltz in C sharp minor, and the twelfth rhapsodie of Liszt.

Paderewski's fame does not rest wholly upon his pianoforte playing. His concerto is a strong

work, full of ideas which are clearly, poetically and brilliantly expressed; and it will undoubtedly become a favorite with pianists when it is better known. In the pianoforte part its composer has shown a conservatism as regards modern technical difficulties that is surprising. There is no attempt to create obstacles of this sort merely for the sake of affording opportunities for the display of virtuosity. Nevertheless it shows a knowledge of the resources of the pianoforte which only a skilful pianist can possess; while the instrumentation evinces an equally clear understanding of the nature of orchestral instruments, and their proper combinations. His many smaller piano pieces too are full of poetic charm; and it is rumored that he is the composer of unpublished works for orchestra of much greater importance than any that he has yet given out.

Between the concerto and the solos came a work by Svendsen, new to Boston, an episode "Carnival in Paris." It is a brilliant piece of orchestral scoring and suggests in a marked degree the various characteristics of the kind of scene it attempts to depict in tone. The symphony, which came first, was Beethoven's fourth and the closing number was the overture to Euryanthe. The orchestral playing was generally fine, the accompaniment to the concerto being given with unusual care and finish.

— Mr. Paderewski, of course, returns in the fall. He must have earned about $60,000 in his four months' stay, and much territory is still unvisited. For the same number of concerts, no pianist that has visited the United States in the past ever received so large a sum of money, although it is likely that Casimir Hoffman's receipts would have quite equalled, had he had held out, Mr. Paderewski's. Receipts, however, have nothing to do with a man's place in art, and while I cheerfully concede that the Polish virtuoso's strength, precision, and earnestness are astounding, that his memory is extraordinary, and that his personality is most interesting, I cannot coincide with, at least, one of my confreres, who proclaims him the greatest performer of his age. As a poet musician, Mr. Paderewski stands far beneath Anton Rubinstein. As a Beethoven player, he ranks after Bülow and D'Albert. As an interpreter of the graceful and filmy compositions of Chopin and Henselt, and as a Mozart player, he cannot be compared with De Pachmann. Withal, he is an executant of enormous talent, and possessed of a magnetism that has thus far been irresistible. I do not fancy that his work has taught his auditors much, and in this respect his visit will have been far less fruitful than were the tournées of some of his predecessors. It is positive, however, that his exceptional success has revived a very general interest in piano-playing, and its good results, if secured in a somewhat indirect fashion, are no less valuable on that account.—Town Topics.

De Pachmann and Paderewski, men of widely differing genius, find that their most devoted admirers are women. Few men will go eagerly to recital after recital, for they echo the saying of the Englishman, "Life would be tolerable were it not for its pleasures." The two pianists should remember the fate of Orpheus and tremble. If historians are worthy of belief, Orpheus was the inventor of recitals. Armed with his lyre he went from town to town; he was greeted with enthusiasm; women followed in his train. In a Thracian village he gave his last recitals. Possibly he finally exhausted the patience of the hearers; possibly he attempted to give an "historical cyclus," or perhaps he insisted on playing opus 110 or opus 111 of some contemporary Beethoven. At any rate, the very women that had in former days fawned on him and pelted him with flowers attacked him and tore him limb from limb.

PHILIP HALE.

man to drop in at Billy Apthorp's and take a hand in a game.

Paderewski's present object is to accumulate as many American dollars as possible, so as to be able to give up playing and devote himself wholly to composition.

He is a very well-informed man, and speaks five or six languages fluently. His English is not perfect, but it is far superior to most of the Boston French that is fired at him. His own French is very fine.

He is an excellent story-teller, and a most graceful after-dinner speaker.

He was recently asked why he had not learned to play the violin. His reply was that when he was a boy in Poland he had gone to a famed teacher of the violin, but had been sent away on the ground that he would never make a musician!

If there is no music in your soul, it will nevertheless pay you to go and see his hair the next time he plays in Boston.

A professional interviewer who, either in imagination or reality, recently had a session with Paderewski, and then wrote for his paper says: "He shakes your hand in a welcome squeeze, and when the anacostia effect has passed off you wonder why you ever thought him at all effeminate. The truth is that no 2-year-old ever trained for the Futurity stakes as does this comet for the pianistic sweepstakes, and the odds in the artistic world in his favor are growing heavier every day. He does not know whether he likes America or not, as he has only been around in Philadelphia. In this city he spends his time practising the piano, sleeping, smoking cigarettes and appearing in public. Naturally I asked him if he admired the harbor and the Statue of Liberty, but received an evasive answer to the effect that American pianos are the best in the world. I realized that here was a votary of art for art's sake, one to whom the ordinary sights and scenes of life were not of paramount interest, so I tacked in another direction. "And the New York girls," I queried. "They are all beautiful," he replied, and lighted a fresh cigarette. Then I knew that a supreme mastery of the piano did not preclude diplomatic gifts of the highest order. I questioned him closely about the "long foreground" of his career, as Walt Whitman would say, and received but little satisfaction. Yes, he had studied, but not with many masters; had never heard Liszt; played for Rubinstein but once, and for an answer received an ursine growl from the great Muscovite.

Fursch-Madi

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1891-92.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

IX. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 19, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

IN MEMORIAM. W. A. MOZART,

DIED DECEMBER 5, 1791.

- | | |
|---------|---|
| MOZART. | OVERTURE. "Magic Flute." |
| MOZART. | ARIA from "Don Giovanni." |
| MOZART. | MASONIC FUNERAL MUSIC. |
| MOZART. | ARIA, "Dove Song," from "Marriage of Figaro." |
| MOZART. | SYMPHONY in E flat.
Adagio; Allegro.—Andante.—
Minuetto.—Finale; Allegro. |

SOLOIST:

MME. FURSCH-MADI.

The next PUBLIC REHEARSAL will be on THURSDAY Afternoon,
December 24, at 2.30.

Fursch-Madi

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1891-92.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

IX. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 19, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

IN MEMORIAM. W. A. MOZART,
DIED DECEMBER 5, 1791.

MOZART.	OVERTURE. "Magic Flute."
MOZART.	ARIA from "Don Giovanni."
MOZART.	MASONIC FUNERAL MUSIC.
MOZART.	ARIA, "Dove Song," from "Marriage of Figaro."
MOZART.	SYMPHONY in E flat. Adagio; Allegro.—Andante.— Minuetto.—Finale; Allegro.

SOLOIST :

MME. FURSCH-MADI.

The next PUBLIC REHEARSAL will be on THURSDAY Afternoon,
December 24, at 2.30.

MOZART.

The Commemoration of the Centenary of His Death.

The programme of the ninth Symphony concert was devoted to certain works of Mozart, in commemoration of the centenary of his death, Dec. 5, 1791. The numbers chosen were the "Magic Flute" overture; the symphony in E flat, "Or sai chi l'onore" from "Don Giovanni," and "Dove sono" from "The Marriage of Figaro" (sung by Mrs. Fursch-Madi), and the Masonic Funeral Music, which was substituted for the concertante for violin, viola and orchestra, on account of the sickness of Messrs. Kneisel and Loeffler.

It is well in these nervous days, when the listeners to music, like unto the Athenians of old, demand eagerly all that is new; when the tendency is to welcome the strange and unintelligible, and to despise, because, forsooth, they are lucid and beautiful, even long accepted works that have withstood the tooth of Time; when music is no longer regarded as a separate art, but as a means of expressing all things in nature and in the brain and the heart of man, an art interchangeable with prose, poetry, sculpture and painting—it is well to take a breathing spell and to contemplate the serenity of the supreme Mozart.

We are too apt to lose sight of historical perspective in our judgments upon composers. We judge rashly the men of former centuries with the men of our own generation, and it is not uncommon to find comparisons drawn between Mozart and Wagner, or Mozart and Schumann; as though Tabarin and Artemus War I, Apuleius and Balzac could be weighed one against the other. The smug critic that belongs to the hyper-modern school pats Mozart's head, chucks Haydn under the chin, and speaks kindly of Beethoven, echoing the line in Congreve's play, "Hannibal was a very pretty fellow in those days." And he adds: "Mozart now is intolerable, a mere maker of music that portrays nothing, that is without meaning. He had facility, it is true, and his tunes have an agreeable jingle. His music, however, is a thing of the past, unsuited to our wants. We have outgrown it." But the composer must be judged in the light of his time; his music must be compared with that of his contemporaries. The line of composer is not made up of independent, uninfluenced men. Upon Mozart leans Beethoven; upon Beethoven, Schumann and the members of the Romantic School, and then Berlioz, Liszt and Wagner. The last would have been impossible without the first.

On the other hand there is, perhaps, then, no greatest composer. He that excels in one branch of his art may be easily outstripped in another by a less highly gifted man. If, however, among the many glorious names, one may be put above the rest as a supremely endowed genius whose flow of inspiration was directed and not choked by complete mastery of art, that name is Mozart. As a spontaneous singer of pure melody he was approached only by Schubert and Rossini. As an inventor of harmonies and as a juggler with the strictest laws of counterpoint he is a marvel for all time. He knew the secrets of orchestral instruments that had baffled musical seekers before him. He wrote "Don Giovanni" and breathed the breath of dramatic life into the cold body of Italian formalism. He met Beaumarchais upon his own ground and conquered him. With "The Magic Flute" he laid the sure foundations of national German opera. His symphonies and chamber music paved the way for Beethoven. His writings for the pianoforte of his day and for combinations of instruments then relished are crowded with passages of rare beauty; and everywhere is seen the complete and easy triumph of astounding skill over the greatest theoretical difficulties. And when he turned from the concert room and the stage to the church, the noble fragments of the Requiem and the matchless Ave Verum show that music may be the full expression of religious awe and ecstatic worship. Let it also be remembered that he composed when he was of tender age; that his life was full of disappointment; that he was constantly harassed by poverty; that his compositions are nearly eight hundred in number; and that he died before he was thirty-six.

Victor Wilder has well said that the crowning glory of Mozart's work is its ideal perfection. This perfection is in great measure due to its apparent simplicity, which in music as in literature is, as Walt Whitman declared in his famous preface to the first edition of "Leaves of Grass," "the art of art, the glory of expression and the sunlight. To speak with the perfect rectitude and insouciance of the movements of animals and the unimpeachableness of the sentiment of the trees in the woods and grass by the roadside is the flawless triumph of art." It is this that makes the just performance of a Mozart composition so rare. The French claim, and many will admit that they are not exorbitant, that a Mozart symphony or overture is only heard in perfection when it is played by the orchestra of the Paris Conservatory. It is true that in Germany the players seem to lay their hands upon his music with a heavy touch, and there is too often an absence of the delicacy, the elegance, the restrained passion, the serene spirit so characteristic of Mozart. It is a pleasure then to state that the performance of Saturday evening, if it were not an absolutely ideal one, was, upon the whole, very satisfactory. The readings of Mr. Nikisch were sympathetic and free from exaggeration; the work of the orchestra was excellent. It is true that the first violins in the andante of the symphony were once or twice not above reproach; it is true that in the overture and symphony there was occasional cloudiness in the rapid wood-wind passages; but there was but little to find fault with, and the concert gave legitimate enjoyment. The Masonic Funeral Music, written in memory of Meklenburg and Esterhazy naturally lost in effect in consequence of the necessary absence of the basset horns with which Mozart gave a peculiarly sombre coloring to his score; and however appropriate it may have been to the occasion for which it was written, it loses in value when heard in the concert hall. The other orchestral numbers were happily chosen. Age has not staled their infinite beauty.

122

Mrs. Fursch-Madi declaimed with intelligence and force the trying recitative to the great air from "Don Giovanni," and sang the air itself with breadth and dignity. She is a dramatic soprano, a chanteuse Falcon, and she was heard to less advantage in the air from "The Marriage of Figaro," although she gave constant proofs in the latter number of the training and understanding of the accomplished artist. Such singers serve to show that the noble art of song really existed, that it is not merely a matter of tradition. They also give the lie to the pernicious theory that vocal skill and dramatic truth cannot dwell together.

The programme of the next concert includes Handel's concerto in F for strings and two wind orchestras; the prelude to "Parsifal," and Rubinstein's Dramatic Symphony (No. 4).

Music Hall: The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Symphony Orchestra gave a Mozart programme last Saturday evening, in honor of the centenary of the composer's death. The list was as follows:

Overture to "Die Zauberflöte."
Aria: "Or sai chi l'onore," from "Don Giovanni."
Masonic Funeral Music.
Aria: "Dove sono," from "Le nozze di Figaro."
Symphony in E-flat.

Mme. Fursch-Madi was the singer.

Influenza had been at work and put two solo players hors de combat. Mr. Loeffler and Mr. Kneisel were to play the concerto for violin and viola, but both were too ill to appear. Mr. Schroeder, the first cellist, was in the same case. The overture began a little vaguely, the orchestra not being well together, but with the fugue matters mended, and all went well to the end. It was a pleasure, too, to hear this fugue taken at so good a tempo. The Masonic Music sounds surprisingly modern, almost Beethovenish; it was played with great, perhaps too dramatic, force of expression, but not with much finish. The ever-welcome symphony went grandly. It was a delightful reproduction of the sunlight that beams from out this masterpiece, and played by Mr. Nikisch con amore. Mme. Fursch-Madi sang the two arias to the admiration of every one. Such Mozart singing is exceedingly rare; and, to show how a really good thing is appreciated, Mme. Fursch-Madi was called out after both songs.

The programme for the concert next Saturday night is: Handel—Concerto for strings and two wind orchestras in F major, first time; Wagner—Prelude to "Parsifal;" Rubinstein—Fourth symphony, "Dramatic," first time. The public rehearsal will be held on Thursday afternoon.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Beacon

One disappointment was in store for the attendants upon the ninth Symphony concert—the withdrawal of the concerto for violin and viola, which was to have been played by Messrs. Loeffler and Kneisel, but was given up on account of their illness. For this—and by the way, the programme was all from Mozart and in his honor—was substituted the Masonic funeral music, an announcement of rather lugubrious and ominous cast being made from the stage to the effect that "on account" of the illness just mentioned this sombre selection would be given. But apart from this change the whole evening was one of pleasantness and grace. It is good to hear for an hour or two the exquisite melodies, the rare harmonies, the wonderful orchestral effects and the pure, various human feeling of Mozart, in these grim days when mysticism and trigonometric proportion are sought to be foisted upon the world as the true essence of music, cold calculation is preferred to inspiration, and clangor or twiddling is declared to be the acme of expressiveness. Mr. Nikisch led the "Magic Flute" overture and the E-flat symphony in an entirely sympathetic manner, not making simplicity trivial or overcharging sentiment. What the Funeral music—like some other pages of the master's work—would be if one could evolve from the past the gloomy horn upon which Mozart relied for his most sepulchral sounds, will probably never be known again; but this reading was good and grave. Mme. Fursch-Madi—in hearing whom once more there was great content—sang from "Don Giovanni" the largo scene, "Or sai che l'onore," and from "The Marriage of Figaro," the air "Dove sono," with that deeply dramatic feeling and in that beautifully balanced style which placed her long ago among great vocal artists. Quiet, sustained and suave in tone, but firm, sincere and direct in expression, she brought a new proof—ah, how sadly needed in these degenerate and careless days!—that the beauty of mere delivery and the fulness of meaning and emotion should meet together whenever there is to be true vocal art.

The programme for tonight needs no soloists, for it consists only of three orchestral works. Two of these are new here—Handel's concerto in F-major for strings and a double wind choir and Rubinstein's fourth, or "Dramatic," symphony. Between these will be placed the prelude to "Parsifal."

Since Mr. George H. Wilson's departure for Chicago, there to assume the secretaryship of the musical department of the World's Fair, the compilation of the notes for the programme Bulletin has been assumed by Mr. Philip Hale, who is sure to make his pages brilliant, diversified and rich with the instructive fruits of knowledge and research.

The Symphony Concert.

Our young Lochinvars have come out of the Southwest, and brought plenty of laurels with them, for in every city the praises have been of the most extravagant sort. Our orchestra is still acknowledged to be the best cisatlantic one, by the reviewers of the outlying districts. Saturday's programme was devoted to the memory of Mozart's death; one would have expected this commemoration at the concert of Dec. 5, which was exactly the centennial of that sad event, and the ceremonies of Saturday seemed just a trifle post festum, while the bust and wreath of laurel at the front of the stage were somewhat too theatrical for our Boston tastes. Nevertheless the music was its own most fitting excuse, and was well played in almost every detail. The "Magic Flute" overture was taken in just the right tempo, and not in the prestissimo which marred it in the former performances by this orchestra. As a consequence, every voice in the fugato, which forms the chief theme, was clear and intelligible (it is the most popular piece of fugal writing in the entire repertoire), and the development was also easily followed, although the introductory chords of this portion of the work were rather square cut.

What a model of the true dramatic school Mme. Fursch-Madi is! Her two numbers (Donna Anna's aria and "Dove Sono," the latter, of course, misprinted "Dove Song") were as different from each other as possible, yet the same success was achieved in both. "Dove Sono" was a lesson to every vocal student present, in its pure enunciation, its artistic phrasing, its unexaggerated portamenti; only in the high notes was there evidence of caution, which told of weakness—just a suspicion of vocal decadence. Mozart's Masonic funeral music was written for a lodge of sorrow held for Prince Esterhazy in July 1785. It does not magnify into a full orchestral score very well; it was written originally for two violins, two violas, contrabass, one clarinet, three basset-horns, two oboes, two horns and a contrabassoon. It will be seen that in such a combination the wind instruments were given a preponderance which had much to do with the tone-color, and this preponderance was not present in the full orchestral version. The contrabassoon was very effective (one very seldom hears this instrument in anything like an obligato), and gave something of the mournful gravity intended by the composer, but, of course, the basset-horns were not obtainable, the instrument being quite obsolete, and one could only guess at what the original music must have sounded like. The bass clarinet can by no means replace the basset-horn, for the latter had a far more gloomy effect, and whenever Mozart desired to picture death, as in his requiem for example, he had recourse to this instrument.

The "Clarinet Symphony" ended the programme. Mozart was the father of the clarinet, for his predecessors Bach and Handel never used it, and in this work for the first time, the instrument enters into symphony, but so wedded were the composers of a century ago to having the woodwind in three parts, that Mozart turned out the oboe to make room for the new comer. Because of the innovation, the woodwind have most important work to do in this symphony, and it must be said that they did it very well. The tempi were reasonable, the balance good and the finale entirely crisp and brilliant. The trio of the minuet was also especially excellent. Only in the second movement could the dainty staccato chords have had more piquancy and lightness; but this is a minor fault, and the entire concert was a pleasing one, and so well given that the most confirmed fault-finder can put aside his vitriol bottle for the nonce. LOUIS C. ELSON.

123

Notes.

It will delight many Boston musicians to learn that Mr. Gericke's health is now entirely restored. He has begun his concert season in Vienna, as director of the Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde concerts, with Mozart's arrangement of Handel's "Alexander's Feast," and is delighted with both chorus and orchestra. On Dec. 6 the death of Mozart was commemorated by a great performance of the "Requiem" by the same forces, Haydn's "Seasons," Beethoven's "Missa Solemnis," and other great works are to be given this season, and our conductor is evidently a very busy man again.

The prevalent illness has at last made itself felt in our concert room, and Mozart's funeral music made a gloomy substitute for the two invalids, Messrs. Loeffler and Kneisel, but this gloom was somewhat dispelled by the orator of the occasion, whose exordium was bold, but whose peroration was slightly vague.

On the evening of Dec. 19 the Boston Symphony Orchestra recognized the 100th anniversary of the death of the immortal Mozart with a programme "in memoriam" embracing the overture of the "Magic Flute," the "Masonic Funeral Music" and the ever fresh and beautiful "Symphony in E flat."

Mme. Fursch Madi contributed two solos, one from "Don Juan," the other from "Figaro." It is a pleasant task to speak of this concert for in many respects the programme was admirably performed. The orchestra played with a degree of smoothness and delicacy and a regard for the expression in the works given that was at once surprising and gratifying, and all the more so because of the coarseness and almost utter disregard of the dynamic effects that has marked its performance since Mr. Gericke departed.

The tempi was well chosen, the programme being well balanced, and, we are happy to say, of short duration. Mr. Nikisch has more often than otherwise shown poor taste in the arrangement of his programme and bad judgment in the dragging it out a half-hour too long. Fursch-Madi's singing of the solos assigned her was commendable in a high degree. She gave the difficult recitative and aria from "Don Juan" with noble style and dramatic intensity, being little less happy in the one from "Figaro." This was a concert to be pleasantly remembered.

of the basset horns with which Mozart gave a peculiarly somber coloring to his score; and however appropriate it may have been to the occasion for which it was written, it loses in value when heard in the concert hall. The other orchestral numbers were happily chosen. Age has not staled their infinite beauty.

Mrs. Fursch-Madi declaimed with intelligence and force the trying recitative to the great air from "Don Giovanni," and sang the air itself with breadth and dignity. She is a dramatic soprano, a chanteuse Falcon, and she was heard to less advantage in the air from "The Marriage of Figaro," although she gave constant proofs in the latter number of the training and understanding of the accomplished artist. Such singers serve to show that the noble art of song really existed, that it is not merely a matter of tradition. They also give the lie to the pernicious theory that vocal skill and dramatic truth cannot dwell together.

The programme of the next concert includes Handel's concerto in F for strings and two wind orchestras; the prelude to "Parsifal," and Rubinstein's Dramatic Symphony (No. 4).

Music Hall: The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Symphony Orchestra gave a Mozart programme last Saturday evening, in honor of the centenary of the composer's death. The list was as follows:

Overture to "Die Zauberflöte."
Aria: "Or sai chi l'onore," from "Don Giovanni."
Masonic Funeral Music.
Aria: "Dove sono," from "Le nozze di Figaro."
Symphony in E-flat.

Mme. Fursch-Madi was the singer.

Influenza had been at work and put two solo players hors de combat. Mr. Loeffler and Mr. Kneisel were to play the concerto for violin and viola, but both were too ill to appear. Mr. Schroeder, the first cellist, was in the same case. The overture began a little vaguely, the orchestra not being well together, but with the fugue matters mended, and all went well to the end. It was a pleasure, too, to hear this fugue taken at so good a tempo. The Masonic Music sounds surprisingly modern, almost Beethovenish; it was played with great, perhaps too dramatic, force of expression, but not with much finish. The ever-welcome symphony went grandly. It was a delightful reproduction of the sunlight that beams from out this masterpiece, and played by Mr. Nikisch con amore. Mme. Fursch-Madi sang the two arias to the admiration of every one. Such Mozart singing is exceedingly rare; and, to show how a really good thing is appreciated, Mme. Fursch-Madi was called out after both songs.

The programme for the concert next Saturday night is: Handel—Concerto for strings and two wind orchestras in F major, first time; Wagner—Prelude to "Parsifal;" Rubinstein—Fourth symphony, "Dramatic," first time. The public rehearsal will be held on Thursday afternoon.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Beacon

One disappointment was in store for the attendants upon the ninth Symphony concert—the withdrawal of the concerto for violin and viola, which was to have been played by Messrs. Loeffler and Kneisel, but was given up on account of their illness. For this—and by the way, the programme was all from Mozart and in his honor—was substituted the Masonic funeral music, an announcement of rather lugubrious and ominous cast being made from the stage to the effect that "on account" of the illness just mentioned this sombre selection would be given. But apart from this change the whole evening was one of pleasantness and grace. It is good to hear for an hour or two the exquisite melodies, the rare harmonies, the wonderful orchestral effects and the pure, various human feeling of Mozart, in these grim days when mysticism and trigonometric proportion are sought to be foisted upon the world as the true essence of music, cold calculation is preferred to inspiration, and clangor or twiddling is declared to be the acme of expressiveness. Mr. Nikisch led the "Magic Flute" overture and the E-flat symphony in an entirely sympathetic manner, not making simplicity trivial or overcharging sentiment. What the Funeral music—like some other pages of the master's work—would be if one could evolve from the past the gloomy horn upon which Mozart relied for his most sepulchral sounds, will probably never be known again; but this reading was good and grave. Mme. Fursch-Madi—in hearing whom once more there was great content—sang from "Don Giovanni" the large scene, "Or sai che l'onore," and from "The Marriage of Figaro," the air "Dove sono," with that deeply dramatic feeling and in that beautifully balanced style which placed her long ago among great vocal artists. Quiet, sustained and suave in tone, but firm, sincere and direct in expression, she brought a new proof—ah, how sadly needed in these degenerate and careless days!—that the beauty of mere delivery and the fulness of meaning and emotion should meet together whenever there is to be true vocal art.

The programme for tonight needs no soloists, for it consists only of three orchestral works. Two of these are new here—Handel's concerto in F-major for strings and a double wind choir and Rubinstein's fourth, or "Dramatic," symphony. Between these will be placed the prelude to "Parsifal."

Since Mr. George H. Wilson's departure for Chicago, there to assume the secretaryship of the musical department of the World's Fair, the compilation of the notes for the programme Bulletin has been assumed by Mr. Philip Hale, who is sure to make his pages brilliant, diversified and rich with the instructive fruits of knowledge and research.

The Symphony Concert.

Our young Lochinvars have come out of the Southwest, and brought plenty of laurels with them, for in every city the praises have been of the most extravagant sort. Our orchestra is still acknowledged to be the best cisatlantic one, by the reviewers of the outlying districts. Saturday's programme was devoted to the memory of Mozart's death; one would have expected this commemoration at the concert of Dec. 5, which was exactly the centennial of that sad event, and the ceremonies of Saturday seemed just a trifle post festum, while the bust and wreath of laurel at the front of the stage were somewhat too theatrical for our Boston tastes. Nevertheless the music was its own most fitting excuse, and was well played in almost every detail. The "Magic Flute" overture was taken in just the right tempo, and not in the prestissimo which marred it in the former performances by this orchestra. As a consequence, every voice in the fugato, which forms the chief theme, was clear and intelligible (it is the most popular piece of fugal writing in the entire repertoire), and the development was also easily followed, although the introductory chords of this portion of the work were rather square cut.

What a model of the true dramatic school Mme. Fursch-Madi is! Her two numbers (Donna Anna's aria and "Dove Sono," the latter, of course, misprinted "Dove Song") were as different from each other as possible, yet the same success was achieved in both. "Dove Sono" was a lesson to every vocal student present, in its pure enunciation, its artistic phrasing, its unexaggerated portamenti; only in the high notes was there evidence of caution, which told of weakness—just a suspicion of vocal decadence. Mozart's Masonic funeral music was written for a lodge of sorrow held for Prince Esterhazy in July 1785. It does not magnify into a full orchestral score very well; it was written originally for two violins, two violas, contrabass, one clarinet, three basset-horns, two oboes, two horns and a contrabassoon. It will be seen that in such a combination the wind instruments were given a preponderance which had much to do with the tone-color, and this preponderance was not present in the full orchestral version. The contrabassoon was very effective (one very seldom hears this instrument in anything like an obligato), and gave something of the mournful gravity intended by the composer, but, of course, the basset-horns were not obtainable, the instrument being quite obsolete, and one could only guess at what the original music must have sounded like. The bass clarinet can by no means replace the basset-horn, for the latter had a far more gloomy effect, and whenever Mozart desired to picture death, as in his requiem for example, he had recourse to this instrument.

The "Clarinet Symphony" ended the programme. Mozart was the father of the clarinet, for his predecessors Bach and Handel never used it, and in this work for the first time, the instrument enters into symphony, but so wedded were the composers of a century ago to having the woodwind in three parts, that Mozart turned out the oboe to make room for the new comer. Because of the innovation, the woodwind have most important work to do in this symphony, and it must be said that they did it very well. The tempi were reasonable, the balance good and the finale entirely crisp and brilliant. The trio of the minuet was also especially excellent. Only in the second movement could the dainty staccato chords have had more piquancy and lightness; but this is a minor fault, and the entire concert was a pleasing one, and so well given that the most confirmed fault-finder can put aside his vitriol bottle for the nonce. LEUIS C. ELSON.

Notes.

It will delight many Boston musicians to learn that Mr. Gericke's health is now entirely restored. He has begun his concert season in Vienna, as director of the Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde concerts, with Mozart's arrangement of Handel's "Alexander's Feast," and is delighted with both chorus and orchestra. On Dec. 6 the death of Mozart was commemorated by a great performance of the "Requiem" by the same forces. Haydn's "Seasons," Beethoven's "Missa Solemnis," and other great works are to be given this season, and our conductor is evidently a very busy man again.

The prevalent illness has at last made itself felt in our concert room, and Mozart's funeral music made a gloomy substitute for the two invalids, Messrs. Loeffler and Kneisel, but this gloom was somewhat dispelled by the orator of the occasion, whose exordium was bold, but whose peroration was slightly vague.

On the evening of Dec. 19 the Boston Symphony Orchestra recognized the 100th anniversary of the death of the immortal Mozart with a programme "in memoriam" embracing the overture of the "Magic Flute," the "Masonic Funeral Music" and the ever fresh and beautiful "Symphony in E flat."

Mme. Fursch-Madi contributed two solos, one from "Don Juan," the other from "Figaro." It is a pleasant task to speak of this concert for in many respects the programme was admirably performed. The orchestra played with a degree of smoothness and delicacy and a regard for the expression in the works given that was at once surprising and gratifying, and all the more so because of the coarseness and almost utter disregard of the dynamic effects that has marked its performance since Mr. Gericke departed.

The tempi was well chosen, the programme being well balanced, and, we are happy to say, of short duration. Mr. Nikisch has more often than otherwise shown poor taste in the arrangement of his programme and bad judgment in the dragging it out a half-hour too long. Fursch-Madi's singing of the solos assigned her was commendable in a high degree. She gave the difficult recitative and aria from "Don Juan" with noble style and dramatic intensity, being little less happy in the one from "Figaro." This was a concert to be pleasantly remembered.

MUSIC AND DRAMA.

THE SYMPHONY.

"In Memoriam. W. A. Mozart. Died December 5, 1791."

This was the inscription with which the programme of the ninth symphony rehearsal and concert was prefaced. In front of the conductor's stand, on a low pedestal, somewhat scantily decorated with laurel leaves, was placed a life size bust of the genius who has been well called the Raphael of Music. It is possible that this object of art was visible from the center balcony, and it is probable that the bust was the largest one that was available. The contrast, however, which if presented to the colossal statue of Beethoven that mentor like overlooks the orchestra from the rear of the stage, was decidedly startling, and must have aroused feelings antagonistic to those of reverence in the breasts of more than one of the audience. It must be confessed, too, that the construction of the programme was, considering the occasion, in a measure disappointing. It is true that nothing could have been chosen for the opening number which was better calculated to throw the vast audience into a thoroughly receptive mood than was the overture to the "Magic Flute"—beautiful and inspiring as it always is. But the short, though impressive adagio, written for the Masonic funeral service, and the E flat symphony, typical as it is of the most delightful side of its composer's nature, failed to impart to this commemoration of the hundredth anniversary of Mozart's death the air of greatness one would have liked to associate with it. No doubt the illness of Mr. Kneisel and Mr. Loeffler deprived the audience of a performance which would have been wholly delightful. This unfortunate incident necessitated at the last moment the substitution of the funeral music for the Symphonic Concert for violin and viola, in which Mr. Kneisel, who has in times past shown what noble tones he could draw from the viola, was once more to be heard as a player of that instrument. This work, together with the greatest of all his symphonies, the "Jupiter," and the singing of a Lehmann, might have completed a programme which would indeed have been a worthy tribute to the memory of him whose music makes us forget care, whose life makes us heart sick.

But, putting what might have been out of mind, the programme as it stood was productive of much enjoyment. The overture was played with an airiness, a delicacy and finish that were hardly surpassed by the orchestra, even when it was under the lead of its former master of detail. The funeral music was broadly and feelingly rendered, and in the symphony was heard some of the best playing of the season, notwithstanding a certain lack of virility in the tone produced by the strings, due to the absence of the two leading violin players. The work of the wood wind was especially good, and Messrs. Mole and Sautet were once more their old selves in purity of tone and beauty of phrasing.

Mme. Fursch-Madi was the soloist, singing for her first number an aria from "Don Giovanni," and afterwards with piano accompaniment by Mr. Nikisch, the aria, "Dove Sono," from the "Marriage of Figaro." The first, Donna Anna's passionate entreaty to Don Ottavio to avenge her wrongs, Mme. Fursch-Madi sang with fire and true dramatic expressiveness, and the second was also artistically rendered. Her voice, however, was not wholly agreeable in quality, and it also at times was not under full control. This no doubt was partly owing to her recent illness. She was well received, and was heartily recalled after both numbers.

The Symphony Concert.

The concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall, last night, was in commemoration of the one hundredth anniversary of Mozart's death, was devoted wholly to music by the master, and was delightful from beginning to end. Notwithstanding the many great musicians who have written since that sad December night, when all that was mortal of the still young composer was thrust into a pauper's grave, without a mourner by to pay it the last honors, Mozart remains indisputably the greatest genius that the art of music has known among its followers. A century after his death his music is as fresh, as beautiful and as fascinating in the hearing as ever. How many of the so called great ones of our time, in which there is a tendency to pronounce him, passé, will be heard one hundred years hence? The overture to "The Magic Flute" with which the concert opened still stands foremost among the greatest of all works in its kind, and in its way it has never been approached. So with the great E-flat symphony, with which the concert ended. There has been more majestic and more pretentious music, more elaborately wrought music, more romantic, and even more philosophic music, but there never has been purer music, never music in which exquisite grace and profound learning have been so wonderfully mingled, or which appeals more directly to the gentler emotions with such irresistible power. The pleasure in hearing it was intensified by the admirable readings that were given to the programme throughout, and by the smoothness, precision and sympathetic sentiment that characterized the work of the orchestra. It was, on the whole, the best concert of the current symphony season thus far, and was honorable to all concerned in it. It is to be regretted that the illness of Messrs. Kneisel and Loeffler made it necessary to omit the promised concerto for violin and viola. The Masonic Funeral Music that was substituted for it was the only weak point in the concert. It is not a good example of the master, and its monotonous tonality makes it somewhat tiresome in the hearing, despite the richness of the orchestral color. Madame Fursch-Madi sang the recitative and air, "Or salci l'Onore," from "Don Giovanni," with fine dramatic force, declaiming the recitative with masterly impressiveness, and singing the impassioned air with dignity and brilliancy in effect. Later in the evening she gave "Dove Sono," from "Figaro," and in the recitative again illustrated her mastery of the purely dramatic style. She was less felicitous in the aria which was sung somewhat coldly and stiffly. The artist was cordially received and was recalled heartily after each effort. The selections for the next concert are: Concerto for strings and two wind orchestras, Handel, (first time); Prelude "Parsifal," Wagner; and Dramatic Symphony, Rubinstein. There will be no soloist.

MUSICAL.

Improving Beethoven.

The tendency of the day, in certain so-called "progressive" natures, is to modernize composers who wrote before Schumann. Mozart and Beethoven, are not highly seasoned enough for these music reformers, and therefore pepper, mustard and pungent sauces must be added to them. A Beethoven Symphony, played according to the expression marks provided by the composer with minutely sensitive care, in order that there may be no doubt as to his exact meaning, are unheeded, and other marks are supplied by the conductor, who, feeling that the privilege of using a baton endows him with iconoclastic rights, assumes to interpret the symphony according to his own personal impressions of what it should be, and hence the composer is relegated to the background and the conductor pushed to the front. This is all wrong. Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, Schumann and Weber, as the special individualities they appear in their scores are of infinitely more importance than are conductors who attempt to fasten their own unimpressive individualities on the music that they have not written and are only called upon to interpret according to the express indications given by the great masters, who, if it not unreasonable to believe, knew precisely what effects they wished to produce. This tampering with a composer's nuances is unpardonable. It is as if a picture restorer, feeling that a Rembrandt entrusted to him for repairs is not quite what it should be, introduces a touch here and there that changes the original effect, and makes it what the tasteless and presuming busy body imagines it ought to be. The result is that the picture is marred. Bentley once fancied that Milton's "Paradise Lost" was not written as it should have been, and he puts himself to great trouble in order to improve the poet's diction and to show how it should have been framed. The outcome was very much of Bentley, very little of Milton, and a preference for the poem as it originally appeared. Dryden and Pope felt that Chaucer was old fashioned, and set about modernizing him. The color and distinctive characteristics of the wonderful master-bard were wholly obliterated. Dryden and Pope were undoubtedly great poets in their way, but their paraphrases of Chaucer have sunk into deserved oblivion, and the old poet still lives in his original form, the delight of all who take the trouble to master his work as he gave it to the world. It is always an impertinence to treat a masterpiece in the spirit of a tinkering.

To Schumannize, or to Wagnerize, or to Nikischize a Beethoven symphony is something that calls for the severest reprehension. The composer there speaks for himself, and speaks with an authority from which there is no appeal; and the conductor who undertakes to substitute his authority for that of the master he is called on to read, assumes a superiority that savors more of smug conceit than of taste and judgment, and makes an attempt to elevate the mere interpretation of ideas above the lofty invention of them. There is no more excuse for interpolating new color in a great Beethoven symphony than there is for interpolating new color in a great Rembrandt, a great Titian or a great Raphael. In the case of the composer, as in that of the painter, the color and effect have been carefully thought out and as carefully set down by the originator of the work, and any effort to improve them is both presumptuous and destructive. A tinkered Beethoven symphony is no more admirable than is a tinkered Rembrandt portrait, and it matters little whether the great canvas be meddled with by a Van Daub, or the great symphony be meddled with by a Nikisch, the interference and the conceit are of the same reprehensible order.

We are firm in the belief that Mr. Nikisch cannot improve Beethoven, or Mozart, or Weber;—that if these composers had wished a slowing of the time where Mr. Nikisch introduces it, they would have marked it in their scores. We are also of the belief that when Beethoven, in the Marcia Funebre of his "Eroica" symphony, marked at the beginning of the movement "otto voce" and "pianissimo," thus giving a double evidence of his intention regarding the dynamic effect he desired to produce, he knew exactly what he wanted; and we therefore feel that when Mr. Nikisch disregarded these marks, he gave, as it were, a slap in the face to the composer. And we furthermore feel, that when, in the second phrase of the same movement, he changed the time to a slower pace, without finding the remotest authority for it in the score, he gave practical illustration of his evident belief that Mr. Nikisch knew much better than Beethoven how the music should be marked. Now, irreverent as it may appear, we unhesitatingly assert, that when the question arises between Beethoven and Mr. Nikisch regarding the nuances of the "Eroica" symphony, our adhesion is to Beethoven on every occasion. We care very much for Beethoven's markings and we do not care at all for Mr. Nikisch's. He may tinker Wagner, or Liszt, or Tchaikowsky, or Goldmark, or Bruchner to his heart's content; he may even tinker Brahms; but we entreat him, to let us have Beethoven unsophisticated of persistent sickly sentimental, quasi-operatic modernizing. When a Titan speaks for himself in large majestic tones, nothing is added to the dignity or the clearness of his utterances by interpolated comments made in a plaintive, pigmy voice. After a Hercules has slain a Nemean Lion, it is folly to thrust a pin in the carcass in the belief that it will complete the work of the hero.

MUSIC AND DRAMA.

MUSIC IN VIENNA.

Mr. Gericke's Work—Richter's Orchestra—Vienna Halls and Theatres—The New Art Museum.

[Special Correspondence of the Transcript.]

VIENNA, Nov. 25, 1891. Since I came to Vienna, the first of this month, many interesting things have occurred. On the 8th of November came Wilhelm Gericke's first concert; he gave Handel's "Alexander's Feast" in the hall of the Musikverein. To Boston eyes it was most agreeable to see our old director again waving his baton. I was especially struck by the freshness of the 250 voices of the chorus and the sureness with which they sang the choruses, more or less involved, in the fugues; one could easily follow the different voices. The orchestra, made up from the Opera here, numbered about eighty men and the smoothness of the strings was a pleasure to hear. The violins belong to the Opera and are all equally good, which accounts, to a certain extent, for their uniformity of tone. Mr. Gericke, before he left Boston, I believe, induced Mr. Higginson to send to Vienna and buy violins for his orchestra, with what result, the readers of this letter well know. Mr. Gericke was received with great applause, and apparently is a great favorite here. He looks well and happy, and finds it less fatiguing to conduct six concerts in Vienna than he did his one hundred and eight in America.

The acoustics of the hall are good, the fortes are very strong and seem to carry out Gericke's theory with regard to our Music Hall. I remember, he always said, "Your American halls are too broad, whereas Vienna halls are long and narrow—hence they carry sound better." As acoustics so seldom are good when great care is taken to have them so, one can little believe in the science—for certainly the new Burg theatre here, built with the greatest care, is a lamentable failure. To look at it is the most beautiful theatre I know in Europe, but unless one sits near the stage he hears little. The Viennese consider its actors quite equal to the Français, but whether they are or not they act at a disadvantage in a theatre where the acoustics are so poor.

Following Gericke's concert came Richter's First Philharmonic, also in Musikverein Hall, the same hour, half-past twelve o'clock, on Sunday morning. Again a packed house and great applause, the Opera orchestra and a programme made up of Cherubini's overture to "Anacreon," Bach's "Passacaglia," Berlioz's overture to "King Lear," and Beethoven's Seventh Symphony. Why I had never heard such kettle-drum playing in the "presto," or, in fact, never heard the passage before, I cannot say; but when the audience rose and shrieked its applause until the whole orchestra rose to acknowledge it, I felt that perhaps after all I was hearing an unusual performance. I had forgotten how Richter holds his orchestra in hand, and how he plays upon it as if it were literally under his fingers.

One thing I noticed which foreigners often say is peculiarly American, and which never occurs in music-loving Germany and Austria, was that many people actually got up and left the concert-room during the last movement of the symphony, presumably to get at their wraps and get out before the crowd.

I heard Emil Sauer play extremely well in the famous Börsendorfer Hall last week in an atmosphere so close and hot that it was impossible to stay. Fancy playing in a large white box in which no air can come from outside.

The Opera here is a great fact—and yet it does not seem, this year, quite up to its reputation. "Fidelio" with Materna was well done, and the third Leonora overture under Richter a thing to be remembered. "Lohengrin" I have rarely seen so poorly done. To be sure, it was a special performance ordered by the emperor to entertain his royal Saxon guests who were there for the marriage of Friederich August of Saxony and Louise Archduchess of Toscana, and, as a rule, such performances are below the average. Not to have Materna sing Ortrud was a disappointment, and people who have heard Winklemann sing in Bayreuth last summer will understand how badly it made one feel to hear his Lohengrin. After the 2d act all the royal guests departed and the opera was given to a practically empty house. In this instance the show was in the house—not on the stage. Every opera-glass was pointed at the royal box, where sat the kaiser, the king and queen of Saxony, the Princess Mathilde and the bridegroom. The house was a blaze of jewels and brilliant uniforms. Vienna women are justly celebrated for their fine clothes and jewels, and as all the boxes and parquet seats were occupied by members of the court, everybody put on his or her war paint and feathers. The Hungarians with leopard skins over their shoulders looked bizarre to the American eye.

Here, as in the other royal opera houses of Germany and Austria the performances of different operas vary, but as a whole I do not find the Vienna Opera quite so good as the Dresden one. One feels that its public demands a light opera to be followed by ballet. Nothing must last too long, and there must be always a novelty; hence the operas are cut, or short ones given.

The new museums are splendid; the picture gallery perhaps too gorgeous; yet time will soften all its splendor. Certainly its fine Van Dycks, Velasquez, Rubens, Tintoretto and Rembrandts never looked in the old Belvedere as they do now. In the parterre all the Ambras collection of armor is arranged and all the crystal vases and small jewelled toys and conceits of the imperial collection are placed in glass cabinets, where one sees them as one never could before in the small treasury of the burg. The cameos, intaglios and orders are arranged against the light, so that one may see every detail. It is greatly to the credit of the present emperor that he has finished his museums for his people and allowed the palace to remain almost untouched, although begun at the same time. The view of the Ringstrasse, with the Votiv Church, houses of Parliament, the Burg Theatre, Rathhaus and the two new museums, is unlike anything on the continent. It has all been made by the present sovereign, and it is sad to remember that with him dies his branch of the imperial family. His brother, Karl Ludwig, is his successor, and Ludwig's son, Ferdinand d'Este, now about twenty-eight years old, is really considered crown prince. Of course the absence of the Hungarian nobles and the rapid growth of Buda-Pesth have done much to depress Vienna; still, she will always be the Emperor's City.

128

R. C. Dyer.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

Globe

Mozart Programme at the Symphony Concert.

Mme. Fursch-Madi's Voice and Mr. Nikisch's Band Share Honors.

MME. FURSCHMADI.

ME. FURSCH-MADI was the soloist at last night's symphony concert, and the programme consisted entirely of selections from Mozart's writings. The numbers were thoroughly representative of the genius of the great composer, as it included the overture to the "Magic Flute" and the "Masonic Funeral March," both compositions which the author himself esteemed almost as the best results of his greatest efforts.

The "Overture" does not lend itself to any particular display of great originality in interpretation or any striking skill in its execution, but Mr. Nikisch managed to enhance it with a vivacity in tempo and delicacy of tone which, in effect, almost reached the dignity of grandeur.

The concerto for the viola and flute which was to be played was abandoned, owing to the illness of Kneisel and Loeffler; instead the funeral march was given. It was played with all the charm and exquisite harmony to which it is susceptible, and Mr. Nikisch, in his interpretation of it, displayed the exquisite symmetry in conception of the whole which make the carefulness of technique indispensable to the beautiful effect.

As the solemn chord rose and fell, occasionally swelling to sonorous diapason and gradually dropping off into the pathos of the minor, the effect was beautiful in its grand, almost majestic sombreness. The impression on the audience was most effective. Several seconds passed before anybody stirred, and even when the applause came the effect was as if they were given by people who were still thoughtfully watching the painful sounds of the abrupt finale, as if they were still listening to the harsh sound of the lowering of the coffin.

But it was the andante in Mozart's symphony in E flat in which the orchestra showed itself at its best, and which produced the most pleasing effect on the audience.

It was played with exquisite grace in movement, and the spontaneity of sound, the shadowy blending of notes, made the impression of the whole appear as that of a streaming, alluring harmony, pregnant with feeling and sentiment. Mr. Nikisch's leading was bold, striking and original, and in this instance he appeared more intent, more watchful, as is usually the case when he is conscious of a particular effort.

Mme. Fursch-Madi, the soloist, was in excellent condition last night. She sang an aria from "Don Giovanni" with splendid effect. Her voice, which is capable of beautiful modulation, was clear, soft and expressive. She almost rose to the dignity of passion when, in the last lines of her song, she urges the revenge of her father's murder. The theme of her song lends itself to great dramatic interpretation, to which she did more than justice. She displayed the greatness of her talent when a few minutes afterwards she sang "Dove Sous," an aria from "Marriage of Figaro."

The contrast from passionate declamation to mournful misgiving, from urgent appeal to wavering regret and disgust at having to adopt a subterfuge in order to win back her love—the theme of her second song—gave her an excellent opportunity for displaying the charming modulations to which her voice is susceptible to an attentive and appreciative audience.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

Harold

The Symphony Concert—Soloist, Mme. Fursch-Madi.

Conductor Nikisch improved his earliest opportunity in the home concerts of the Boston symphony orchestra last evening to commemorate the Mozart centennial, the selections made for the occasion from Mozart's works being the overture to the "Magic Flute," the great Donna Anna aria from "Don Giovanni," the "Masonic Funeral Music," the "Dove Song" from "Marriage of Figaro," and the symphony in E flat.

Such programmes, while altogether commendable and appropriate for such observances, are not altogether enjoyable, on account of the absence of contrasting styles and forms demanded in all successful programme making. Conductor Nikisch, however, made all that was possible of the overture, funeral music and symphony, and was heartily commended for his readings of these several compositions.

Mme. Fursch-Madi was the singer of the evening, and her delivery of the Donna Anna aria was characterized by all the dramatic strength and taste called for in its perfect interpretation. Mme. Fursch-Madi has not been heard here for some seasons, but the pleasant memories of her earlier triumphs were shown in the hearty greeting given her, and the applause following her first contribution to the programme recalled her to bow her acknowledgments. The beauties of the "Dove Song" were made distinctly prominent by Mme. Fursch-Madi's singing of the number, and she was again most heartily applauded at its conclusion.

The public rehearsal of the coming week will be given on Thursday, and for this and the Saturday evening concert the programme will be as follows: Handel's concerto for strings and two wind orchestras, in F major (first time); Wagner's prelude, "Parsifal," and Rubinstein's symphony No. 4, dramatic, (first time).

130

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1891-92.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

X. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 26, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

HANDEL.

CONCERTO for STRINGS and two WIND ORCHES-TRAS, in F major.
Pomposo; Allegro.—Allegro ma non troppo.—
Largo.—A tempo ordinario.—Allegro.
(First time.)

WAGNER.

PRELUDE, "Parsifal."

RUBINSTEIN.

OCEAN SYMPHONY. (Original Version.)
Allegro maestoso.—Adagio.—
Allegro.—Adagio: Allegro con fuoco.

THE SYMPHONY.

Journal

An Important Work Heard for the First Time.

The Composer Often the Expression of His Age.

Coming Musical Events of Interest, Among Them the Opera.

The programme of the tenth Symphony concert, given Saturday evening in Music Hall, was as follows: Concerto for strings and two wind orchestras, in F major, Handel; prelude, "Parsifal," Wagner; Rubinstein's "Ocean" Symphony (original version).

This Handel concerto was a novelty, and a refreshing one. We know but little of its history, although Rockstro and Chrysander have rummaged manuscripts and records. It is written for string quartette and two choirs of wind instruments, consisting each of two horns, two oboes and a bassoon. There are nine movements, and this number in the version used by Mr. Nikisch is reduced to five. It is a remarkably strong and effective work, and in certain respects the instrumental combinations are modern, or this statement may be reversed, and it may be said that the grouping together of instrumental families and using them antiphonally, one against the other, is evidently not a modern invention. In his earlier days, and when he was in Italy, Handel taxed the skill of the solo violinists; in this concerto he set a task of no mean difficulty before his horn and oboe players. It is true that there are figures and passages that are familiar to students of his oratorios and his organ concertos; but as a whole the work is one of amazing freshness. The mannerisms of Handel are to be found; just as they are found in the works of all great composers. They serve as the flourish that in former days was added to a signature. They are perhaps old-fashioned; but the mannerisms of our modern composers may excite the same comment a hundred years from now. In this work they do not annoy by their constant recurrence; and there is more than once a deliberate harmonic surprise, as though Handel had thought to himself, "They will say that I have a trick of rounding my sentences in one and the same way. But this surely is a change." So in its harmonic structure and in its sense of instrumental color the concerto was a genuine surprise to many who thought they knew their Handel.

This music of Handel is at least one hundred and fifty years old. Our advanced friends of the modern school do not deny that the old maker of operas and oratorios was possessed of a certain rude strength, a vigorous rhythm, contrapuntal ingenuity and a pleasing melody that was too often choked by the rigid bands of formalism. They are men of to-day, and they would not probably exchange the prelude to "Parsifal" for the whole voluminous baggage of Handel. But how will the men of 1990 look upon "Parsifal," or will they have even the opportunity?

I have more than once in these columns hinted at the absurdity of comparing together musicians of different centuries or even generations. To solemnly weigh Handel and Wagner in the scales and then pronounce judgment is opposed to the spirit and the canons of modern criticism. The one, as well as the other, was an expression of his time. That is to say, each was in a way ahead of his time, but certain features, certain feelings of each century found fullest expression in the music of the one and in that of the other. Handel was bitterly accused in the English prose and poetry of his day of giving "sound and show, instead of sense." His pathetic melodies were characterized by some as "smooth stupidity," as "sing-songs." At the same time there is much that is essentially English in Handel's music after he abandoned the operatic stage. We know the character of the people he lived among from memoirs and journals. We know what they ate and drank. Their amusements, their conversations, are familiar to us. Their roughness, coarseness, brutality are always painfully present to students of the manners and customs of that century. The satires upon Handel's operas and his opera singers are often couched in the foulest language. The Grand Duke of Chandos, Handel's patron, was warmly praised for buying his third wife from her husband, a groom, who was in the habit of beating her. But, in spite of the many faults of the people, there was a certain manliness, a frank self-reliance, a belief in a special Providence for Englishmen, an indefinable enjoyment in all things that were out of doors, and these qualities or characteristics are found in the fresh and virile music of Handel, as in this concerto, for example. Above all, it was not an age of diseased nerves. The real lovers of music in Handel's time were simply moved by apparently simple means.

When Wagner wrote "Parsifal" he had exhausted in his music the passion of love as it is commonly understood. His philosophy, and perhaps his age, led him to meditate upon the expression in music of self-abnegation, of self-immolation. And the prelude to "Parsifal," taken in connection with the music-drama that follows, is intended to prepare the hearer for what is to come, to put him in the mood. When this prelude is given upon the concert stage, and when it is stripped of its conditions, it becomes merely music pure and simple without symbolical meaning. The composer may say "I mean this and I mean that," but the hearer has a right to reply, "It is not what you mean, but it is what you write that I am chiefly concerned with." It is, therefore, perhaps a great injustice to Wagner to give this prelude in the garish concert hall, for as absolute music it must seem intrinsically empty and bombastic, and worse than that, monotonous. There is a mock solemnity, there is an attempt at religious simplicity, and there is of course a violent attack upon the nerves of the hearer. But the hearer is more or less hardened, his nerves have become accustomed to the disquieting progressions that are always promising a climax and constantly disappoint. At the same time he has lost his taste for simple things; and, the child of his age, with vague longings, dissatisfied, often without trust or hope, he finds in the music of Wagner the most complete expression of his mental and physical condition. Perhaps he thinks it is really the only music when suddenly a Handelian blast assails him; he finds himself drawing a long breath, and he forgets his mental speculations, and he realizes that mere healthy animal existence is not to be despised, and he may even envy secretly the man of Handel's day.

134

When Rubinstein led in different cities his "Ocean" symphony, his personality lent it a foreign interest, so that it often provoked enthusiasm. When it is heard in cold blood and regarded simply as a symphonic work, it loses with each hearing. By the very title it invites conjecture, and the hearer is too often busied in trying to unroll a panorama as the music is played. Rubinstein has given no programme, and the hearer may find at pleasure all objects and all phenomena above and below the surface, or all thoughts suggested by the mere contemplation of the ocean. The first movement is easily the best, and it is of grand proportions. The other movements seem to have been written at random, and Louis de Romain once suggested that Rubinstein, in making his musical voyage, was caught the second day out in a heavy fog.

The concerto was played with firmness and spirit. The work of the strings was generally to be warmly commended; the oboe solo passages were delightfully played; the horns were not always faultless in intonation or in quality of tone. The "Parsifal" prelude was played with great care, and the "Faith" motif was most defiantly proclaimed by the brass. The performance of the symphony was characterized by a brilliancy that was at times reckless.

PHILIP HALE.

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS.

From (Warren D.)

Review of the Tenth Symphony Concert.

The programme of last Saturday's concert was a purely orchestral one embracing the following numbers: Concerto for strings and two wind orchestras, in F major, Handel; prelude, "Parsifal," Wagner; "Ocean Symphony," Rubinstein. The interesting number of the above was the Handel concerto, composed probably about 1740. Little is known of this composition, as there is no direct historical record regarding it. It however proved to be a work in the broadest style of the old master, florid and graceful in form, and scored in a manner that would redound to the credit of a modern composer. The characteristic duets between the oboes and the same treatment of the horns, exquisite bits of florid composition, were charmingly rendered and followed by the audience with undivided attention. Barring some roughness in the strings the whole work was well played, and its performance must be counted among the interesting novelties of the season.

Following this came the "Parsifal" prelude, as recent in both as the other is distant. In its own place in Wagner's music-drama, and properly rendered, it has its significance when judged from the standard its composer erected in his latter-day frenzies. In the form of a concert piece, detached from its surroundings, it is tedious and unmeaning; as incoherent to the unstudied Wagnerite as Handel's piece is clear and exhilarating to any one having a spark of music within his soul, be his tastes ancient or modern, if he be not sunk in the prejudice of Wagnerphobia.

The "Ocean" symphony that followed (the four original movements), with its wonderful first movement, ended the concert. Like the preceding Wagner piece, it was played in places in a rough and uncouth manner, less boisterous and vulgar than is so often the case with this orchestra, but still far, infinitely far, from the artistic finish that was the ever-present condition existing when the refined Gerike controlled its forces. To quote from the able pen of Mr. Louis Elson, "The end was as loud as Gilmore himself could have achieved, and then

"Silence like a poultice came
 To heal the blows of sound."

There is a reason why the playing on Saturday night should fall so far beneath the commendable effort of a week ago. The reason is clear enough also. The comparatively good work done at the last two concerts had encouraged the critical listeners to hope that a new leaf had been turned over, but alas, the hope was dashed. We will discuss the reason for this great contrast in a future paper.

THE SYMPHONY.

Concluded

IMPORTANT MUSICAL EVENTS OF CHRISTMAS WEEK.

THE HANDEL AND HAYDN SOCIETY'S PERFORMANCE OF THE "MESSIAH"—THE PADEREWSKI CONCERT.

Handel, Wagner and Rubinstein were the giants that were grouped together in the tenth Symphony programme.

A concerto for strings and two wind orchestras, in F major, by Handel, was the opening number. Much credit is due Mr. Nikisch for rescuing this work from oblivion, and performing it with some modifications, for the first time in Boston. The programme book tells us that the date of its composition, as well as that of its first performance is unknown to history. In its original form it contained nine movements; that is, two measures of a ninth movement were found in the manuscript, the remaining pages being lost, or perhaps never written. Six movements were played at this concert, although the first two were connected in the form of an introduction and allegro. In order to give the work properly some changes in the orchestra were necessary. Two extra oboe players were called into service, and the second pair of horns was placed at the right of the bassoons, among the 'cellos and double basses. The bassoons, of which there were also four, thus came between the horns, the clarinets not being in the score at all.

Those who are acquainted with the works of Handel can imagine the character of this music more easily than it can be described, for it is thoroughly Handelian. The movements bear these titles: Pomposo, allegro, allegro ma non troppo, largo, a tempo ordinario, allegro. The introduction and the largo are broad and dignified and rich in harmony, while the others are delightfully quaint and fascinating. In the second and last allegros the horns are used in a charmingly effective manner. The last in gigue form opening with a passage which is given out by the first horns and repeated by the seconds, is especially attractive. In the second and fifth movements the oboes are the prominent feature; while throughout the entire work the strings are constantly employed either as leading or accompanying instruments. The work was well worth the trouble of the preparation involved. That it was enjoyed by the audience was evident from the spontaneous applause which most of the movements evoked.

Why the prelude to "Parsifal" was made the go-between of this concerto and the "Ocean" symphony of Rubinstein is one of those things that, we dare say, few fellows, at the most, can find out. It is a riddle which even those few will in all probability scarcely take the trouble to guess at this time of year, when every one wants a holiday mentally as well as bodily. The prelude was played magnificently, however, and Mr. Nikisch amply demonstrated the intensity of his admiration for Wagner, and the greatness of his powers as a conductor as well.

135

If the Ocean symphony were placed first on a programme, it would be a satisfaction to hear it given in its entirety whenever it is given at all. But a seven movement work for a final number is a little too much; therefore it was a happy thought to perform it as it originally left the hands of its composer.

What a glorious movement is the first! The finale, too, after an evident falling off in inspiration in the two middle movements, shows that Rubinstein made a herculean effort to create a movement that should be a fit companion of the first. It is a melancholy fact, however, that he only partly succeeded. The symphony was played in a manner worthy of the work by conductor and orchestra; and of all the players, no one so completely distinguished himself as did our virtuoso of the kettledrums.

MUSICAL.

The Symphony Concert.

The programme for last night's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, was: Concerto for String and two Wind orchestras, in F., Handel (first time); Prelude, "Parsifal," Wagner, and the original version of Rubinstein's "Ocean" Symphony. These selections made a curious and not very harmonious combination. The chief point of interest was the Handel work, which was a surprise in the solidity and richness of its orchestration. Much of it was as full and as sonorous as if it had been scored yesterday by a follower of the modern school, and the marvel of it is that so much should be accomplished by such simple means. As evidenced in this work, Handel could write wonderfully well for the orchestra when he desired to do so. The brief but lovely Largo is an example in point. It is broadly, richly and impressively arranged, and shows a fine appreciation of the characteristic timbres of the various instruments. The fifth movement, a species of minuet, is beautiful in its theme and delightful in its orchestration, the florid dialogue between the solo oboes being exquisite. There must have been fine players of the oboe and horn in Handel's time or such difficult bravura passages as are heard in this movement would not have been written. The oboe solos were played with charming grace and beautiful finish of technique. This concerto shows that there was no slight knowledge of orchestral effect before Haydn and Mozart, and that Handel did not need a Berlioz or a Wagner to teach him close and massive scoring. The work was listened to with unalloyed pleasure, and was enthusiastically applauded. We trust that it may be heard here again at no distant date. It was well worth the reviving, not only for the freshness and interest of the music, but as an example of Handel's masterly use of the orchestra. The "Parsifal" music was well played, but it is tiresome and unmeaning in itself, and is incoherent unless it be followed with a full elucidation on the programme. The symphony was well read and brilliantly, though at times roughly played. At the next concert will be given Goldmark's overture, "Prometheus Bound," the first movement of the Symphonic Concerto for violin, viola, and orchestra, by Mozart; the Entr'acte to Schubert's "Rosamunde," and the Symphony No. 2, in D, by Brahms. Messrs. Loewler and Kniesel are to be the soloists.

134
 what you write that I am chiefly concerned with." It is, therefore, perhaps a great injustice to Wagner to give this prelude in the garish concert hall, for as absolute music it must seem intrinsically empty and bombastic, and worse than that, monotonous. There is a mock solemnity, there is an attempt at religious simplicity, and there is of course a violent attack upon the nerves of the hearer. But the hearer is more or less hardened, his nerves have become accustomed to the disquieting progressions that are always promising a climax and constantly disappointing. At the same time he has lost his taste for simple things; and, the child of his age, with vague longings, dissatisfied, often without trust or hope, he finds in the music of Wagner the most complete expression of his mental and physical condition. Perhaps he thinks it is really the only music when suddenly a Handelian blast assails him; he finds himself drawing a long breath, and he forgets his mental speculations, and he realizes that mere healthy animal existence is not to be despised, and he may even envy secretly the man of Handel's day.

When Rubinstein led in different cities his "Ocean" symphony, his personality lent it a foreign interest, so that it often provoked enthusiasm. When it is heard in cold blood and regarded simply as a symphonic work, it loses with each hearing. By the very title it invites conjecture, and the hearer is too often busied in trying to unroll a panorama as the music is played. Rubinstein has given no programme, and the hearer may find at pleasure all objects and all phenomena above and below the surface, or all thoughts suggested by the mere contemplation of the ocean. The first movement is easily the best, and it is of grand proportions. The other movements seem to have been written at random, and Louis de Romain once suggested that Rubinstein, in making his musical voyage, was caught the second day out in a heavy fog.

The concerto was played with firmness and spirit. The work of the strings was generally to be warmly commended; the oboe solo passages were delightfully played; the horns were not always faultless in intonation or in quality of tone. The "Parsifal" prelude was played with great care, and the "Faith" motif was most defiantly proclaimed by the brass. The performance of the symphony was characterized by a brilliancy that was at times reckless.

PHILIP HALE.

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS.

From (Warran D.)

Review of the Tenth Symphony Concert.

The programme of last Saturday's concert was a purely orchestral one embracing the following numbers: Concerto for strings and two wind orchestras, in F major, Handel; prelude, "Parsifal," Wagner; "Ocean Symphony," Rubinstein. The interesting number of the above was the Handel concerto, composed probably about 1740. Little is known of this composition, as there is no direct historical record regarding it. It however proved to be a work in the broadest style of the old master, florid and graceful in form, and scored in a manner that would redound to the credit of a modern composer. The characteristic duets between the oboes and the same treatment of the horns, exquisite bits of florid composition, were charmingly rendered and followed by the audience with undivided attention. Lacking some roughness in the strings the whole work was well played, and its performance must be counted among the interesting novelties of the season.

Following this came the "Parsifal" prelude, as recent in both as the other is distant. In its own place in Wagner's music-drama, and properly rendered, it has its significance when judged from the standard its composer erected in his latter-day frenzies. In the form of a concert piece, detached from its surroundings, it is tedious and unmeaning; as incoherent to the unstudied Wagnerite as Handel's piece is clear and exhilarating to any one having a spark of music within his soul, be his tastes ancient or modern, if he be not sunk in the prejudice of Wagnerphobia.

The "Ocean" symphony that followed (the four original movements), with its wonderful first movement, ended the concert. Like the preceding Wagner piece, it was played in places in a rough and uncouth manner, less boisterous and vulgar than is so often the case with this orchestra, but still far, infinitely far, from the artistic finish that was the ever-present condition existing when the refined Gericke controlled its forces. To quote from the able pen of Mr. Louis Elson, "The end was as loud as Gilmore himself could have achieved, and then

"Silence like a poultice came
 To heal the blows of sound."

There is a reason why the playing on Saturday night should fall so far beneath the commendable effort of a week ago. The reason is clear enough also. The comparatively good work done at the last two concerts had encouraged the critical listeners to hope that a new leaf had been turned over, but alas, the hope was dashed. We will discuss the reason for this great contrast in a future paper.

THE SYMPHONY.

IMPORTANT MUSICAL EVENTS OF CHRISTMAS WEEK.

THE HANDEL AND HAYDN SOCIETY'S PERFORMANCE OF THE "MESSIAH"—THE PADEREWSKI CONCERT.

Handel, Wagner and Rubinstein were the giants that were grouped together in the tenth Symphony programme.

A concerto for strings and two wind orchestras, in F major, by Handel, was the opening number. Much credit is due Mr. Nikisch for rescuing this work from oblivion, and performing it with some modifications, for the first time in Boston. The programme book tells us that the date of its composition, as well as that of its first performance is unknown to history. In its original form it contained nine movements; that is, two measures of a ninth movement were found in the manuscript, the remaining pages being lost, or perhaps never written. Six movements were played at this concert, although the first two were connected in the form of an introduction and allegro. In order to give the work properly some changes in the orchestra were necessary. Two extra oboe players were called into service, and the second pair of horns was placed at the right of the bassoons, among the cellos and double basses. The bassoons, of which there were also four, thus came between the horns, the clarinets not being in the score at all.

Those who are acquainted with the works of Handel can imagine the character of this music more easily than it can be described, for it is thoroughly Handelian. The movements bear these titles: Pomposo, allegro, allegro ma non troppo, largo, a tempo ordinario, allegro. The introduction and the largo are broad and dignified and rich in harmony, while the others are delightfully quaint and fascinating. In the second and last allegros the horns are used in a charmingly effective manner. The last in gigue form opening with a passage which is given out by the first horns and repeated by the seconds, is especially attractive. In the second and fifth movements the oboes are the prominent feature; while throughout the entire work the strings are constantly employed either as leading or accompanying instruments. The work was well worth the trouble of the preparation involved. That it was enjoyed by the audience was evident from the spontaneous applause which most of the movements evoked.

Why the prelude to "Parsifal" was made the go-between of this concerto and the "Ocean" symphony of Rubinstein is one of those things that, we dare say, few fellows, at the most, can find out. It is a riddle which even those few will in all probability scarcely take the trouble to guess at this time of year, when every one wants a holiday mentally as well as bodily. The prelude was played magnificently, however, and Mr. Nikisch amply demonstrated the intensity of his admiration for Wagner, and the greatness of his powers as a conductor as well.

If the Ocean symphony were placed first on a programme, it would be a satisfaction to hear it given in its entirety whenever it is given at all. But a seven movement work for a final number is a little too much; therefore it was a happy thought to perform it as it originally left the hands of its composer.

What a glorious movement is the first! The finale, too, after an evident falling off in inspiration in the two middle movements, shows that Rubinstein made a herculean effort to create a movement that should be a fit companion of the first. It is a melancholy fact, however, that he only partly succeeded. The symphony was played in a manner worthy of the work by conductor and orchestra; and of all the players, no one so completely distinguished himself as did our virtuoso of the kettledrums.

MUSICAL.

The Symphony Concert.

The programme for last night's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, was: Concerto for String and two Wind orchestras, in F., Handel (first time); Prelude, "Parsifal," Wagner, and the original version of Rubinstein's "Ocean" Symphony. These selections made a curious and not very harmonious combination. The chief point of interest was the Handel work, which was a surprise in the solidity and richness of its orchestration. Much of it was as full and as sonorous as if it had been scored yesterday by a follower of the modern school, and the marvel of it is that so much should be accomplished by such simple means. As evidenced in this work, Handel could write wonderfully well for the orchestra when he desired to do so. The brief but lovely Largo is an example in point. It is broadly, richly and impressively arranged, and shows a fine appreciation of the characteristic timbres of the various instruments. The fifth movement, a species of minuet, is beautiful in its theme and delightful in its orchestration, the florid dialogue between the solo oboes being exquisite. There must have been five players of the oboe and horn in Handel's time or such difficult bravura passages as are heard in this movement would not have been written. The oboe solos were played with charming grace and beautiful finish of technique. This concerto shows that there was no slight knowledge of orchestral effect before Haydn and Mozart, and that Handel did not need a Berlioz or a Wagner to teach him close and massive scoring. The work was listened to with unalloyed pleasure, and was enthusiastically applauded. We trust that it may be heard here again at no distant date. It was well worth the reviving, not only for the freshness and interest of the music, but as an example of Handel's masterly use of the orchestra. The "Parsifal" music was well played, but it is tiresome and unmeaning in itself, and is incoherent unless it be followed with a full elation on the programme. The symphony was well read and brilliantly, though at times roughly played. At the next concert will be given Goldmark's overture, "Prometheus Bound," the first movement of the Symphonic Concerto for violin, viola, and orchestra, by Mozart; the Entr'acte to Schubert's "Rosamunde," and the Symphony No. 2, in D, by Brahms. Messrs. Loeffler and Kneisel are to be the soloists.

AN "END-SEATER" AT THE SYMPHONY.

To the Editor of the Transcript: At the last performance of the Symphony Orchestra the number of those present who were not provided with seats was greater than usual. The number of those who stand is always large, but on any special occasion the crowd is very much in excess of the accommodation and the result is very great inconvenience and injustice to those who are the owners of end seats next the sides of the house. Nearly half the space of such end seats is apt to be taken up by the front row of those who stand and who are crowded in between the seats when the press is great as it was last Saturday night. Persons who pay their admission fee and who are thus obliged to stand along the sides of the house, the only place provided for them, are certainly not to be blamed for this condition of things. After having paid their money they have a right to expect to get inside the hall. The management is responsible for thus rendering seats which were bought in good faith at comparatively high prices almost valueless. Many side and end seats toward the rear of the hall are wholly cut off at times from a view of the stage by the crowd of persons standing, and this in spite of the efforts of an able corp of ushers who do all they can to preserve the rights of those who have seats. The management is surely not under the necessity of selling more tickets than the house will accommodate and yet this is precisely what this crowding means.

Apropos of this whole subject, why should there not be another Symphony performance, say on Thursday evenings? Let it be a rehearsal, if you please, in contradistinction to what is now called a rehearsal, but which is, in fact, a preliminary performance. There may be some good reason for not having a third performance although it be a rehearsal. If there is, would it not be well to let the public know the objection? Such a performance would undoubtedly pay—perhaps not quite as well as the present performances, still it would pay handsomely, and it has generally been supposed that the question of paying and profit was not paramount in the minds of the management of the Symphony concerts. Is there not time for a third performance? Many of the members of the orchestra have time for outside work and the whole orchestra performs on certain evenings in a neighboring city. We do not desire to deprive Cambridge of its concerts but we respectfully suggest that charity begins at home and that Cambridge music lovers can come to Music Hall, Boston, as conveniently as can residents of many other suburbs.

If the educational element of the scheme is to be considered—and I do not for a moment suppose that it is not, there is certainly demand for a third performance. One cannot be present at the sale of the tickets for the concerts without being aware of the presence of a large number of disappointed people who are forced to give up the idea of attending, solely because the tickets cost too much, and it is safe to say that the vast majority of those who cannot attend because of the high cost of the tickets are not to be seen at the sales at all. If the public needs are to be considered a third performance is clearly demanded, and it should be an evening performance, because that is the time when the greatest number of people are most likely to be able to attend. If it were a genuine rehearsal with some repetition of parts of the performance, as occasionally occurred in the rehearsals of former days, no harm would result. In fact this would probably suit a large number of professional musical people and students even better than either of the present performances. How many of the students of music in the city attend the Symphony concerts? Is the percentage large? We fear not. Give the people who cannot pay big premiums a chance. Let the splendid orchestra be a source of education and recreation to a still larger number of the people. W. A. M.

TENTH CONCERT.

The programme of the tenth concert of the season by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dec. 26, was: Handel's concerto for strings and two wind orchestras, in F major (first time); Wagner's prelude to "Parsifal"; Rubinstein's symphony No. 4, dramatic (first time).

It will be readily seen that the above programme presented little in the way of novelty or interest to the regular symphony attendant. It is also apparent that the programmes are becoming less and less attractive as the season progresses. The last two have been kiln-dried, if such and expression can be permitted in music. The recent wet weather ought to have a tendency to moisten them up.

Handel was a prolific writer, composing every species of music from a piccolo solo up to an opera and oratorio; but this concerto, for strings and two wind orchestras, is rather a misnomer, inasmuch as it would require an orchestra of strings, with two brass bands, to carry out the idea. This, of course, was not attempted, but quite another idea prevailed. Though announced as a novelty, it failed to produce any marked impression. The music is Handelonian, and hence good. It was fairly well played. Such arrangements, however, seldom afford much pleasure, no matter how well played.

The Parsifal music was read with intelligence, in the light of Mr. Nikisch's understanding, and that is acknowledged to be equal, if not superior, to most other conductors we have had with us. Mr. Nikisch certainly ought to understand Wagner's operas, and all other composers' operas as well, for he was purely an operatic conductor when he arrived here, having acted in that capacity at Leipzig. It is a mistake to say he was conductor of the Gewandhaus orchestra, for such is not a fact. Carl Reinicke has been its conductor for thirty years, and is still in the harness.

The Rubinstein symphony, baring the first movement, is not really musically agreeable, and the orchestra was not at its best in several particulars. Yet, it evidently pleased the audience and that is the main thing, after all.

JAMES M. TRACY.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Symphony Concert.

The concert of Saturday, which was a purely orchestral one, did not redound to the credit of the organization which gave it, for there were not only misreadings, but a degree of noisy roughness that spoiled more than one movement. The programme began with a novelty,—but a very old one,—a Concerto by Handel which had never been heard in our concerts before. It may be remembered that the clarinet was not used in Handel's day, and that therefore there was a degree of attachment to the oboes and bassoons which can scarcely be fully realized by modern musicians. This prominence of oboe was the great characteristic of the tone-color of the present concerto, and the most effective playing in it was the duet between two oboes in the fourth movement, which was executed without a flaw in spite of difficulties as great as ever appear in any modern work. Scarcely less difficult, and scarcely less perfect in rendering, were the horn passages of the finale, a charming Gigue. The first movements were roughly played, but the work was full of interest, and showed that there was a fairly good standard of tone coloring even in the early days of orchestral writing, for Bach and Handel may be considered as the very pioneers of orchestral thought.

To put Handel's work in immediate propinquity to the prelude to "Parsifal" was just to neither of the compositions, although it may have been the conductor's purpose to show the inception and the culmination of orchestral scoring, side by side. Be that as it may, the proximity was unwise, and the contrast far too sharp. The great flaw of the concert was the manner in which the Wagner work was performed; here at least, no apologist can urge the permissibility of freedom of conception, for Wagner is of today, he has directed his own work, he has authorized representatives and successors who perpetuate those details of tempo, shading and execution, which he took such care in evolving, and no one has a right to meddle with the minutiae as established at Bayreuth. It must have been a surprise then to any musician who had heard the "Abendmahls-thema" sigh out at the first of the performance in the German theatre, to find this dreamy touch transformed into a cyclone in the opening measures of this performance.

In one respect, however, it may be acknowledged that our orchestra distanced the orchestra of Bayreuth; it played louder than any band that Wagner, or Richter, or Levy, or Mottl ever led; the onslaught on "Parsifal" made the Bayreuthian fortissimi seem very puny indeed; the kettle-drummer played as if he were thinking of Haydn's "Suprise Symphony"; the brasses thundered the "Glaubens-thema" in deafening fury, and the prelude was carried by assault. If the wittings of the paragraphic press are right, if Wagner is noise pure and simple, then this may be classed as the very best performance this prelude has ever received, but if one demands something of coherency, a degree of shading rather than wild extremes, and a trifle of accuracy in ensemble then the praise may turn to emphatic censure. It is wonderful that a man as musically gifted as our conductor, who has heard the prelude performed in its best form, should have given such a hurly-burly of sound in its place, and it is strange that our orchestra, which has even a week ago, done fairly good work, should so entirely lose all sense of unity and effective attack.

The ensemble of the "Ocean Symphony" was not much better, but here, at least, the elan of the chief theme of the first movement was grandly given, and the heavy crescendos led up to the solid climaxes at the re-entrances of this chief theme after development and in the effective coda. The second movement was rather coarsely played, and the symphony, after the first movement (which deserved praise), sank to the noisy vulgarity of the preceding performance. A word of commendation may be spoken for the execution of the florid piccolo passages, and the ugly tones of the muted horn made their due effect in the finale. The end was as loud as Gilmore himself could have achieved, and then

Silence like a poultice came
To heal the blows of Sound.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Three works, each with strongly distinctive peculiarities, made up the programme for the tenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in the Music Hall, last Saturday night. These were:

Handel—Concerto for strings and the wind orchestras in F major. First time.
Wagner—Prelude to "Parsifal."
Rubinstein—Ocean Symphony. Original version.

For the opportunity to hear the Handel concerto, a thousand thanks. As explained in the programme book, six of the original nine movements (only a fragment of the ninth being in existence, by the way) have been taken and newly arranged into five movements. The scoring is for very simple appliances, judged from a modern standpoint—string quartet and two groups of wind instruments, each including horns, oboes and bassoons in pairs. Not even a flute for sweetness, a trombone for weight, or drums and cymbals to startle you with a momentary crash. But how delightful it all is! How clear the themes, how rich the harmony, and how expressive the instrumentation, despite its apparent poverty of color! A duet for oboes in the fourth movement so pleased the audience that its repetition was almost demanded. The entire work is an illustration of the rule in art that it is not what you use for material or means that brings success, as how you use it. Hearty and spontaneous applause followed each movement, testifying as much to the refined taste of the hearers as to the masterful performance which this most interesting work received. The wholesome breeziness of both concerto and performance was most refreshing and inspiring.

It would have been hardly possible to follow Handel's work with one more strongly contrasted in every element than is the prelude to "Parsifal." In the first we had pure form, crystalline in its integrity, with color sparingly but effectively used. From Wagner we had elaborate interweaving of forms, requiring closest attention from the listener to detect their outline, while all the hues and tints known to modern musicians are laid on with greatest lavishness. The prelude, however, has now been heard in Music Hall often enough—at least four times previous to this occasion—for our amateurs to acquire a knowledge of its nature, so that its intricacies have lost some of their perplexity. It was played with splendid warmth, a warmth that was developed into a white heat at moments when some of the dreamy nature and reposefulness of the work seemed to be needlessly sacrificed.

Of Rubinstein's symphony it is again to be said that the first movement is superb, and its power over the hearer suffers no loss by repetition. But all that follows again appears labored. Why it should be called an "Ocean" symphony may well be a mystery, as the composer has given no catalogue of sea views depicted or of marine emotions experienced. Every hearer is, therefore, left to his own resources, if he cares for a translation. Were the possible intentions of the composer distinctly perceptible, the symphony might be grouped with Rossini's overture to "William Tell" as an illustration of an artist's power to paint in tones scenes and a life with which he had no sympathy, if indeed he had not an actual aversion for them. Rubinstein, they say, has for the sea an almost invincible repugnance; while as for Rossini, who can imagine him in entirely agreeable surroundings elsewhere than at a luxuriously served dinner in the heart of Paris where there was no hint of Swiss mountains other than the ice in the wine-cooler?

The programme for the eleventh concert, to be given next Saturday night, is: Goldmark—Overture, "Prometheus Bound;" Mozart—Symphonic concerto for violin and viola, first movement; Schubert—Entr'acte from "Rosamunde;" Brahms—Second symphony. Mr. Loeffler will be the violinist, and Mr. Kneisel the violist. The first concert of the Young People's Popular Series is announced for Wednesday afternoon, Jan. 6. Seats are for sale at the ticket office.

THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

One of the best programmes of the season thus far was given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Sander's Theatre, in Cambridge, last evening. It was made up of three numbers, "Wagner's Faust Overture," Mr. C. M. Loeffler's suite for violin and orchestra, "Les Veillies de l'Ukraine," and Goldmark's beautiful symphony, "Rustic Wedding." The audience was large, but cold and unresponsive, and even Mr. Loeffler's fine rendering of his own work failed to bring forth the enthusiasm it merited. The Goldmark Symphony did produce a small amount of excitement, but the entire performance was admirable and deserved hearty applause. The wedding march in the symphony was exquisitely played, and great credit is due the basses and cellos for the fine effect produced in the opening measures. The next concert in the series will take place Jan. 21.

VIVIAN.

WORLD OF MUSIC.

Echoes from the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme selected by Director Nikisch for the Symphony orchestra contribution to Christmas week was not of a particularly joyous nature. To tell the truth, it proved rather stupid to all but the most thoughtful and cultured of the orchestra's patrons.

It is, of course, to be publicly declared that the frequenters of these concerts are capable of appreciating all that is good in the higher class of musical composition, but the conductor, the players and the managers knew within themselves that many of those who so eagerly strive to outbid one another in paying premiums for course tickets, enjoy melody more than they do the elusive harmony of the ultra refined classics; and it is to be said to the credit of their good nature that the directors of symphony bands do occasionally submit to the wishes of these richly paying but poorly educated patrons.

Such favors should create sufficient gratitude to overcome any feeling of resentment which might ordinarily be awakened by being forced to battle with two hours of almost unconquerable drowsiness.

That the audience at the rehearsal, given on Thursday instead of Friday, and at the concert last evening, were the smallest of the season, was probably due more to the Christmas festivities than to the unattractiveness of the programme announcements.

There were three numbers on the programme, a Handel concerto for strings and wind orchestra in F major, played for the first time by this orchestra, the prelude to Wagner's "Parsifal," and Rubinstein's "Ocean" symphony. Handel's writings are always interesting, even if they are sometimes beyond the comprehension of an average auditor. His tonal pictures are so brilliantly and uniquely colored that they win unbounded admiration from those who have not the least idea of what the composer is endeavoring to portray.

It is rather surprising that the concerto in F minor has not been given here before, for it is a most impressive work, grand in solemn harmonies and pregnant with the individuality of its composer.

The prelude was magnificently played and proved a genuine treat to the audience, particularly to those who had attended the "Parsifal" performance in Music Hall last season. The "Ocean Symphony" also received thoroughly satisfactory treatment from the orchestra.

On next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening the programme will be as follows: Overture, Prometheus Bound, Goldmark Symphonic concerto for violin and viola (first movement), Mozart Entr'acte, Rosamunde, Schubert Symphony No. 2, in D major, Brahms

DECEMBER 27, 1891 --- T

MUSICAL MATTERS.

No Soloist at Last Night's Symphony.

The Symphony concert of last evening commended itself to the students and those skilled in music rather than to those whose inclinations are not ultra classical. There was no soloist on the programme, and there were but three numbers given—Handel's concerto for strings and two wind instruments in F major, Wagner's prelude to the "Parsifal" and Rubinstein's Ocean symphony. The interpretation of these numbers by the fine orchestra under Conductor Nikisch was such as to meet with the heartiest approval, and, as usual, the applause was not lacking after each selection.

The concerto of Handel was written for a strong quartet and two choirs of two horns, two oboes and two bassoons. The work is full of the characteristics of the author. Handel was constantly striving for new effects in his compositions, and this work being most interesting in that direction.

The prelude to the "Parsifal" had its third presentation at the Symphony concerts in this city. It was last given at Mr. Gericke's farewell concert, May 23, 1889. Like all of the preludes of this author, it is immediately suggestive of the play, and one hears the melody that is sung in the great religious scene of the first act in the mystic feast, the Lord's Supper. The simple succession of harmonies and the soft and sweet accompaniments that follow are eloquent with expression of the development of the drama. Now the music impresses the auditor as that of a hidden orchestra, and again there is the sound as if of voices of children which occurs in the finale of the first act. The music broadens in the fourth theme, representing the sufferings of Christ, and here the whole orchestra is brought into play. The beauties of the production were finely delineated by the orchestra.

Last on the programme was the Ocean symphony of Rubinstein. The beauty of this work lies in its grand first number, so replete with melody and originality and so characteristic of the hand of a master hand. The succeeding themes do not lend themselves to such favorable impression, and about them there is a diversity of opinion. The standard of the first theme is not maintained, and the effect is disappointing to the auditor.

Messrs. C. M. Loeffler (violin) and Franz Kneisel (viola) will be the soloists at the next public rehearsal on Friday and concert on Saturday, and the following programme will be performed:

Goldmark's overture, "Prometheus Bound;" Mozart's symphonic concerto for violin and viola (first movement), cadenza by Hellmesberger (first time at these concerts); Schubert's Entr'acte, "Rosamunde;" Brahms' Symphony No. 2, in D major.

Music Hall.

1891-92.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

NIKISCH, Conductor.

CONCERT.

DECEMBER 10, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

1. "Dedication of the House."

2. Prelude.

3. DAY SPELL, from "Parsifal."

4. "All of Song," from "Tannhauser."

5. No. 3, in E flat, (Rubinisch), op. 97.

6. Moderato—Andante—Vivace.

SOLOIST:

FRANZ KNEISEL, NORDICA.

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1891-92.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

II. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 17, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

TSCHAIKOWSKY.

SUITE, op. 55.
(First time in Boston.)

MASCAGNI.

PRELUDE from the Opera "Cavalleria Rusticana."
(First time at these Concerts.)

BEETHOVEN.

MENUETTO AND FINALE. (Fugue), from String
Quartette, op. 59, No. 3, in C.
(Played by all the Strings.)
(First time.)

SONGS with PIANO.

MASSNET.

OVERTURE. "Phedre."

SOLOIST:

MR. WM. J. WINCH.

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1891-92.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

XI. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 2, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

- | | |
|-----------|--|
| GOLDMARK. | OVERTURE. "Prometheus Bound." |
| MOZART. | SYMPHONIC CONCERTO for VIOLIN and VIOLA
(First movement.)
Cadenza by HELLMESBERGER.
(First time at these Concerts.) |
| SCHUBERT. | ENTR'ACTE. "Rosamunde." |
| BRAHMS. | SYMPHONY No. 2, in D major.
Allegro ma non troppo.—Adagio non troppo.
Allegretto grazioso.—Finale (Allegro con spirito.) |
-

SOLOISTS :

MR. C. M. LOEFFLER, Violin.

MR. FRANZ KNEISEL, Viola.

THE SYMPHONY.

Goldmark's Overture to "Prometheus Bound."

A Few Remarks Concerning Local Color,

With a Short Digression Upon Cadenzas.

The programme of the eleventh Symphony concert was as follows: Overture, "Prometheus Bound," Goldmark; Symphonic Concerto for violin and viola (first movement), Mozart; Entr'acte in B flat, "Rosamunde," Schubert; Symphony No. 2 in D major, Brahms.

The two works in which the individuality of Goldmark is most strongly felt are the "Sakuntala" overture and the opera, "The Queen of Sheba." This individuality is at the same time Hebraic, Hungarian and what is vaguely described as Oriental: that is to say, Jewish chants, Hungarian modes and rhythms, and intervals that are used by Eastern people all give a peculiar color to his music. Then there must be added a pomp that is borrowed from Meyerbeer, and a richness of instrumentation that is due to Wagner.

The individuality of Goldmark is, then, chiefly remarkable for its feeling of what is called "local color" and its ability to express it. Johannes Weber, the learned and sarcastic musical editor of Le Temps, defines "local color" as the property attributed to music of its complying with the time and the country with which the subject of a vocal or instrumental work is concerned; and he is bold enough to add that it is merely a musical illusion. Thus, he says, "to make Oriental music, they imitate the rhythms and the melodic forms employed by Arabs; but the hearer must first be told that they are Oriental." Without stopping here to argue the question—and there is sound sense in many of Weber's theories on this subject—it may be said that Goldmark, by using old Jewish chants, by employing harmonies abounding in augmented fourths and diminished sixths, by constant shiftings from major to minor, suggested to an imaginative hearer the East. The listener was in the synagogue, or he saw strange and oppressively luxurious vegetation; or in the desert, parched with thirst, he saw afar off the camels of the merchants; or venerable, white-bearded men, half stupefied by heavy perfumes, stretched on their rugs, watching, as in an opium dream, the swaying bodies of swart dancing girls. The music was as the odor of tuberose, of "charred frankincense and grated sandal wood." It lulled, it cloyed, it enervated. Its sensuousness approached sensuality. Such was the effect produced by Goldmark's local color. But it should be remembered that in "Sakuntala" the hearer was prepared by the very title for an Eastern atmosphere, and in "The Queen of Sheba" the eyes were regaled by Eastern scenes, Eastern costumes and Eastern groupings. He was, therefore, ready to accept the music as Eastern, provided it was strange to him and in keeping with what went upon the stage. Now, when Goldmark wrote an overture and called it "Overture to Prometheus Bound of Æschylus," he necessarily was obliged to lay aside the coloring that had made him an individuality. Balkis, the Queen of Sheba, delighting in luxury, tempting Solomon with hard questions, coquetting with the courtiers, and the lonely Prometheus, bound down in a cleft of a rock in a waste place in Scythia, are two very different subjects for musical treatment. So Goldmark was obliged to re-arrange his palette. His individuality vanished with the discarded colors. If the composer's name were not upon the programme, no one would say at once during the playing of the "Prometheus," "Why, this is Goldmark's music."

Goldmark has given the title without adding a descriptive text. The question then is, does the music give the hearer an adequate idea of the great tragedy of Æschylus? It is not necessary to examine the details, to pry curiously, in the hope of finding the chaining of the enemy of Zeus, the comfort vainly brought by the Oceanides, the gnawing of the eternal vulture, the plaint of the wandering Io, the combined attack of the elements upon the heaven-defying sufferer. But does the music rise in tragic grandeur to the level of the play? Is it filled with the spirit of Æschylus, that moves us so deeply even when filtered through the baldest, most prosaic translation? No, it must be confessed that there is a sublimity in the first and in the last speech of Prometheus that Goldmark with all his imagination has not rivaled. Try as he may, let him call upon the brass to do the bravest, let him goad the strings to fury, he is to Æschylus as the explosion of cannon crackers to the "spasms of the sky and the shatter of the sea." In spite of modern theories, music is not an interchangeable art. There are emotions, there are phenomena that are better expressed in prose, poetry or painting than in music. And nobler, more impassioned music is often suggested by the writer or painter than is in the power of the musician to invent.

Goldmark called it "Prometheus." He might as well have called it "Hamlet" or "Orestes," or "Napoleon." He chose "Prometheus," and, therefore, necessarily put himself in comparison with the Grecian poet. But let us not insist upon this point. For without giving a detailed programme, Goldmark has indicated by the title to the orchestra and to the hearer his intention; and as Rubinstein has well remarked in his new book, "Music and Its Masters," "every composer has put into his work a certain spiritual meaning, that is, a programme, with the conviction that the hearer will understand it." It is then an affair between the individual hearer and the composer, provided the composer's meaning is fully expressed by the player or players. To one it may be the very Prometheus; to another an effective concert-overture, too long, with too much treatment of the second theme, but interesting in its instrumentation; to a third it may be pretentious, full of bluster, weak in melody and without a suggestion of the spirit of the antique.

146

It is too long. It is not always well defined. And what has the sentimental second theme or the fanfare of brass to do with the tragedy of Æschylus? Nor in spite of the orchestral crashes is there a full expression of the storm that raged in the soul of the sufferer, a storm mightier than the war of the elements waged against him. It is an extremely modern treatment of an antique subject. It is at times effective, often ingenious, and always worthy of respect. But is neither characteristic of Æschylus nor of Goldmark.

The programme of the next concert is Schubert's Unfinished Symphony and Schumann's "Manfred" music. Mr. Riddle will read the poem, and the singers will be Mrs. Nikisch, Mrs. Wyman, Messrs. Heinrich, Lamson, Meyn, Sargent, Morawski, and a chorus from the Cecilia.

PHILIP HALE.

The Eleventh Symphony Concert.

The programme on Saturday evening embraced Goldmark's Overture, "Prometheus Bound;" Symphonic Concerto for violin and viola (first movement), Mozart; Entr'acte No. 2, "Rosamunde," Schubert, and Brahms's Symphony No. 2 in D major.

With renewed hearings the Goldmark Overture does not lose, but, on the contrary, impresses one more and more as the work of an able, earnest musician, dealing with his art according to its most modern modes. If one, however, was to estimate the work at its real value, he must follow the playing with the score and let his imagination furnish what was lost in the distortion of the composer's intentions by Mr. Nikisch's band on this occasion. Otherwise the listener would be induced to regard the work as bombastic and pretentious in the extreme.

It seems as if the sight of a forte mark has the same effect upon our conductor as does the waving of a red rag on a bull, while fortissimo in a full brass-wind passage evokes from his baton a blast of violence bulging the phrase to the point of bursting; tearing the passion to tatters. It has always been held that marks of expression have some significance, and that opinion is still entertained by musicians of refinement but the fact could not be realized in listening to the Symphony orchestra on Saturday evening.

Mr. Damrosch's New York orchestra gave evidence lately, when it appeared here, that music and noise need not be synonymous, and we dream of the days when the Boston Symphony orchestra, under Gerike, gave the most perfect examples of what value contrast, gradations of power and the limitation of tone production, are in delineating the intentions of the composer. With what refinement and perfect accord did Messrs. Loeffler and Kneisel display the beauties of the violin and viola solos of the Mozart concerto. In the cadenza by Hellmesbeyer these artists exhibited their well-known skill, and with true musicianlike feeling and delicate sentiment, presented a superb effect. It made the general coarseness of the conductor's interpretation of the antiphonal passages, and the roughness of the tutti playing all the more apparent. Our conductor handles the delicacy of Haydn and Mozart akin to the fondling of its cub by a grizzly bear. How the sublime and ridiculous do jostle each other in the musical world.

The "Rosamunde" music of Schubert is graceful and melodic, that goes without saying, and was fairly well played.

If the clarinet could only distinguish himself by a warmer touch in his intonation. When heard in comparison with the oboe and flute in this Schubert piece his playing suffered. This being a little under the pitch often puts the whole wood-wind passages out of tune. The first sixteen measures of the Andantino are marked pianissimo with repetition. Mr. Nikisch played them through mezzoforte the first time and very much softer on the repeat, a negro-minstrel effect that we are familiar with in the pathetic quartets of the burnt-cork fraternity. This is not the first instance that he has given us of a questionable taste in this direction.

The Brahms symphony is a work of remarkable power. It was first played in Boston by the Harvard Orchestra Jan. 9, 1879. At these concerts it was first given by Mr. Henschel in 1882. It is a work that appeals to the listener at once, and yet grows upon repeated hearings. It has not so much of the musical problem to it as No. 1 symphony, and shows its composer in a more genial light. It should have been first on the programme, however, for even at his best Brahms must not be offered to the listener at the latter end of a programme. Of the playing, not much can be said in its favor. It was ragged and rough and fraught with all the well-known shortcomings of the conductor, in spite of which the work stood out in all its nobility at times. Next Saturday the Manfred music of Schumann, complete with solos and chorus, will be given. Mr. George Riddle will read the text.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

TRANSCRIPT. MONDAY

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the eleventh concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Goldmark: Overture, "Prometheus Bound."
Mozart: First movement of Symphonic Concerto for violin and viola.
Schubert: Entr'acte from "Rosamunde."
Brahms: Symphony No. 2, in D, op. 73.
Mr. O. M. Loeffler was the violinist, and Mr. Franz Kneisel the violist.

Goldmark's overture has been heard here before, and does not seem to improve much on better acquaintance. There are passages in it of strong dramatic effectiveness, and, in the scoring the composer has departed somewhat from his usual routine manner; but the dramatic effect is too often obtained at the expense of musical beauty, and the greater part of the work seems strenuous rather than powerful. Goldmark's thunder is not entirely Jovian, and often reminds one a little of that Salmonius whom pious Æneas met (in very ungodlike circumstances) among the nether shades.

The "Rosamunde" entr'acte is lovely music indeed, and wholly characteristic of Schubert. Only the change Schubert made in the theme, when he used it for his B-flat pianoforte variations, is such a vast improvement that the melody sounds comparatively poor and tame in its original shape, and one is impelled to look upon this entr'acte as rather an "überwundener Standpunkt." We, for one, should be glad to see it laid on the shelf for good and all.

Brahms's second symphony was for some time, and perhaps still is, the most popular of his works in this form. When it first appeared, the Vienna critics proclaimed that whatever might have been criticised in the first, C minor, symphony, was thoroughly cured in this one, and that the whole work was "pure gold." There must be a wrong kink in our head, for, to save us, we have never been able to enjoy this D major symphony as much as any von please of its companions. Except in the Allegretto grazioso, there seems to us to be a certain vagueness of musical purpose in the work which keeps the attention constantly on the stretch, without affording the mind complete artistic satisfaction. Nevertheless it is not to be forgotten that Brahms has worked up the Finale to a really strong and brilliant dramatic climax, a thing that he does not often succeed in doing. Saving some rather ragged work in the first movement, and the insecure playing of the trombones almost throughout, the orchestra played the symphony very well indeed. Certainly, each successive movement went better than the one before it, and the last climax was given with great brilliancy and force.

Mozart's symphonic concerto is not one of the composer's strong works. The duet concerto is now a virtually obsolete form, and one could not help feeling, on Saturday evening, that Mozart himself must have felt that it was not destined to be eternal. Though composers in his day were in the habit of submitting quite willingly to certain extraneous conditions in music, one cannot but feel that he really found this sort of writing for two solo instruments a little irksome. The constant obligation to give each one of them an equal amount to do—lest the other should be jealous, and feel itself slighted—is no inspiration to a composer, but rather a shackle upon the free development of his ideas. Neither is it any inspiration to the listener to hear one instrument perpetually coming in as "me too" to the other; it is like the old, traditional pianoforte variations, where, after the right hand had had its innings, the left hand must have its innings, too! But, apart from these requirements which are inherent in the scheme of the work, the work itself is rather tame and colorless. Mozart nodded at times. Messrs. Loeffler and Kneisel played the movement to perfection, with exquisite grace, beauty of tone and refinement of style. They could almost induce one to swallow the long (too long) Helmesberger cadenza. The orchestra played the accompaniment all too roughly.

147

MUSICAL.

The Symphony Concert.

The eleventh concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, last evening opened with Goldmark's pretentious but garish and somewhat blatant overture "Prometheus Bound." The work is no more clear in meaning on a second hearing than it was on the first. Its rich and brilliant orchestral color was as impressive as before and its dramatic vigor was as striking, but what the music says by way of illustration of Prometheus and the cruelly persistent attack of the bird on his liver still remains a mystery to us. The composer appears to have wrestled with the subject of a tremendous tone picture that presented itself to his imagination, but the only outcome appears to be the laying of masses of gorgeous color on his canvas, and a forgetfulness in this color frenzy of a clearly drawn, or at least a readily comprehended design. It was played with much fire and brilliancy, and excepting some coarseness in the wind, and an occasional uncertainty of attack, the performance was satisfying and remarkably effective. It was followed by the first movement of Mozart's Concertante in E-flat, for solo violin and viola and orchestra. The movement is broad in style and almost symphonic in seriousness, and is fairly divided between the orchestra and the solo instruments. It is full of the Mozart charm, and the solo parts are little given up to bravura display, and are for the most part of an antiphonal character. The work was thoroughly interesting in the hearing, and delightful in effect. The solo instruments were played by Messrs. Loeffler and Kneisel with exquisite taste and finish and in a spirit of refined and perfect sympathy with the sentiment of the music. The artists were vigorously applauded at the close of the movement, and twice recalled. The entr'acte in B-flat to Schubert's "Rosamunde" followed and was gracefully and chastely read and played. The whole ended with Brahms's symphony No. 2, in D, which has been frequently heard at these concerts. The programme was not particularly attractive. In fact, the programmes of late have, as a rule, been dull and monotonous; but programme making is not Mr. Nikisch's strong point, and it becomes necessary every now and then to remind him that there is excellent music that is not music of the German school, and that a programme is not perforce classical and interesting because the solemn and the severely heavy prevails in it. The programme for the next concert is Schubert's Unfinished Symphony and Schumann's "Manfred" music. The poem will be read by Mr. George Riddle, and the singers are to be Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, Mrs. Julie L. Wyman, Mr. W. Heinrich, Mr. H. Meyn, Mr. G. S. Lamson, Mr. S. A. Sargent, Mr. I. Morawski, and a chorus from the Cecilia.

both to the orchestra and to the hearer his intention; and as Rubinstein has well remarked in his new book, "Music and Its Masters," "every composer has put into his work a certain spiritual meaning, that is, a programme, with the conviction that the hearer will understand it." It is then an affair between the individual hearer and the composer, provided the composer's meaning is fully expressed by the player or players. To one it may be the very Prometheus; to another an effective concert-overture, too long, with too much treatment of the second theme, but interesting in its instrumentation; to a third it may be pretentious, full of bluster, weak in melody and without a suggestion of the spirit of the antique.

It is too long. It is not always well defined. And what has the sentimental second theme or the fanfare of brass to do with the tragedy of Æschylus? Nor in spite of the orchestral crashes is there a full expression of the storm that raged in the soul of the sufferer, a storm mightier than the war of the elements waged against him. It is an extremely modern treatment of an antique subject. It is at times effective, often ingenious, and always worthy of respect. But is neither characteristic of Æschylus nor of Goldmark.

The programme of the next concert is Schubert's Unfinished Symphony and Schumann's "Manfred" music. Mr. Riddle will read the poem, and the singers will be Mrs. Nikisch, Mrs. Wyman, Messrs. Heinrich, Lamson, Meyn, Sargent, Morawski, and a chorus from the Cecilia.

PHILIP HALE.

The Eleventh Symphony Concert.

The programme on Saturday evening embraced Goldmark's Overture, "Prometheus Bound," Symphonic Concerto for violin and viola (first movement), Mozart; Entr'acte No. 2, "Rosamunde," Schubert, and Brahms's Symphony No. 2 in D major.

With renewed hearings the Goldmark Overture does not lose, but, on the contrary, impresses one more and more as the work of an able, earnest musician, dealing with his art according to its most modern modes. If one, however, was to estimate the work at its real value, he must follow the playing with the score and let his imagination furnish what was lost in the distortion of the composer's intentions by Mr. Nikisch's band on this occasion. Otherwise the listener would be induced to regard the work as bombastic and pretentious in the extreme.

It seems as if the sight of a forte mark has the same effect upon our conductor as does the waving of a red rag on a bull, while fortissimo in a full brass-wind passage evokes from his baton a blast of violence bulging the phrase to the point of bursting; tearing the passion to tatters. It has always been held that marks of expression have some significance, and that opinion is still entertained by musicians of refinement but the fact could not be realized in listening to the Symphony orchestra on Saturday evening.

Mr. Damrosch's New York orchestra gave evidence lately, when it appeared here, that music and noise need not be synonymous, and we dream of the days when the Boston Symphony orchestra, under Gericke, gave the most perfect examples of what value contrast, gradations of power and the limitation of tone production, are in delineating the intentions of the composer. With what refinement and perfect accord did Messrs. Loeffler and Kneisel display the beauties of the violin and viola solos of the Mozart concerto. In the cadenza by Hellmesbeyer these artists exhibited their well-known skill, and with true musicianlike feeling and delicate sentiment, presented a superb effect. It made the general coarseness of the conductor's interpretation of the antiphonal passages, and the roughness of the tutti playing all the more apparent. Our conductor handles the delicacy of Haydn and Mozart akin to the fondling of its cub by a grizzly bear. How the sublime and ridiculous do jostle each other in the musical world.

The "Rosamunde" music of Schubert is graceful and melodic, that goes without saying, and was fairly well played.

If the clarinet could only distinguish himself by a warmer touch in his intonation. When heard in comparison with the oboe and flute in this Schubert piece his playing suffered. This being a little under the pitch often puts the whole wood-wind passages out of tune. The first sixteen measures of the Andantino are marked pianissimo with repetition. Mr. Nikisch played them through mezzoforte the first time and very much softer on the repeat, a negro minstrel effect that we are familiar with in the pathetic quartets of the burnt-cork fraternity. This is not the first instance that he has given us of a questionable taste in this direction.

The Brahms symphony is a work of remarkable power. It was first played in Boston by the Harvard Orchestra Jan. 9, 1879. At these concerts it was first given by Mr. Henschel in 1882. It is a work that appeals to the listener at once, and yet grows upon repeated hearings. It has not so much of the musical problem to it as No. 1 symphony, and shows its composer in a more genial light. It should have been first on the programme, however, for even at his best Brahms must not be offered to the listener at the latter end of a programme. Of the playing, not much can be said in its favor. It was ragged and rough and fraught with all the well-known shortcomings of the conductor, in spite of which the work stood out in all its nobility at times. Next Saturday the Manfred music of Schumann, complete with solos and chorus, will be given. Mr. George Riddle will read the text.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

TRANSCRIPT. MONDAY

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the eleventh concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Goldmark: Overture, "Prometheus Bound."

Mozart: First movement of Symphonic Concerto for violin and viola.

Schubert: Entr'acte from "Rosamunde."

Brahms: Symphony No. 2, in D, op. 73.

Mr. C. M. Loeffler was the violinist, and Mr. Franz Kneisel the violist.

Goldmark's overture has been heard here before, and does not seem to improve much on better acquaintance. There are passages in it of strong dramatic effectiveness, and, in the scoring the composer has departed somewhat from his usual routine manner; but the dramatic effect is too often obtained at the expense of musical beauty, and the greater part of the work seems strenuous rather than powerful. Goldmark's thunder is not entirely Jovian, and often reminds one a little of that Salmoneus whom pious Æneas met (in very ungodlike circumstances) among the nether shades.

The "Rosamunde" entr'acte is lovely music indeed, and wholly characteristic of Schubert. Only the change Schubert made in the theme, when he used it for his B-flat pianoforte variations, is such a vast improvement that the melody sounds comparatively poor and tame in its original shape, and one is impelled to look upon this entr'acte as rather an "überwundener Standpunkt." We, for one, should be glad to see it laid on the shelf for good and all.

Brahms's second symphony was for some time, and perhaps still is, the most popular of his works in this form. When it first appeared, the Vienna critics proclaimed that whatever might have been criticised in the first, C minor, symphony, was thoroughly cured in this one, and that the whole work was "pure gold." There must be a wrong kink in our head, for, to save us, we have never been able to enjoy this D major symphony as much as any you please of its companions. Except in the Allegretto grazioso, there seems to us to be a certain vagueness of musical purpose in the work which keeps the attention constantly on the stretch, without affording the mind complete artistic satisfaction. Nevertheless it is not to be forgotten that Brahms has worked up the Finale to a really strong and brilliant dramatic climax, a thing that he does not often succeed in doing. Saving some rather ragged work in the first movement, and the insecure playing of the trombones almost throughout, the orchestra played the symphony very well indeed. Certainly, each successive movement went better than the one before it, and the last climax was given with great brilliancy and force.

Mozart's symphonic concerto is not one of the composer's strong works. The duet concerto is now a virtually obsolete form, and one could not help feeling, on Saturday evening, that Mozart himself must have felt that it was not destined to be eternal. Though composers in his day were in the habit of submitting quite willingly to certain extraneous conditions in music, one cannot but feel that he really found this sort of writing for two solo instruments a little irksome. The constant obligation to give each one of them an equal amount to do—lest the other should be jealous, and feel itself slighted—is no inspiration to a composer, but rather a shackle upon the free development of his ideas. Neither is it any inspiration to the listener to hear one instrument perpetually coming in as "me too" to the other; it is like the old, traditional pianoforte variations, where, after the right hand had had its innings, the left hand must have its innings, too; But, apart from these requirements which are inherent in the scheme of the work, the work itself is rather tame and colorless. Mozart nodded at times. Messrs. Loeffler and Kneisel played the movement to perfection, with exquisite grace, beauty of tone and refinement of style. They could almost induce one to swallow the long (too long) Hellmesberger cadenza. The orchestra played the accompaniment all too roughly.

MUSICAL.

The Symphony Concert.

The eleventh concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, last evening opened with Goldmark's pretentious but garish and somewhat blatant overture "Prometheus Bound." The work is no more clear in meaning on a second hearing than it was on the first. Its rich and brilliant orchestral color was as impressive as before and its dramatic vigor was as striking, but what the music says by way of illustration of Prometheus and the cruelly persistent attack of the bird on his liver still remains a mystery to us. The composer appears to have wrestled with the subject of a tremendous tone picture that presented itself to his imagination, but the only outcome appears to be the laying of masses of gorgeous color on his canvas, and a forgetfulness in this color frenzy of a clearly drawn, or at least a readily comprehended design. It was played with much fire and brilliancy, and excepting some coarseness in the wind, and an occasional uncertainty of attack, the performance was satisfying and remarkably effective. It was followed by the first movement of Mozart's Concertante in E-flat, for solo violin and viola and orchestra. The movement is broad in style and almost symphonic in serenity, and is fairly divided between the orchestra and the solo instruments. It is full of the Mozart charm, and the solo parts are little given up to bravura display, and are for the most part of an antiphonal character. The work was thoroughly interesting in the hearing, and delightful in effect. The solo instruments were played by Messrs. Loeffler and Kneisel with exquisite taste and finish and in a spirit of refined and perfect sympathy with the sentiment of the music. The artists were vigorously applauded at the close of the movement, and twice recalled. The entr'acte in B-flat to Schubert's "Rosamunde" followed and was gracefully and chastely read and played. The whole ended with Brahms's symphony No. 2, in D, which has been frequently heard at these concerts. The programme was not particularly attractive. In fact, the programmes of late have, as a rule, been dull and monotonous; but programme making is not Mr. Nikisch's strong point, and it becomes necessary every now and then to remind him that there is excellent music that is not music of the German school, and that a programme is not perforce classical and interesting because the solemn and the severely heavy prevail in it. The programme for the next concert is Schubert's Unfinished Symphony and Schumann's "Manfred" music. The poem will be read by Mr. George Riddle, and the singers are to be Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, Mrs. Julie L. Wyman, Mr. W. Heinrich, Mr. H. Meyn, Mr. G. S. Lamson, Mr. S. A. Sargent, Mr. I. Morawski, and a chorus from the Cecilia.

MUSICAL EVENTS.

THE VARIOUS CONCERTS OF THE LAST PAST WEEK.

THE SYMPHONY LAST NIGHT—THE FINAL PADEREWSKI RECITALS—THE PHILHAR- MONIC.

The eleventh Symphony rehearsal and concert programme had for its first number Goldmark's overture to "Prometheus Bound." A second hearing strengthens to some extent the favorable impression it created last season, when it was performed for the first time here. The composer's somewhat excessive dwelling upon the second theme imparts an air of monotony to the middle and concluding portions of the work, but as a whole it is strong and musically attractive. It was finely played.

Following the overture came the first movement of the Symphonic Concerto for violin and viola by Mozart. This work was on the original programme which was to have been presented at the Mozart concert two weeks ago, but was withdrawn owing to the illness of Mr. Kneisel and Mr. Loeffler. The movement performed is interesting and the treatment is broad and dignified; but its construction is such as to give to the solo instruments only moderate opportunities for individual display. Of course its performance in a hall as large as Music Hall was not dreamed of by Mozart. In spite of the brilliant, penetrating quality of Mr. Loeffler's violin and the full, noble tones that Mr. Kneisel drew from his viola, the solo parts were too slight in character to enable these players to hold their own successfully against the full string orchestra; and without the cadenza (written by Hellmesberger), the performance would have fallen flat. But this cadenza and especially its performance, made all the difference in the world. That each performer displayed in his part great beauty of tone and finish may be readily believed; but the unanimity of feeling that both evinced is less easily comprehended. The manner in which they played together,—their almost infallible accuracy in attacking and finishing phrases, the delicacy and variety of their nuances,—was nothing short of wonderful. It was, indeed, a triumph of a very unusual kind, and the enthusiastic applause which followed the conclusion of the movement was well earned.

The familiar and justly popular "Entr'acte" to Schubert's "Rosamunde" will never cease to be enjoyable. Its beautiful themes and exquisite tone coloring are always sure to excite a glow of delight in the heart of every music lover. It was given in an exceedingly delicate and tasteful manner; the wood-wind and horn playing being especially worthy of commendation.

Brahm's Symphony in D, was the closing number. Like Schubert's entr'acte music, this beautiful work will always be a favorite with all lovers of pure music. Every successive performance but serves to reveal to the attentive listener many beauties of form and expression which contain, but which at first remain unnoticed. With Brahms as well as Schumann Mr. Nikisch is at his best, which is equivalent to saying that the symphony was performed in a thoroughly artistic manner.

The Symphony Concert.

It is difficult to do entire justice to the concert of Saturday, for the dismal weather and the many rows of empty seats were unpleasant factors that in some degree jaundiced one's judgment and made that tone picture of liver complaint—Goldmark's "Prometheus Overture"—seem more than usually lugubrious. Yet its broad and massive treatment was quite suited to the ambitious vein of the conductor, and the climaxes were mighty enough, even if not in perfect unity. It is tiresome to continually repeat the same censure, but if any musical auditor will follow Mr. Nikisch's beat carefully, he will see, as clearly as the reviewer, that the orchestra does not unitedly follow it, and if there is a certain raggedness of attack, there is still more lack of unity in the leaving of a chord; the orchestra does not work as one great instrument, but is becoming perceptibly heterogeneous. I have so frequently stated this self-evident fact, that I may be excused from noticing any but the more flagrant blemishes in this direction in the immediate future.

The first movement from the Mozart symphonic concerto owed its success to the excellent playing of Messrs. Loeffler and Kneisel. It was interesting to note the clear shape with which Mozart replaced the vague form of the old Italian concerto, which was not any closer to the modern concerto form than a Corelli sonata is to a Beethoven symphony. But there were passages in the work which seemed rather in the "daily-exercises" vein, and had not the charm of the average Mozart compositions. A double recall followed the conclusion of the work, and was deserved by the artists.

The most graceful and acceptable work on the programme was the entr'acte from Schubert's "Rosamunde." This was given with commendable daintiness, and its melodic beauty illumined the entire programme. But the Brahms' Symphony (No. 2, D major) was not as satisfactory, for the reasons given above. The work itself is certainly the most popular of the composer's contributions to the classical instrumental repertoire, and its second movement is replete with charming effects which are not too intricate for the general public to follow. Fortunately this received the best execution and must have been a revelation of the sweetness of a composer who has a rather pedantic reputation to many. The first movement was not nearly so steady, and the brasses were very uncertain in their tones more than once.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

THE SYMPHONIES.

ELEVENTH CONCERT.

The programme of the eleventh Symphony concert at Music hall Saturday evening, Jan. 2, was:

Goldmark. Overture, "Prometheus Bound."
Mozart. Symphonic Concerto for Violin and Viola (First Movement)
Cadenza by Hellmesberger.
(First time at these concerts.)
Schubert. Entr'acte, "Rosamunde."
Brahms. Symphony No. 2, in D major.
Allegro ma non troppo.
Adagio non troppo.
Allegretto grazioso.
Finale: Allegro con spirito.

Soloists: C. M. Loeffler, violin; Mr. Franz Kneisel, viola.

Goldmark, born in Hungary sixty years ago, has not been a profuse writer, preferring to give a few good things rather than many poor ones. This overture, "Prometheus Bound," like many other musical compositions of the present day, is founded on a very mythical subject; hence, difficult to understand. The story of how Prometheus tricked Zeus by some is considered too absurd, too profoundly a lie, to tempt any one to try to portray it in music; and yet, many of the great composers, including Beethoven, have tried their skill at it. A great objection to Wagner's operas, for instance, is that they are founded on mythological stories, impossible of understanding without the most elaborate stage setting, accompanied with ample text and actors. Notwithstanding all these objections, Goldmark has succeeded in formulating a brilliant, showy overture, which was remarkably well read by Mr. Nikisch and his orchestra.

The concertante in E flat for solo violin and viola, supposed to have been written by Mozart in the later years of his life, made a pleasant impression. The solo parts were taken by those two favorite violinists of the orchestra, Messrs. Loeffler and Kneisel, who acquitted themselves with glory, according to the standard fixed by their friends, though their intonation at all times was not perfect.

The Entr'acte (overture) to "Rosamunde" is pretty music, but the author, Schubert, does not shine brightly in it. Schubert could compose symphonies, sonatas and songs, unexcelled by any, but when he attempted operas, his muse was lost. Mr. Nikisch gave a very tame reading of the overture, which was, perhaps, the reason it fell so flat.

Brahms's symphony No. 2 in D is one of the most enjoyable of this modern Hercules's writings. The first movement is spun out intolerably, but the orchestra made it enjoyable. The second movement commenced rather dubiously, and there appeared some danger of the orchestra becoming stranded, but they were finally extricated from peril by that tiny little baton of Director Nikisch. The third movement is beautiful, too beautiful to last long. The orchestra did it exquisitely.

On the whole, the playing of the orchestra was better at this concert than at any previous one this season. However, the drum player beat his kettles several times as if he had gone mad, causing us to look down upon them with alarm, fearing he might fall upon them with his sticks and do them harm. But perhaps he was only trying to drown out the horn player and cover up the buzz of the oboes, which seemed a little out of order.

The analytical notes in the programme by Mr. Philip Hale are of great merit.

JAMES M. TRACY.

SYMPHONY AND SONG.

Works by Goldmark, Mozart, Schubert and Brahms

Played by Nikisch's Band, with Loeffler and Kneisel as Soloists.

Novel Concert in Music Hall—Young People's Symphony.

The symphony concert last night attracted the usual large and interested audience to the Music Hall, where Director Nikisch presented a varied and interesting programme, including selections from Goldmark, Mozart, Schubert and Brahms.

Mr. Nikisch was very felicitous in his interpretation of Goldmark's overture, and it gave the orchestra a wide range of opportunities for effective play and dramatic climaxes.

Mozart's symphonic concerto for violin and viola, in which Messrs. Loeffler and Kneisel appeared as soloists, was listened to with great interest, as it was new at these concerts, and was probably heard for the first time in Boston by such a large audience.

The arrangement lends itself more to the display of wonderful skill in the manipulation of technique than to the elucidation of much harmony or melody. The movements were intricate, and at times suggestive of attractive effect, while both Loeffler and Kneisel displayed brilliant talent in their command of the violin and the viola. It was somewhat strained at the end, but it was more the fault of the conception than the laboriousness of the execution, and the warm applause of the audience was a deserved reward for what was really a difficult undertaking on the part of the soloists.

It was somewhat of a relief to hear Schubert's entr'acte of "Rosamunde," and the quaint, delicate rise and fall of sound

MUSICAL EVENTS.

THE VARIOUS CONCERTS OF THE LAST PAST WEEK.

THE SYMPHONY LAST NIGHT—THE FINAL PADEREWSKI RECITALS—THE PHILHAR- MONIC.

The eleventh Symphony rehearsal and concert programme had for its first number Goldmark's overture to "Prometheus Bound." A second hearing strengthens to some extent the favorable impression it created last season, when it was performed for the first time here. The composer's somewhat excessive dwelling upon the second theme imparts an air of monotony to the middle and concluding portions of the work, but as a whole it is strong and musically attractive. It was finely played.

Following the overture came the first movement of the Symphonic Concerto for violin and viola by Mozart. This work was on the original programme which was to have been presented at the Mozart concert two weeks ago, but was withdrawn owing to the illness of Mr. Kneisel and Mr. Loeffler. The movement performed is interesting and the treatment is broad and dignified; but its construction is such as to give to the solo instruments only moderate opportunities for individual display. Of course its performance in a hall as large as Music Hall was not dreamed of by Mozart. In spite of the brilliant, penetrating quality of Mr. Loeffler's violin and the full, noble tones that Mr. Kneisel drew from his viola, the solo parts were too slight in character to enable these players to hold their own successfully against the full string orchestra; and without the cadenza (written by Hellmesberger), the performance would have fallen flat. But this cadenza and especially its performance, made all the difference in the world. That each performer displayed in his part great beauty of tone and finish may be readily believed; but the unanimity of feeling that both evinced is less easily comprehended. The manner in which they played together,—their almost infallible accuracy in attacking and finishing phrases, the delicacy and variety of their nuances,—was nothing short of wonderful. It was, indeed, a triumph of a very unusual kind, and the enthusiastic applause which followed the conclusion of the movement was well earned.

The familiar and justly popular "Entr'acte" to Schubert's "Rosamunde" will never cease to be enjoyable. Its beautiful themes and exquisite tone coloring are always sure to excite a glow of delight in the heart of every music lover. It was given in an exceedingly delicate and tasteful manner; the wood-wind and horn playing being especially worthy of commendation.

Brahm's Symphony in D, was the closing number. Like Schubert's entr'acte music, this beautiful work will always be a favorite with all lovers of pure music. Every successive performance but serves to reveal to the attentive listener many beauties of form and expression which contain, but which at first remain unnoticed. With Brahms as well as Schumann Mr. Nikisch is at his best, which is equivalent to saying the symphony was performed in a thoroughly artistic manner.

The Symphony Concert.

It is difficult to do entire justice to the concert of Saturday, for the dismal weather and the many rows of empty seats were unpleasant factors that in some degree jaundiced one's judgment and made that tone picture of liver complaint—Goldmark's "Prometheus Overture"—seem more than usually lugubrious. Yet its broad and massive treatment was quite suited to the ambitious vein of the conductor, and the climaxes were mighty enough, even if not in perfect unity. It is tiresome to continually repeat the same censure, but if any musical auditor will follow Mr. Nikisch's beat carefully, he will see, as clearly as the reviewer, that the orchestra does not unitedly follow it, and if there is a certain raggedness of attack, there is still more lack of unity in the leaving of a chord; the orchestra does not work as one great instrument, but is becoming perceptibly heterogeneous. I have so frequently stated this self-evident fact, that I may be excused from noticing any but the more flagrant blemishes in this direction in the immediate future.

The first movement from the Mozart symphonic concerto owed its success to the excellent playing of Messrs. Loeffler and Kneisel. It was interesting to note the clear shape with which Mozart replaced the vague form of the old Italian concerto, which was not any closer to the modern concerto form than a Corelli sonata is to a Beethoven symphony. But there were passages in the work which seemed rather in the "daily-exercises" vein, and had not the charm of the average Mozart compositions. A double recall followed the conclusion of the work, and was deserved by the artists.

The most graceful and acceptable work on the programme was the entr'acte from Schubert's "Rosamunde." This was given with commendable daintiness, and its melodic beauty illumined the entire programme. But the Brahms' Symphony (No. 2, D major) was not as satisfactory, for the reasons given above. The work itself is certainly the most popular of the composer's contributions to the classical instrumental repertoire, and its second movement is replete with charming effects which are not too intricate for the general public to follow. Fortunately this received the best execution and must have been a revelation of the sweetness of a composer who has a rather pedantic reputation to many. The first movement was not nearly so steady, and the brasses were very uncertain in their tones more than once.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

THE SYMPHONIES.

ELEVENTH CONCERT.

The programme of the eleventh Symphony concert at Music hall Saturday evening, Jan. 2, was:

Goldmark. Overture, "Prometheus Bound."
Mozart. Symphonic Concerto for Violin and Viola (First Movement)
Cadenza by Hellmesberger.
(First time at these concerts)
Schubert. Entr'acte, "Rosamunde."
Brahms. Symphony No. 2, in D major.
Allegro ma non troppo.
Adagio non troppo.
Allegretto grazioso.
Finale: Allegro con spirito.

Soloists: C. M. Loeffler, violin; Mr. Franz Kneisel, viola.

Goldmark, born in Hungary sixty years ago, has not been a profuse writer, preferring to give a few good things rather than many poor ones. This overture, "Prometheus Bound," like many other musical compositions of the present day, is founded on a very mythical subject; hence, difficult to understand. The story of how Prometheus tricked Zeus by some is considered too absurd, too profoundly a lie, to tempt any one to try to portray it in music; and yet, many of the great composers, including Beethoven, have tried their skill at it. A great objection to Wagner's operas, for instance, is that they are founded on mythological stories, impossible of understanding without the most elaborate stage setting, accompanied with ample text and actors. Notwithstanding all these objections, Goldmark has succeeded in formulating a brilliant, showy overture, which was remarkably well read by Mr. Nikisch and his orchestra.

The concertante in E flat for solo violin and viola, supposed to have been written by Mozart in the later years of his life, made a pleasant impression. The solo parts were taken by those two favorite violinists of the orchestra, Messrs. Loeffler and Kneisel, who acquitted themselves with glory, according to the standard fixed by their friends, though their intonation at all times was not perfect.

The Entr'acte (overture) to "Rosamunde" is pretty music, but the author, Schubert, does not shine brightly in it. Schubert could compose symphonies, sonatas and songs, unexcelled by any, but when he attempted operas, his muse was lost. Mr. Nikisch gave a very tame reading of the overture, which was, perhaps, the reason it fell so flat.

Brahms's symphony No. 2 in D is one of the most enjoyable of this modern Hercules's writings. The first movement is spun out intolerably, but the orchestra made it enjoyable. The second movement commenced rather dubiously, and there appeared some danger of the orchestra becoming stranded, but they were finally extricated from peril by that tiny little baton of Director Nikisch. The third movement is beautiful, too beautiful to last long. The orchestra did it exquisitely.

On the whole, the playing of the orchestra was better at this concert than at any previous one this season. However, the drum player beat his kettles several times as if he had gone mad, causing us to look down upon the band with alarm, fearing he might fall upon them with his sticks and do them harm. But perhaps he was only trying to drown out the horn player and cover up the buzz of the oboes, which seemed a little out of order.

The analytical notes in the programme by Mr. Philip Hale are of great merit.

JAMES M. TRACY.

SYMPHONY AND SONG.

Works by Goldmark, Mozart, Schubert and Brahms

Played by Nikisch's Band, with Loeffler and Kneisel as Soloists.

Novel Concert in Music Hall—Young People's Symphony.

The symphony concert last night attracted the usual large and interested audience to the Music Hall, where Director Nikisch presented a varied and interesting programme, including selections from Goldmark, Mozart, Schubert and Brahms.

Mr. Nikisch was very felicitous in his interpretation of Goldmark's overture, and it gave the orchestra a wide range of opportunities for effective play and dramatic climaxes.

Mozart's symphonic concerto for violin and viola, in which Messrs. Loeffler and Kneisel appeared as soloists, was listened to with great interest, as it was new at these concerts, and was probably heard for the first time in Boston by such a large audience.

The arrangement lends itself more to the display of wonderful skill in the manipulation of technique than to the elucidation of much harmony or melody. The movements were intricate, and at times suggestive of attractive effect, while both Loeffler and Kneisel displayed brilliant talent in their command of the violin and the viola. It was somewhat strained at the end, but it was more the fault of the conception than the laboriousness of the execution, and the warm applause of the audience was a deserved reward for what was really a difficult undertaking on the part of the soloists.

It was somewhat of a relief to hear Schubert's entr'acte of "Rosamunde," and the piquant, delicate rise and fall of sound presented a charming contrast. The orchestra was at its best in elucidating these pathetic harmonies, with which it is pregnant, and even the abrupt changes of tempo contained a rhythm that was very pleasing.

150

Brahm's Symphony No. 2, in D major, threatened to be a dull and uninteresting performance. The allegro is reminiscent and sketchy. It is reminiscent and unsatisfactory. The plaintive notes contain neither harmony to give it dramatic effect, nor the pathos which would make it attractive. They seem to obtrude here and there, and give you an idea that the composer's imagination was more receptive of other's impressions than originally creative. It gave many opportunities, though, for the display of the horn, while Nikisch's interpretation of it added to it a vivacity and spirit that is frequently destitute in others' translation of the theme. It improved marvellously in the allegretto, where the charm of the piquant staccati merges into a delightfully graceful melody which continues in spontaneous movement till it winds up with the peaceful though rapid finale.

The orchestra played with remarkable spirit, while Nikisch's leading was characteristic of his originality and ingenuity.

For the 12th concert the programme is: Schubert, unfinished symphony; Schumann, music to Byron's "Manfred." The solo singers will be Meses. Arthur Nikisch and Julie L. Wyman, and Messrs. Wilhelm Heinrich, Gardner S. Lamson, Heinrich Meyn, Ivan Morawski and Sullivan A. Sargent. Mr. George Riddle will read the text.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The audience at the Symphony concert last evening were given, as a novelty, a hearing of the first movement of the symphonic concerto for violin and viola by Mozart, which was promised a week before and postponed by reason of the illness of Messrs. Kneisel and Loeffler, to whom the solo parts were assigned. The work, as illustrated by this opening movement, proved to be a most interesting one, and with the violin playing of Mr. Loeffler and the viola playing by Mr. Kneisel, was made highly enjoyable. It is supposed to be one of the later compositions of Mozart, being very generally credited as having been written about 10 years before his death, and the maturity of thought shown in the themes and their treatment strengthens this opinion. The beautiful cadenza by Heilmesberger was added in last evening's performance, and both the solo players were heartily commended for their highly artistic efforts.

The orchestra has seldom of late been heard to better advantage than in last evening's performance of the overture by Goldmark, "Prometheus Bound." The masterly skill of the composer, as shown in the series of tone pictures given in this composition, makes it a constant source of delight as an orchestral study, and the opportunities it affords for the conductor to bring out its ever varying effects, and to show the wonderful tone tints given by the ever changing combinations, were fully improved by Mr. Nikisch.

Schubert's entracte to "Rosamunde" made a charming contrast between the Mozart concerto and the second symphony by Brahms, a spirited reading of this latter work ending the evening's programme.

Next Saturday evening Schubert's unfinished symphony is to precede Schumann's music to Byron's "Manfred," the text being read by Mr. George Riddle, and the vocal score interpreted by Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, Mrs. Julie L. Wyman, Mr. William Heilmesberger, Mr. Heinrich Meyn, Mr. Gardner S. Lamson, Mr. Sullivan A. Sargent, Mr. Ivan Morawski and a chorus of members of the Cecilia. Hand

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1891-92.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, CONDUCTOR.

FIRST

'YOUNG PEOPLE'S POPULAR.'

WEDNESDAY AFTERNOON, JAN'Y 6, AT 2.30.

SOLOISTS:

MISS ADELE AUS DER OHE,

MISS MAUD POWELL.

150
presented a charming effect. The orchestra was at its best in elucidating these pathetic harmonies, with which it is pregnant, and even the abrupt changes of tempo contained a rhythm that was very pleasing.

Brahm's Symphony No. 2, in D major, threatened to be a dull and uninteresting performance. The allegro is reminiscent and sketchy. It is reminiscent and unsatisfactory. The plaintive notes contain neither harmony to give it dramatic effect, nor the pathos which would make it attractive. They seem to obtrude here and there, and give you an idea that the composer's imagination was more receptive of other's impressions than originally creative. It gave many opportunities, though, for the display of the horn, while Nikisch's interpretation of it added to it a vivacity and spirit that is frequently destitute in others' translation of the theme. It improved marvellously in the allegretto, where the charm of the piquant staccati merges into a delightfully graceful melody which continues in spontaneous movement till it winds up with the peaceful though rapid finale.

The orchestra played with remarkable spirit, while Nikisch's leading was characteristic of his originality and ingenuity.

For the 12th concert the programme is: Schubert, unfinished symphony; Schumann, music to Byron's "Manfred." The solo singers will be Meses. Arthur Nikisch and Julie L. Wyman, and Messrs. Wilhelm Heinrich, Gardner S. Lamson, Heinrich Meyn, Ivan Morawski and Sullivan A. Sargent. Mr. George Riddle will read the text.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The audience at the Symphony concert last evening were given, as a novelty, a hearing of the first movement of the symphonic concerto for violin and viola by Mozart, which was promised a week before and postponed by reason of the illness of Messrs. Kneisel and Loeffler, to whom the solo parts were assigned. The work, as illustrated by this opening movement, proved to be a most interesting one, and with the violin playing of Mr. Loeffler and the viola playing by Mr. Kneisel, was made highly enjoyable. It is supposed to be one of the later compositions of Mozart, being very generally credited as having been written about 10 years before his death, and the maturity of thought shown in the themes and their treatment strengthens this opinion. The beautiful cadenza by Heilmesberger was added in last evening's performance, and both the solo players were heartily commended for their highly artistic efforts.

The orchestra has seldom of late been heard to better advantage than in last evening's performance of the overture by Goldmark, "Prometheus Bound." The masterly skill of the composer, as shown in the series of tone pictures given in this composition, makes it a constant source of delight as an orchestral study, and the opportunities it affords for the conductor to bring out its ever varying effects, and to show the wonderful tone tints given by the ever changing combinations, were fully improved by Mr. Nikisch.

Schubert's entr'acte to "Rosamunde" made a charming contrast between the Mozart concerto and the second symphony by Brahms, a spirited reading of this latter work ending the evening's programme.

Next Saturday evening Schubert's unfinished symphony is to precede Schumann's music to Byron's "Manfred," the text being read by Mr. George Riddle, and the vocal score interpreted by Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, Mrs. Julie L. Wyman, Mr. William Heinrich, Mr. Heinrich Meyn, Mr. Gardner S. Lamson, Mr. Sullivan A. Sargent, Mr. Ivan Morawski and a chorus of members of the Cecilia. Hend

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1891-92.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, CONDUCTOR.

FIRST

'YOUNG PEOPLE'S POPULAR.'

WEDNESDAY AFTERNOON, JAN'Y 6, AT 2.30.

SOLOISTS:

MISS ADELE AUS DER OHE,

MISS MAUD POWELL.

PROGRAMME.

OVERTURE. "King Lear." Littolff
(First time.)

CONCERTO No. 1, in B flat minor, op. 23. . . . Tschaikowsky
Allegro non troppo e molto maestoso, D flat. Allegro con spirito. B flat minor.—
Andante Simplice. D flat.—Allegro con fuoco. B flat minor.

Miss AUS DER OHE.

a) "DANSE ET MARCHE DES GNOMES." Reginald e Koven
(First time.)

b) PAGINA D' AMORE. . . . F. van der Stucken
(First time.)

c) A CARNIVAL SCENE. . . . Arthur Bird
(First time.)

RONDO CAPRICCIOSO FOR VIOLIN. . . . Saint-Saens
Miss POWELL.

BALLET MUSIC. "Le Cid." Massenet

The Piano used is a Steinway.

Young People's Popular Concert.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the first of its young people's popular programmes at the Music Hall yesterday P. M. to a good-sized audience, and probably if the day had been a fair one the hall would have been crowded. The opening number was Litoff's overture to "King Lear," a pompous, conventional composition. The other orchestral pieces were a "Danse and March of Gnomes" by DeKoven, Mr. Van der Stucken's "Pagina d'Amore," and a "Carnival Scene" by Arthur Bird, an American resident abroad.

Mr. DeKoven is, of course, well known through his operas, and Mr. Van der Stucken as the conductor in New York, and champion-in-general of American compositions at home and abroad. These three American pieces possessed characteristics creditable to the modern composer, and well paid the effort of production. Less can be said of the carnival scene than of the others, but all showed a good knowledge of orchestral effects happily employed. The other orchestral number was the ballet music from Massenet's "Le Cid," exciting and brilliant in the extreme, as are all such efforts of this sensuous French composer.

Miss Aus der Ohe played the concerto No. 1 of Tchaikowsky, a work that is more or less familiar here and one that abounds in themes that are striking and original. The orchestration is rich in color and there are many fanciful effects but the composition on the whole is not particularly coherent in form and lacks many elements that would favorably impress the critical musician. Miss Aus der Ohe met the difficulties of the work with ease and gave a marked performance in many respects, but her inability to define the notes in the softer passages is a blemish that outweighs many other good qualities. This has always been a fault in her playing and rendered her performance some time since, at the Symphony Concerts, of the E-flat Concerto of Beethoven, a failure in many listeners' estimation. It would seem as if less flourishing of the arms and more practice of acute finger work in the scales would be of great benefit in the improvement of her technique.

Miss Maud Powell, the eminent violinist, played Saint-Saens's "Rondo Capriccioso" in that broad, artistic manner marking her ability, supplemented with a delicate finish in all the details that has placed her at the head of all the lady violinists this country has produced or heard. In fact, there are few male artists who surpass Miss Powell, either in the matter of interpretation or virtuosity. She was recalled several times but refused to play again, to her credit let it be said. The encore fiend needs crushing on every occasion.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

Music Hall: Young People's Popular.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its first Young People's Popular in the Music Hall yesterday afternoon, the programme being:

Litoff: Overture to "King Lear."
Tschalkowsky: Pianoforte Concerto No. 1, in B-flat minor, op. 23.
De Koven: Danse et Marche des Gnomes.
Van der Stucken: Pagina d'Amore.
Bird: A Carnival Scene.
Saint-Saens: Rondo Capriccioso for Violin.
Massenet: Ballet Music from "Le Cid."

Miss Adele aus der Ohe was the pianist, and Miss Maud Powell the violinist.

It is perhaps not necessary for a name to mean very much, but one likes it to mean at least something. If yesterday's concert was a "Young People's Popular," one wonders what sort of a programme Mr. Nikisch would draw up for an "Old People's Popular!" One looks in vain for anything especially juvenile in the list of music; there was little, if anything, especially adapted to the entertainment of youth, and certainly nothing of educational value. Almost everything seemed calculated, on the contrary, to appeal to a rather jaded musical palate. It was like setting the supper table at a juvenile party with curried lobster, paté de foie gras, and flagons of old Bourbon or "nice, cooling gin."

Apart from this, however, the concert was interesting enough. Litoff's "King Lear" overture, albeit sometimes verging upon the mock-terrible, is a notable advance upon his more familiar "Robespierre." The three American pieces were interesting to hear, Mr. De Koven's dance and march standing easily first for musical value. Van der Stucken's "Pagina d'Amore" seems rather flimsy, and Arthur Bird falls in with the prevalent notion today that painting the orchestra red is the true way of writing a carnival scene. The "Cid" ballet music is brilliant as may be.

It was a great pleasure to hear Miss aus der Ohe play the great Tchaikowsky concerto. The work itself holds its own admirably; very few modern concertos can compare with it in fertility of invention, firmness of musical purpose, and stout construction. There is some rather unkempt savagery in it, even some triviality now and then; but Tchaikowsky shows in it that he has so much to say, and says it with such force and distinctness, that the work cannot but be called admirable. Miss aus der Ohe played it superbly from beginning to end; she was in evident sympathy with the composition, and showed herself at her very best. It was grand playing.

Miss Powell played the bright and graceful Saint-Saens rondo in admirable style; with winning animation, musicianly feeling, and in every way adequate technique.

FIRST YOUNG PEOPLE'S POPULAR.

The first of the "Young People's Popular" concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given yesterday afternoon. The orchestra was assisted by Miss Adele Aus der Ohe, the pianist, and Miss Maud Powell, the violinist.

The first number of the programme was Litoff's overture to "King Lear," a play that has been used as an opera subject by Andre and Semeladis. Overtures bearing the same title have been composed by Leidgebel, Balakireff and Berlioz. The one by the great Frenchman—alas! it is too seldom heard—is full of the grief and the agony and the raging storm of Shakspeare's tragedy. In comparison with it this overture by Litoff is a poor thing, conventional and dull. And what, pray, has it to do with Lear or Cordelia? To be sure it is not without an incongruous and tinsel pomp, not, perhaps, out of place in an overture written for some special occasion—for the opening of a German exposition of industries or for the dedication of a city market.

Three numbers by American composers were bunched together, and, as the overture, they were played for the first time in Boston. The name of Reginald De Koven has been hitherto associated with comic operas and songs. He is now the musical editor of the New York World. He has given the orchestral piece played yesterday the title "Danse and March of the Gnomes." The gnome is a familiar figure in the musical menagerie, and his habits are well known. He delights in the triangle, the cymbals and the bass drum, and he prefers, as a rule, the minor mode to the major. Mr. De Koven's gnomes have, however, learned one new trick. When they dance they whistle the tunes of Grieg. Mr. Van der Stucken's "Pagina d'Amore" is a melodious salon piece for orchestra, and Mr. Arthur Bird's "Carnival Scene" is an echo of music that has been written before his day, descriptive, or supposed to be descriptive of the carnival. The instrumentation is clever—and that is all.

Miss Aus der Ohe was heard in Tchaikowsky's concerto in B flat minor. This concerto gains with each hearing. It is full of fine fantasy, noble frenzy, haunting melody, and skillful workmanship. Above all, it has a strange, pungent, savage perfume. It makes severe demands upon the temperament and the mechanism of the pianist. Now, Miss Aus der Ohe is a most interesting temperamental study. She glides across the stage, cool, virginal, the Diana of the pianoforte; but the moment she touches the keys she undergoes a transformation; and while she does not lose her self-control and while she watches the flight of her musical arrows, little by little she becomes intensely human. Seldom is such virility seen in a woman's playing; and, yesterday, her feminine instinct of refinement kept her from abusing her strength. So that while her performance was bold and broad, strong and manly, it was also impassioned; and when occasion required, she showed daintiness, elegance, and a sentiment that was never mawkish. Although she played with abandon, the ability to curb her passion accompanied the display of her temperament. She was most heartily applauded.

Miss Maud Powell played Saint-Saens's Rondo Capriccioso. She has long been distinguished for the breadth and richness of her tone, the sureness of her mechanism, and the sincerity of her art. To-day she plays with greater elasticity and with more marked confidence in the expression of her convictions. It is a pleasure to watch the steady growth of this admirable violinist; it is also a pleasure to foresee that she has not yet reached the limits of her capacity. She, too, was most warmly applauded. In spite of many recalls she modestly and sensibly contented herself with bowing in response to the demands of the audience.

The final number of the programme was the brilliant and exhilarating ballet music from Massenet's "Le Cid." It was given with great spirit and with a full appreciation of its rhythms and its colors.

PHILIP HALE.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Young People's Popular Concert.

It was a programme full of interest, and containing many novelties, that was given at Music Hall yesterday afternoon by our symphony orchestra, and our conductor proved himself in sympathy with native work by placing three American compositions on the list. A fair-sized audience was in attendance, and the encore-fiend attempted to force the soloists into repetitions, but was defeated.

The "King Lear" overture by Litoff was a highly-spiced dish which began the banquet. It was military even to the bass-drum point, and the basses roared as if they had taken the line from the tragedy:—

"Blow winds and crack your cheeks."

to themselves. Only one tender clarinette phrase seemed to suggest the existence of a Cordelia; the rest was dissonant, sombre, and above all, spasmodic. It was played with amazing force, throughout. Now followed more legitimate power, in Tchaikowsky's first piano concerto, played by Miss Aus der Ohe. This lady is the most leonine of female pianists, and the work suited her broad and fiery vein. She held her own against the thunderings of the orchestra, and her octave work and heavy chords were very effective, but the light passagen-playing was not so perfect. The orchestra hurried the soloist once or twice in the andante, and the horn players gave a few specimens of disagreeable tone-color. The cadenza of the first movement was rather an incoherent bit of composition, but the entire work was full of those touches of folk-music with which not only Tchaikowsky, but Rubenstein, Grieg, Suendsen, Dvorak and Liszt have made their works characteristic. We owe many an original flavor, in modern music to the great northern repertoire of folk song and dance, and in this concerto all the themes seemed to speak of Russian influence, and all, except one in the andante, were beautiful; the exception was rather a tawdry subject in rapid waltz rhythm.

The other soloist was the young violinist—Miss Maud Powell—who performed a capricious work with great dash and purity of intonation, but with an occasional lack of force in passages on the G string. She received numerous recalls, but wisely forbore to inaugurate the encore system. The excellent Western composer, Reginald de Koven, was represented on the programme by a "Danse et marche des Gnomes." The piece was sprightly and attractive, and although a trifle "Peer-Ginty" in its vein, was by no means plagiarized, or even conventional. The Gnomes skipped in fourths chiefly, the Glockenspiel added its sweetness, and sforzando effects were plentiful. Mr. Van der Stucken's "Pagina d'Amore" was ecstatic enough, but not as fine as some of the compositions that he has given us. Arthur Bird's "Carnival" was full of the modern sensational devices, all the way from piccolo shrieks to the baleful tones of muted horns, but such a musical Saturnalia is not very difficult to achieve since Berlioz led the way into tonal diablerie. There was some effective work in the deepest register of the bassoon, and an impressive march theme appeared, but as a whole the composition was not novel. Massenet's ballet music from "Le Cid," with many odd touches of flat sevenths and new scale forms, ended a concert that was popular enough and yet of sustained interest to the musicians present.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

The First "Young People's Popular" at Music Hall.

Everything considered, it was a large audience that heard the first "Young People's Popular" concert by the Symphony orchestra at Music hall yesterday afternoon. The programme was a fairly well selected one, but Mr. Nikisch should abide by the time-honored custom, and have at least one great composer represented in the orchestral numbers. Had it not been for the pianoforte concerto and the violin rondo, the timbre of the afternoon would have been light indeed. Litloff's "King Lear" overture, new to Boston, and first on the programme, was a smoothly written piece of music and quiet pleasing, but fell a bit short of the tragic grandeur necessary to portray its subject. It was admirably played.

Needless to say, the Tschalkowsky concerto was magnificently handled by Miss Aus der Ohe, who seems to gain in power and warmth of tone with each year. The finale was a wonderful piece of bravura playing, and moved the audience to great enthusiasm.

Miss Maud Powell, the violinist, made a marked impression with Saint-Saen's rondo capriccioso. Her playing is intensely virile and her tone sympathetic and broad. She attacks technical difficulties with a nervous energy that is sometimes excessive. But the effect of her work is entirely praiseworthy. She was recalled half a dozen times, at least. De Koven's "Dance and March of the Gnomes" was a pleasant bit of orchestral writing, but not so good as one would expect from the composer of "Robin Hood." Melodious and chaste was Van der Stucken's "Pagina d'Amore," and it was beautifully played. The concert ended with a fine performance of Massanett's somewhat majestic ballet music from "Le Cid."

THE YOUNG PEOPLE'S POPULAR.

The first concert of the season in the Young People's Popular course was given at Music hall Wednesday afternoon. In spite of the heavy snow storm a very large audience was present and sufficient satisfaction was manifested by those who had braved the weather to make the success of such a series of concerts again no question. The programme:

Overture, "King Lear".....Litloff
Concerto No. 1, in B flat minor, op. 23....

Allegro non troppo e molto maestoso, D flat.
Allegro con spirito, B flat minor.—Andante
Simplice, D flat.—Allegro con fuoco, B flat minor.

Miss Aus Der Ohe.

a) "Danse et Marche des Gnomes".....
Reginald de Koven
b) Pagina D'Amore.....F. van der Stucken
c) A Carnival scene.....Arthur Bird
Rondo Capriccioso for Violin.....Saint-Saens
Miss Powell.

Ballet Music. "Le Cid".....Massenet

The programme was a charming one, four of the numbers being produced for the first time. These were the "King Lear" overture by Litloff, the "Danse et Marche des Gnomes" by Reginald de Koven, the "Pagina d'Amore" by F. Van der Stucken, and "A Carnival Scene" by Arthur Bird.

A dreamy bit of musical writing is "Pagina d'Amore" and most exquisitely played on Wednesday afternoon by Mr. Nikisch's band.

"A Carnival Scene" is a delightfully jolly picture of the sights and sounds of carnival time, and made even more enjoyable by the fact that it is of American parentage.

The Overture "King Lear" was finely rendered, as was also the "Danse et Marche des Gnomes," and the fascinating ballet music from "Le Cid" by Massenet which ended the programme.

Miss Aus der Ohe and Miss Powell were highly appreciated, the former winning great applause in the "Concerto" by Tschalkowsky, the latter equally welcome in the "Rondo Capriccioso" by Saint-Saens. Both artists were repeatedly recalled to bow their acknowledgments.

These popular concerts in every way deserve the appreciation they are receiving and cannot come too often.

THE YOUNG PEOPLE'S POPULAR.

The first Young People's popular concert was given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall last Wednesday afternoon. A highly entertaining programme was presented, which, without doubt, would have been enjoyed by an audience limited in size only by the capacity of the hall, if the violent storm of the day had not intervened. There were five orchestral numbers, four of which were played for the first time in Boston. Litloff's overture to "King Lear" was evidently written at a time when its composer's mind was pretty thoroughly saturated with Berlioz, Wagner and the theatre. It is a brilliant and effective concert piece, and is interesting in that it displays an easy command of the modern orchestra, and a charming dexterity in making use of other people's ideas. But even with all these resources to draw upon, the composer succeeded only in producing a conventional and, in most respects, commonplace work, which characteristics, its gorgeous instrumentation fails to conceal.

In the middle of the programme three short pieces by American composers were grouped together: "Danse et Marche des Gnomes," by Reginald de Koven; "Pagina D'Amore," by F. van der Stucken; and "A Carnival Scene," by Arthur Bird. All of these young men are admittedly the possessors of talent in no slight degree.

Of the three, Arthur Bird ranks first; but although in his "Carnival Scene" is to be found great variety of orchestral treatment, it is not the equal of his fascinating "Scene Orientale," in thematic material or in completeness of musical expression. The Danse has points of attractiveness in its rhythmic and instrumental effects; and Mr. van der Stucken's sensuous and boldly orchestrated song is certainly an effective concert piece.

Two of the most popular soloists now before the public were also heard at this concert. Miss Adele Aus der Ohe gave a generally strong, musician-like performance of Tschalkowsky's first concerto in B flat minor. She was not at her best in the first movement, her technical work being somewhat labored and unfinished. The andante, too, although played with much taste, suffered from a too great delicacy of touch, the player's pianissimo frequently being scarcely heard at all. Her handling of the finale, however, was characterized by buoyancy, fire and rhythmic clearness, and at its close she was enthusiastically and deservedly recalled. Miss Aus der Ohe is a pianist of brains as well as of keen sensibilities. She has made marked gains in delicacy of touch since last season, when it was to be feared that she was fast eradicating the womanly qualities of her playing, in her apparent ambition to play "like a man."

Miss Maud Powell, like Miss Aus der Ohe, not only evinces fine technical skill, but the nature of a musician in all that she does. Her performance of Saint-Saens's "Rondo Capriccioso" was exceedingly artistic and brilliant. For some reason her tone was not as pure as is usually the case, it being somewhat veiled in quality. Perhaps it was due to the damp atmosphere. She, too, was recalled until there appeared to be no longer a hope that she would grant an encore. The closing number was the gorgeous ballet music from Massenet's "Le Cid." The work of the orchestra was full of verve, and Mr. Nikisch's strongly dramatic instincts imparted an effect to every number that was little short of dazzling. The broad, fresco-like style of his tone-painting, however, was a little too pronounced even for Music Hall, a very considerable amount of coarseness of execution being apparent throughout.

Comier

YOUNG PEOPLE'S POPULAR.

The first of the Young People's Popular concerts, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given in Music Hall on Wednesday afternoon before an audience of fair size. In his make up of the program Mr. Nikisch had paid particular attention to the character of the concert and also to the representation of American composers, three of them—Reginald de Koven, F. Van der Stucken and Arthur Bird—appearing prominently. The first of these was represented by his "Danse et March des Gnomes," an odd composition, as its subject would intimate and one which calls to mind "Peer Gynt" without actually being reminiscent. It is undoubtedly a clever piece of work and received full justice at the hands of Mr. Nikisch and his musicians. Van der Stucken's "Pagina d'Amore" is a graceful, romantic composition, but hardly the equal of some of his previous work. Mr. Bird's "Carnival Scene" is an effort in tone painting which is made startlingly sensational, and some very effective work was done particularly in the lower register, and in the introduction of a march theme. The rest of the program was made up of Massenet's ballet music from "Le Cid," and the "King Lear" overture by Litloff.

The soloists were Miss Aus der Ohe, who chose the first of Tschalkowsky's concertos, and Miss Maud Powell, who rendered the rondo capriccioso for violin by Saint-Saens. Miss Powell emphasized her right to a place in the first rank of women violinists of the day by her execution of this capricious subject and showed the results of her work even since her last appearance here. Miss Aus der Ohe in her broad, powerful treatment of her selection gave further evidence of her strength and virility as a pianist.

Young Boston took its turn at a "symphony concert," with the symphony left out, last Wednesday, and very important the youngsters looked under the dispensation. Insipient violin and piano players were as thick as hops, and it wouldn't have been safe to toss a biscuit in the crowd for fear of hitting a future Paderewski or Joachim.

poser, Reginald de Koven, was represented on the programme by a "Danse et marche des Gnomes." The piece was sprightly and attractive, and although a trifle "Peer-Ginty" in its vein, was by no means plagiarized, or even conventional. The Gnomes skipped in fourths chiefly, the Glockenspiel added its sweetness, and sforzando effects were plentiful. Mr. Van der Hucken's "Pagina d'Amore" was ecstatic enough, but not as fine as some of the compositions that he has given us. Arthur Bird's "Carnival" was full of the modern sensational devices, all the way from piccolo shrieks to the baleful tones of muted horns, but such a musical Saturnalia is not very difficult to achieve since Berlioz led the way into tonal diablerie. There was some effective work in the deepest register of the bassoon, and an impressive march theme appeared, but as a whole the composition was not novel. Massenet's ballet music from "Le Cid," with many odd touches of flat sevenths and new scale forms, ended a concert that was popular enough and yet of sustained interest to the musicians present.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

The First "Young People's Popular" at Music Hall.

Everything considered, it was a large audience that heard the first "Young People's Popular" concert by the Symphony orchestra at Music hall yesterday afternoon. The programme was a fairly well selected one, but Mr. Nikisch should abide by the time-honored custom, and have at least one great composer represented in the orchestral numbers. Had it not been for the pianoforte concerto and the violin rondo, the timbre of the afternoon would have been light indeed. Litloff's "King Lear" overture, new to Boston, and first on the programme, was a smoothly written piece of music and quiet pleasing, but fell a bit short of the tragic grandeur necessary to portray its subject. It was admirably played.

Needless to say, the Tschaikowsky concerto was magnificently handled by Miss Aus der Ohe, who seems to gain in power and warmth of tone with each year. The finale was a wonderful piece of bravura playing, and moved the audience to great enthusiasm.

Miss Maud Powell, the violinist, made a marked impression with Saint-Saens's rondo capriccioso. Her playing is intensely virile and her tone sympathetic and broad. She attacks technical difficulties with a nervous energy that is sometimes excessive. But the effect of her work is entirely praiseworthy. She was recalled half a dozen times, at least. De Koven's "Dance and March of the Gnomes" was a pleasant bit of orchestral writing, but not so good as one would expect from the composer of "Robin Hood." Melodious and chaste was Van der Stucken's "Pagina d'Amore," and it was beautifully played. The concert ended with a fine performance of Massenet's somewhat majestic ballet music from "Le Cid."

THE YOUNG PEOPLE'S POPULAR.

The first concert of the season in the Young People's Popular course was given at Music hall Wednesday afternoon. In spite of the heavy snow storm a very large audience was present and sufficient satisfaction was manifested by those who had braved the weather to make the success of such a series of concerts again no question. The programme:

Overture. "King Lear".....Litloff
Concerto No. 1, in B flat minor, op. 23....Tschaikowsky
Allegro non troppo e molto maestoso, D flat.
Allegro con spirito, B flat minor.—Andante
Simplice, D flat.—Allegro con fuoco. B flat minor.

Miss Aus Der Ohe.
a) "Danse et Marche des Gnomes".....Reginald de Koven
b) Pagina D'Amore.....F. van der Stucken
c) A Carnival scene.....Arthur Bird
Rondo Capriccioso for Violin.....Saint-Saens
Miss Powell.
Ballet Music. "Le Cid".....Massenet

The programme was a charming one, four of the numbers being produced for the first time. These were the "King Lear" overture by Litloff, the "Danse et Marche des Gnomes" by Reginald de Koven, the "Pagina d'Amore" by F. Van der Stucken, and "A Carnival Scene" by Arthur Bird.

A dreamy bit of musical writing is "Pagina d'Amore" and most exquisitely played on Wednesday afternoon by Mr. Nikisch's band.

"A Carnival Scene" is a delightfully jolly picture of the sights and sounds of carnival time, and made even more enjoyable by the fact that it is of American parentage.

The Overture "King Lear" was finely rendered, as was also the "Danse et Marche des Gnomes," and the fascinating ballet music from "Le Cid" by Massenet which ended the programme.

Miss Aus der Ohe and Miss Powell were highly appreciated, the former winning great applause in the "Concerto" by Tschaikowsky, the latter equally welcome in the "Rondo Capriccioso" by Saint-Saens. Both artists were repeatedly recalled to bow their acknowledgments.

These popular concerts in every way deserve the appreciation they are receiving and cannot come too often.

THE YOUNG PEOPLE'S POPULAR.

The first Young People's popular concert was given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall last Wednesday afternoon. A highly entertaining programme was presented, which, without doubt, would have been enjoyed by an audience limited in size only by the capacity of the hall, if the violent storm of the day had not intervened. There were five orchestral numbers, four of which were played for the first time in Boston. Litloff's overture to "King Lear" was evidently written at a time when its composer's mind was pretty thoroughly saturated with Berlioz, Wagner and the theatre. It is a brilliant and effective concert piece, and is interesting in that it displays an easy command of the modern orchestra, and a charming dexterity in making use of other people's ideas. But even with all these resources to draw upon, the composer succeeded only in producing a conventional and, in most respects, commonplace work, which characteristics, its gorgeous instrumentation fails to conceal.

In the middle of the programme three short pieces by American composers were grouped together: "Danse et Marche des Gnomes," by Reginald de Koven; "Pagina D'Amore," by F. van der Stucken; and "A Carnival Scene," by Arthur Bird. All of these young men are admittedly the possessors of talent in no slight degree.

Of the three, Arthur Bird ranks first; but although in his "Carnival Scene" is to be found great variety of orchestral treatment, it is not the equal of his fascinating "Scene Orientale," in thematic material or in completeness of musical expression. The Danse has points of attractiveness in its rhythmic and instrumental effects; and Mr. van der Stucken's sensuous and boldly orchestrated song is certainly an effective concert piece.

Two of the most popular soloists now before the public were also heard at this concert. Miss Adele Aus der Ohe gave a generally strong, musician-like performance of Tschaikowsky's first concerto in B flat minor. She was not at her best in the first movement, her technical work being somewhat labored and unfinished. The andante, too, although played with much taste, suffered from a too great delicacy of touch, the player's pianissimo frequently being scarcely heard at all. Her handling of the finale, however, was characterized by buoyancy, fire and rhythmical clearness, and at its close she was enthusiastically and deservedly recalled. Miss Aus der Ohe is a pianist of brains as well as of keen sensibilities. She has made marked gains in delicacy of touch since last season, when it was to be feared that she was fast eradicating the womanly qualities of her playing, in her apparent ambition to play "like a man."

Miss Maud Powell, like Miss Aus der Ohe, not only evinces fine technical skill, but the nature of a musician in all that she does. Her performance of Saint-Saens's "Rondo Capriccioso" was exceedingly artistic and brilliant. For some reason her tone was not as pure as is usually the case, it being somewhat veiled in quality. Perhaps it was due to the damp atmosphere. She, too, was recalled until there appeared to be no longer a hope that she would grant an encore. The closing number was the gorgeous ballet music from Massenet's "Le Cid." The work of the orchestra was full of verve, and Mr. Nikisch's strongly dramatic instincts imparted an effect to every number that was little short of dazzling. The broad, fresco-like style of his tone-painting, however, was a little too pronounced even for Music Hall, a very considerable amount of coarseness of execution being apparent throughout.

YOUNG PEOPLE'S POPULAR.

The first of the Young People's Popular concerts, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given in Music Hall on Wednesday afternoon before an audience of fair size. In his make up of the program Mr. Nikisch had paid particular attention to the character of the concert and also to the representation of American composers, three of them—Reginald de Koven, F. Van der Stucken and Arthur Bird—appearing prominently. The first of these was represented by his "Danse et Marche des Gnomes," an odd composition, as its subject would intimate and one which calls to mind "Peer Gynt" without actually being reminiscent. It is undoubtedly a clever piece of work and received full justice at the hands of Mr. Nikisch and his musicians. Van der Stucken's "Pagina d'Amore" is a graceful, romantic composition, but hardly the equal of some of his previous work. Mr. Bird's "Carnival Scene" is an effort in tone painting which is made startlingly sensational, and some very effective work was done particularly in the lower register, and in the introduction of a march theme. The rest of the program was made up of Massenet's ballet music from "Le Cid," and the "King Lear" overture by Litloff.

The soloists were Miss Aus der Ohe, who chose the first of Tschaikowsky's concertos, and Miss Maud Powell, who rendered the rondo capriccioso for violin by Saint-Saens. Miss Powell emphasized her right to a place in the first rank of women violinists of the day by her execution of this capricious subject and showed the results of her work even since her last appearance here. Miss Aus der Ohe in her broad, powerful treatment of her selection gave further evidence of her strength and virility as a pianist.

Young Boston took its turn at a "symphony concert," with the symphony left out, last Wednesday, and very important the youngsters looked under the dispensation. Insipient violin and piano players were as thick as hops, and it wouldn't have been safe to toss a biscuit in the crowd for fear of hitting a future Paderewski or Joachim.

158

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1891-92.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

XII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 9, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

SCHUBERT.

UNFINISHED SYMPHONY in B minor.
Allegro moderato—Andante con moto.

SCHUMANN.

THE MUSIC TO BYRON'S "MANFRED."

Reader: MR. GEORGE RIDDLE.

SOLOISTS:

MRS. ARTHUR NIKISCH.

MRS. JULIE L. WYMAN.

MR. WILHELM HEINRICH.

MR. HEINRICH MEYN.

MR. GARDNER S. LAMSON.

MR. SULLIVAN A. SARGENT.

MR. CLARENCE E. HAY.

CHORUS OF MEMBERS OF THE "CECILIA."

"MANFRED."

Jan 18

An Admirable Performance of Schumann's Work.

A Discussion of Its Dramatic Value.

The programme of the twelfth concert of the Symphony Orchestra was as follows: Schubert's "Unfinished" symphony in B minor and Schumann's music to Byron's "Manfred." The arrangement of the poem was read by Mr. George Riddle. The singers were Mrs. Nikisch, Mrs. Wyman and Messrs. Heinrich, Meyn, Lamson, Sargent and Hay. The chorus was taken from the Cecilia Society. There was a very large audience.

Byron did not write "Manfred" for the theatre. In a letter to Murray, the publisher, he says: "I have made it impossible that it should be put upon the stage, having the greatest contempt for the theatre ever since my affair with Drury Lane." In another letter he speaks of having composed it with a horror of the stage, and with the intention of making even the thought of dramatic presentation impracticable. It is, indeed, eminently unfit for the theatre; not on account of its dismal subject, but there is no action, there are no incidents, there are no characters of flesh-and-blood interest. It has been called a species of "Faust." Manfred is, perhaps, a twin brother of Faust, but the drama, as a German critic keenly observes, is without Gretchen, without Valentin and Mephisto, without an Easter walk, without Auerbach's cellar, without Dame Martha's garden. There is the Walpurgis-night spirit in each, "but of the 'two souls' that dwell in the breast of Faust only one is found in the body of Manfred, a spirit dissatisfied, indulging in subtle inquiries, metaphysical." Furthermore, Manfred does not yield to the devil; "he conquers him by the might of the human spirit." As a poem, however, "Manfred" made a profound impression in Germany, and it is still seen, at intervals, upon the German stage.

Schumann was a passionate admirer of Byron, and it is not surprising that he tried to show in music the impressions made upon his mind by the English poet. He wrote a chorus and an aria for an opera, the subject of which was taken from "The Corsair;" but he abandoned his purpose, and the numbers were not published. He set three of the "Hebrew Melodies" to music. His perturbed spirit found special pleasure in "Manfred," and he once said that he never devoted himself to any composition with such lavish love and power as to his music to Byron's dramatic work. Wasielowski tells us that when reading the poem aloud in Dusseldorf his voice suddenly faltered, he burst into tears, and he was so overcome that he could read no farther.

Schumann's "Manfred" music may be considered as stage music or as absolute music—that is, as music pure and simple, untrammelled by conditions, without reference to theatrical purpose. As stage music it is a failure. It is devoid of the elements that make such music effective. The object of melodramatic music is to accentuate a situation, to put a character in bolder relief, to intensify an emotion upon the stage. To do this successfully the composer must unite keen dramatic instincts with the power of expression. The genius of Schumann was essentially undramatic. He proved this fact in many ways—in his opera, which was a failure; in "Paradise and the Peri," where "the idea of dramatic form is often sacrificed to subjective caprice;" in a song like "Belshazzar," where he loses the whole effect by fretting over the detail; and, not to mention other instances, in "Manfred." His nature was lyric, and "only when personified does the lyric become dramatic." He had not the faculty of musical characterization. Crowds or individuals did not appeal to him dramatically, and instead of presenting the scenes in which they moved so that the music identified those scenes, he merely gave way to a series of "lyrical outbursts." Sneer as he might at Auber and Meyerbeer he never could have written the music that characterizes Fenella or Marcel.

Take his "Manfred." Whatever may be said about the merits of the overture as a strictly musical composition, as a theatre overture to prepare the hearer for a play, it is too subjective, too intimate. The theatrical perspective is disregarded, and as a prelude to a play or opera it must be placed below the overtures of Weber, for example, or the overture to "Coriolanus" or "Egmont" or even "Midsummer Night's Dream." I say "even 'Midsummer Night's Dream,'" for Mendelssohn, too, would have failed upon the stage if the fragment of his unfinished opera may be justly taken as an exhibition of his powers as an opera composer. Without discussing the question of whether Schumann's arrangement of the text of Byron's poem is satisfactory—and it might be argued that here, too, he showed his lack of dramatic feeling—let us pass on to the incidental music. The first three numbers are devoted to spiritual manifestations. In the first, four spirits sing in turn a few measures, characterless, unmelodious, uninteresting. One spirit is an alto, another a soprano and so on. Finally they sing together. That is all. Their lines well declaimed upon the stage, with the accessories of costume and scenery, would be more effective. And, pray, does the music, beautiful as it is, that accompanies the appearance of the female figure, fit in any way the agony and doubt of Manfred as he gazes and falls senseless? Or is the incantation with four bass voices an adequate supplement to the horror of the words? A few measures taken at random from the first pages of the scene in the Wolf's Glen in "Der Freischuetz" contain more blood-curdling suggestion than is found in this whole number. Or is the "Hymn of the Spirits" filled with the demoniac fury of Satanic adoration? It is certainly written in defiance of the laws of vocal composition. No one would object to this if an effect were thereby gained. The final chorus is extremely effective, and at the sacrifice of dramatic truth. Manfred in the poem rejects the rites of the Church. The closing words are spoken by the Abbot: "His soul hath ta'en its earthless flight—whither? I dread to think—but he is gone." In a word, there is no hope. What fitness is there in the requiem with its "eternal rest" and "light perpetual?" The instrumental melodramatic music is sometimes delightful per se—as in the calling of the Alp witch and in the address to Astarte—but it can seldom be called characteristic, or suggestive of the text. As purely melodramatic music, "Manfred" is inferior to Beethoven's "Egmont," Mendels. Sohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream," and Bizet's "L'Arlesienne," for it lacks dramatic truth.

Objection has been raised against its use in the concert hall on the ground that the music does not bring vividly the play before the audience. There is also another objection that has been made against all melodramatic music of such pretension, and that is this: The text suffers by the musical interruption, and the music is neglected in the desire to hear the text. But if "Manfred" is banished from the theatre and the concert hall, where is its place? One ingenious writer claims that as the symphonic poem was unknown in Schumann's time, he put the impressions produced by Byron's poem into incidental music; and perhaps this is as satisfactory a summing up as any—that "Manfred" is a fine poetic rendering in music of Schumann's impressions.

The performance of the orchestra was very satisfactory, although at the opening of the overture and in a few passages of the melodramatic music the attack was ragged, as were the final measures before Act III. The "Calling of the Alp witch" was given with unusual delicacy and precision. The solo singers were adequate, although the unison passages of the "Incantation" were slightly marred by Mr. Meyn's singular habit of singing the two equal and final notes of a measure as though the first were dotted and the second of necessarily lesser value. In the "Hymn of the Spirits" the chorus was feeble; the Requiem was sung with due effect.

The applause of the evening, however, was given to Mr. Riddle, and deservedly; for he succeeded admirably in an arduous task. There might be a question as to his use of the "ascending scale"; possibly the last word of the vanishing Astarte should be uttered as a reproach; but in view of the breadth and dignity and discrimination of his performance, these and similar questions savor of hypercriticism.

The concert opened with an excellent interpretation of the "Unfinished" Symphony. It is interesting to note in this connection that the symphony was finished in 1891 by an earnest German named August Ludwig. His offense is aggravated by the fact that he has written a pamphlet in which he congratulates the world upon the accomplishment of his labor and the consequent satisfying of a long felt want. Incidentally he speaks of his own music in terms of warm approbation.

PHILIP HALE.

MUSIC.

Schumann's "Manfred" at the Symphony Concert.

An unusually large audience assembled at Music Hall, last Saturday night, to enjoy the attractive programme offered by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The "Manfred" reading and music was the principal feature of the occasion. Twice before it has been given here, in 1884 and 1886, but this was the best performance. The beautiful music that Schumann has given Byron's exquisite but rather gloomy poem is appropriate in every particular, and the expressive and sympathetic interpretation given it by Herr Nikisch, rendered the presence of the supporting artists, with the exception of Mr. George Riddle, almost superfluous. The solo parts were small but well done by Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, Mrs. Julie L. Wyman, Mr. Wilhelm Heinrich, Mr. Heinrich Meyn, Mr. Gardiner S. Lamson, Mr. Sullivan A. Sargent, Mr. Clarence E. Hay. The choral numbers were sung by a large number of members of the Cecilia Club, who gave the numbers with taste and precision. The requiem at the close of the poem was finely shaded.

Mr. Riddle's finished powers, his clear enunciation and his voice, whose quality can be described by no better word than "velvety," were admirably shown in his rendition of the poet's lines.

The performance of that exquisite fragment—Schubert's unfinished symphony in B minor, No. 8—was a fitting prelude to the melancholy charm which pervades "Manfred." It has truly been said that "it stands quite apart from all other compositions of Schubert or any other master." It was written in 1822, six years before the death of its composer. Why it was never finished cannot now be told. For forty-five years it was buried in oblivion and then suddenly leapt into fame. It offers great opportunities for fine effects, delicate shading and clear perception of the composer's meaning, and all these marked its rendition on Saturday night.

There will be no concert this week, as the orchestra will be in Philadelphia tonight, in New York Tuesday; Washington, Wednesday; Baltimore, Thursday; Brooklyn, Friday and Saturday. On Jan. 23 the programme will be as follows: "A Faust Overture," Wagner; concerto for pianoforte in F minor, Chopin; symphony No. 3, "Eroica," Beethoven. Mrs. H. H. A. Beach will be the soloist.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Symphony Concert.

The large audience and the rapt attention that was continuously displayed proved the concert of Saturday a popular success, and if a few flaws may be picked here or there, it must still be remembered that as a whole, the execution of the numbers showed an advance over the blatant vein that has frequently marred recent performances. The unfinished symphony by Schubert was generally well shaded and given in a conservative manner that was as welcome as it was unexpected, and made a few irregularities in the second movement at least condonable, although the exaggeration of the pauses and ritenuto effects was out of place in so simple a work as this—a violet among symphonies.

The quiet melancholy of Schubert's symphony made an excellent introduction to the profounder gloom of Schumann's "Manfred," and the historical link that Schumann drew much inspiration from Schubert and in his later days believed that the ghost of the latter was haunting him, implored him to complete this very symphony, made the juxtaposition especially apt. One can readily imagine how much the character of the Anglicized Faust (as "Manfred" may fairly be called) appealed to the introspective Schumann; it is said that he wept when he first read the poem. The use of melodrama (spoken dialogue accompanied by music), first employed by Rousseau in 1773, is an effective touch if perfectly carried out by the reader.

Mr. George Riddle certainly read with an intelligence and poetic feeling that swayed every auditor, but he did not unite the text to the musical expression as did Mr. H. M. Ticknor in a previous performance. Beautiful as was his rendering of the few sentences of the spirit of Astarte, the words were given with so little regard for the accompaniment that often they fell with the gloomy instrumentation which pictured Manfred, and not with the tender phrases of muted violins which portrayed the spirit of his beloved.

These dainty measure, also on muted violins, of the incantation to the witch of the Alps, presented an audacious innovation; the reading was not given with the music, as intended by Schumann, but postponed until after it! This was probably done in the hope that the music, the prettiest in the entire work, might win applause, but if so it failed of its object, for the audience seemed to enter into the spirit of the work and demand continuity rather than sporadic successes; but the most graceful effect of the composition was sacrificed by omitting the words.

The overture was fairly well played. It could have had more of subtlety in its pictures of the struggles of Manfred again fate, and more of unity in the many syncopated passages, but the contrast between the proud and dark nature, and the tender and forgiving one was well drawn. The overture is as subtle and soulful as anything that Schumann has ever written. The orchestral work in the passages of melodrama was of varying shades of merit, but even when it was excellent, the palpable disjunction of reader and accompaniment caused many a blemish, as, for example, in the lines:—

O God, if it be thus,
And thou art not a madness and a mockery,
I yet might be most happy,
at the end of which the figure of Astarte vanishes with an expressive diminished seventh chord, just as Manfred cries:—

I will clasp thee, and we again will be—just at this important point there was a sufficient aberration to destroy the meaning of the music almost totally.

But it is impossible to wholly impair the beauty of this work, and the choruses were given with much steadiness by the members of the Cecilia, the solos by such singers as Mrs. Nikisch, Mrs. Wyman and Messrs. Heinrich, Meyn, Lamson, Sargent and Hay, and the entr'acte was played by the orchestra with absolute perfection. The scenes in the Hall of Ahrimanes, with the exception noted, were splendidly given orchestra and chorus, and the vehemence of the phrases "Prostrate thyself" and "Destroy the worm," so much akin to the Turbæ of more classical and sacred music, was commendable.

Schumann, like Wagner and Rossini, uses the English horn to represent the shepherd's, or Alpine, horn, and the distant sounds of the instrument form a splendid background to the hero's attempt at suicide, but the tones could have been a little louder, for at times the phrases became unintelligible in the hall. The double canon which forms the final requiem was well shaded; it is a good piece of composition, but is none the less a sin against dramatic unity to introduce a requiem, which has no more right in "Manfred" than a Mass would have in a Mohammedan mosque, but Schumann evidently sacrificed something to attain a dramatic ending.

In summing up the concert one must acknowledge the great difficulties attendant on a performance of "Manfred"; the reader must be a practical musician, the conductor must balance against his declamation in a manner more changeable than that required against a singer's musical expression, and the continuity must be preserved in many rapidly shifting emotions. When one considers all these stumbling blocks placed in the path (they have been surmounted, however), it seems like hyper-criticism to demand an almost unattainable ideal, and it is much fairer to dwell on what has been surmounted; judged in such a manner one can repeat that the performance of Saturday was one to be remembered with much pleasure, and a great advance over many of the preceding concerts.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

—In Boston, says the New York World, they named the grandly topped musician Paderewski the Human Chrysanthemum. He is that and several other things. A New York woman who knows almost everything—much more than all of Beacon st. boiled down—has told just what kind of a chrysanthemum he is. He is a tsuki-no-kasa. This is Japanese. It means moon's halo and it designates, so say the books, "a flower of an orange-red color."

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Twelfth Symphony Concert.

The programme of the twelfth concert of the Symphony orchestra included the "Unfinished Symphony" of Schubert and Schumann's "Manfred" music. In the production of the latter work Mr. George Riddle was the reader, the solo parts being taken by Mrs. Nikisch, Mrs. Wyman and Messrs. Heinrich, Meyn, Lamson, Sargent and Hay. The choruses were sung by members of the Cecilia Society.

The performance of the "Unfinished Symphony" was in some respects not an entirely objectionable one; that is to say, there was less coarseness and theatric affectation in the interpretation than might have occurred when we consider the standard that exists with the orchestra.

Still, however, the playing lacked the element of repose that is demanded in many of the phases of this beautiful creation of Schubert's, and never once was a sustained pianissimo realized. It does not seem to be a part of Mr. Nikisch's nature to conceive what sempre pianissimo means. If a phrase is marked pianissimo, and accidentally, or otherwise, it is begun so it is immediately changed to a sentimental exaggeration that is made to over-ride the rest of the score and entirely submerge important accompanying figures. If there is a swell indicated in a pianissimo passage it is distorted out of all reasonable proportion. As for repose, it is conspicuous by its absence in the efforts of Mr. Nikisch's band.

It must be from a rough musical nature that such deficiencies can proceed, one might naturally conclude, to say nothing of a doubtful, if not vulgar, taste, when it is observed in the rendering of the classics. The succeeding measures in sixteenths between the violins in the opening movement were played without unity of purpose, and the figure was soon lost in the exaggeration of the theme in the wood wind. The second movement fared little better than the first, the need of repose and a lesser volume of tone being constantly desired. We have had this delightful symphony played too many times in a faultless manner by the orchestra in days past, to sit by and accept this coarse substitute with approbation.

That it is the fault of the players does not follow, for we all recall the evening last season when Mr. Kniesel took the baton and at once, as if by magic, the delicacy and refinement that were always present under Gericke again appeared and a rendering of Beethoven's Second Symphony was given that the most critical could but applaud. It elicited "bravo" from the audience. Perhaps we ought to be thankful for the half loaf that is given us nowadays, but we shall have to get more hungry for second rate performances before we accept such playing without criticism.

That Schumann was not a dramatic composer need not be told at this late day. Hence it is that the performance of "Manfred" on Saturday evening was in many respects dull and wearisome. It served principally to bring Mr. Riddle to the front, and he did his task so admirably that he elicited most of the applause of the evening. There were points where objection could be raised in the matter of concerted effort with the orchestral delineation, but they may have been wholly the result of the conductor's intentions.

The work of the orchestra in many places was remarkably good. Of course there was roughness here and there, and some ragged playing marred the beginnings, but not more than we are usually accustomed to, for unity of attack and exactness in the ensemble departed with Mr. Gericke. The chorus did its work passably well, and the solos, also, were adequate. If the chamois hunter who played his Alpine horn had been on the craggy heights of South Boston duetting with the bagpipes of the Mileian goat-tender, his tune would have been about as audible as it was coming from the "dense forest" of the ante-room in the Music Hall. The effort was entirely lost to most of the audience.

This attempt to be theatric died by its own hands, which was more than Manfred accomplished with his suicidal intentions. He was rescued, but the Alpine horn player disappeared from sight and sound. The house was crowded, whether because of the Riddle "fad" or to see how a chorus of a hundred or more could be seated upon a stage heretofore almost wholly occupied by the orchestra alone, or because of an interest in the "Manfred" music, is something that no man can find out. At the next concert Mrs. H. H. A. Beach will play the F minor concerto of Chopin, an event that will be looked forward to with interest. Beethoven No. 3 and Wagner's Faust overture will complete the programme.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

MUSICAL. Parade

The Symphony Concert.

The twelfth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall, last evening, opened with Schubert's Unfinished Symphony, the performance of which was admirable in interpretation and playing, save for some lapses in precision of attack in the second movement, and an occasional untunefulness in the brass wind. The rest of the programme was taken up with Schumann's music to Byron's "Manfred." Beyond the noble overture, the Entr'acte and the "Witch of the Alps" music there is little of interest in the score. It is a thrice-told tale to assert that Schumann had but little of the dramatic spirit. If proof were needed at this late date of his almost exceptional lack of such spirit, the melodramatic music of this work would furnish it in abundance. It rarely echoes the sentiments of language it is intended to emphasize, is monotonously dull and at times painfully wearisome. The vocal solos are weak and ineffective and the choruses labored and uninteresting. Why the work should have been given in its entirety surpasses understanding. It was finely read and played from beginning to end and the performances of overture and entr'acte were among the best work that the orchestra has done this season. The music, if it interested the vast audience, excited no enthusiasm, the applause it evoked being very slight. In fact, all of the applause was bestowed on Mr. George Riddle, who read the poem in a masterly manner, with a large and expressive dignity and a keenly intelligent appreciation of every shade of sentiment that the text suggests. Mr. Riddle has given no reading here in which the best qualities of his art and his skill as an exponent of it were more brilliantly displayed. His success was as thorough as it was deserved. The soloists were Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, Mrs. Julie L. Wyman, Mr. W. Heinrich, Mr. H. Meyn, Mr. Gardner S. Lamson, Mr. S. A. Sargent and Mr. Clarence E. Hay. They had but little to do. It was not exacting, and was satisfactorily done. The chorus of members of the Cecilia fulfilled their slight tasks in a wholly creditable manner. The programme for the next concert is: Wagner's "Faust" overture, Chopin's pianoforte concerto in F minor, and Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony. Mrs. H. H. A. Beach is to be the soloist.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the twelfth concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was—Schubert: Unfinished Symphony in B minor. Schumann: Music to Byron's "Manfred," Op. 115. Mr. George Riddle, Mr. Arthur Nikisch, Mrs. Julie L. Wyman, Mr. Wilhelm Heinrich, Mr. Heinrich Meyn, Mr. Gardner S. Lamson, Mr. Clarence E. Hay, Mr. Sullivan A. Sargent and a chorus of members of the Cecilia assisted.

Few things are pleasanter to the sincere music lover than to see a vast audience assembled for a really high and noble artistic purpose. Last Saturday evening the Music Hall was filled to overflowing by an audience that had come evidently to hear a worthy performance of a great work by Schumann; it was not attracted by the name of any world-famous performer, but by the programme itself. This was as it should be. And the reward was not wanting, for few concerts we can remember have been more noteworthy at once for splendor of subject-matter and triumphant performance.

The way in which the first movement of the Schubert Symphony was played can only be called superb. The playing did full justice to the romantic spirit of the music, without for a moment violating that classic symmetry and regularity of formal beauty which Schubert and the great composers of his day prized so highly. In the mere matter of tempo it was masterly; Mr. Nikisch's beat was ever sensitive to the emotional character of the phrase immediately in hand, now hurrying, now retarding a little, but ever and anon returning to the regular, typical rhythmic swing of the movement. Here was, in one sense, the ne plus ultra of musical performance: a sensitive, elastic, but, as a whole, regular tempo. And note especially what it was that made it fine: its variety, its occasional departures from metronomic exactness, never seemed premeditated, but actuated solely by a spontaneous, sensitive response to the immediate demands of the music; what did seem premeditated was its constant return to regularity, its adhering in the main to a definite plan. Of the second movement we care less to speak; not that the performance was less fine, for it was admirable, but that the movement itself is in every way inferior to the first.

The main business of the evening, however, was the "Manfred;" that was the magnum opus. Let us say, to begin with, that we were particularly glad to see no attempt made at anything like scenic effect in the arrangement of the singing forces. The solo-singers (spirits and apparitions) were simply drawn up in a line at the front of the stage on one side of Mr. Nikisch, while Mr. Riddle stood at his reader's desk, on the other. It has always been our opinion that, when a dramatic composition is given off the stage, as concert-music, it ought to be given purely, simply and strictly as concert-music: that no attempt should be made to appeal to the imagination, or assist the imagination, through the eye. Such an attempt is sure to be foiled by its necessary incompleteness. When a singer stands up in ordinary concert fashion, your attention is riveted upon what he is singing; but when he sings at the back of the stage, in order to give a suggestion of an apparition from the spirit world, singing from a distance, you are at once reminded of the very unspiritual aspect of his evening suit and white tie. A dramatic work, given as concert-music, must needs suffer some loss; let then this loss be compensated for by the better grouping of the singers for purely musical effect which belongs to the concert stage.

The wonderful overture to "Manfred" was wonderfully played; it was one of the finest performances that we have ever heard from our orchestra. It was a complete revelation of all the tragic depth and beauty of the music. The lovely Entr'acte, on the other hand, seemed to us to go a little heavily. The greatest thing in the whole work, however (always excepting the overture), is the melodrama music that accompanies Manfred's apostrophe to Astarte. We know of nothing in all music that attains to

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Twelfth Symphony Concert.

The programme of the twelfth concert of the Symphony orchestra included the "Unfinished Symphony" of Schubert and Schumann's "Manfred" music. In the production of the latter work Mr. George Riddle was the reader, the solo parts being taken by Mrs. Nikisch, Mrs. Wyman and Messrs. Heinrich, Meyn, Lamson, Sargent and Hay. The choruses were sung by members of the Cecilia Society.

The performance of the "Unfinished Symphony" was in some respects not an entirely objectionable one; that is to say, there was less coarseness and theatric affectation in the interpretation than might have occurred when we consider the standard that exists with the orchestra.

Still, however, the playing lacked the element of repose that is demanded in many of the phases of this beautiful creation of Schubert's, and never once was a sustained pianissimo realized. It does not seem to be a part of Mr. Nikisch's nature to conceive what sempré pianissimo means. If a phrase is marked pianissimo, and accidentally, or otherwise, it is begun so it is immediately changed to a sentimental exaggeration that is made to over-ride the rest of the score and entirely submerge important accompanying figures. If there is a swell indicated in a pianissimo passage it is distorted out of all reasonable proportion. As for repose, it is conspicuous by its absence in the efforts of Mr. Nikisch's band.

It must be from a rough musical nature that such deficiencies can proceed, one might naturally conclude, to say nothing of a doubtful, if not vulgar, taste, when it is observed in the rendering of the classics. The succeeding measures in sixteenths between the violins in the opening movement were played without unity of purpose, and the figure was soon lost in the exaggeration of the theme in the wood wind. The second movement fared little better than the first, the need of repose and a lesser volume of tone being constantly desired. We have had this delightful symphony played too many times in a faultless manner by the orchestra in days past, to sit by and accept this coarse substitute with approbation.

That it is the fault of the players does not follow, for we all recall the evening last season when Mr. Kniesel took the baton and at once, as if by magic, the delicacy and refinement that were always present under Gericke again appeared and a rendering of Beethoven's Second Symphony was given that the most critical could but applaud. It elicited "bravo" from the audience. Perhaps we ought to be thankful for the half loaf that is given us nowadays, but we shall have to get more hungry for second rate performances before we accept such playing without criticism.

That Schumann was not a dramatic composer need not be told at this late day. Hence it is that the performance of "Manfred" on Saturday evening was in many respects dull and wearisome. It served principally to bring Mr. Riddle to the front, and he did his task so admirably that he elicited most of the applause of the evening. There were points where objection could be raised in the matter of concerted effort with the orchestral delineation, but they may have been wholly the result of the conductor's intentions.

The work of the orchestra in many places was remarkably good. Of course there was roughness here and there, and some ragged playing marred the beginnings, but not more than we are usually accustomed to, for unity of attack and exactness in the ensemble departed with Mr. Gericke. The chorus did its work passably well, and the solos, also, were adequate. If the chamois hunter who played his Alpine horn had been on the craggy heights of South Boston duetting with the bagpipes of the Mile-dan goat-tender, his tune would have been about as audible as it was coming from the "dense forest" of the ante-room in the Music Hall. The effort was entirely lost to most of the audience.

This attempt to be theatric died by its own hands, which was more than Manfred accomplished with his suicidal intentions. He was rescued, but the Alpine horn player disappeared from sight and sound. The house was crowded, whether because of the Riddle "fad" or to see how a chorus of a hundred or more could be seated upon a stage heretofore almost wholly occupied by the orchestra alone, or because of an interest in the "Manfred" music, is something that no man can find out. At the next concert Mrs. H. H. A. Beach will play the F minor concerto of Chopin, an event that will be looked forward to with interest. Beethoven No. 3 and Wagner's Faust overture will complete the programme.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

MUSICAL. Gazette

The Symphony Concert.

The twelfth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall, last evening, opened with Schubert's Unfinished Symphony, the performance of which was admirable in interpretation and playing, save for some lapses in precision of attack in the second movement, and an occasional untunefulness in the brass wind. The rest of the programme was taken up with Schumann's music to Byron's "Manfred." Beyond the noble overture, the Entr'acte and the "Witch of the Alps" music there is little of interest in the score. It is a thrice-told tale to assert that Schumann had but little of the dramatic spirit. If proof were needed at this late date of his almost exceptional lack of such spirit, the melodramatic music of this work would furnish it in abundance. It rarely echoes the sentiments of language it is intended to emphasize, is monotonously dull and at times painfully wearisome. The vocal solos are weak and ineffective and the choruses labored and uninteresting. Why the work should have been given in its entirety surpasses understanding. It was finely read and played from beginning to end and the performances of overture and entr'acte were among the best work that the orchestra has done this season. The music, if it interested the vast audience, excited no enthusiasm, the applause it evoked being very slight. In fact, all of the applause was bestowed on Mr. George Riddle, who read the poem in a masterly manner, with a large and expressive dignity and a keenly intelligent appreciation of every shade of sentiment that the text suggests. Mr. Riddle has given no reading here in which the best qualities of his art and his skill as an exponent of it were more brilliantly displayed. His success was as thorough as it was deserved. The soloists were Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, Mrs. Julie L. Wyman, Mr. W. Heinrich, Mr. H. Meyn, Mr. Gardner S. Lamson, Mr. S. A. Sargent and Mr. Clarence E. Hay. They had but little to do. It was not exacting, and was satisfactorily done. The chorus of members of the Cecilia fulfilled their slight tasks in a wholly creditable manner. The programme for the next concert is: Wagner's "Faust" overture, Chopin's pianoforte concerto in F minor, and Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony. Mrs. H. H. A. Beach is to be the soloist.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the twelfth concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was—Schubert: Unfinished Symphony in B minor. Schumann: Music to Byron's "Manfred," Op. 115. Mr. George Riddle, Mr. Arthur Nikisch, Mrs. Julie L. Wyman, Mr. Wilhelm Heinrich, Mr. Heinrich Meyn, Mr. Gardner S. Lamson, Mr. Clarence E. Hay, Mr. Sullivan A. Sargent and a chorus of members of the Cecilia assisted.

Few things are pleasanter to the sincere music lover than to see a vast audience assembled for a really high and noble artistic purpose. Last Saturday evening the Music Hall was filled to overflowing by an audience that had come evidently to hear a worthy performance of a great work by Schumann; it was not attracted by the name of any world-famous performer, but by the programme itself. This was as it should be. And the reward was not wanting, for few concerts we can remember have been more noteworthy at once for splendor of subject-matter and triumphant performance.

The way in which the first movement of the Schubert Symphony was played can only be called superb. The playing did full justice to the romantic spirit of the music, without for a moment violating that classic symmetry and regularity of formal beauty which Schubert and the great composers of his day prized so highly. In the mere matter of tempo it was masterly; Mr. Nikisch's beat was ever sensitive to the emotional character of the phrase immediately in hand, now hurrying, now retarding a little, but ever and anon returning to the regular, typical rhythmic swing of the movement. Here was, in one sense, the ne plus ultra of musical performance: a sensitive, elastic, but, as a whole, regular tempo. And note especially what it was that made it fine: its variety, its occasional departures from metronomic exactness, never seemed premeditated, but actuated solely by a spontaneous, sensitive response to the immediate demands of the music; what did seem premeditated was its constant return to regularity, its adhering in the main to a definite plan. Of the second movement we care less to speak; not that the performance was less fine, for it was admirable, but that the movement itself is in every way inferior to the first.

The main business of the evening, however, was the "Manfred;" that was the magnum opus. Let us say, to begin with, that we were particularly glad to see no attempt made at anything like scenic effect in the arrangement of the singing forces. The solo-singers (spirits and apparitions) were simply drawn up in a line at the front of the stage on one side of Mr. Nikisch, while Mr. Riddle stood at his reader's desk, on the other. It has always been our opinion that, when a dramatic composition is given off the stage, as concert-music, it ought to be given purely, simply and strictly as concert-music: that no attempt should be made to appeal to the imagination, or assist the imagination, through the eye. Such an attempt is sure to be foiled by its necessary incompleteness. When a singer stands up in ordinary concert fashion, your attention is riveted upon what he is singing; but when he sings at the back of the stage, in order to give a suggestion of an apparition from the spirit world, singing from a distance, you are at once reminded of the very unspiritual aspect of his evening suit and white tie. A dramatic work, given as concert-music, must needs suffer some loss; let then this loss be compensated for by the better grouping of the singers for purely musical effect which belongs to the concert stage.

The wonderful overture to "Manfred" was wonderfully played; it was one of the finest performances that we have ever heard from our orchestra. It was a complete revelation of all the tragic depth and beauty of the music. The lovely Entr'acte, on the other hand, seemed to us to go a little heavily. The greatest thing in the whole work, however (always excepting the overture), is the melodrama music that accompanies Manfred's apostrophe to Astarte. We know of nothing in all music that attains to a higher poetic level, or gives greater poignancy of expression to such a depth of tragic emotion; it is almost too much to bear, but its finest artistic merit is that it never absolutely reaches the unbearable point. And how admirably Mr. Riddle read the passage! His reading throughout was excellent, but here he rose to a well nigh incomparable beauty of expressiveness. The solo-singers and chorus did grandly. There must have been many persons in the audience who felt, as they left the hall, that the concert was to be reckoned among the profoundest and most elevating artistic experiences of their lives.

106

The next programme (Jan. 23) is a Wagner, "Eine Faust-Ouverture;" Chopin, concerto No. 2, in F minor, op. 21; Beethoven, symphony No. 3, in E-flat ("Eroica"), op. 55. Mrs. H. H. A. Beach will be the pianist.

MUSIC. Courier

THE SYMPHONY.

The thousands of faithful attendants at the Symphony rehearsals and concerts were treated to a change at the twelfth in its series such as has not been their good (or ill) fortune to experience since that somewhat depressing performance of "Fidelio," which marked the close of last season. This time Schumann's "Manfred" was presented; and to put the audience into the right mood for listening to that tale of woe, Schubert's unfinished symphony was brought into play.

"Manfred," as a concert piece is on the whole, ineffective and disappointing; and it is probable that, produced on the modern stage, with all the scenic illusions that the stage mechanics of the day are enabled to create, it would be hardly less so. The reasons are obvious. One is that Byron's dramatic poem furnishes no basis for acting; indeed its author is on record as having boasted that, while setting no great store by the work, he at least had written something that could not be acted. A feeling of contempt that he at that time nourished for the theatre was engendered by the sometime previous failure of a play of his at Drury Lane. Another and far more important reason is that Schumann's music is not dramatic. Manfred's mournful soliloquies might become endurable if they were relieved by descriptive music, rich in harmonic effects and graphic in scoring. But, as it stands, there are few measures that act as a stimulus to the imagination; and, as for the vocal numbers, they are ill-designed to display the noblest qualities of the voice, or to arouse the dramatic instincts of the singer. It is to be doubted then, if the most enticing or awe-inspiring scenic display would serve to materially increase general interest in the work. As a concert piece, "Manfred" would reach the acme of its effectiveness in a hall about half as large as Music Hall. In such a place the voice of the reader would not be lost in space, and the delicate outlines of the musical setting would be fully apparent.

Schumann's music, if it is not dramatic, is for the most part beautiful and thoroughly Schumannesque. This is true of the overture, which, however, is less effective than the "Genoveva" overture; and the tender beauty of the entr'acte never fails to appeal strongly to the heart of the sensitive listener. The descriptive music throughout is also worthy of Schumann, that accompanying the appearance of the Witch, and Manfred's address being especially charming. The vocal portion is much less satisfying; for besides being essentially undramatic, it is lyrically unimpressive.

The performance as a whole was excellent. Mr. George Riddle read the text with his well known finish and breadth of style, keeping pace with the music with an ease that was at once artistic and admirable. Mrs. Nikisch, Mrs. Julie P. Wyman, Messrs. Heinrich and Meyn sang their short solos in an expressive manner, and Messrs. Meyn, Lamson, Sargent and Hay gave a smooth performance of the Incantation scene. The chorus, made up from the Cecilia, was also effective in its several numbers, the Requiem being delicately as well as broadly delivered. Little, if any, fault can be found with the work of the orchestra; on the contrary, both in the Schumann music and the symphony it was well up to the standard of this organization.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

Schumann's "Manfred" Music at the Symphony Concert.

Mme. Patti's Only Appearance in Boston—High Art and Concert Giving—Mme. Nordica's Farewell—The Heinrich Historical Vocal Concerts—News Notes, Comment and Gossip.

It is doubtless owing to the measure of indefiniteness inseparable from musical expression that composers of "the immortals" class have ever been so fond of intensifying with their works those efforts of literary genius that attempt to deal with the expression of the restless longings of the human soul through the medium of supernaturalism. It hardly seems accidental that two such natures as Byron and Schumann should have existed at the same epoch, and that the composer should have chosen the poet's "Manfred" for musical illustration.

By their union a work has been produced, composite in its make-up, and yet beautiful in its unity of effect; a work in which the tenderest and most recondite emotions of spirituality are so ethereally conveyed, that although it is classified as "dramatic," the relegation of all theatric aid to the imagination (that is, of course, the properly receptive imagination) only adds to its impressiveness and impalpable beauty. Beauty of a romantic cast, it is true, and so far removed from the clearness of outline dear to the classic muse, that the pen shrinks from attempting to imprison any adequate realization of it within the hard-set confines of words. A memory of the delights of Schumann's musical setting of "Manfred," which has twice before been produced in Boston—in 1884 and 1886—doubtless contributed largely to draw the immense audiences that assembled for the 12th concert this season of the Boston Symphony orchestra last evening, as well as the preceding rehearsal Friday afternoon, at both of which occasions the "Manfred" reading and music was the principal feature.

In its production were enlisted Mr. George Riddle, reader; vocal soloists, Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, Mrs. Julie L. Wyman, Mr. Wilhelm Heinrich, Mr. Heinrich Meyn, Mr. Gardner S. Lamson, Mr. Sullivan A. Sargent and Mr. Clarence E. Hay. The choral numbers were sung by a large contingent of the members of the Cecilia. It would hardly be possible for the superb training of the Symphony orchestra and the sympathetic, sensitive nature of Mr. Nikisch to manifest themselves to greater advantage than was done in their performance of the symphonic and melodramatic setting of this lyric in dramatic form. The overture and the entr'acte were played with a soulful perfection that mated well with the exquisite care and delicacy bestowed upon the passages designed to accentuate the reading of the poet's lines. Of the latter task Mr. Riddle acquitted himself most admirably, and his own intelligent conception and discriminating touch, seconded by a crystalline clearness of enunciation, carried along without apparent effort, were a delight to the hearer and an aid to his appreciation. If it is well to cull any particular example from so much general excellence, the palm must be given to the exquisite pathos with which Mr. Riddle spoke Manfred's despairing invocation to the phantom of Astarte, beginning with

34
107

—Speak to me!
For I have called on thee in the still night,
and the not less exquisite beauty of the melodrama, executed by the orchestra in a manner that heightened the sad intensity of the lines to the point of setting the eyes a-brimming. Marvellously fine, too, in both these respects, was Manfred's haughty allocation to the demon spirits, just before his death:

I do defy ye—though I feel my soul
Is ebbing from me, yet I do defy ye.

The vocal soloists contributed their share of the performance very competently, and the chorus manifested gratifying power and precision; it sang the requiem at the close of the poem with noble unity, typical of the exalted calm of a high once troubled spirit, that has at last found its rest.

Should it be held that a monotony of praise pervades this comment upon the "Manfred" performance of last evening—a performance that must remain notable even in the annals of Boston symphony productions—it will, perhaps, be granted also that in this cynical age it is at times harder to utter the truth when it is complimentary than when it is otherwise. It is a pity—let it be said in passing—that this consideration is not oftener present in the minds of those who for the petty satisfaction of saying something ostensibly "smart," treat flippantly the outcome of protracted and conscientious effort.

The performance of that lovely fragment—Schubert's unfinished symphony in B minor (No. 8)—with which last night's concert was begun, was in full accord with the melancholy charm that this tone-poem exhales; delicacy, sympathy and comprehension marked the execution of every passage. In one sense, the regret that this work was never completed is tempered by its bewitching charm as it is. And ambitious musicians had better let it alone. No sculptor has ever lived to conceive limbs the addition of which would not detract from the beauty of the armless marble goddess of the Grecian isle.

TWELFTH SYMPHONY.

Stoke
Schumann's Music to Byron's "Manfred" Finely Played.

Last evening's symphony concert, the twelfth of the series, was attended by a notably large audience who greatly enjoyed the best performance of Byron's "Manfred" that has ever been given here. The weirdly beautiful and appropriate music which Schumann has given Byron's a higher poetic level, or gives greater poignancy of expression to such a depth of tragic emotion; it is almost too much to bear, but its finest artistic merit is that it never absolutely reaches the unbearable point. And how admirably Mr. Riddle read the passage! His reading throughout was excellent, but here he rose to a well nigh incomparable beauty of expressiveness. The solo-singers and chorus did grandly. There must have been many persons in the audience who felt, as they left the hall, that the concert was to be reckoned among the profoundest and most elevating artistic experiences of their lives.

The next programme (Jan. 23) is a Wagner, "Eine Faust-Ouverture;" Chopin, concerto No. 2, in F minor, op. 21; Beethoven, symphony No. 3, in E-flat ("Eroica"), op. 55. Mrs. H. H. A. Beach will be the pianist.

MUSIC. Continued

THE SYMPHONY.

The thousands of faithful attendants at the Symphony rehearsals and concerts were treated to a change at the twelfth in its series such as has not been their good (or ill) fortune to experience since that somewhat depressing performance of "Fidelio," which marked the close of last season. This time Schumann's "Manfred" was presented; and to put the audience into the right mood for listening to that tale of woe, Schubert's unfinished symphony was brought into play.

"Manfred," as a concert piece is on the whole, ineffective and disappointing; and it is probable that, produced on the modern stage, with all the scenic illusions that the stage mechanics of the day are enabled to create, it would be hardly less so. The reasons are obvious. One is that Byron's dramatic poem furnishes no basis for acting; indeed its author is on record as having boasted that, while setting no great store by the work, he at least had written something that could not be acted. A feeling of contempt that he at that time nourished for the theatre was engendered by the sometime previous failure of a play of his at Drury Lane. Another and far more important reason is that Schumann's music is not dramatic. Manfred's mournful soliloquies might become endurable if they were relieved by descriptive music, rich in harmonic effects and graphic in scoring. But, as it stands, there are few measures that act as a stimulus to the imagination; and, as for the vocal numbers, they are ill-designed to display the noblest qualities of the voice, or to arouse the dramatic instincts of the singer. It is to be doubted then, if the most enticing or awe-inspiring scenic display would serve to materially increase general interest in the work. As a concert piece, "Manfred" would reach the acme of its effectiveness in a hall about half as large as Music Hall. In such a place the voice of the reader would not be lost in space, and the delicate outlines of the musical setting would be fully apparent.

Schumann's music, if it is not dramatic, is for the most part beautiful and thoroughly Schumannesque. This is true of the overture, which, however, is less effective than the "Genoveva" overture; and the tender beauty of the entr'acte never fails to appeal strongly to the heart of the sensitive listener. The descriptive music throughout is also worthy of Schumann, that accompanying the appearance of the Witch, and Manfred's address being especially charming. The vocal portion is much less satisfying; for besides being essentially undramatic, it is lyrically unimpressive.

The performance as a whole was excellent. Mr. George Riddle read the text with his well known finish and breadth of style, keeping pace with the music with an ease that was at once artistic and admirable. Mrs. Nikisch, Mrs. Julie P. Wyman, Messrs. Heinrich and Meyn sang their short solos in an expressive manner, and Messrs. Meyn, Lamson, Sargent and Hay gave a smooth performance of the Incantation scene. The chorus, made up from the Cecilia, was also effective in its several numbers, the Requiem being delicately as well as broadly delivered. Little, if any, fault can be found with the work of the orchestra; on the contrary, both in the Schumann music and the symphony it was well up to the standard of this organization.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

Schumann's "Manfred" Music at the Symphony Concert.

Mme. Patti's Only Appearance in Boston—High Art and Concert Giving—Mme. Nordica's Farewell—The Heinrich Historical Vocal Concerts—News Notes, Comment and Gossip.

It is doubtless owing to the measure of indefiniteness inseparable from musical expression that composers of "the immortals" class have ever been so fond of intensifying with their works those efforts of literary genius that attempt to deal with the expression of the restless longings of the human soul through the medium of supernaturalism. It hardly seems accidental that two such natures as Byron and Schumann should have existed at the same epoch, and that the composer should have chosen the poet's "Manfred" for musical illustration.

By their union a work has been produced, composite in its make-up, and yet beautiful in its unity of effect; a work in which the tenderest and most recondite emotions of spirituality are so ethereally conveyed, that although it is classified as "dramatic," the relegation of all theatric aid to the imagination (that is, of course, the properly receptive imagination) only adds to its impressiveness and impalpable beauty. Beauty of a romantic cast, it is true, and so far removed from the clearness of outline dear to the classic muse, that the pen shrinks from attempting to imprison any adequate realization of it within the hard-set confines of words. A memory of the delights of Schumann's musical setting of "Manfred," which has twice before been produced in Boston—in 1884 and 1886—doubtless contributed largely to draw the immense audiences that assembled for the 12th concert this season of the Boston Symphony orchestra last evening, as well as the preceding rehearsal Friday afternoon, at both of which occasions the "Manfred" reading and music was the principal feature.

In its production were enlisted Mr. George Riddle, reader; vocal soloists, Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, Mrs. Julie L. Wyman, Mr. Wilhelm Heinrich, Mr. Heinrich Meyn, Mr. Gardner S. Lamson, Mr. Sullivan A. Sargent and Mr. Clarence E. Hay. The choral numbers were sung by a large contingent of the members of the Cecilia. It would hardly be possible for the superb training of the Symphony orchestra and the sympathetic, sensitive nature of Mr. Nikisch to manifest themselves to greater advantage than was done in their performance of the symphonic and melodramatic setting of this lyric in dramatic form. The overture and the entr'acte were played with a soulful perfection that mated well with the exquisite care and delicacy bestowed upon the passages designed to accentuate the reading of the poet's lines. Of the latter task Mr. Riddle acquitted himself most admirably, and his own intelligent conception and discriminating touch, seconded by a crystalline clearness of enunciation, carried along without apparent effort, were a delight to the hearer and an aid to his appreciation. If it is well to cull any particular example from so much general excellence, the palm must be given to the exquisite pathos with which Mr. Riddle spoke Manfred's despairing invocation to the phantom of Astarte, beginning with

—Speak to me!
For I have called on thee in the still night,

and the not less exquisite beauty of the melodrama, executed by the orchestra in a manner that heightened the sad intensity of the lines to the point of setting the eyes a-brimming. Marvellously fine, too, in both these respects, was Manfred's haughty allusion to the demon spirits, just before his death:

I do defy ye—though I feel my soul
Is ebbing from me, yet I do defy ye.

The vocal soloists contributed their share of the performance very competently, and the chorus manifested gratifying power and precision; it sang the requiem at the close of the poem with noble unity, typical of the exalted calm of a high once troubled spirit, that has at last found its rest.

Should it be held that a monotony of praise pervades this comment upon the "Manfred" performance of last evening—a performance that must remain notable even in the annals of Boston symphony productions—it will, perhaps, be granted also that in this cynical age it is at times harder to utter the truth when it is complimentary than when it is otherwise. It is a pity—let it be said in passing—that this consideration is not often present in the minds of those who for the petty satisfaction of saying something ostensibly "smart," treat flippantly the outcome of protracted and conscientious effort.

The performance of that lovely fragment—Schubert's unfinished symphony in B minor (No. 8)—with which last night's concert was begun, was in full accord with the melancholy charm that this tone-poem exhales; delicacy, sympathy and comprehension marked the execution of every passage. In one sense, the regret that this work was never completed is tempered by its bewitching charm as it is. And ambitious musicians had better let it alone. No sculptor has ever lived to conceive limbs the addition of which would not detract from the beauty of the armless marble goddess of the Grecian isle.

TWELFTH SYMPHONY.

Schumann's Music to Byron's "Manfred" Finely Played.

Last evening's symphony concert, the twelfth of the series, was attended by a notably large audience who greatly enjoyed the best performance of Byron's "Manfred" that has ever been given here. The weirdly beautiful and appropriate music which Schumann has given Byron's exquisite poem received intelligent, expressive and sympathetic interpretation. Seldom has Mr. Nikisch's band been more satisfying. The overture was magnificently played, and particularly good was the orchestra's effect throughout the "third act."

163

Excellent support was contributed by a large and splendidly trained chorus from the Cecilia Society and the following soloists: Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, Mrs. Julie L. Wyman, Mr. Wilhelm Heinrich, Mr. Heinrich Meyn, Mr. Gardner S. Lamson, Mr. Sullivan A. Sargent, Mr. Clarence E. Hay.

Mr. George Riddle received cordial commendation for his intelligent reading of the text.

Schubert's unfinished symphony, that noble fragment of the great tone-maker's work, was played as the other offering of the evening and proved a genuine treat. Its performance is always welcome, and yesterday's presentation was more than commonly pleasing.

There will be no symphony concert next Saturday. On Jan. 23 the programme will be as follows: Wagner, a "Faust" overture; Chopin, concerto for pianoforte in F minor; Beethoven, symphony No. 3, "Eroica;" soloist, Mrs. H. H. A. Beach.

164
Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1891-92.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

XX. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, MARCH 26, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

BRAHMS.

TRAGIC OVERTURE.

GLUCK.

ARIA from "Orpheus."

GLUCK.

REIGEN SELIGER GEISTER UND FURIEN
TANZ, from "Orpheus."

SONGS with PIANO.

a) SCHUBERT.

"LIEBESBOTSCHAFT."

b) SCHUMANN.

"SCHOENE WIEGE MEINER LEIDEN."

c) SCHUBERT.

"ERLKOENIG."

BEETHOVEN.

SYMPHONY No. 8.

SOLOIST:

MME. AMALIE JOACHIM.

exquisite poem received intelligent, expressive and sympathetic interpretation. Seldom has Mr. Nikisch's band been more satisfying. The overture was magnificently played, and particularly good was the orchestra's effect throughout the "third act."

Excellent support was contributed by a large and splendidly trained chorus from the Cecilia Society and the following soloists: Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, Mrs. Julie L. Wyman, Mr. Wilhelm Heinrich, Mr. Heinrich Meyn, Mr. Gardner S. Lamson, Mr. Sullivan A. Sargent, Mr. Clarence E. Hay.

Mr. George Riddle received cordial commendation for his intelligent reading of the text.

Schubert's unfinished symphony, that noble fragment of the great tone-maker's work, was played as the other offering of the evening and proved a genuine treat. Its performance is always welcome, and yesterday's presentation was more than commonly pleasing.

There will be no symphony concert next Saturday. On Jan. 23 the programme will be as follows: Wagner, a "Faust" overture; Chopin, concerto for pianoforte in F minor; Beethoven, symphony No. 3, "Eroica;" soloist, Mrs. H. H. A. Beach.

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1891-92.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

XX. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, MARCH 26, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

BRAMMS.

TRAGIC OVERTURE.

GLUCK.

ARIA from "Orpheus."

GLUCK.

REIGEN SELIGER GEISTER UND FURIEN
TANZ, from "Orpheus."

SONGS with PIANO.

a) SCHUBERT.

"LIEBESBOTSCHAFT."

b) SCHUMANN.

"SCHOENE WIEGE MEINER LEIDEN."

c) SCHUBERT.

"ERLKROENIG."

BEETHOVEN.

SYMPHONY No. 3.

SOLOIST:

MME. AMALIE JOACHIM.

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1891-92.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

XIII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 23, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

WAGNER.

A FAUST OVERTURE.

CHOPIN.

CONCERTO for PIANOFORTE in F minor.
Allegro.—Adagio.—Rondo.

BEETHOVEN.

SYMPHONY No. 3. "Heroic."
Allegro con brio.—Adagio assai (Marcia funebre).—
Scherzo (Allegro vivace).—Finale.

SOLOIST:

MRS. H. H. A. BEACH.

The Piano used is a Steinway.

CAUSERIE.

The Symphony Concert of Saturday Evening.

Changes in the Meaning of the Word "Ballad."

Gossip Concerning Music and Musicians.

The programme of the thirteenth Symphony concert was as follows: Wagner's "Faust Overture," Chopin's Concerto for Pianoforte in F minor, and Beethoven's Symphony No. 3, the "Heroic." Mrs. H. H. A. Beach was the pianist. In 1840 Wagner had ready a "Faust" overture, which he sketched originally as a movement for a "Faust" symphony. Through the kindness of Schlesinger, the publisher, it was put in the hands of the Directors of the "Société des Concerts." We learn from a number of "La Gazette Musicale" of the same year that after the first and the only rehearsal the players looked at each other, perplexed, if not absolutely stupefied. They were the same players who had given a performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony that called forth the unqualified praise of Wagner. So the "Faust" overture was not heard in Paris until 1870, in its present form. And now in 1892 the question arises "What did Wagner mean?" For the hyper-moderns claim that the hearer must take into consideration the intentions of the composer as well as his actual performance. Viewed as purely absolute music, without any reference to "intentions," this overture is blatant, amorphous and dull. But let us examine the "intentions" of Wagner. This overture, it seems, should represent in music "the solitary Faust, longing, despairing, cursing. The feminine floats around him as an object of his longing, but not in its divine reality; and it is just this insufficient image of his longing which he destroys in his despair." This was Wagner's original idea, and when he rewrote the overture the idea was preserved without material change. The devout Wagnerite keeps this idea firmly in mind when he listens, and so finds enjoyment in the musical portrayal of "longing, despairing, cursing." But would he find these emotions and expressions of emotions in the music unless he were first prepared by the text? This is the old question, and the answer in each case must be an individual one. One hearer may agree with Mr. Hugo Bussmeyer, who once wrote a pamphlet of 40 pages to prove that the overture is a great work. Another may echo feelingly the remark of Hanslick, that the lines of the motto of the overture,

"Existence lies a load upon my breast; Life is a curse and death a longed-for rest," express faithfully the feelings of the unfortunate hearer.

Mrs. Beach was very warmly applauded for her performance of the Chopin concerto. This performance was distinguished by clearness, elegance and feminine refinement, rather than by breadth and passion. It was sane and free from sentimentalism. Her rubato was not always apparently spontaneous, and at times she robbed without giving back. Nor were the arabesques played with sufficient nonchalance. They were too precise, too exact, too carefully planned. But as a whole her performance was a very creditable one, although, as a pianist, she appears to greater advantage in a smaller hall and without the rivalry of the orchestra.

Mr. Nikisch showed in his version of Beethoven's "Heroic" symphony his most characteristic failing; the desire to produce an effect, even if the effect is directly opposed to the express wish of the composer. He is not alone. There are conductors in Europe and in America who look upon a composer's score as a medium merely of showing their own individuality. Rubinstein speaks of them in "A Conversation on Music," and as follows: "You spoke before of the best interpretation of the master works nowadays—I have my doubts of that—the interpreters of to-day (Director and Virtuoso) delight especially in a capricious interpretation of the classical works (for which Wagner and Liszt are most to blame)—change of tempo, holds, ritardandos, stringendos, crescendos and so on, not written by the composer." Take a very simple illustration. A theme of eight measures is given by the composer to the first violins. It is marked simply piano. A crescendo is indicated at the ninth measure. The simple beauty of the theme sung with pure tone does not satisfy Mr. Nikisch. With the second measure he begins a crescendo, so that when he reaches the ninth, instead of a mezzo-forte, or even a forte, there is very apt to be a fortissimo. Nervous unrest takes the place of serenity. The designed effect of the composer's crescendo is discounted at the very start. Or would any one Saturday evening have supposed from the performance of the "Funeral March" that Beethoven had written at the beginning of it sotto voce and pianissimo? But there is no need of multiplying instances. The new method of treating old works is admired by many. It shows the originality of the director; it makes the works themselves "more interesting."

A correspondent inquires concerning a distinction lately made in these columns between a song and a ballad. These words are used carelessly, and they are regarded by some as interchangeable. Now the song (musical) in its strict sense has been defined as "a more regular composition written with conscious art by men who have made music their study." The song then corresponds to the German Kunstlied. The ballad is "the spontaneous outcome of native inspiration, the wild indigenous fruit of a particular soil. Ballads are, then, allied closely to Volkslieder and Canti popolari." "The Bailiff's Daughter," "Barbara Allen," "The Willow" are well-known examples of the ballad. The ballad is foolishly and unjustly slighted or openly despised in these days, when the voice is too often used merely as an obligato to pianoforte or orchestra and deliberately robbed of the melody that should be its own. But this form of song shows the popular taste, feeling and life; many examples are of simple and irresistible beauty, and even the history of the word itself, with its changed meanings, is of lively interest and genuine value. Originally the words "ballad" and "ballet" were interchangeable. A ballad was a song intended as the accompaniment to a dance, or the tune to which the song was sung. For in olden days they danced to song, and if there were instruments, they only doubled the song in the octave of unison, or marked strongly the steps and accents. In some parts of France, as in Auvergne, the peasants dance the bourree while one of them sings loudly native airs. Morley in 1597 speaks of "another kind of ballets, formerly called fa-las, devised to be danced to voices." It is also "a sentimental or romantic composition of two or more verses, each of which is sung to the same melody, the musical accompaniment being strictly subordinated to the air." So, in 1568 the Bishop's Bible gave the title "The Ballet of Ballets or Solomon" to the Canticles. Pepys, a collector of ballads, or ballets, writes in his diary, 1664: "I occasioned much mirth by a ballet I brought with me made from the seamen at sea to their ladies in town." Before and during the reign of Elizabeth, day laborers and handicraftsmen sang as they worked, as sang "the spinners and the knitters in the sun." "Never trust a tailor that does not sing at his work," said Fletcher, "for his mind is of nothing but fitching." Even Tennyson's haughty Maud did not disdain "a passionate ballad, gallant and gay." The word was once of another sense: "A popular song celebrating or curiously attacking persons or institutions," and Fletcher of Saltoun had this meaning in mind when he wrote of "a very wise man that believed that if a man were permitted to make all the ballads, he need not care who should make the laws of a nation." In the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries a writer of scurrilous verses was called, therefore, a ballader. Or it was a proverbial saying usually in the form of a couplet. In an essentially modern sense, a ballad is "a simple spirited poem in short stanzas, in which some popular story is graphically narrated," and it is of this that Swinburne declares, "The highest form of ballad requires from a poet at once narrative power, lyrical and dramatic." An example that answers fully this definition is Buchanan's "Ballad of Judas Iscariot." In modern music this word is used loosely, as the title for choral works of large dimensions and with orchestral accompaniment, and even for purely instrumental compositions. This use of the word is, singularly enough, unnoticed by the Murray "English Dictionary."

Mr. H. E. Krehbiel, in his interesting article, "The Modern Orchestra," in Harper's Weekly of last week, speaks of the ignorance shown by literary men in their allusions to musical subjects, and he cites the following example:

"How did it come that Thackeray, who loved music, and knew that which was current in the concert-rooms, theatres, and drawing-rooms of his day, should credit Beethoven with having composed a 'Dream of St. Jerome,' which the King of Novelists says always soothed him and charmed him so that he fancied it was a poem of Tennyson's in music?"

The answer is simple. In Thackeray's day the "Dream of St. Jerome" or "Love of St. Jerome," for the two titles were in use, was frequently heard in drawing rooms. An andante written by Beethoven for the pianoforte—it was from op. 26, if I am not mistaken—was arranged or disarranged as a vocal composition; the words of Thomas Moore, "And who is the maid," were set to this arrangement; and it was known as "Saint Jerome's Love." This arrangement may be found to-day in a volume of "Sacred Songs," edited by John Hiles. As the arrangement, even without the words, is tuneful, no doubt Thackeray often heard it in houses frequented by him, and it no doubt soothed him. Of all such literary offenders, however, "Quida" is the most remarkable. In one novel her hero spends hours at the organ "playing the grand old masses of Mendelssohn." In "Moths" the tenor is "never weary of singing exquisite 'airs of Palestrina,'" and here are only two of many instances. Marion Crawford, by the way, made a singular blunder in "A Roman Singer," by unjustly crediting a well-known composer with the authorship of an equally well-known opera. But who in these days of nervous haste is safe in throwing stones against the glass house of a neighbor?

Dugan D'Albert, the famous pianist, will come to us with the winds of March. He will play with the Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall March 11 and 12. His new wife, the fascinating Theresa Carreno, will not cross the ocean with him. Carreno has had an assortment of musical husbands. There was Emile Sawret, the celebrated violinist, who now lives in London, where he is happily married and greatly esteemed. It is said that when Carreno was asked why she was divorced from him she replied: "Oh, I have learned everything he could teach me in my profession." Then there was Tagliapietra, the baritone, who was formerly afflicted with the acute mania of singing "Palm Branches" on all occasions, sacred and profane. Possibly she became too familiar with the tune; at any rate, she left him, and he is now in an operatic company in New York. What this woman of superb beauty can see in D'Albert baffles conjecture. To be sure, he is a great pianist; but his temperament verges upon temper. Vexed by an unfavorable criticism in an English journal, he renounced his birthright and became a German citizen. It will be remembered that he was first brought to this country by a firm of pianoforte makers, and he played with gusto upon their instruments. Trouble arose. Just before his return home he examined the pianofortes of a rival house, and the scales fell from his eyes, as well as from his fingers. He left behind him a glowing eulogy of the newly discovered treasure and an instance of sudden conversion—an instance only equaled by the celebrated case of Saul of Tarsus. Nor is D'Albert without matrimonial experience.

The concerts of this month have been few in number, but the thoughtful and experienced observer was not deceived by the comparative quiet that reigned in the musical world. He knew full well that pianists were practicing day and night, soaking their wrists and hands in hot water and indulging in light gymnastics. He knew that singers were examining carefully their respective methods and visiting throat doctors. He knew the treachery of this peace, the ominous lull that precedes the hurricane. And, lo, the storm breaks to-day, and it will rage until Sunday next. Within six days there will be nightly performances of comic opera; two orchestral concerts and a public orchestral rehearsal; two chamber concerts; two song recitals and two pianoforte recitals; an operatic concert, and two concerts by the Cecilia. Add to these the open-air entertainments given by hand organs, German bands, negro singers and lonely fiddlers, and it will be seen that we are in nearly as wretched a plight as the people of London in 1764—that is, if Ange Goudar's account of the society of that time can be believed. He, poor man, was harassed by music at every corner. He could not walk in a public garden without involuntarily keeping step to the tones of a violin. "In one of these gardens they drink tea in strict time and in another they sup to the conductor's beat. But these symphonic repasts have their inconveniences. Many people here complain that they do not sleep well, because their supper has thus been hurried. Now, I am afraid of indigestion, and when I eat a chicken in the evening at Vauxhall I choose always the moment of an andante." We are not original even in our amusements. In 1722 the poet Gay wrote Dean Swift from London as follows: "As for the reigning amusement of the town, it is entirely music; real fiddles, bass viols and hautboys; not poetical harps, lyres and reeds. Everybody is grown now as great a judge of music as they were in your time of poetry; and folks that could not distinguish one tune from another now daily dispute about the different styles of Handel, Bononcini and Attilio. People have now forgotten Homer, and Virgil, and Caesar; or, at least, they have lost their ranks. For in London and Westminster, in all polite conversations, Senesino is daily voted to be the greatest man that ever lived." Change the names of the composers to Wagner, Brannma or any modern; substitute Paderewski or De Pachmann for the once famous Senesino, and Gay's letter might be sent from Boston in the present year of our Lord.

PHILIP HALE.

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the thirteenth concert was as follows:

Wagner: "Eine Faust-Ouverture."

Chopin: Concerto No. 2, in F minor, Op. 21.

Beethoven: Symphony No. 3, in E-flat ("Eroica"), Op. 55.

Mrs. H. H. A. Beach was the pianist.

Wagner's "Eine Faust-Ouverture," written during his unhappy first Paris period as the first movement of a "Faust" symphony, and afterwards entirely re-written in Zürich, holds its own wonderfully well—indeed, it does rather more than this, it seems to ripen and grow finer with age, like sound wine. Time was when a certain lack of control over musical form was painfully apparent in the work, and the second theme seemed all too vague. But, with repeated hearing, has come better understanding. Perhaps, also, we now involuntarily and half consciously compare it in our mind with much of the more recent music that we hear nowadays, and the comparison shows it to us as very strong and coherent indeed. Certainly we can now recognize the second half of the Allegro as one of the finest bits of purely orchestral writing that ever came from Wagner's pen; it has more of the truly symphonic spirit in it than anything else he ever did, saving the corresponding part of the Prelude to the "Meistersinger." The performance last Saturday evening was really superb; the poetic essence and intent of the music were thrown into due relief, while every element that could make for musical coherence and clearness of outline was made the most of.

The first movement of the "Eroica" was grandly played: with clearness, vigor of accent, and just the right Beethovenish intensity of passion. The change of mood, too, from the stormy, tragic character of the main body of the movement to the radiant, Hellenic serenity of the Coda was admirably reflected in the performance. It was like turning from some mighty tragedy of Sophocles in the theatre of Dionysus, and looking out over the sun-steeped glory of the Attic landscape. In the Funeral March we found only one thing whereat to take exception: why, oh! why will Mr. Nikisch, when a passage in the wind instruments is answered by the strings, suddenly take the tempo of the response half as slow again as before? Is it for greater solemnity of impression? If so, we think it fails to gain its end; this outburst of merely human pathos seems weak and trivial in comparison with the superhuman solemnity of what has just gone before. Apart from this, the movement was admirably played; Mr. Sautet is especially to be praised for his playing of the first theme. The Scherzo was taken at the brisk tempo in which we used to hear it years ago, and we must own that we have grown to liking it to go a little more moderately. We have nothing to urge against the slight overblowing of the horns in the Trio. It may be a little contrary to the (perhaps rather finicking) modern notions about horn playing, but it is quite in accordance with German tradition, and produces a fresh, breezy effect wholly consonant with the woodland associations of the instrument. A French conductor would be horrified at it; but there is no need of playing German music with a French accent. The Finale was splendidly given.

Mrs. Beach played the Chopin concerto very beautifully indeed, notably the first two movements. In purity and sincerity of feeling, beauty of tone, grace and elegance of phrasing, clearness and coherence, her performance left nothing to be desired. It showed fine fibre and artistic perception throughout. Not that it was great playing, for the music is capable of having a greater quantity of being thrown into it, and there is much in it that can be invested with more resplendent brilliancy. But it was superlatively good and artistic playing, fully adequate technically, and with the emotional and intellectual elements well balanced. The only point that seems to us fairly open to criticism is that, in the first movement, Mrs. Beach gave evidence of sharing one error with most players of her sex—and with not a few of the others, too, if the whole truth be told—that is, of considering pathos of expression as inseparable from a slow tempo. Reason about the matter as you will, you cannot escape the fact that this first movement is an Allegro, and that no pathetic possibilities that may be discovered in its first, and principal, theme can warrant a style of playing this theme—especially in its first announcement—that tends to efface its allegro character. But, with this exception, we can speak of Mrs. Beach's playing with hearty admiration.

The next programme is: Spohr, symphony No. 3, in C minor, op. 78; Bruch, violin concerto No. 1, in G minor; Chadwick, pastoral prelude; Dvorák, three Slavonic dances. Mr. T. Adamowski will be the violinist.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Thirteenth Symphony Concert.

The programme opened with Wagner's "A Faust Overture." Upon its merits and demerits as a musical composition it is unnecessary to comment at length, for according as one regards the music of this great innovator of the present century will he be influenced in rating its value. Rubinstein classes it with the "Lohengrin" and "Meistersingers" as the best of Wagner's compositions. Von Bulow declared that "the introduction is not surpassed by any other instrumental work of the kind." Critical judgment ranges from this point to that where it is termed "an incongruous mess," "groping, foggy, and artificial," "vulgar and blatant," "devoid of one salient musical idea, one purely musical conception." It certainly is original and full of orchestral combinations that are brilliant and startling, exhibiting the rare skill of the composer. At the same time in places it gropes, is devoid of musical form, and is little less than mere cacophony.

Of the playing on this occasion it can be said that the strings were almost perfect, and had the wood-wind, which has much to do in conjunction with the strings, been equally successful, the performance would have been a fine one. But there is no longer any delicacy or repose in the wind departments of the orchestra since it fell under the present conductor's hand. Coarseness and blatancy are the dominant traits that distinguish this part of Nikisch's band. The very ending of the overture that in the wind should be barely breathed forth was tooted out almost as if it was a fanfare. What a difference from the days when Gericke had his iron grip on the orchestra and enforced delicacy and repose in every department where it was demanded and crushed every effort of grossness and vulgarity that showed itself, where now it seems to revel in all its ugliness!

This coarseness and blatancy is now so much the habit of the orchestra, where it formerly was unknown under Nikisch's predecessor, that what can one believe but that it is the taste of the present conductor that demands it? It is like the Irishman when given a glass of old whiskey, smooth as oil, and asked how he liked it, replied that he "liked Mother Murphy's down on Fedderal street better, because it burned all the way down." It is Mother Murphy's whiskey that we get from the wind departments of the orchestra about all the time nowadays, with a dose of cayenne pepper added when the drummer joins with his fiendish pounding.

The second number on the programme was Chopin's F minor Concerto, with Mrs. H. H. A. Beach as soloist. It seems as if it was an unfortunate selection upon the part of Mrs. Beach to play Chopin when we consider what surpassing models De Pachmann and Paderewski have given us of late. Mrs. Beach is a pianist of innate refinement and ample technique, and has done much in our concert halls that has called forth high praise. There was wanting, however, in her playing of this concerto a certain brilliancy and sentiment when observed that makes the works of Chopin so fascinating. There was less of the passionate element also than has been evident in her former appearances. The true artist, however, was ever present in her playing, and she was recalled in acknowledgment of her efforts.

The concert ended with the Eroica Symphony of Beethoven. Here again the work of the strings was superb, while the wind instruments again, as in the Wagner piece, served to destroy the effect. The trumpets were particularly offensive. In justice to Mr. Muller, the regular first trumpet player, it must be noted that he was absent from his place, the second trumpet supplying it. A bad feature of the slow movement was the false pitch of the drums. The timpani are in C and G, but the player tuned the C drum to almost C sharp, and as the movement is in C minor, it made a bad fundamental to pound C sharp instead of C natural. It was particularly bad when heard in unison with the contrabasses in the softer passages.

This is not an isolated case either, for it happens often that this drummer fails to tune his instrument to the correct pitch. Sometimes both drums are out of tune. It may seem hypercritical to mention this, but if bad intonation is to be tolerated where will it stop? It is but one evidence of many that indicate the degraded state of the orchestra since Gericke left it. To the credit of the former drummer, Mr. Simpson, it can be said that he could tune his drums correctly and then use them discreetly and artistically. Anton Rubenstein recognized the importance of the timpani to the extent that when he conducted his Ocean Symphony here in 1873, he personally thanked Mr. Henry Greene, then the timpani player of the orchestra, for the artistic manner in which he played his part and for the correct pitch of his instruments, telling him he had no rival in Europe.

He certainly has not in the present importation that rules the whirlwind in his corner of the orchestra. Mr. Greene is now one of the leading contrabass players in the orchestra. Mr. Nikisch of course applied the modern touch to the expression of the symphony, distorting phrases that should remain in repose and exaggerating forte to fortissimo, and double fortissimo even. What a craving for noise some human individuals possess!

Mr. Adamowski will be the soloist at the next concert, playing Max Bruch's Concerto in G minor, and "A Pastoral Prelude," by Chadwick, will be offered as a novelty.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Symphony Concert.

The concert of Saturday was heroic both in its beginning and end, for as Beethoven's "Heroic" symphony gives the character of a masculine warrior, Wagner's "Faust" overture portrays an equally masculine and virile philosopher; both works are examples of musical hero-worship, although cast in such different moulds. That Wagner was very much in earnest about this overture is sufficiently proven by his rescoring it in Zurich in 1855, 15 years after its composition in Paris. One can imagine its rather gloomy character to have sprung from the semi-starvation of the composer in the French capital. In the reaction from writing operatic transcriptions, cornet solos, etc., the pendulum seems to have swung too far in the direction of the abstruse, the mystical and the gloomy. The dark key-note is sounded even in the very first measures, where the sombre bass-tuba is added to the contrabasses. The performance of the work was a good one, although the demon of exaggeration seized upon one chord and a kettledrum note, which are marked in the score with a simple "f," but which became "sfz" in the interpretation.

Mrs. H. H. A. Beach was the soloist of the concert, and appeared in Chopin's F minor concerto. The public has recently had so much of Chopin, interpreted by such giants (in this school) as Paderewski and De Pachmann, that it was very bold, to say the least, for our Boston artist to make choice of such a work. Nevertheless the task was carried through with clearness and ability. One might have demanded more of passion and abandon, but eliminating these requirements, every movement was conscientiously and intelligently rendered. The first movement was rather square cut, and even the rubato effects of the second were made in cold blood, but the finale was the best part of the work, and was given with much grace and was well shaded. Much applause and a monster floral tribute followed. Mrs. Beach only appears in public for charitable purposes, and proves the old saying that "charity covereth a multitude of sins" untrue by the excellence of much of her work.

Beethoven's "Heroic" symphony began excellently; it is long since the orchestra has played with such steadiness and unity as were displayed in the first movement, and Mr. Nikisch seemed thoroughly en rapport with the subject, so that the performance equalled any ever given in Boston. The second movement was inferior, for not only was the orchestra often behind the conductor's beat, but certain ritenuto effects were introduced that never were authorized by Beethoven. At least one can compliment the performance of the movement in its avoiding the error of extreme slowness; many conductors sin in this respect; they should remember Coleridge's remark that the movement is "a funeral march in purple," that it is not pathos so much as brooding that is pictured, that it is Beethoven burying his hopes of freedom and of Napoleon, and not a feminine tearfulness that forms a chief part of the picture. It was noticeable that the important oboe theme was given in accordance with this view. M. Sautet is a great artist, but the Parisian taste often drives French oboe players to seek a thin, nasal and pathetic tone rather than the broader style that is cultivated in Germany; but in this march the oboe was more broadly played than for a long time past, and the result was most praiseworthy; Beethoven here pictured feminine grief, not a Mrs. Gummidge, but something akin to what Tennyson meant in "Home they brought her warrior dead."

The pauses, the orchestral sobs and sighs that close the movement were splendidly given. The scherzo was taken at an appropriately rapid pace, which was well sustained by the orchestra. It is really the first scherzo in musical history, for the scherzo of the second symphony, with which the composer replaced the minuet, was more of a minuet than the movement which bore that name in the first symphony. Here all trace of dance effect is gone and the chatter of the world, forgetting its hero and all his deeds, is predominant. Yet the trio, with its revelations of horn playing (it contains the most difficult and effective horn passages that had up to that time been written) is heroic and romantic too. If only our horn players could achieve a romantic and mellow tone! They play as if they had trombones to deal with! There was exquisite flute and oboe work done in the variations that close the work, and just here one cannot help wishing that the composer had used trombones too, as he did in the finale of the fifth symphony (the first time those instruments were admitted into symphony) for the whole movement is not so heroic as that later finale. The capricious tempo was finely given, and the symphony must be numbered with the successes of the season. LOUIS C. ELSON.

THIRTEENTH CONCERT.

The programme of the Symphony concert in Music hall, Saturday evening, Jan. 23, was:

Wagner.	A Faust Overture.
Chopin.	Concerto for Pianoforte in F minor.
	Allegro.—Adagio.—Rondo.
Beethoven.	Symphony No. 3. "Heroic."
	Allegro con brio.—Adagio assai (Marcia funebre).—Scherzo (Allegro vivace).—Finale.
	Soloist: Mrs. H. H. A. Beach.

The overture of Faust in solitude was first performed at Dresden in 1844. It seems the music did not please Wagner, who, after hearing suggestions from Liszt, whom Wagner always sought for advice, the overture was rewritten in 1855. Like most works from great composers, it was founded on a poem; that is, the poem suggested and inspired the music, though the music does not pretend to picture Faust or Gretchen. The overture commenced in very subdued tones from the brass, but soon got away from its confinement, making its usual noisy demonstration. The performance as a whole was unsatisfactory; at times very good, at others, rough in quality, disjointed in rhythm. The reading of the score was decidedly romantic, especially when the drum came in, in the wrong place, which was of course an accident.

Everybody musical takes an interest in Mrs. Beach, because she is musical, modest, finely educated, and a Boston woman. She has on former occasions done exceptionally fine work, and did at this concert; but she proved inadequate to the difficulties she put before herself. This concerto of Chopin's bristles with difficulties, technical and artistic, requiring more of both than Mrs. Beach at present possesses. While Mrs. Beach played correctly all the notes, and in some instances showed good perception of the music, her rendition failed to bring out or produce that noble, refined sentiment required and demanded. A smaller hall would make Mrs. Beach shine in far more brilliant, artistic colors as a pianist.

The great Heroic symphony has been many times heard in Boston Music hall; sometimes with satisfaction, at others, with more or less displeasure. Hardly two conductors give us the same interpretative reading, and so it has come to pass that the true traditional reading has become one of the lost arts. From this cause, it will be seen that any exceptions taken to Mr. Nikisch's reading would be entirely superfluous. The first movement is of great power, bringing all the emotional feelings into constant play. The orchestra was not at its best. The funeral march was in parts beautifully expressed, but as a whole was slow and draggy. The third movement with its bright, quick sparkle was finely played, the strings excelling in soft, fine, precise quality of tone, such as is seldom heard in this orchestra in latter days. It was keenly relished by not a few of the croakers. The last movement received about the usual, careful treatment it generally receives. The concert as a whole was not so enjoyable as the previous one.

JAMES M. TRACY.

Ah!

The Musical Courier, of New York, expresses its disapproval of our recent comments on Wagner's dreary "Faust" overture, by pronouncing them "downright purblind criticism, or rather want of it," whatever that may mean. Our censor evidently lost his head, and with it, his command over lucid ideas and lucid English, in his horror at our criminal distaste for this overture, which he calls a "noble torso," expressing at the same time an undying regret that it should have remained uncompleted. But a torso, noble or otherwise, is a statue that has been completed, and deprived of its head and limbs. That our censor should have been thrown into a mental muddle is excusable when it is considered that he is suffering under an attack of that most distressing and most brain-fuddling of afflictions, Wagnermania. There is something deeply touching in that mental strabismus which caused the Courier man first to condemn our criticism as purblind and then to condemn it for its want of purblindness. Of course, we understand that he objects to our remarks anent the overture; but it is dreadful to reflect that the state of mind into which he was thrown by them prevented him from expressing himself intelligently; caused him, as it were, to foam at the mouth; caused him in fact, to become as obscure as to meaning, as is the overture to whose defence he rushes. His reproof of us winds up:

MUSICAL.

The Symphony Concert.

The concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall, last evening, opened with Wagner's inscrutable "Faust" overture. That ever-reliable incentive to acute melancholia has long been before a world more or less interested in discovering its meaning, but its mystery remains as elusive as ever. Some ingenious but perversely imaginative people have, from time to time, plunged into its dark profound and returned panting to the surface with what they deemed an interpretation of its meaning, but they have not succeeded in making followers and have left the world as vague and as comfortless on the subject as it was before. As music this overture has the same frolicsome flexibility and the same winsome cheerfulness that are such pleasing qualities in abstruse problems in conic equations. As a tone poem it is lacking in that plainness of purpose and lucidity of treatment that characterize the equally cacophonous and no less fervid overtures that are poured forth in the silence of night under the moon, in broad catacoustics and simple but effective polyphony by wooing feltness ignorant of any music but that of nature. We fear that the solution of this ugly musical problem must be delayed until those other problems, perpetual motion and squaring the circle, are solved. Whether this be so or not, the overture is as depressingly dreary, as drearily dry and as dryly disheartening on a twentieth hearing as it was on a first. It was read and played with much dramatic intensity of feeling, but whether it was read rightly or wrongly it is not easy to say; and after all it does not seem to matter much, for it resembles those picture aberrations of the famous Turner, that were so confused that it made no difference whether they were hung upside down, or not. It was followed by Chopin's Concerto in F-minor, the solo part of which was played by Mrs. H. H. A. Beach. We have been so surfeited on Chopin of late by such unapproachable Chopin interpreters as de Pachmann and Paderewski, that it is to be regretted Mrs. Beach did not select a work from some other composer, to say nothing of the exciting of comparisons, which, in the very nature of things, became inevitable. Her performance, however, may be warmly praised for its grace, its neat and delicate technique and its fluent ease. In style it was, perhaps, somewhat finical and wanting in breath and passion; but the effort, as a whole, was abundant in pleasing interest and was fairly entitled to the vigorous applause and the recalls that rewarded the artist. The concert ended with Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony. The reading accorded the work, did not, on the whole, depart widely from the conventional one. There were some liberties, of a sugary sentimental description, taken with the tempi here and there, and one or two new and obtrusively unnecessary rallentandos were made in the funeral march and an occasional neglect of some of the more significant nuances indicated by the composer; but taken altogether the interpretation was spirited and fairly interesting. The playing of the orchestra was admirable throughout. The soloist at the next concert is to be Mr. T. Adamowski. The novelty of the programme will be a symphony by Spohr, not before heard at these concerts.

"Funny world, funnier people, funniest of all, some music critics!" This is perhaps cutting as a summing up of its writer's sad estimate of human existence in relation to Wagnerism; but he should have added to the "funniest of all" list, some "critics of music critics," because he is deliciously funny. However, we cannot be angry with him; on the contrary we tender him our sincerest sympathies in his hour of unfortunate suffering under Wagner rables; and wish him a speedy restoration to health and common sense.

SYMPHONY ECHOES.

Mrs. Beach Makes a Favorable Impression as the Piano Soloist.

Music Hall was crowded last night with the usual attentive audience, who came to listen to an attractive programme, which included selections from Wagner, Chopin and Beethoven.

It is seldom that the Symphony orchestra has better opportunities for effective playing than was afforded by Wagner's "Faust's Overture." The theme, which is replete with passionate sentiment and dramatic feeling, was interpreted by Nikisch with wonderful vigor, and the cadence was executed by the orchestra with beautiful effect and vivacity.

The stormy discontent, the indefinite longings, and the bitter complaints and curses of Faust found grand expression in the harmonious altos and the sudden dropping into pathetic tremors—while the effect of distant tones and sudden modulation of notes, introduced here and there, added a poetic suggestiveness to the whole which was cordially appreciated by the audience.

Chopin's concerto for pianoforte in F minor, the orchestration of which was arranged by the composer himself, was played by Mrs. Beach, the soloist of the evening.

Mrs. Beach's playing was very skilful, and at times was marked by rare sentiment and delicacy. She displayed almost remarkable talent in her interpretation of the second movement in the concerto, and though there was nothing original in her interpretation she gave full expression to the wonderful and fantastic beauties with which it is pregnant.

The orchestra accompaniments, though cold and weak at first, improved wonderfully in the last movement, and the quick, vivacious, almost sportive tempo with which it concluded, produced a very agreeable impression.

Mr. Nikisch's admirable reading of Beethoven's third symphony arrested the attention of the audience, who sat through, listening to the four movements with almost spellbound watchfulness.

The bold, vigorous movement, swelling gradually to a grand diapason and suddenly dropping to a series of heroic staccati, the dramatic climaxes in the adagio, afforded a sublime contrast to the mournful strains, the solemn chords and the pathetic, almost heart-rending notes which pervaded the second movement.

The sighing sorrow, the impotent despair gradually changing to triumphant hope, and the struggling, quivering feeling with which the movement was pregnant, were beautifully expressed by the orchestra, who displayed their powers to excellent advantage, which were thoroughly appreciated by the audience.

Mr. T. Adamowski will be the soloist at this week's concert, and the programme will be as follows:

Symphony No. 3, in C minor.....Spohr
(First time at these concerts.)
Concerto for violin, in G minor.....Bruch
A pastoral prelude.....Chadwick
(First time.)
Three Slavonic dances.....Dvorak

Xaver Reiter, once first horn player of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has recently made a success with the Detroit Symphony Orchestra.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

At last evening's Symphony concert in Music Hall, Mr. Arthur Nikisch conductor, the soloist was Mrs. H. H. A. Beach, and the programme included Wagner's "Faust" overture, the F minor piano concerto by Chopin and Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony.

The "Faust" overture has but rarely had so good a performance as that given by Mr. Nikisch on this occasion, and the beauty of the tone pictures was made delightfully clear throughout the composition. The merits of the work of the orchestra in this number of the programme were quickly and enthusiastically appreciated by the audience.

Mrs. Beach was not altogether wise in putting herself before such an audience in so large an auditorium in Chopin's familiar concerto. She is a very gifted player, a musician of excellent parts, and an artist who shows in her limited appearances in concert work a distinct devotion to her chosen field of effort. Her playing is always strictly correct, intelligent and painstaking, but when she enters into the performance of such a work as the Chopin concerto of the evening, her limitations are made very apparent. The emotional characteristics of Chopin's compositions may be too strongly developed in the playing of Paderewsky and De Pachmann, but Mrs. Beach, in last evening's performance failed to give this element in the concerto the desired prominence, and for this reason the lovely adagio was but little appreciated. The brilliant rondo also makes demands upon a player which Mrs. Beach is evidently unequal to at present, yet all her work was characterized by so much earnestness, and was so free from ostentation, that she was heartily commended by the applause of the audience as she ended her playing, and had an additional complimentary recall after she had retired from the stage.

In his reading of the No. 3 Beethoven symphony, the "Eroica," Mr. Nikisch merited and received the highest praise, the beauties of the several movements standing out in bold relief in the performance of the work.

Mr. T. Adamowski, violinist, is the soloist next Saturday evening, and the programme will include: Spohr's symphony No. 3 in C minor, Max Bruch's concerto for violin in G minor, George W. Chadwick's "A Pastoral Prelude" and three Slavonic dances by Dvorak.

SYMPHONY CONCERT. Post

The programme of the concert given in Music Hall Saturday night by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was of unusual interest to Boston people, as it was closely connected with a lady who ranks high both as musician and composer. The appearance of Mrs. H. H. A. Beach as a soloist has been pleasantly anticipated, and no composition better calculated to bring out the ability of a pianist could have been chosen than the second number on the programme. Chopin's concerto in F minor, op. 21, is in three movements, and dates from the year 1829, when Chopin had barely reached manhood. It was composed while he was living in Warsaw, and was first played at a ly romantic, especially when the drum came in, in the wrong place, which was of course an accident.

Everybody musical takes an interest in Mrs. Beach, because she is musical, modest, finely educated, and a Boston woman. She has on former occasions done exceptionally fine work, and did at this concert; but she proved inadequate to the difficulties she put before herself. This concerto of Chopin's bristles with difficulties, technical and artistic, requiring more of both than Mrs. Beach at present possesses. While Mrs. Beach played correctly all the notes, and in some instances showed good perception of the music, her rendition failed to bring out or produce that noble, refined sentiment required and demanded. A smaller hall would make Mrs. Beach shine in far more brilliant, artistic colors as a pianist.

The great Heroic symphony has been many times heard in Boston Music hall; sometimes with satisfaction, at others, with more or less displeasure. Hardly two conductors give us the same interpretative reading, and so it has come to pass that the true traditional reading has become one of the lost arts. From this cause, it will be seen that any exceptions taken to Mr. Nikisch's reading would be entirely superfluous. The first movement is of great power, bringing all the emotional feelings into constant play. The orchestra was not at its best. The funeral march was in parts beautifully expressed, but as a whole was slow and draggy. The third movement with its bright, quick sparkle was finely played, the strings excelling in soft, fine, precise quality of tone, such as is seldom heard in this orchestra in latter days. It was keenly relished by not a few of the croakers. The last movement received about the usual, careful treatment it generally receives. The concert as a whole was not so enjoyable as the previous one.

JAMES M. TRACY.

Ah!

The Musical Courier, of New York, expresses its disapproval of our recent comments on Wagner's dreary "Faust" overture, by pronouncing them "downright purblind criticism, or rather want of it," whatever that may mean. Our censor evidently lost his head, and with it, his command over lucid ideas and lucid English, in his horror at our criminal distaste for this overture, which he calls a "noble torso," expressing at the same time an undying regret that it should have remained uncompleted. But a torso, noble or otherwise, is a statue that has been completed and deprived of its head and limbs. That our censor should have been thrown into a mental muddle is excusable when it is considered that he is suffering under an attack of that most distressing and most brain-fuddling of afflictions, Wagnermania. There is something deeply touching in that mental strabismus which caused the Courier man first to condemn our criticism as purblind and then to condemn it for its want of purblindness. Of course, we understand that he objects to our remarks about the overture; but it is dreadful to reflect that the state of mind into which he was thrown by them prevented him from expressing himself intelligently; caused him, as it were, to foam at the mouth; caused him in fact, to become as obscure as to meaning, as is the overture to whose defence he rushes. His reproof of us winds up:

MUSICAL.

The Symphony Concert.

The concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall, last evening, opened with Wagner's inscrutable "Faust" overture. That ever-reliable incentive to acute melancholia has long been before a world more or less interested in discovering its meaning, but its mystery remains as elusive as ever. Some ingenuous but perversely imaginative people have, from time to time, plunged into its dark profound and returned panting to the surface with what they deemed an interpretation of its meaning, but they have not succeeded in making followers and have left the world as vague and as comfortless on the subject as it was before. As music this overture has the same frolicsome flexibility and the same winsome cheerfulness that are such pleasing qualities in abstruse problems in conic equations. As a tone poem it is lacking in that plainness of purpose and lucidity of treatment that characterize the equally cacophonous and no less fervid overtures that are poured forth in the silence of night under the moon, in broad catacoustics and simple but effective polyphony by wooing felicity ignorant of any music but that of nature. We fear that the solution of this ugly musical problem must be delayed until those other problems, perpetual motion and squaring the circle, are solved. Whether this be so or not, the overture is as depressingly dreary, as drearily dry and as dryly disheartening on a twentieth hearing as it was on a first. It was read and played with much dramatic intensity of feeling, but whether it was read rightly or wrongly it is not easy to say; and after all it does not seem to matter much, for it resembles those picture aberrations or the famous Turner, that were so confused that it made no difference whether they were hung upside down, or not. It was followed by Chopin's Concerto in F-minor, the solo part of which was played by Mrs. H. H. A. Beach. We have been so surfeited on Chopin of late by such unapproachable Chopin interpreters as de Pachmann and Paderewski, that it is to be regretted Mrs. Beach did not select a work from some other composer, to say nothing of the exciting of comparisons, which, in the very nature of things, became inevitable. Her performance, however, may be warmly praised for its grace, its neat and delicate technique and its fluent ease. In style it was, perhaps, somewhat finical and wanting in breath and passion; but the effort, as a whole, was abundant in pleasing interest and was fairly entitled to the vigorous applause and the recalls that rewarded the artist. The concert ended with Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony. The reading accorded the work, did not, on the whole, depart widely from the conventional one. There were some liberties, of a sugary sentimental description, taken with the tempi here and there, and one or two new and obtrusively unnecessary rallentandos were made in the funeral march and an occasional neglect of some of the more significant nuances indicated by the composer; but taken altogether the interpretation was spirited and fairly interesting. The playing of the orchestra was admirable throughout. The soloist at the next concert is to be Mr. T. Adamowski. The novelty of the programme will be a symphony by Spohr, not before heard at these concerts.

"Funny world, funnier people, funniest of all, some music critics!" This is perhaps cutting as a summing up of its writer's sad estimate of human existence in relation to Wagnerism; but he should have added to the "funniest of all" list, some "critics of music critics," because he is deliciously funny. However, we cannot be angry with him; on the contrary we tender him our sincerest sympathies in his hour of unfortunate suffering under Wagner rables; and wish him a speedy restoration to health and common sense.

SYMPHONY ECHOES.

Mrs. Beach Makes a Favorable Impression as the Piano Soloist.

Music Hall was crowded last night with the usual attentive audience, who came to listen to an attractive programme, which included selections from Wagner, Chopin and Beethoven.

It is seldom that the Symphony orchestra has better opportunities for effective playing than was afforded by Wagner's "Faust's Overture." The theme, which is replete with passionate sentiment and dramatic feeling, was interpreted by Nikisch with wonderful vigor, and the cadence was executed by the orchestra with beautiful effect and vivacity.

The stormy discontent, the indefinite longings, and the bitter complaints and curses of Faust found grand expression in the harmonious altos and the sudden dropping into pathetic tremors—while the effect of distant tones and sudden modulation of notes, introduced here and there, added a poetic suggestiveness to the whole which was cordially appreciated by the audience. Chopin's concerto for pianoforte in F minor, the orchestration of which was arranged by the composer himself, was played by Mrs. Beach, the soloist of the evening.

Mrs. Beach's playing was very skilful, and at times was marked by rare sentiment and delicacy. She displayed almost remarkable talent in her interpretation of the second movement in the concerto, and though there was nothing original in her interpretation she gave full expression to the wonderful and fantastic beauties with which it is pregnant.

The orchestra accompaniments, though cold and weak at first, improved wonderfully in the last movement, and the quick, vivacious, almost sportive tempo with which it concluded, produced a very agreeable impression.

Mr. Nikisch's admirable reading of Beethoven's third symphony arrested the attention of the audience, who sat through, listening to the four movements with almost spellbound watchfulness.

The bold, vigorous movement, swelling gradually to a grand diapason and suddenly dropping to a series of heroic staccati, the dramatic climaxes in the adagio, afforded a sublime contrast to the mournful strains, the solemn chords and the pathetic, almost heart-rending notes which pervaded the second movement.

The sighing sorrow, the impotent despair gradually changing to triumphant hope, and the struggling, quivering feeling with which the movement was pregnant, were beautifully expressed by the orchestra, who displayed their powers to excellent advantage, which were thoroughly appreciated by the audience.

Mr. T. Adamowski will be the soloist at this week's concert, and the programme will be as follows:

Symphony No. 3, in C minor.....Spohr
(First time at these concerts.)
Concerto for violin, in G minor.....Bruch
A pastoral prelude.....Chadwick
(First time.)
Three Slavonic dances.....Dvorak

Xaver Reiter, once first horn player of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has recently made a success with the Detroit Symphony Orchestra.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

At last evening's Symphony concert in Music Hall, Mr. Arthur Nikisch conductor, the soloist was Mrs. H. H. A. Beach, and the programme included Wagner's "Faust" overture, the F minor piano concerto by Chopin and Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony.

The "Faust" overture has but rarely had so good a performance as that given by Mr. Nikisch on this occasion, and the beauty of the tone pictures was made delightfully clear throughout the composition. The merits of the work of the orchestra in this number of the programme were quickly and enthusiastically appreciated by the audience.

Mrs. Beach was not altogether wise in putting herself before such an audience in so large an auditorium in Chopin's familiar concerto. She is a very gifted player, a musician of excellent parts, and an artist who shows in her limited appearances in concert work a distinct devotion to her chosen field of effort. Her playing is always strictly correct, intelligent and painstaking, but when she enters into the performance of such a work as the Chopin concerto of the evening, her limitations are made very apparent. The emotional characteristics of Chopin's compositions may be too strongly developed in the playing of Paderewsky and De Pachmann, but Mrs. Beach, in last evening's performance, failed to give this element in the concerto the desired prominence, and for this reason the lovely adagio was but little appreciated. The brilliant rondo also makes demands upon a player which Mrs. Beach is evidently unequal to at present, yet all her work was characterized by so much earnestness, and was so free from ostentation, that she was heartily commended by the applause of the audience as she ended her playing, and had an additional complimentary recall after she had retired from the stage.

In his reading of the No. 3 Beethoven symphony, the "Eroica," Mr. Nikisch merited and received the highest praise, the beauties of the several movements standing out in bold relief in the performance of the work.

Mr. T. Adamowski, violinist, is the soloist next Saturday evening, and the programme will include: Spohr's symphony No. 3 in C minor, Max Bruch's concerto for violin in G minor, George W. Chadwick's "A Pastoral Prelude" and three Slavonic dances by Dvorak.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The programme of the concert given in Music Hall Saturday night by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was of unusual interest to Boston people, as it was closely connected with a lady who ranks high both as musician and composer. The appearance of Mrs. H. H. A. Beach as a soloist has been pleasantly anticipated, and no composition better calculated to bring out the ability of a pianist could have been chosen than the second number on the programme. Chopin's concerto in F minor, op. 21, is in three movements, and dates from the year 1829, when Chopin had barely reached manhood. It was composed while he was living in Warsaw, and was first played at a concert at that city March 17, 1880, by Chopin himself.

Mrs. Beach did her task well; her playing was clear, clean and precise, although there was little vibration in the tones, little of the carrying quality that is so necessary in making pianoforte music interesting. Her shading was excellent and her touch very delicate at times, but she lacked, in a measure, the necessary power to make the performance masterly.

Mr. Nikisch's interpretation of "A Faust Overture" made it almost interesting, although it is lacking in Wagner's peculiar originality. His original plan was to write a Faust symphony, with this as the first movement, but the plan was never carried out. It is incomplete in many ways.

The Beethoven symphony No. 3, styled "Heroic," was finely rendered. It has been included in the repertoire of each season but one since the Boston Symphony concerts were founded. The funeral march received a masterly rendering and the heartiest reception of the whole programme. Next week's concert will present Mr. T. Adamowski as soloist and two novelties in orchestral music—Spohr's symphony No. 3, in C minor, and "A Pastoral Prelude" by Chadwick.

THE SYMPHONY.

PRINCIPAL MUSICAL EVENTS OF THE WEEK LAST PAST.

WAGNER AND CHOPIN PERFORMED LAST NIGHT—THE HOPEKIRK RECITAL TUESDAY—MISS LUNDE'S CONCERT.

Chopin's F minor concerto was hardly in the right place between Wagner's "A Faust Overture" and the "Heroic" symphony. In spite of this, however, the programme of the thirteenth Symphony, rehearsal and concert, proved in many respects one of the most enjoyable of the season.

Every successive performance of the overture under the direction of Mr. Nikisch reveals something more of its titanic strength and its depths of expression. Without doubt it is a great work, one that is destined to live. That Wagner himself, after an interval of ten years, during which he was absorbed by other matters of greater import, should have felt impelled to give more complete expression to the ideas embodied in the original score by re-writing it and this, notwithstanding his belief at one time that the work no longer interested him shows how strongly it appealed to his nature.

In the vigorous, yet finished performance, there was no evidence of fatigue on the part of the players, who have just returned from a periodical concert-trip. Their work was characterized by unwonted precision and virility, and this applies with equal force to Mr. Nikisch's conducting. It is doubtful, too, if the "Heroic" has ever been given in this city more effectively or in a manner more in accord with the spirit of its text. The titanic grandeur of the first movement and the pathos of the second never seemed more completely revealed. The scherzo, too, was given with delightful buoyancy, the pianissimo effects being unusually delicate.

Throughout the performance the playing was of a high order of excellence. Messrs. Molé and Santet fairly surpassed themselves, and the strings have seldom, if ever, done more exquisite work.

Mrs. H. H. A. Beach was the soloist. Her reading of the concerto was distinguished by its musicianly qualities and its simplicity. If it contained few evidences of breadth or passion, it was also free from the suspicion of sentimentalism. The rubato was used sparingly and with much skill; and many artistic effects throughout the performance more than sufficed to show the musical stuff that Mrs. Beach is made of. Of her technical work, little can be said but words of praise. It is true that in power it was not commensurate to the size of the hall; but it was of crystalline clearness, and the precision with which both hands moved together was a model for students. In the matter of tempo, too, her fingers freely responded; the fioriture and the slighter embellishments were played with admirable freedom and delicacy, while the bravura passages presented no difficulties whatever. Mrs. Beach was warmly received, and was recalled with great heartiness.

IONY ORCHESTRA,

NIKISCH, Conductor.

CONCERT.

BER 6TH, AT 8, P. M.

GRAMME.

RE, "Coriolan."

TO for VIOLIN.

st time.)

NY in C major, No. 2.

SOIST:

Z KNEISEL.

concert at that city March 17, 1830, by Chopin himself.

Mrs. Beach did her task well; her playing was clear, clean and precise, although there was little vibration in the tones, little of the carrying quality that is so necessary in making pianoforte music interesting. Her shading was excellent and her touch very delicate at times, but she lacked, in a measure, the necessary power to make the performance masterly.

Mr. Nikisch's interpretation of "A Faust Overture" made it almost interesting, although it is lacking in Wagner's peculiar originality. His original plan was to write a Faust symphony, with this as the first movement, but the plan was never carried out. It is incomplete in many ways.

The Beethoven symphony No. 3, styled "Heroic," was finely rendered. It has been included in the repertoire of each season but one since the Boston Symphony concerts were founded. The funeral march received a masterly rendering and the heartiest reception of the whole programme. Next week's concert will present Mr. T. Adamowski as soloist and two novelties in orchestral music—Spohr's symphony No. 3, in C minor, and "A Pastoral Prelude" by Chadwick.

THE SYMPHONY.

PRINCIPAL MUSICAL EVENTS OF THE WEEK LAST PAST.

WAGNER AND CHOPIN PERFORMED LAST NIGHT—THE HOPEKIRK RECITAL TUES-DAY—MISS LUNDE'S CONCERT.

Chopin's F minor concerto was hardly in the right place between Wagner's "A Faust Overture" and the "Heroic" symphony. In spite of this, however, the programme of the thirteenth Symphony, rehearsal and concert, proved in many respects one of the most enjoyable of the season.

Every successive performance of the overture under the direction of Mr. Nikisch reveals something more of its titanic strength and its depths of expression. Without doubt it is a great work, one that is destined to live. That Wagner himself, after an interval of ten years, during which he was absorbed by other matters of greater import, should have felt impelled to give more complete expression to the ideas embodied in the original score by re-writing it and this, notwithstanding his belief at one time that the work no longer interested him shows how strongly it appealed to his nature.

In the vigorous, yet finished performance, there was no evidence of fatigue on the part of the players, who have just returned from a periodical concert-trip. Their work was characterized by unwonted precision and virility, and this applies with equal force to Mr. Nikisch's conducting. It is doubtful, too, if the "Heroic" has ever been given in this city more effectively or in a manner more in accord with the spirit of its text. The titanic grandeur of the first movement and the pathos of the second never seemed more completely revealed. The scherzo, too, was given with delightful buoyancy, the pianissimo effects being unusually delicate.

Throughout the performance the playing was of a high order of excellence. Messrs. Mole and Santet fairly surpassed themselves, and the strings have seldom, if ever, done more exquisite work.

Mrs. H. H. A. Beach was the soloist. Her reading of the concerto was distinguished by its musicianly qualities and its simplicity. If it contained few evidences of breadth or passion, it was also free from the suspicion of sentimentalism. The rubato was used sparingly and with much skill; and many artistic effects throughout the performance more than sufficed to show the musical stuff that Mrs. Beach is made of. Of her technical work, little can be said but words of praise. It is true that in power it was not commensurate to the size of the hall; but it was of crystalline clearness, and the precision with which both hands moved together was a model for students. In the matter of tempo, too, her fingers freely responded; the fioriture and the slighter embellishments were played with admirable freedom and delicacy, while the bravura passages presented no difficulties whatever. Mrs. Beach was warmly received, and was recalled with great heartiness.

IONY ORCHESTRA,

IKISCH, Conductor.

CONCERT.

BER 6TH, AT 8, P. M.

GRAMME.

RE, "Coriolan."

TO for VIOLIN.

(4 times.)

NY in C major, No. 2.

SOIST:

Z KNEISEL.

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1891-92.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

XIV. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 30, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

SPOHR.

SYMPHONY No. 3, in C minor.

Andante Grave; Allegro.—Larghetto,— Scherzo.—Finale; Allegro.
(First time at these Concerts.)

BRUCH.

CONCERTO for VIOLIN, in G minor.

Allegro moderato.—Adagio.—Finale; Allegro energico.

CHADWICK.

A PASTORAL PRELUDE.

(First time.)

DVOŘÁK.

THREE SLAVONIC DANCES.

SOLOIST:

MR. T. ADAMOWSKI.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Symphony Concert.

It was a wise proceeding to resuscitate Spohr, for the world at present passes him by with altogether too much superciliousness. Genius ought not to cause talent to be forgotten, and the overwhelming greatness of Beethoven in the symphonic field should not obliterate the sweetness and calm of Spohr's orchestral writings. The composer was not a reformer; he took the symphony just as Mozart had left it, and the influence of the "Jupiter" symphony may readily be perceived in the fugato of the finale of the symphony of Saturday. Of Beethoven and a broad and passionate school, Spohr desired to know nothing, his formalism was opposed to anything that seemed iconoclastic in music, at least in the instrumental forms, and ingenuity took the place of fervor in all his symphonies.

The symphony in C minor, given at this concert, has pretty themes, overflowing with melody, but its first movement has no real development, and there is a sameness in the first three movements that is not permissible in symphonic work, the Scherzo being anything but a good example of the character of this movement. The finale, however, makes some amends. The work was well played, not with great precision, but with a certain power and "schwung" that was effective. The work of the cellos and violas in the second movement, and the woodwind in the third, may be commended, and the fugato of the finale was quite clear and well balanced.

Mr. T. Adamowski deserves the heartiest congratulations on the success he achieved in Bruch's violin concerto; it was given with a breadth and yet a refinement that overtopped anything that he has yet achieved, and it suggested possibilities that I had not suspected, much as I have appreciated the poetic intelligence of the artist. A most sympathetic tone, a direct and manly interpretation quite in line with the work, a constant purity of intonation, and full and broad bowing, were a few of the many creditable points of the performance.

As to the work itself, this concert in G minor is the best instrumental composition of the master. It is far above the other two violin concertos that he has written (the third was played at Dusseldorf by Joachim this summer for the first time), and it may be ranked above the Mendelssohn concerto, which is the visiting card of every new comer that plays violin, and not so very far from the Beethoven concerto, with which it has this in common, it grows weaker towards the end, its chief beauty being in its first portions.

Mr. Chadwick's "Pastoral Prelude" was a disappointment; it began at once with a drone-bass, and gave a few bird-calls that seemed to come direct from the Wagnerian scores, but it was rather bombastic than pastoral, and seemed either a dilution or a parody of "Waldweben" with most of the work transferred from the strings to the woodwind. Its scoring was ambitious enough, but its themes were rather vague, and even the instrumentation was paled by the Slavonic dances by Dvorak (why not spell this name "Dvorjak" and give some idea of its pronunciation?) which were spiced to the very brim with every kind of musical pepper known to the modern composer. In these Mr. Nikisch was entirely in his element, and there was fire, yes even an entire conflagration, in the interpretation. LOUIS C. ELSON.

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the fourteenth symphony concert was as follows:

Spohr: Symphony No. 3, in C minor.
Bruch: Violin concerto No. 1, in G minor.
Chadwick: A pastoral prelude.
Dvorak: Three Slavonic dances.

Mr. T. Adamowski was the violinist.

It is a refreshing thing to hear a work like the Spohr C-minor symphony now and then; a work admirably organic in construction, in which everything makes for beauty, and in which the composer's musical invention does not go lame after the first step or two. It is in no sense the work of a giant, but it is eminently the work of a fine-feeling, cultivated and genially inspired musician. One cannot always be titanic, and Spohr's sweetly piping muse is excellent company at times. Only once in the whole symphony did we find anything actually commonplace: the theme of the fugato in the last movement—which fugato is admirably written, by the way—has all too much the air of having been picked out of some text-book in counterpoint. It is so nicely adapted to facile imitative development that, as if sure of its own contrapuntal suggestiveness, it seems to think it superfluous really to say anything for itself. In the Larghetto one can hardly escape noticing the strong likeness between Spohr and Gounod, only one could well say that Spohr was Gounod plus something else. The symphony was beautifully played.

If Mr. Chadwick meant to give his audience a surprise by calling his latest orchestral work a pastoral, he certainly succeeded. One usually associates the lazy, dreamy, patulae-sub-tegmine fagi side of country life with the word pastoral, and here we have a bright, lively, chattering movement, full enough of a certain rusticity, if you will, but in no wise suggestive of that peaceful repose which it is conventional to seek in the country. But the music is none the worse for not being the conventional pastoral; it is bright, taking, cleverly written, and charming in effect.

The Dvorak dances are bustling, lively noisy pieces, rather vulgar in character and commonplace in effect. Only in the last one of the three, which might be entitled "Turkish March from the Ruins of Athens to Somerville," do we find any real piquancy of humor.

Mr. Adamowski surpassed himself in the Bruch concerto. For beauty of tone, supreme elegance and grace in phrasing, depth and poetic beauty of sentiment, his playing was beyond praise. Technically, too, it was exceedingly fine; but, in the presence of so much that belongs to the higher side of artistic performance, one does not care to talk about technique. Mr. Adamowski was rapturously applauded, as he deserved to be, and was twice recalled.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Fourteenth Symphony Concert.

There were two novelties on the programme of the Symphony concert, Saturday evening, Symphony No. 3 in C-minor by Spohr and Mr. George Chadwick's "A Pastoral Prelude." The other numbers of the programme were Bruch concerto for violin, No. 1, in G-minor, Mr. T. Adamowski, soloist, and three Slavonic dances, Nos. 8, 6 and 5, which have not been heard in these concerts since Mr. Henschel played them.

The Spohr Symphony begins with an introduction, Andante Grave in C time in short phrases, commencing forte and ending piano or pianissimo and then reversing the dynamics, nuances that demand sudden diminuendos and crescendos if the expression is to be observed.

Following comes an Allegro in six-eight time, a flowing theme, pianissimo, given to the first violins, with imitative passages on the other strings, taken up later on by the wind instruments in happy combination, and sustained unflagging to the end. The nuances are sudden and extreme in character, and require a most accurate rendering, at once delicate and then bold again, if the effect indicated by the composer is to be obtained.

A Larghetto follows in nine-eight time, a delightful cantabile with a second theme for the violins on the G string in unison with the 'celli. The Scherzo which follows is not in the form that the general acceptance of the term implies; at all events, it has not the effect that one would anticipate. It is in six-four time, and flows on in a legato manner with little or none of the detached form of treatment.

This movement also calls for some most delicate touches, the contrasts also being suddenly marked. The final movement has a bold theme which is carried out in imitations and fugue in the strings, with sustained harmonies occurring here and there in the wind instruments, the vigorous counterpoint between the violins and the basses being exhilarating in the extreme. There are delicate touches indicated in places, that in their episodic relation furnish a fine contrast to the boldness of other parts. Again in this movement is necessary the most careful and conscientious following of the composer's indications. The symphony as a whole upon the basis it is written is an interesting work, for it is beautifully melodious, pure in style, and devoid of the ultra-chromatic modula-tions that burden many of the composer's scores.

It is a work that requires the hand of a sensitive and delicately musical conductor to guide and control the orchestra in obtaining all the contrasts that crowd the score and relieve the monotony that otherwise must prevail. Mr. Nikisch laid too heavy a hand upon it, although the strings were most of the time well together and fairly observant of the dynamics. The wood-wind also was not so coarse as on last Saturday night, and the brass was less vehement. As an able contemporary says, speaking of the composition, "There was a lack of vigorous contrasts in the first three movements." Now this lack was not in the composition but in the rendering, for which the conductor is responsible, not the author. Mr. Gericke would have given the touch to the nuances that would have revealed the beauties that were hidden and relieved the monotony that existed Saturday night in the rendering it received under the baton of his successor.

It is useless to deny that Mr. Nikisch has signally failed as an interpreter of the classics if the traditions that have been handed down so carefully by eminent musicians are of value in preserving the characteristics identical with the ideas of the composer, his period and the resources that then existed. The modernism of these conductors that would turn a Mozart or Beethoven Symphony into a Hungarian Fantasia or a Dvorak Slavonic Dance, and profane what should remain sacred, deserves constant and vigorous reproof. Since Mr. Nikisch first came here, when his rendering of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony was little less than a musical bull fight, he has tempered his extravagances somewhat, but he yet indulges in a too wilful variation of the tempo, a too sentimental exaggeration of themes, and a coarseness of execution that is reprehensible in a conductor holding the exalted position he does—a position wherein he can educate a public or vitiate its taste. Had he an orchestra of players that had not been subjected to the rigid discipline of that superb drill master and conductor, Wilhelm Gericke, and that had absorbed to a certain degree the refinement that Gericke demanded in their efforts, it is easy to imagine what the result might be. Well, the leopard cannot change his spots, and I don't believe Mr. Nikisch will ever change his characteristics either.

Mr. Adamowski's playing of the Bruch Concerto calls for the highest praise. The style was noble, the finish elegant, and the intonation faultless. He gave to the Adagio a warmth and beauty of expression that was charming. It was by far the best effort that he has made here, and one that satisfied the most critical demand. What more can be said? The orchestra accompanied in a most discreet manner, aiding the soloist in every way, and gaining an almost perfect ensemble. Praise must be given the fine, artistic manner in which the first horn played the obligatos that occur in his part. The orchestra is fortunate in possessing so fine an artist upon this difficult instrument. When he has been absent he has been sadly missed.

Mr. Chadwick's "A Pastoral Prelude" proved to be an ingenious composition, showing the knowledge and skill of the writer in dealing with orchestral effects. The pastoral element, however, was a disappointment, some reminiscences of Siegfried's pipe and a few bucolic imitations embracing all that twanged of the woods or meadows. It was a little overwrought and bombastic at times, but that might have been the fault of the playing.

The Slavonic dances ended the programme, and being in the style of the conductor, were fired off with all the noise and brilliancy of a Fourth of July celebration.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The programme of the fourteenth Symphony concert, given in Music Hall Saturday evening, was as follows: Spohr's Symphony No. 3 in C-minor (first time at these concerts), Bruch's violin concerto in G minor (played by Mr. Timothy Adamowski), Chadwick's "A Pastoral Prelude" and three Slavonic dances by Dvorak.

Spohr in his autobiography says that, according to the best of his recollection, the symphony in C-minor was played for the first time in June, 1828, at a musical festival in Halberstadt. He was invited there to direct his oratorio, "The Last Judgment." In a second concert he played a new violin concertino (op. 79); and it was at this same concert that he thinks the symphony was produced. Schumann once said that Spohr's instrumental compositions were nearly all alike, and that there was only a superficial difference between his first and third symphonies. And there is truth in this remark, in spite of Spohr's many attempts to invent new symphonic movements, for the invention rarely went beyond the choosing of a fantastic name as "The Consecration of Sound" or the arrangement of a programme which should be expressed by the music. Yet this third symphony is a delightful work. It is "old fashioned," and many who prefer modern striving after effect, and consequent unintelligibility, to old-fashioned clearness of melody and chasteness of treatment, hold their hands to their ears or doze patiently until the final chord. The first three movements are wanting, perhaps, in contrast; they are so gently melodious, so smooth, oily and refined. Yet the luxuriant melody of Spohr is refreshing in these days when themes sprout with difficulty and are forced and nurtured in the composer's hotbed. The finale is spirited enough to make amends, and it might have been written at a later date.

Mr. Chadwick's "Pastoral Prelude" is a perplexing composition. The natural question is, prelude to what? And, again, why should the word "Pastoral" be used? For even in the vague and unsatisfactory nomenclature of music the different meanings of "pastoral" are fairly defined. There are, it is true, occasional barn-yard imitations which are not beyond recognition, such as the crowing of cocks, etc.; the naïveté that is associated with the pastoral is absent. The themes are to the point, and they are characteristic, but in the middle of the composition there is not a little that is obscure and apparently without real meaning. The instrumentation shows a practiced hand and it is often very ingenious.

Mr. Adamowski gave a fine performance of the Bruch concerto. His mechanism was sure; his phrasing was musicianlike, and he played throughout with breadth, elegance and artistic finish. Nor was his sentiment finical, nor did it degenerate into mere prettiness. He was twice recalled.

The orchestral numbers were admirably played, and the Dvorak dances closed a concert that in spite of an occasional lack of precision of attack was worthy of the old reputation of the organization.

The programme of the next concert includes Dvorak's Symphonic Variations; Prelude and Fugue by Floersheim (first time); "Harold in Italy" by Hector Berlioz, in which the viola solo will be played by Mr. Kneisel.

The Symphony Concert.

The fourteenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall, last evening, opened with Spohr's Symphony, No. 3, in C-minor, a genial composition and with less of that persistent chromatic modulation which characterizes Spohr generally and gives such mononony of effect to his work. This is solid music, clear as crystal, chaste in style and of infinite grace in melody and treatment. There is, perhaps, too much of smoothness and a lack of vigorous contrasts in the first three movements, charming as they are; but the brilliant and fiery finale, with its spirited and clean cut fugato, makes amends. The finale is, on the whole, the best and most interesting movement. The first allegro is delightful in its easy flow. The larghetto has no especial distinction except its purity of feeling and its suave melodiousness. The scherzo has scarcely the true scherzo spirit, and runs into a smoothness more befitting a minuet; but it is all solid music, exquisite in its finish, its warmth of sentiment, and its polished style. The work was admirably played, save for an occasional indecision in attack, a fault that seems to have become a permanency with the orchestra. The novelty of the programme was "A Pastoral Prelude," by Mr. G. W. Chadwick. It is full of life, bright in its themes and ingenious and brilliant in its orchestration. We failed to discover the pastoral element in it, but that may have been a lack of perception on our part. Now and then we fancied we heard the gobbling of turkeys, the quacking of ducks, the crowing of cocks and the bleating of lambs; but the meaning of the work did not make itself clear to us, and it seemed a trifle over long for its themes. It was played with animation and emphasis, and was heartily applauded. The concert ended with an inspiring performance of three Slavonic dances by Dvorak which had been heard here before. The soloist was Mr. T. Adamowski, who played Bruch's violin concerto in G-minor, and with a finish and elegance of style and beauty of phrasing that were adelic in the best sense of the word. The adagio was given with notable warmth, and largeness of sentiment. On the whole the effort was the best and the most satisfying that the artist has made at these concerts. He was applauded with fervor, and twice recalled. The programme for the next concert is Symphonic Variations, Dvorak; Prelude and Fugue, Otto Floersheim (first time), and Berlioz's Symphony, "Harold in Italy," in which the viola solo will be played by Mr. Franz Kneisel.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Fourteenth Symphony Concert.

There were two novelties on the programme of the Symphony concert, Saturday evening, Symphony No. 3 in C-minor by Spohr and Mr. George Chadwick's "A Pastoral Prelude." The other numbers of the programme were Bruch concerto for violin, No. 1, in G-minor, Mr. T. Adamowski, soloist, and three Slavonic dances, Nos. 8, 6 and 5, which have not been heard in these concerts since Mr. Henschel played them.

The Spohr Symphony begins with an introduction, Andante Grave in C time in short phrases, commencing forte and ending piano or pianissimo and then reversing the dynamics, nuances that demand sudden diminuendos and crescendos if the expression is to be observed.

Following comes an Allegro in six-eight time, a flowing theme, pianissimo, given to the first violins, with imitative passages on the other strings, taken up later on by the wind instruments in happy combination, and sustained unflagging to the end. The nuances are sudden and extreme in character, and require a most accurate rendering, at once delicate and then bold again, if the effect indicated by the composer is to be obtained.

A Larghetto follows in nine-eight time, a delightful cantabile with a second theme for the violins on the G string in unison with the 'celli. The Scherzo which follows is not in the form that the general acceptance of the term implies; at all events, it has not the effect that one would anticipate. It is in six-four time, and flows on in a legato manner with little or none of the detached form of treatment.

This movement also calls for some most delicate touches, the contrasts also being suddenly marked. The final movement has a bold theme which is carried out in imitations and fugue in the strings, with sustained harmonies occurring here and there in the wind instruments, the vigorous counterpoint between the violins and the basses being exhilarating in the extreme. There are delicate touches indicated in places, that in their episodic relation furnish a fine contrast to the boldness of other parts. Again in this movement is necessary the most careful and conscientious following of the composer's indications. The symphony as a whole upon the basis it is written is an interesting work, for it is beautifully melodious, pure in style, and devoid of the ultra-chromatic modula-tions that burden many of the composer's scores.

It is a work that requires the hand of a sensitive and delicately musical conductor to guide and control the orchestra in obtaining all the contrasts that crowd the score and relieve the monotony that otherwise must prevail. Mr. Nikisch laid too heavy a hand upon it, although the strings were most of the time well together and fairly observant of the dynamics. The wood-wind also was not so coarse as on last Saturday night, and the brass was less vehement. As an able contemporary says, speaking of the composition, "There was a lack of vigorous contrasts in the first three movements." Now this lack was not in the composition but in the rendering, for which the conductor is responsible not the author. Mr. Gericke would have given the touch to the nuances that would have revealed the beauties that were hidden and relieved the monotony that existed Saturday night in the rendering it received under the baton of his successor.

It is useless to deny that Mr. Nikisch has signally failed as an interpreter of the classics if the traditions that have been handed down so carefully by eminent musicians are of value in preserving the characteristics identical with the ideas of the composer, his period and the resources that then existed. The modernism of these conductors that would turn a Mozart or Beethoven Symphony into a Hungarian Fantasia or a Dvorak Slavonic Dance, and profane what should remain sacred, deserves constant and vigorous reproof. Since Mr. Nikisch first came here, when his rendering of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony was little less than a musical bull fight, he has tempered his extravagances somewhat, but he yet indulges in a too wilful variation of the tempo, a too sentimental exaggeration of themes, and a coarseness of execution that is reprehensible in a conductor holding the exalted position he does—a position wherein he can educate a public or vitiate its taste. Had he an orchestra of players that had not been subjected to the rigid discipline of that superb drill master and conductor, Wilhelm Gericke, and that had absorbed to a certain degree the refinement that Gericke demanded in their efforts, it is easy to imagine what the result might be. Well, the leopard cannot change his spots, and I don't believe Mr. Nikisch will ever change his characteristics either.

Mr. Adamowski's playing of the Bruch Concerto calls for the highest praise. The style was noble, the finish elegant, and the intonation faultless. He gave to the Adagio a warmth and beauty of expression that was charming. It was by far the best effort that he has made here, and one that satisfied the most critical demand. What more can be said? The orchestra accompanied in a most discreet manner, aiding the soloist in every way, and gaining an almost perfect ensemble. Praise must be given the fine, artistic manner in which the first horn played the obligatos that occur in his part. The orchestra is fortunate in possessing so fine an artist upon this difficult instrument. When he has been absent he has been sadly missed.

Mr. Chadwick's "A Pastoral Prelude" proved to be an ingenious composition, showing the knowledge and skill of the writer in dealing with orchestral effects. The pastoral element, however, was a disappointment, some reminiscences of Siegfried's pipe and a few bucolic imitations embracing all that twanged of the woods or meadows. It was a little overwrought and bombastic at times, but that might have been the fault of the playing.

The Slavonic dances ended the programme, and being in the style of the conductor, were fired off with all the noise and brilliancy of a Fourth of July celebration.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The programme of the fourteenth Symphony concert, given in Music Hall Saturday evening, was as follows: Spohr's Symphony No. 3 in C-minor (first time at these concerts), Bruch's violin concerto in G minor (played by Mr. Timothy Adamowski), Chadwick's "A Pastoral Prelude" and three Slavonic dances by Dvorak.

Spohr in his autobiography says that, according to the best of his recollection, the symphony in C-minor was played for the first time in June, 1828, at a musical festival in Halberstadt. He was invited there to direct his oratorio, "The Last Judgment." In a second concert he played a new violin concertino (op. 79); and it was at this same concert that he thinks the symphony was produced. Schumann once said that Spohr's instrumental compositions were nearly all alike, and that there was only a superficial difference between his first and third symphonies. And there is truth in this remark, in spite of Spohr's many attempts to invent new symphonic movements, for the invention rarely went beyond the choosing of a fantastic name as "The Consecration of Sound" or the arrangement of a programme which should be expressed by the music. Yet this third symphony is a delightful work. It is "old fashioned," and many who prefer modern striving after effect, and consequent unintelligibility, to old-fashioned clearness of melody and chasteness of treatment, hold their hands to their ears or doze patiently until the final chord. The first three movements are wanting, perhaps, in contrast; they are so gently melodious, so smooth, oily and refined. Yet the luxuriant melody of Spohr is refreshing in these days when themes sprout with difficulty and are forced and nurtured in the composer's hotbed. The finale is spirited enough to make amends, and it might have been written at a later date.

Mr. Chadwick's "Pastoral Prelude" is a perplexing composition. The natural question is, prelude to what? And, again, why should the word "Pastoral" be used? For even in the vague and unsatisfactory nomenclature of music the different meanings of "pastoral" are fairly defined. There are, it is true, occasional barn-yard imitations which are not beyond recognition, such as the crowing of cocks, etc.; the naïveté that is associated with the pastoral is absent. The themes are to the point, and they are characteristic, but in the middle of the composition there is not a little that is obscure and apparently without real meaning. The instrumentation shows a practiced hand and it is often very ingenious.

Mr. Adamowski gave a fine performance of the Bruch concerto. His mechanism was sure; his phrasing was musicianlike, and he played throughout with breadth, elegance and artistic finish. Nor was his sentiment finical, nor did it degenerate into mere prettiness. He was twice recalled.

The orchestral numbers were admirably played, and the Dvorak dances closed a concert that in spite of an occasional lack of precision of attack was worthy of the old reputation of the organization.

The programme of the next concert includes Dvorak's Symphonic Variations; Prelude and Fugue by Floersheim (first time); "Harold in Italy" by Hector Berlioz, in which the viola solo will be played by Mr. Kneisel.

The Symphony Concert.

The fourteenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall, last evening, opened with Spohr's Symphony, No. 3, in C-minor, a genial composition and with less of that persistent chromatic modulation which characterizes Spohr generally and gives such mononony of effect to his work. This is solid music, clear as crystal, chaste in style and of infinite grace in melody and treatment. There is, perhaps, too much of smoothness and a lack of vigorous contrasts in the first three movements, charming as they are; but the brilliant and fiery finale, with its spirited and clean cut fugato, makes amends. The finale is, on the whole, the best and most interesting movement. The first allegro is delightful in its easy flow. The larghetto has no especial distinction except its purity of feeling and its suave melodiousness. The scherzo has scarcely the true scherzo spirit, and runs into a smoothness more befitting a minuet; but it is all solid music, exquisite in its finish, its warmth of sentiment, and its polished style. The work was admirably played, save for an occasional indecision in attack, a fault that seems to have become a permanency with the orchestra. The novelty of the programme was "A Pastoral Prelude," by Mr. G. W. Chadwick. It is full of life, bright in its themes and ingenious and brilliant in its orchestration. We failed to discover the pastoral element in it, but that may have been a lack of perception on our part. Now and then we fancied we heard the gobbling of turkeys, the quacking of ducks, the crowing of cocks and the bleating of lambs; but the meaning of the work did not make itself clear to us, and it seemed a trifle over long for its themes. It was played with animation and emphasis, and was heartily applauded. The concert ended with an inspiring performance of three Slavonic dances by Dvorak which had been heard here before. The soloist was Mr. T. Adamowski, who played Bruch's violin concerto in G-minor, and with a finish and elegance of style and beauty of phrasing that were artistic in the best sense of the word. The adagio was given with notable warmth, and largeness of sentiment. On the whole the effort was the best and the most satisfying that the artist has made at these concerts. He was applauded with fervor, and twice recalled. The programme for the next concert is Symphonic Variations, Dvorak; Prelude and Fugue, Otto Floersheim (first time), and Berlioz's Symphony, "Harold in Italy," in which the viola solo will be played by Mr. Franz Kneisel.

CONCERT AND OPERA.

A WEEK OVERFLOWING WITH THE
CONCORDS OF SWEET SOUNDS.

THE SYMPHONY LAST NIGHT—THE BOSTON-
IANS AT THE TREMONT THEATRE—RECI-
TALS AND CHAMBER CONCERTS.

Two important works were presented at the fourteenth symphony rehearsal and concert. One was heard for the first time at these concerts and the other for the first time in any concert hall.

If Spohr's third symphony in C minor was ever performed in Boston, it was a good while ago. Probably it figured in the programmes of the Germania or the Harvard Musical Association concerts. The work is thoroughly characteristic of Spohr in its melodiousness, richness of harmony and perfection of orchestration. It has also one especial merit—its comparative brevity. Its performance consumes only thirty-five minutes. Like many of Spohr's works, this is more remarkable for its sensuous beauty than for the strength and the elaboration of its themes. Yet thematic strength and solidity of development are not wanting. The short introduction at the beginning which so quickly merges into the allegro has unexpected strength and nobility of utterance, while the development of the finale and its closing measures are full of energy and virility. The Scherzo, which is only a Scherzo in name, although by no means thematically weak, is the least interesting of the four movements because of the lack of contrast that its sombreness affords. The larghetto is a beautiful song throughout and appeals with considerable force to one's emotional nature.

Mr. Chadwick modestly calls his new orchestral work, "A Pastoral Prelude," although it is substantially in symphonic form. The title, however, clearly indicates the character of the music. The prelude starts off joyously, figures imitating the calls of birds of the forest being used thematically, until the second theme, a charming cantilena given out by the English horn, appears. After extended treatment of this theme, the first reappears, which is followed by further development of both themes and a conclusion pianissimo. The work is an exceedingly happy outcome of Mr. Chadwick's talent. Not only does it reveal the fancy of one born to make music, but the skill displayed in construction and orchestration is that of a master. It is "programme" music of a delightful sort, and undoubtedly will rank with the best of its composer's orchestral productions.

The playing of the orchestra, both in the symphony and the prelude, was well up to its highest standard. In the first named work in particular, the magnificent bode of strings was heard in all its glory of breadth and sensuousness of tone, while the wood-wind and brass were practically above reproach.

Mr. T. Adamowski has seldom if ever appeared to better advantage than he did in Max Bruch's first violin concerto. In every respect his playing was unusually fine. Not only was his tone warm and pure, and his phrasing highly expressive, but there was a steadiness, a reserve force apparent through all that he did, which has not always characterized his work in public. His reading of the concerto was instinct with artistic taste, and his execution was alive with brilliancy and energy. He was enthusiastically received and recalled. The concert closed with a performance of three Slavonic Dances, by Dvorak.

FOURTEENTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The programme offered at Music Hall last Saturday night by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was a particularly happy one, presenting Mr. Timothee Adamowski in Bruch's concerto for violin in G minor, and a first hearing at these concerts of Spohr's third symphony in C minor and Chadwick's "Pastoral Prelude."

The symphony was very effective. The second and third movements offered continuous opportunities for delicate shading and harmonious blending of tones. The finale was given in all the perfection of rich harmonies and fine coloring which characterizes the composition.

Adamowski's rendition of Bruch's concerto was a surprise even to his friends. His improvement in touch, execution and breadth of style is marked, and he was particularly fortunate in choosing a work adapted in every way to his powers. His playing was characterized by purity of tone, refinement and expression, and was heartily appreciated by the audience, whose enthusiasm was only appeased after a second recall.

Mr. George W. Chadwick, the composer of "A Pastoral Prelude," had previously demonstrated his ability as a composer of rare merit, and the work so ably interpreted by Mr. Nikisch Saturday night bore testimony to his good taste in including the composition in his programme. It is full of color and built on the prescribed lines of pastoral music composition, is full of fine orchestral effects, and needs to be heard more than once to be properly appreciated.

The three Slavonic dances of Dvorak were a bright and fitting end to a delightful programme. They were rendered with a dash and spirit which are required to give brilliancy to such compositions.

If any doubts concerning Mr. Nikisch's superlative merits as a conductor had entered the minds of those accustomed to attend the Music Hall performances, they must have forever departed since comparing the work done by the orchestra at the Nordica concert and that of Saturday night.

It seems to be the correct thing after the Symphony rehearsal or the matinee to go to Miss Fisk's, 44 Temple place, for her delicious ice-cream sodas. Do you go there?

CONCERT AND OPERA.

A WEEK OVERFLOWING WITH THE
CONCORDS OF SWEET SOUNDS.

THE SYMPHONY LAST NIGHT—THE BOSTON.
IANS AT THE TREMONT THEATRE—RECI-
TALS AND CHAMBER CONCERTS.

Two important works were presented at the fourteenth symphony rehearsal and concert. One was heard for the first time at these concerts and the other for the first time in any concert hall.

If Spohr's third symphony in C minor was ever performed in Boston, it was a good while ago. Probably it figured in the programmes of the Germania or the Harvard Musical Association concerts. The work is thoroughly characteristic of Spohr in its melodiousness, richness of harmony and perfection of orchestration. It has also one especial merit—its comparative brevity. Its performance consumes only thirty-five minutes. Like many of Spohr's works, this is more remarkable for its sensuous beauty than for the strength and the elaboration of its themes. Yet thematic strength and solidity of development are not wanting. The short introduction at the beginning which so quickly merges into the allegro has unexpected strength and nobility of utterance, while the development of the finale and its closing measures are full of energy and virility. The Scherzo, which is only a Scherzo in name, although by no means thematically weak, is the least interesting of the four movements because of the lack of contrast that its sombreness affords. The larghetto is a beautiful song throughout and appeals with considerable force to one's emotional nature.

Mr. Chadwick modestly calls his new orchestral work, "A Pastoral Prelude," although it is substantially in symphonic form. The title, however, clearly indicates the character of the music. The prelude starts off joyously, figures imitating the calls of birds of the forest being used thematically, until the second theme, a charming cantilena given out by the English horn, appears. After extended treatment of this theme, the first reappears, which is followed by further development of both themes and a conclusion pianissimo. The work is an exceedingly happy outcome of Mr. Chadwick's talent. Not only does it reveal the fancy of one born to make music, but the skill displayed in construction and orchestration is that of a master. It is "programme" music of a delightful sort, and undoubtedly will rank with the best of its composer's orchestral productions.

The playing of the orchestra, both in the symphony and the prelude, was well up to its highest standard. In the first named work in particular, the magnificent bode of strings was heard in all its glory of breadth and sensuousness of tone, while the wood-wind and brass were practically above reproach.

Mr. T. Adamowski has seldom if ever appeared to better advantage than he did in Max Bruch's first violin concerto. In every respect his playing was unusually fine. Not only was his tone warm and pure, and his phrasing highly expressive, but there was a steadiness, a reserve force apparent through all that he did, which has not always characterized his work in public. His reading of the concerto was instinct with artistic taste, and his execution was alive with brilliancy and energy. He was enthusiastically received and recalled. The concert closed with a performance of three Slavonic Dances, by Dvorak.

FOURTEENTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The programme offered at Music Hall last Saturday night by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was a particularly happy one, presenting Mr. Timothee Adamowski in Bruch's concerto for violin in G minor, and a first hearing at these concerts of Spohr's third symphony in C minor and Chadwick's "Pastoral Prelude."

The symphony was very effective. The second and third movements offered continuous opportunities for delicate shading and harmonious blending of tones. The finale was given in all the perfection of rich harmonies and fine coloring which characterizes the composition.

Adamowski's rendition of Bruch's concerto was a surprise even to his friends. His improvement in touch, execution and breadth of style is marked, and he was particularly fortunate in choosing a work adapted in every way to his powers. His playing was characterized by purity of tone, refinement and expression, and was heartily appreciated by the audience, whose enthusiasm was only appeased after a second recall.

Mr. George W. Chadwick, the composer of "A Pastoral Prelude," had previously demonstrated his ability as a composer of rare merit, and the work so ably interpreted by Mr. Nikisch Saturday night bore testimony to his good taste in including the composition in his programme. It is full of color and built on the prescribed lines of pastoral music composition, is full of fine orchestral effects, and needs to be heard more than once to be properly appreciated.

The three Slavonic dances of Dvorak were a bright and fitting end to a delightful programme. They were rendered with a dash and spirit which are required to give brilliancy to such compositions.

If any doubts concerning Mr. Nikisch's superlative merits as a conductor had entered the minds of those accustomed to attend the Music Hall performances, they must have forever departed since comparing the work done by the orchestra at the Nordica concert and that of Saturday night.

It seems to be the correct thing after the Symphony rehearsal or the matinee to go to Miss Fisk's, 44 Temple place, for her delicious ice-cream sodas. Do you go there?

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

When Conductor Nikisch of the Boston Symphony orchestra makes a good programme, it is "very, very good," and when the reverse happens the old nursery rhyme can be completed with equal truth. Last evening's selection was of the "very, very good" sort, and the enjoyment of the audience was in keeping with the musical feast provided for the occasion.

Beginning his programme with Spohr's third symphony in C minor, Mr. Nikisch gave a delightful interpretation of the tuneful movements, in which the beauties of the old time forms and their graceful treatment were given in all their perfection, and this example of the genius and melodious fertility of the composer was thoroughly enjoyed.

Mr. Adamowski, the soloist of the evening, was then heard in Max Bruch's concerto for violin in G minor, a composition exactly suited to the player, and in which he made, by all odds, the happiest effort in his whole career in this city. His playing was characterized by a degree of excellence in purity of tone, expression and refinement that he has never equalled in these concerts, and he held his audience at his will throughout the concerto. The beautiful adagio was sung upon the instrument with wonderful expression, and the finale was played with splendid breadth and vigor. The audience responded to his efforts with hearty good will, and recalled their old-time favorite with great enthusiasm.

Mr. George W. Chadwick's "Pastoral Prelude" followed, having its first hearing here on this occasion. Mr. Chadwick's eminent attainments as a musician and his genius as a composer entitle him to the honor thus conferred upon him, and it is pleasant to have Mr. Nikisch recognize the rights of local composers in such a scheme of concerts. Concerning the prelude, it is difficult to express an opinion on a single hearing, especially as no key is given making it possible to "dilute with the right emotion" in its hearing. It has the traditional pastoral sounds which, however, are as unlike nature as they can well be, and undoubtedly to the imaginative mind its several movements present beautiful tone pictures. It is skilfully and gracefully scored, and is all in all a work worthy the hearing given it, and in keeping with the excellent record of this composer.

Three "Slavonic dances" by Dvorak brought the bright enjoyable programme to an end, and these numbers were splendidly played, the readings given by Mr. Nikisch bringing out all the spirit and dash of the compositions with brilliant effect.

Next Saturday evening the programme will include Dvorak's symphonic variation, Otto Floersheim's prelude and fugue and Berlioz' symphony, "Harold in Italy," in which the viola solo will be played by Mr. Franz Kneisel.

SYMPHONY SOUNDS.

Welcome Novelties Played by Director Nikisch's Orchestra.

The attractions at the Symphony concert last night, besides Mr. Adamowski's solo, were Spohr's third symphony, in C minor, and Chadwick's "Pastoral Prelude," both of which were given for the first time at these concerts.

Mr. Nikisch was particularly felicitous in his interpretation of the scherzo, and the orchestra displayed their greatest skill and accuracy in harmony blending generally.

The symphony was very effective. It occasionally labored in construction, the delicate shadings, and growing harmonies of the second and third movement were delightfully pleasant, especially that shading and imperceptible blending of notes in the third movement of the finale resounding almost as a repeatedly distancing and dying echo.

Mr. Nikisch's interpretation of Chadwick's prelude was equally satisfactory, brilliant at times, and replete with those delicate touches which make the themes, under his interpolations, so full of rich and lovely coloring.

The humorous and lively staccatti with which the theme is introduced excites the imagination to reflect scenes of picturesque rustic life, and the obtrusion of the wood winds in the midst of the vivacious harmonies produces a charming effect in the ensemble.

The orchestra played the "Pastoral Prelude" with excellent technique, and the comical introduction of the second horn here and there, mingling and echoing with higher notes of the flute, contributed very picturesque effects, and was exceedingly pleasing to the audience.

Mr. Adamowski, as soloist, had the opportunity of once more displaying his great command over the violin.

He played Bruch's concerto, in G minor, and if in the allegro he was somewhat stiff and abrupt in bowing, in the adagio he exhibited a wonderful capacity of producing the loveliest and most delicate tones of which the instrument is susceptible.

Three Slavonic dances from Dvorak, which concluded the concert, were played with vivacity and that abandonment in movement which is characteristic of Slavonic music and which seem to breathe that native fantastic, almost wild buoyancy, which was thrown into more conspicuous relief by the emphasis and vigor of the tempo in which they were played, and of which Mr. Nikisch is probably the most brilliant exponent in this country.

The programme for the next concert will be as follows: Symphonic variations, Dvorak; prelude and fugue, Otto Floersheim; symphony, "Harold in Italy," Berlioz. Mr. Franz Kneisel will play the viola solo.

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1891-92.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

XV. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 6, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

HANDEL.

CONCERTO for STRINGS and Two WIND CHOIRS, in F major.

Pomposo; Allegro.—Allegro ma non troppo.—Largo.—Allegro.—A tempo ordinario.

(By special request.)

OTTO FLOERSHEIM.

PRELUDE AND FUGUE.

(First time at these Concerts.)

SAINT-SAËNS.

SYMPHONIC POEM. "Le Rouet d'Omphale."

BERLIOZ.

SYMPHONY. "Harold in Italy."

(Viola Solo, MR. FRANZ KNEISEL.)

- I. HAROLD IN THE MOUNTAINS, (Scenes of Melancholy, Happiness and Joy).—Adagio; Allegro.
- II. MARCH OF THE PILGRIMS, (Singing the Evening Prayer).—Allegretto.
- III. SERENADE OF A MOUNTAINEER.—Allegro assai; Allegretto.
- IV. ORGY OF THE BRIGANDS, (Recalling previous scenes).—Allegro frenetico.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

When Conductor Nikisch of the Boston Symphony orchestra makes a good programme, it is "very, very good," and when the reverse happens the old nursery rhyme can be completed with equal truth. Last evening's selection was of the "very, very good" sort, and the enjoyment of the audience was in keeping with the musical feast provided for the occasion.

Beginning his programme with Spohr's third symphony in C minor, Mr. Nikisch gave a delightful interpretation of the tuneful movements, in which the beauties of the old time forms and their graceful treatment were given in all their perfection, and this example of the genius and melodious fertility of the composer was thoroughly enjoyed.

Mr. Adamowski, the soloist of the evening, was then heard in Max Bruch's concerto for violin in G minor, a composition exactly suited to the player, and in which he made, by all odds, the happiest effort in his whole career in this city. His playing was characterized by a degree of excellence in purity of tone, expression and refinement that he has never equalled in these concerts, and he held his audience at his will throughout the concerto. The beautiful adagio was sung upon the instrument with wonderful expression, and the finale was played with splendid breadth and vigor. The audience responded to his efforts with hearty good will, and recalled their old-time favorite with great enthusiasm.

Mr. George W. Chadwick's "Pastoral Prelude" followed, having its first hearing here on this occasion. Mr. Chadwick's eminent attainments as a musician and his genius as a composer entitle him to the honor thus conferred upon him, and it is pleasant to have Mr. Nikisch recognize the rights of local composers in such a scheme of concerts. Concerning the prelude, it is difficult to express an opinion on a single hearing, especially as no key is given making it possible to "dilate with the right emotion" in its hearing. It has the traditional pastoral sounds which, however, are as unlike nature as they can well be, and undoubtedly to the imaginative mind its several movements present beautiful tone pictures. It is skilfully and gracefully scored, and is all in all a work worthy the hearing given it, and in keeping with the excellent record of this composer.

Three "Slavonic dances" by Dvorak brought the bright enjoyable programme to an end, and these numbers were splendidly played, the readings given by Mr. Nikisch bringing out all the spirit and dash of the compositions with brilliant effect.

Next Saturday evening the programme will include Dvorak's symphonic variation, Otto Floersheim's prelude and fugue and Berlioz' symphony, "Harold in Italy," in which the viola solo will be played by Mr. Franz Kneisel.

SYMPHONY SOUNDS.

Welcome Novelties Played by Director Nikisch's Orchestra.

The attractions at the Symphony concert last night, besides Mr. Adamowski's solo, were Spohr's third symphony, in C minor, and Chadwick's "Pastoral Prelude," both of which were given for the first time at these concerts.

Mr. Nikisch was particularly felicitous in his interpretation of the scherzo, and the orchestra displayed their greatest skill and accuracy in harmony blending generally.

The symphony was very effective. It occasionally labored in construction, the delicate shadings, and growing harmonies of the second and third movement were delightfully pleasant, especially that shading and imperceptible blending of notes in the third movement of the finale resounding almost as a repeatedly distancing and dying echo.

Mr. Nikisch's interpretation of Chadwick's prelude was equally satisfactory, brilliant at times, and replete with those delicate touches which make the themes, under his interpolations, so full of rich and lovely coloring.

The humorous and lively staccati with which the theme is introduced excites the imagination to reflect scenes of picturesque rustic life, and the obtrusion of the wood winds in the midst of the vivacious harmonies produces a charming effect in the ensemble.

The orchestra played the "Pastoral Prelude" with excellent technique, and the comical introduction of the second horn here and there, mingling and echoing with higher notes of the flute, contributed very picturesque effects, and was exceedingly pleasing to the audience.

Mr. Adamowski, as soloist, had the opportunity of once more displaying his great command over the violin.

He played Bruch's concerto, in G minor, and if in the allegro he was somewhat stiff and abrupt in bowing, in the adagio he exhibited a wonderful capacity of producing the loveliest and most delicate tones of which the instrument is susceptible.

Three Slavonic dances from Dvorak, which concluded the concert, were played with vivacity and that abandonment in movement which is characteristic of Slavonic music and which seem to breathe that native fantastic, almost wild buoyancy, which was thrown into more conspicuous relief by the emphasis and vigor of the tempo in which they were played, and of which Mr. Nikisch is probably the most brilliant exponent in this country.

The programme for the next concert will be as follows: Symphonic variations, Dvorak; prelude and fugue, Otto Floersheim; symphony, "Harold in Italy," Berlioz. Mr. Franz Kneisel will play the viola solo.

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1891-92.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

XV. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 6, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

HANDEL.

CONCERTO for STRINGS and Two WIND CHOIRS, in F major.

Pomposo; Allegro.—Allegro ma non troppo.—Largo.—Allegro.—A tempo ordinario.

(By special request.)

OTTO FLOERSHEIM.

PRELUDE AND FUGUE.

(First time at these Concerts.)

SAINT-SAENS.

SYMPHONIC POEM. "Le Rouet d'Omphale."

BERLIOZ.

SYMPHONY. "Harold in Italy."

(Viola Solo, MR. FRANZ KNEISEL.)

- I. HAROLD IN THE MOUNTAINS. (Scenes of Melancholy, Happiness and Joy).—Adagio; Allegro.
- II. MARCH OF THE PILGRIMS. (Singing the Evening Prayer).—Allegretto.
- III. SERENADE OF A MOUNTAINEER.—Allegro assai; Allegretto.
- IV. ORGY OF THE BRIGANDS. (Recalling previous scenes).—Allegro frenetico.

MUSIC.

THE SYMPHONY.

Berlioz's symphony, "Harold in Italy," is not a work of imperishable greatness. But it is great in certain respects. It is clear in form and treatment,—remarkably so, as compared with the "Fantasie Symphony";—it is wonderfully rich in rhythmic and orchestral effects; and, as a whole, it is fraught with poetic significance. Even the comparatively commonplace character of the melodic passages which are assigned to the viola is almost concealed by the fanciful and masterly manner in which they made to express the composer's ideas. It is probable that most lovers of music listen to it with no sense of weariness or of having to strain their imagination in order to associate the music with its "programme." They would not care for such music as a steady diet; but neither are poems of the "Childe Harold" class calculated to serve as daily food for the mental digestion. Such poems, however, are productive of much enjoyment and in a similar way "Harold symphonies are welcome diversions.

The symphony was given a splendid reading and performance. Mr. Kneisel's noble viola playing is too well-known to render it necessary to say anything more concerning it than that it was as noble as ever.

The programme of this fifteenth rehearsal and concert had for its opening number Handel's concerto for strings and two wind choirs in F, which was given with such success two or three weeks ago. Its repetition was by request, and it was as finely performed and as warmly received as before. A prelude and fugue by Otto Floersheim and Saint-Saens's. "Le Rout d'Omphale" were the remaining numbers. Mr. Floersheim is well known as a composer of no ordinary ability, and this work, composed in 1883, gave much pleasure. The "bell tones" at the opening of the prelude are skilfully harmonized, and the development is broad and stately. The fugue is also treated in a musicianly style, and the orchestration of the entire work is both effective and discreet. It was well received. The Saint-Saens number was exquisitely played, and won the heartiest applause of all.

"Childe Harold" Played at the Symphony Concert.

The programme of the fifteenth Symphony Concert was as follows: Concerto for strings and two wind choirs, in F major, Handel; prelude and fugue, Otto Floersheim (first time at these concerts); "Le Rouet d'Omphale," Saint-Saens; symphony, "Harold en Italie," Berlioz. The solo viola in the symphony was played by Mr. Franz Kneisel.

The concerto of Handel was played for the first time in this city at the tenth Symphony Concert of this season. A second hearing confirms the opinion that was then expressed in The Journal: It is a remarkably fresh and vigorous work, rich in melody, interesting throughout to amateur and to pedagogue, and, above all—remember that it is at least one hundred and fifty years old—most ingeniously scored. There are many anticipations of modern instrumentation, such as the frequent antiphonal employment of contrasting instrumental families. There is a constant appreciation of the characteristic qualities of various instruments, and there is the knowledge of gaining effects by apparently simple means. The concerto was heartily enjoyed by the audience, although the performance by the orchestra was not equal to that of December in precision, purity or frankness.

This concerto of Handel was in all probability written before 1750; the Berlioz symphony, "Harold," was first played in 1834; and yet the concerto seems to-day the younger and fresher work. It was in December, 1833, that Hector Berlioz, coming out of a concert hall where his "Symphonie Fantastique" had just been performed, saw in the crowd a very tall man, whose black hair fell in neglected curls on his shoulders, "and formed a dark frame round the pale, cadaverous face, on which sorrow, genius and hell had engrained their indestructible lines." The strange being stopped him, seized his hand and poured out words of extravagant praise. It was Nicolo Paganini. Some weeks after Paganini called on him. "I have a marvelous viola," he said, "a wonderful Stradivarius, and I wish to play on it in public. I have no music. Will you write a solo for viola? I would trust you with it, and you alone." Berlioz wrote "Harold." The first movement was finished and Paganini saw it. He counted the rests in the allegro. "No, no," he cried, "I am silent there too long; I must play without ceasing." A few days after he went to Nice, a sick man. Berlioz then conceived the idea of writing four orchestral scenes, in which the viola should take part as a more or less active personage, preserving always the individuality. The symphony was first given Nov. 23, 1834. The march was repeated; the other movements were coolly received. Soon after this performance a writer in Paris began his criticism with the following pleasantry: "Ha! ha! ha!—haro! haro! Harold!" And in an anonymous letter the composer was asked why he did not have courage enough to blow out his brains.

"Harold" has been called a viola symphony, an opera without words, a viola concerto. Berlioz believed implicitly in the supreme power of orchestral instruments. He seemed to disdain the human voice. Now, as Henri Lavoix once wrote, "the singer is the most ignorant, the most rebellious of performers, but you cannot pass him by; he is a necessary evil, and you must admit that to express love and passion there is no instrument more beautiful, more tender, more moving than the human voice." The man, Childe Harold, as represented by a viola, does not appeal directly to the hearer; the composition "Harold" must then be considered as music pure and simple; and, with the exception of the first viola theme and the march, the genuine musical thought is of slight value. I do not speak now of the work as a symphony. Accept the ideas of Berlioz as presented by him; they are few and commonplace, although he tries to command the attention of the hearer by extraordinary means. This symphony with its feeble musical body covered by a gorgeous instrumental dress is not unlike Thackeray's two portraits of Louis XIV. as seen by the Court and by the valet. Strip the stately monarch of his wig and sword, purple and fine linen, lace, pads and high-heeled boots, and you find a bald little man, with a dull face and immaterial legs, supporting himself by a cane. Furthermore the dress that Berlioz so carefully ornamented has lost its dazzling hues in these days composers think more of color than of drawing; and orchestral combinations that startled in 1834 appear now almost conventional, and are in fact expected. Neither is the Berlioz of "Harold," the great Berlioz of "Romeo" and "La Damnation de Faust."

Again, Berlioz, like the man in the Bible that fell down and worshiped the idol hewn by him, bows before his work and rashly calls it good. Here, the insanity of genius is conquered by the sanity of talent; for Saint-Saens, a man of talent rather than genius, stands by his musical machine and watches with you the workings of it. Do you hear Omphale's wheel? Clever instrumentation, is it not? If you reply, "Yes, but you are wrong. The spinning wheel was unknown in Queen Omphale's time; you should have represented her with a distaff"—Saint-Saens would say, with an ironical smile, "Very true; but what do we care in music for synchronism? If I were strictly accurate, you would have no whir. By the way, just listen to Hercules. I think he should groan a little louder."

The symphony and the symphonic poem were very well played by the orchestra, and Mr. Kneisel played the viola part in the symphony with exceeding taste and skill.

Mr. Nikisch directed conscientiously the prelude and fugue by Mr. Otto Floersheim. The prelude, with its imitation of church bells, contains the elements of popularity, and will no doubt always be a pleasing number in concerts of a lighter nature. The fugue, according to the programme book of Saturday evening, is an attempt to clothe "the old form with modern harmonization and the glorious garb of the modern orchestra." In this attempt Mr. Floersheim is not entirely successful. The fugue is a stiff-necked child of the Muse, and it does not lend itself gracefully to such radically modern treatment. Still Mr. Floersheim has shown in this work much ingenuity, and it must be remembered that he set for himself a difficult and an ungrateful task.

The Fifteenth Symphony Concert.

The only novelty on the programme, Saturday night, was the "Prelude and Fugue" by Otto Floersheim, whose compositions have been heard before in these concerts. They are the work of a skilful musician who has a good command of modern orchestral effects as well as the possession of spontaneity. The "Prelude and Fugue" is an interesting number, although the Fugue is

MUSIC.

THE SYMPHONY.

Berlioz's symphony, "Harold in Italy," is not a work of imperishable greatness. But it is great in certain respects. It is clear in form and treatment,—remarkably so, as compared with the "Fantasie Symphony";—it is wonderfully rich in rhythmic and orchestral effects; and, as a whole, it is fraught with poetic significance. Even the comparatively commonplace character of the melodic passages which are assigned to the viola is almost concealed by the fanciful and masterly manner in which they made to express the composer's ideas. It is probable that most lovers of music listen to it with no sense of weariness or of having to strain their imagination in order to associate the music with its "programme." They would not care for such music as a steady diet; but neither are poems of the "Childe Harold" class calculated to serve as daily food for the mental digestion. Such poems, however, are productive of much enjoyment and in a similar way "Harold symphonies are welcome diversions.

The symphony was given a splendid reading and performance. Mr. Kneisel's noble viola playing is too well-known to render it necessary to say anything more concerning it than that it was as noble as ever.

The programme of this fifteenth rehearsal and concert had for its opening number Handel's concerto for strings and two wind choirs in F, which was given with such success two or three weeks ago. Its repetition was by request, and it was as finely performed and as warmly received as before. A prelude and fugue by Otto Floersheim and Saint-Saens's. "Le Rout d'Omphale" were the remaining numbers. Mr. Floersheim is well known as a composer of no ordinary ability, and this work, composed in 1883, gave much pleasure. The "bell tones" at the opening of the prelude are skilfully harmonized, and the development is broad and stately. The fugue is also treated in a musicianly style, and the orchestration of the entire work is both effective and discreet. It was well received. The Saint-Saens number was exquisitely played, and won the heartiest applause of all.

"Childe Harold" Played at the Symphony Concert.

The programme of the fifteenth Symphony Concert was as follows: Concerto for strings and two wind choirs, in F major, Handel; prelude and fugue, Otto Floersheim (first time at these concerts); "Le Rout d'Omphale," Saint-Saens; symphony, "Harold en Italie," Berlioz. The solo viola in the symphony was played by Mr. Franz Kneisel.

The concerto of Handel was played for the first time in this city at the tenth Symphony Concert of this season. A second hearing confirms the opinion that was then expressed in The Journal: It is a remarkably fresh and vigorous work, rich in melody, interesting throughout to amateur and to pedagogue, and, above all—remember that it is at least one hundred and fifty years old—most ingeniously scored. There are many anticipations of modern instrumentation, such as the frequent antiphonal employment of contrasting instrumental families. There is a constant appreciation of the characteristic qualities of various instruments, and there is the knowledge of gaining effects by apparently simple means. The concerto was heartily enjoyed by the audience, although the performance by the orchestra was not equal to that of December in precision, purity or frankness.

This concerto of Handel was in all probability written before 1750; the Berlioz symphony, "Harold," was first played in 1834; and yet the concerto seems to-day the younger and fresher work. It was in December, 1833, that Hector Berlioz, coming out of a concert hall where his "Symphonie Fantastique" had just been performed, saw in the crowd a very tall man, whose black hair fell in neglected curls on his shoulders, "and formed a dark frame round the pale, cadaverous face, on which sorrow, genius and hell had engraved their indestructible lines." The strange being stopped him, seized his hand and poured out words of extravagant praise. It was Nicolo Paganini. Some weeks after Paganini called on him. "I have a marvelous viola," he said, "a wonderful Stradivarius, and I wish to play on it in public. I have no music. Will you write a solo for viola? I would trust you with it, and you alone." Berlioz wrote "Harold." The first movement was finished and Paganini saw it. He counted the rests in the allegro. "No, no," he cried, "I am silent there too long; I must play without ceasing." A few days after he went to Nice, a sick man. Berlioz then conceived the idea of writing four orchestral scenes, in which the viola should take part as a more or less active personage, preserving always the individuality. The symphony was first given Nov. 23, 1834. The march was repeated; the other movements were coolly received. Soon after this performance a writer in Paris began his criticism with the following pleasantry: "Ha! ha! ha!—haro! haro! Harold!" And in an anonymous letter the composer was asked why he did not have courage enough to blow out his brains.

"Harold" has been called a viola symphony, an opera without words, a viola concerto. Berlioz believed implicitly in the supreme power of orchestral instruments. He seemed to disdain the human voice. Now, as Henri Lavoix once wrote, "the singer is the most ignorant, the most rebellious of performers, but you cannot pass him by; he is a necessary evil, and you must admit that to express love and passion there is no instrument more beautiful, more tender, more moving than the human voice." The man, Childe Harold, as represented by a viola, does not appeal directly to the hearer; the composition "Harold" must then be considered as music pure and simple; and, with the exception of the first viola theme and the march, the genuine musical thought is of slight value. I do not speak now of the work as a symphony. Accept the ideas of Berlioz as presented by him; they are few and commonplace, although he tries to command the attention of the hearer by extraordinary means. This symphony with its feeble musical body covered by a gorgeous instrumental dress is not unlike Thackeray's two portraits of Louis XIV. as seen by the Court and by the valet. Strip the stately monarch of his wig and sword, purple and fine linen, lace, pads and high-heeled boots, and you find a bald little man, with a dull face and immaterial legs, supporting himself by a cane. Furthermore the dress that Berlioz so carefully ornamented has lost its dazzling hues in these days composers think more of color than of drawing; and orchestral combinations that startled in 1834 appear now almost conventional, and are in fact expected. Neither is the Berlioz of "Harold," the great Berlioz of "Romeo" and "La Damnation de Faust."

Again, Berlioz, like the man in the Bible that fell down and worshiped the idol hewn by him, bows before his work and rashly calls it good. Here, the insanity of genius is conquered by the sanity of talent; for Saint-Saens, a man of talent rather than genius, stands by his musical machine and watches with you the workings of it. Do you hear Omphale's wheel? Clever instrumentation, is it not? If you reply, "Yes, but you are wrong. The spinning wheel was unknown in Queen Omphale's time; you should have represented her with a distaff"—Saint-Saens would say, with an ironical smile, "Very true; but what do we care in music for synchronism? If I were strictly accurate, you would have no whirr. By the way, just listen to Hercules. I think he should groan a little louder."

The symphony and the symphonic poem were very well played by the orchestra, and Mr. Kneisel played the viola part in the symphony with exceeding taste and skill.

Mr. Nikisch directed conscientiously the prelude and fugue by Mr. Otto Floersheim. The prelude, with its imitation of church bells, contains the elements of popularity, and will no doubt always be a pleasing number in concerts of a lighter nature. The fugue, according to the programme book of Saturday evening, is an attempt to clothe "the old form with modern harmonization and the glorious garb of the modern orchestra." In this attempt Mr. Floersheim is not entirely successful. The fugue is a stiff-necked child of the Muse, and it does not lend itself gracefully to such radically modern treatment. Still Mr. Floersheim has shown in this work much ingenuity, and it must be remembered that he set for himself a difficult and an ungrateful task.

The Fifteenth Symphony Concert.

The only novelty on the programme, Saturday night, was the "Prelude and Fugue" by Otto Floersheim, whose compositions have been heard before in these concerts. They are the work of a skilful musician who has a good command of modern orchestral effects as well as the possession of spontaneity. The "Prelude and Fugue" is an interesting number, although the Fugue is not carried out in the strictly fugal style, the elaborate instrumentation perhaps serving somewhat to hide its development. The composition, however, is one of fine musicianship and effective orchestral writing, and the most pretentious that Mr. Floersheim has yet given us.

194

It was played in a heavy, cumbersome manner by the orchestra, which, generally speaking, did quite fairly with its work during the whole programme. The wood-wind, however, after a most rational employment of its forces during the performance of "Le Rouet d'Omphale" of Saint-Saëns, had to spoil the otherwise beautiful ending by quacking, like a lot of ducks, on the last four chords, instead of merely breathing them out. It didn't appear to annoy the conductor, however. If the players had offended so harshly under Gericke's direction he would have rebuked them, and perhaps discharged them at the end of the concert. Some people, however, have a musical hide that is impervious to such thrusts.

The other numbers of the programme were the Handel concerto for strings and two wind orchestras, played quite recently, and Berlioz's Symphony, "Harold in Italy," Mr. Kneisel playing the viola solo.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Conductor Nikisch gave a somewhat odd combination of works at last evening's concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra, but his choice appeared to meet with the hearty approval of the house full of patrons.

The first number was the concerto for strings and two wind choirs in F major by Handel, this being played "by special request." The work has interesting characteristics in the way of an orchestral study; and, as it was played with most admirable skill throughout, it may be well to accept it as a contribution to the educational interests of the season.

Mr. Otto Floersheim's "Prelude and Fugue" followed, and proved a most scientific piece of musical composition, showing the ingenuity and remarkable skill of this composer who, upon the suggestion of the tones of two bells of a chime, heard on Easter morning, has built this prelude and fugue in a way to give a splendid chance for analytical study. The use of the modern substitutes for bells, steel bars instead of the glockenspiel, would give a more impressive character to the introduction, but the full orchestra of today has been employed otherwise in the most masterly manner in this strikingly original composition.

Saint-Saëns' symphonic poem, "Le Rouet d'Omphale," followed, and a more thoroughly pleasing performance of the work has seldom been had here. Mr. Nikisch showed off the string department of the orchestra in splendid shape in this number, the final pianissimo being brought down to the veriest whisper of a tone.

Whatever was dull and uninteresting in the beginning of the programme was made good in its finish, for it ended with Berlioz' symphony, "Harold in Italy," in which the viola solo was played by Mr. Franz Kneisel.

Mr. Nikisch gave a charming interpretation of the brilliant work done by the composer throughout the four movements, and aroused his audience to repeated demonstrations of approval by the way in which he brought out the beauties of the work, and Mr. Kneisel gave him splendid aid in his solo playing.

The orchestra go on a tour the coming week, returning for the 18th concert on Feb. 20, when Mr. W. H. Sherwood will be the soloist.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Works of Handel, Floersheim, Saint-Saëns and Berlioz Played.

The programme selected by Conductor Nikisch for last evening's Symphony concert gave his splendid band varied opportunities for displaying its resources, and a large audience expressed cordial commendation of all that was offered.

The first number was Handel's concerto for strings and two wind choirs, in F major. This was stated to have been given in response to a special request, presumably by some one of uncommon influence.

The work was played by the Symphony orchestra during Christmas week, and yesterday's performance, being an identical repetition, calls for no comment at this time further than to state that it proved very welcome to the audience.

Otto Floersheim's prelude and fugue was played for the first time at these concerts, and made rather a favorable impression, although no demonstration of enjoyment followed its performance.

The composer is said to have gained his inspiration for the composition from being awakened on an Easter Sunday morning by the chimes of a neighboring church. They sounded two notes, E and B, in a descending, and their continued regularity set his mind to harmonizing them.

These chimes are introduced in the prelude with impressive effect, and then follows a well developed theme of religious fervency which is finally moulded into a fugue, treated with modern orchestral effects. Mr. Nikisch read the work with expression of dignity and solemnity in keeping with the religious character of the composition.

Very dainty and beautiful was the orchestra's playing of Saint-Saëns' symphonic poem, "The Spinning Wheel of Omphale." The music is rarely suggestive of the several themes which it so delightfully treats, and its hearing gave a deal of pleasure.

Berlioz's symphony, "Harold in Italy," was one of the most attractive features of the programme, for in addition to the pleasure of listening to the beautiful harmonies of one of the greatest tone masters that France has ever given to the world there was the further pleasure of hearing Mr. Franz Kneisel as a viola soloist. As a violinist Mr. Kneisel probably ranks first among local players in the regard of the Boston musical public, and wherever he appears as a soloist he is assured of a most cordial welcome. He played the strangely sweet and expressive themes with delicious effect; especially delightful were the passages significant of the pilgrim's march. The orchestra work was also very commendable.

The orchestra will be away from Boston this week, and the next concert will not be given until Feb. 20. On Wednesday evening, March 2, there will be an extra concert for the benefit of the members of the orchestra.

MUSICAL.

The Symphony Concert.

95

The concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, last evening, opened with selections from the Handel concerto, in F, for strings and two wind choirs, heard at a recent concert. It was a genuine delight to listen to this old but still fresh and vigorous music again. It was finely played throughout and with an admirable appreciation of its true character; and was heartily enjoyed, as was evidenced by the cordial applause that attended it. The last movement, with its pretty and brilliant oboe bravura, which by the way, was exquisitely performed, met with special favor. Then followed a prelude and Fugue by Mr. Otto Floersheim, which was given for the first time at these concerts on this occasion. It is the most musicianly of the works we have heard by this composer, is richly scored and with a thorough knowledge of the resources of the modern orchestra. In fact the work is well-written throughout, but the "fugue" is not a fugue in any sense that we have hitherto understood a fugue. After the subject has been fully entered, the movement resolves itself into a succession of imitations on various degrees of the scale, with now and then an episode suggesting a Wagnerian influence, and anything but a fugal style. The theme is always prominent, but the counterpoint that accompanies it never brought distinctly to the surface, and of double counterpoint and other fugal devices there was nothing that was recognizable as such. There is likewise no stretto. We doubt if the movement would bear analyzing as a fugue. However, it shows excellent musicianship, is ingenious and skilful in its harmonies, and, as we have said, admirable in its instrumental effects. It was interesting in the hearing, and we think would have been heard with still better results if it had been played with something more of flexibility. The charming Saint-Saëns "Spinning Wheel of Omphale" was beautifully read and performed and obtained the heartiest applause of the evening. The concert ended with Berlioz's symphony, "Harold in Italy." The work is not as impressive as it once was. The first movement and the last are felt to be too long, and the only movement to which the interest still clings is the March of the Pilgrims. It is curious to reflect that a work which was once lauded for its fire and brilliancy, should have become so tame and dull. It was well read and efficiently played, Mr. Kneisel performing the viola solo in a style of great finish, but without that largeness of tone that is necessary to make the solo part stand out with due prominence. The programme for the next concert is Symphony, G-minor, Mozart; concerto for pianoforte, op. 185, Raff; Symphonic Suite, Busoni, (first time); Huldigung's March, Wagner. The soloist is Mr. W. H. Sherwood. The programme books, by the way, are becoming almost useless, for all the information they afford of the works performed. Not a word was devoted to the Berlioz symphony, but there was a ridiculous portrait of the emperor, a gushing sonnet made up of threadbare commonplaces, meaning nothing in particular, and the well-worn story of the composer's life. To the Handel work there was not even an allusion.

It is all very smart for the Gazette which never loses an opportunity to get in a fling at a certain local conductor, to say in commenting upon the bad orchestral work at a recent concert that "the fault, of course, is with the conductor, who should compel obedience to the dynamic marks placed by the composer in his score." But the Gazette ought to know out of its own professional experience that it is no easier to "compel" a hired band to follow a conductor's orders than it is to make a horse drink. The conductor against whom our contemporary has so much objection—it sometimes appears like prejudice—has of course his faults and flaws; but if musicians play carelessly and wrong after proper rehearsal, it is their fault and not his.

CYNICISMS.

Music Hall is surprisingly eclectic in its devotion to art, and its freedom from prejudices is illustrated by the fact that it has been devoted to every class of uplifting entertainment, from Symphony concerts to poultry exhibitions; from oratorio to dog shows; from miscellaneous concerts to walking matches; from the piano playing of Von Bülow, Paderewski and other masters of finger-play, to Messrs. Sullivan, Murphy, O'Connell, Lynch, McGovern, Flaherty, Donovan, O'Rourke and other masters of fist play. On Saturday evening a week ago, the statue of Beethoven looked down on the artists who were playing the "Eroica" symphony; on last Monday evening it looked down on a display of fist-cuffs, kept within strictly moral bounds by the chastening presence of three distinguished Aldermen. The performances were of a varied order of merit. Among the interesting features was a duet between Mr. Jimmy Hearst and Mr. Doc O'Connell. Both artists manifested the possession of excellent technique, but unfortunately they indulged too vigorously in thumping. Mr. Hearst has a firm touch, and in allegro movements is particularly felicitous. His martellato playing on Mr. O'Connell's nose was full of energy. In the fugato that followed, Mr. O'Connell was scarcely in strict time, and he indulged over-much in sickly sentimental rallentando. Mr. Denny Sullivan gave a delightful display of virtuosity in his duet with Mr. Johnny Murphy, and in an allegro con moto his execution was worthy of the highest praise, especially in a minor episode that had for its subject Mr. Murphy's stomach. The break of the latter into an andante patetico, admirably sustained in point of facial expression, was very fine. Mr. Flaherty's execution in a lively dance movement was excellent, notably in its crispness of touch in a species of free fantasia on Mr. Ghiblin's left eye; but this was scarcely equal to the certainty to which Mr. Lynch played on the mouth of Mr. Dennis, bringing the movement to a close by a spirited stretto, in which, by an ingenious accelerando under Mr. Dennis's chin, he caused his fellow artist's teeth to imitate the playing of castanets. The fault to be found with the programme was the sameness of its selections which proved monotonous. Everything was in the same school. Still, we cannot speak in terms of too warm admiration of a tour de force in which Mr. Billy Wilson, in a splendid outburst con strepitoso, sent Mr. Jim Butler flying prestissimo into the lap of Chairman Sullivan; though there was rare expressiveness in the adagio doloroso with which Mr. Butler returned to the opening theme. All the artists may be complimented on the earnestness of their efforts and their warmth of style. Boston is to be congratulated on the possession of a temple of art in which there are no restrictions against anything that is lofty and ennobling; that is open alike to the performance of works by the great composers, triumphs in poultry raising and dog breeding, and the uplifting intellectually of fist-cuffs. The softening and elevating influences of pugilism were edifyingly shown by the large and brilliant audience present on this delightful occasion.

CHATTERER.

not carried out in the strictly fugal style, the elaborate instrumentation perhaps serving somewhat to hide its development. The composition, however, is one of fine musicianship and effective orchestral writing, and the most pretentious that Mr. Floersheim has yet given us.

It was played in a heavy, cumbersome manner by the orchestra, which, generally speaking, did quite fairly with its work during the whole programme. The wood-wind, however, after a most rational employment of its forces during the performance of "Le Rouet d'Omphale" of Saint-Saens, had to spoil the otherwise beautiful ending by quacking, like a lot of ducks, on the last four chords, instead of merely breathing them out. It didn't appear to annoy the conductor, however. If the players had offended so harshly under Gericke's direction he would have rebuked them, and perhaps discharged them at the end of the concert. Some people, however, have a musical hide that is impervious to such thrusts.

The other numbers of the programme were the Handel concerto for strings and two wind orchestras, played quite recently, and Berlioz's Symphony, "Harold in Italy," Mr. Kneisel playing the viola solo.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Conductor Nikisch gave a somewhat odd combination of works at last evening's concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra, but his choice appeared to meet with the hearty approval of the house full of patrons.

The first number was the concerto for strings and two wind choirs in F major by Handel, this being played "by special request." The work has interesting characteristics in the way of an orchestral study; and, as it was played with most admirable skill throughout, it may be well to accept it as a contribution to the educational interests of the season.

Mr. Otto Floersheim's "Prelude and Fugue" followed, and proved a most scientific piece of musical composition, showing the ingenuity and remarkable skill of this composer who, upon the suggestion of the tones of two bells of a chime, heard on Easter morning, has built this prelude and fugue in a way to give a splendid chance for analytical study. The use of the modern substitutes for bells, steel bars instead of the glockenspiel, would give a more impressive character to the introduction, but the full orchestra of today has been employed otherwise in the most masterly manner in this strikingly original composition.

Saint-Saens' symphonic poem, "Le Rouet d'Omphale," followed, and a more thoroughly pleasing performance of the work has seldom been had here. Mr. Nikisch showed off the string department of the orchestra in splendid shape in this number, the final pianissimo being brought down to the veriest whisper of a tone.

Whatever was dull and uninteresting in the beginning of the programme was made good in its finish, for it ended with Berlioz' symphony, "Harold in Italy," in which the viola solo was played by Mr. Franz Kneisel.

Mr. Nikisch gave a charming interpretation of the brilliant work done by the composer throughout the four movements, and aroused his audience to repeated demonstrations of approval by the way in which he brought out the beauties of the work, and Mr. Kneisel gave him splendid aid in his solo playing.

The orchestra go on a tour the coming week, returning for the 16th concert on Feb. 20, when Mr. W. H. Sherwood will be the soloist.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Works of Handel, Floersheim, Saint-Saens and Berlioz Played.

The programme selected by Conductor Nikisch for last evening's Symphony concert gave his splendid band varied opportunities for displaying its resources, and a large audience expressed cordial commendation of all that was offered.

The first number was Handel's concerto for strings and two wind choirs, in F major. This was stated to have been given in response to a special request, presumably by some one of uncommon influence.

The work was played by the Symphony orchestra during Christmas week, and yesterday's performance, being an identical repetition, calls for no comment at this time further than to state that it proved very welcome to the audience.

Otto Floersheim's prelude and fugue was played for the first time at these concerts, and made rather a favorable impression, although no demonstration of enjoyment followed its performance.

The composer is said to have gained his inspiration for the composition from being awakened on an Easter Sunday morning by the chimes of a neighboring church. They sounded two notes, E and B, in a descending, and their continued regularity set his mind to harmonizing them.

These chimes are introduced in the prelude with impressive effect, and then follows a well developed theme of religious fervency which is finally moulded into a fugue, treated with modern orchestral effects. Mr. Nikisch read the work with expression of dignity and solemnity in keeping with the religious character of the composition.

Very dainty and beautiful was the orchestra's playing of Saint-Saens' symphonic poem, "The Spinning Wheel of Omphale." The music is rarely suggestive of the several themes which it so delightfully treats, and its hearing gave a deal of pleasure.

Berlioz's symphony, "Harold in Italy," was one of the most attractive features of the programme, for in addition to the pleasure of listening to the beautiful harmonies of one of the greatest tone masters that France has ever given to the world there was the further pleasure of hearing Mr. Franz Kneisel as a viola soloist. As a violinist Mr. Kneisel probably ranks first among local players in the regard of the Boston musical public, and wherever he appears as a soloist he is assured of a most cordial welcome. He played the strangely sweet and expressive themes with delicious effect; especially delightful were the passages significant of the pilgrim's march. The orchestra work was also very commendable.

The orchestra will be away from Boston this week, and the next concert will not be given until Feb. 20. On Wednesday evening, March 2, there will be an extra concert for the benefit of the members of the orchestra.

MUSICAL.

The Symphony Concert.

The concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, last evening, opened with selections from the Handel concerto, in F, for strings and two wind choirs, heard at a recent concert. It was a genuine delight to listen to this old but still fresh and vigorous music again. It was finely played throughout and with an admirable appreciation of its true character; and was heartily enjoyed, as was evidenced by the cordial applause that attended it. The last movement, with its pretty and brilliant oboe bravura, which by the way, was exquisitely performed, met with special favor. Then followed a prelude and fugue by Mr. Otto Floersheim, which was given for the first time at these concerts on this occasion. It is the most musically of the works we have heard by this composer, is richly scored and with a thorough knowledge of the resources of the modern orchestra. In fact the work is well-written throughout, but the "fugue" is not a fugue in any sense that we have hitherto understood a fugue. After the subject has been fully entered, the movement resolves itself into a succession of imitations on various degrees of the scale, with now and then an episode suggesting a Wagnerian influence, and anything but a fugal style. The theme is always prominent, but the counterpoint that accompanies it never brought distinctly to the surface, and of double counterpoint and other fugal devices there was nothing that was recognizable as such. There is likewise no stretto. We doubt if the movement would bear analyzing as a fugue. However, it shows excellent musicianship, is ingenious and skilful in its harmonies, and, as we have said, admirable in its instrumental effects. It was interesting in the hearing, and we think would have been heard with still better results if it had been played with something more of flexibility. The charming Saint-Saens "Spinning Wheel of Omphale" was beautifully read and performed and obtained the heartiest applause of the evening. The concert ended with Berlioz's symphony, "Harold in Italy." The work is not as impressive as it once was. The first movement and the last are felt to be too long, and the only movement to which the interest still clings is the March of the Pilgrims. It is curious to reflect that a work which was once lauded for its fire and brilliancy, should have become so tame and dull. It was well read and efficiently played, Mr. Kneisel performing the viola solo in a style of great finish, but without that largeness of tone that is necessary to make the solo part stand out with due prominence. The programme for the next concert is Symphony, G-minor, Mozart; concerto for pianoforte, op. 185, Raff; Symphonic Suite, Busoni, (first time); Huldigung's March, Wagner. The soloist is Mr. W. H. Sherwood. The programme books, by the way, are becoming almost useless, for all the information they afford of the works performed. Not a word was devoted to the Berlioz symphony, but there was a ridiculous portrait of the emperor, a gushing sonnet made up of threadbare commonplaces, meaning nothing in particular, and the well-worn story of the composer's life. To the Handel work there was not even an allusion.

It is all very smart for the Gazette which never loses an opportunity to get in a fling at a certain local conductor, to say in commenting upon the bad orchestral work at a recent concert that "the fault, of course, is with the conductor, who should compel obedience to the dynamic marks placed by the composer in his score." But the Gazette ought to know out of its own professional experience that it is no easier to "compel" a hired band to follow a conductor's orders than it is to make a horse drink. The conductor against whom our contemporary has so much objection—it sometimes appears like prejudice—has of course his faults and flaws; but if musicians play carelessly and wrong after proper rehearsal, it is their fault and not his.

CYNICISMS.

Music Hall is surprisingly eclectic in its devotion to art, and its freedom from prejudices is illustrated by the fact that it has been devoted to every class of uplifting entertainment, from Symphony concerts to poultry exhibitions; from oratorio to dog shows; from miscellaneous concerts to walking matches; from the piano playing of Von Bülow, Paderewski and other masters of finger-play, to Messrs. Sullivan, Murphy, O'Connell, Lynch, McGovern, Flaherty, Donovan, O'Rourke and other masters of fist play. On Saturday evening a week ago, the statue of Beethoven looked down on the artists who were playing the "Eroica" symphony; on last Monday evening it looked down on a display of fist-cuffs, kept within strictly moral bounds by the chastening presence of three distinguished Aldermen. The performances were of a varied order of merit. Among the interesting features was a duet between Mr. Jimmy Hearst and Mr. Doc O'Connell. Both artists manifested the possession of excellent technique, but unfortunately they indulged too vigorously in thumping. Mr. Hearst has a firm touch, and in allegro movements is particularly felicitous. His martellato playing on Mr. O'Connell's nose was full of energy. In the fugato that followed, Mr. O'Connell was scarcely in strict time, and he indulged over-much in sickly sentimental rallentando. Mr. Denny Sullivan gave a delightful display of virtuosity in his duet with Mr. Johnny Murphy, and in an allegro con moto his execution was worthy of the highest praise, especially in a minor episode that had for its subject Mr. Murphy's stomach. The break of the latter into an andante patetico, admirably sustained in point of facial expression, was very fine. Mr. Flaherty's execution in a lively dance movement was excellent, notably in its crispness of touch in a species of free fantasia on Mr. Giblin's left eye; but this was scarcely equal to the certainty to which Mr. Lynch played on the mouth of Mr. Dennis, bringing the movement to a close by a spirited stretto, in which, by an ingenious accelerando under Mr. Dennis's chin, he caused his fellow artist's teeth to imitate the playing of castanets. The fault to be found with the programme was the sameness of its selections which proved monotonous. Everything was in the same school. Still, we cannot speak in terms of too warm admiration of a tour de force in which Mr. Billy Wilson, in a splendid outburst con strepitoso, sent Mr. Jim Butler flying prestissimo into the lap of Chairman Sullivan; though there was rare expressiveness in the maglo doloroso with which Mr. Butler returned to the opening theme. All the artists may be complimented on the earnestness of their efforts and their warmth of style. Boston is to be congratulated on the possession of a temple of art in which there are no restrictions against anything that is lofty and ennobling; that is open alike to the performance of works by the great composers, triumphs in poultry raising and dog breeding, and the uplifting intellectually of fist-cuffs. The softening and elevating influences of pugilism were edifyingly shown by the large and brilliant audience present on this delightful occasion.

CHATTERER.

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the fifteenth symphony concert was as follows:

Handel: Concerto for strings and two wind bands, in F.

Floersheim: Prelude and Fugue.

Saint-Saëns: Symphonic Poem; "Le rouet d'Omphale."

Berlioz: Symphony No. 2. "Harold en Italie" (solo viola by Mr. Kneisel.)

Handel's concerto was well worth repeating; a work of such freshness, vitality and vigor is good for every one to listen to, even if it be in a by-gone style. No better tonic can be imagined; after the somewhat morbid strenuousness of much of our modern music, it came like a "Sunday in the country" to dwellers in stuffy streets.

It was rather hard on Mr. Floersheim's prelude and fugue to play it immediately after a work by such a master of fugal writing as Handel. It showed all the difference between free, natural, genial development and carefully laborious construction. It may be taken as a foregone conclusion that any composer today—with very few exceptions—who attempts to write a fully developed fugue will do himself more good by the exercise than he will anyone else. Modern fugues, as a rule, smell so terribly of the lamp, they are so blistered with sweat-drops from the writer's brow, that one is often in doubt whether they should properly be called musical compositions. But it can be said of Mr. Floersheim that he has, in this case, shown a noble ambition, and has, upon the whole, succeeded better in his task than was to be expected.

Still one could not but feel, with Saint-Saëns's "Rouet d'Omphale," that here was the way in which a composer of today naturally writes, when he gives his inventive fancy free flight, and does not attempt a tour de force. Handel and Bach could fly on fugal wings; modern composers can, for the most part, only painfully trudge along in fugal shackles. What a pretty, genial, fanciful conceit this "Rouet d'Omphale" is! It shows the best, perhaps the only good side of modern French music.

In respect to Berlioz's "Harold" symphony we would permit ourselves to recall a remark we made some years ago: we think it a great mistake to give the work even a semblance of being a viola concerto by having the solo viola part played standing. Mr. Kneisel's usual place, at the head of the first violins, would allow his playing to be seen quite plainly by the audience, and would give the viola part all needful prominence. The notion of having this part played standing seems to have come from the idea that the "Harold" symphony was written as a sort of viola concerto for Paganini. This, however, is not quite true; Paganini ordered a viola concerto of Berlioz, but it did not turn out as he expected. Berlioz showed Paganini the first movement, and the great violinist immediately cried out: "It is not what I want! I am silent too long in it; I must be playing all the time." Berlioz himself writes thus about the matter: "Recognizing that my plan could not suit him, I set to work to carry it out for another purpose, and without troubling myself any further about the means of giving prominence to the principal viola. It came into my head to write a series of scenes for orchestra, in which the solo viola should take part as a more or less active dramatis persona, but always preserving its own proper character. By placing the viola in the midst of the poetic memories I had kept of my wanderings in the Abruzzi, I wished to make it a sort of melancholy dreamer, like Byron's Childe Harold." We can see from this that, whatever intentions Berlioz may have had at first of treating the solo part as a viola concertante, he abandoned the idea after the first movement; and also that, even in the first movement, far less prominence was given to the part than could possibly suit a solo player like Paganini. Still it might be claimed that all this furnished no conclusive reason why Mr. Kneisel should not play the part standing. Our objections are wholly of a practical nature. There are some passages in which the viola part is so doubled by other instruments in the orchestra that its own tone is very much obscured; in these passages, if the player stands out in front of the orchestra, as if playing an actual solo, his prominent position on the stage leads one instinctively to try to catch every note that falls from his bow, and such concentration of the attention upon this single point distracts the listener from following the real development of the music.

But the symphony was wonderfully played! Mr. Kneisel infused more of poetic reverie into Harold's soliloquies than heretofore, and played throughout with admirable expressiveness. His and Mr. Nikisch's handling of the tempo in the first movement was simply masterly, and showed us for the first time the true meaning of the music. The ineffably beautiful pilgrims' march, and the quaint Scherzo were given to perfection. Only in the Finale did we feel that something was lacking; a little more fury would have done it no harm.

The next programme (Feb. 20) is: Mozart, symphony in G minor; Raff, pianoforte concerto, in C minor, op. 185; Busoni, symphonic suite; Wagner, Huldigungsmarsch. Mr. William H. Sherwood will be the pianist.

The Fifteenth Symphony Concert.

The only novelty on the programme, Saturday night, was the "Prelude and Fugue" by Otto Floersheim, whose compositions have been heard before in these concerts. They are the work of a skillful musician who has a good command of modern orchestral effects as well as the possession of spontaneity. The "Prelude and Fugue" is an interesting number, although the Fugue is not carried out in the strictly fugal style, the elaborate instrumentation perhaps serving somewhat to hide its development. The composition, however, is one of fine musicianship and effective orchestral writing, and the most pretentious that Mr. Floersheim has yet given us.

It was played in a heavy, cumbersome manner by the orchestra, which, generally speaking, did quite fairly with its work during the whole programme. The wood-wind, however, after a most rational employment of its forces during the performance of "Le Rouet d'Omphale" of Saint-Saëns, had to spoil the otherwise beautiful ending by quacking, like a lot of ducks, on the last four chords, instead of merely breathing them out. It didn't appear to annoy the conductor, however. If the players had offended so harshly under Gericke's direction he would have rebuked them, and perhaps discharged them at the end of the concert. Some people, however, have a musical hide that is impervious to such thrusts.

The other numbers of the programme were the Handel concerto for strings and two wind orchestras, played quite recently, and Berlioz's Symphony, "Harold in Italy," Mr. Kneisel playing the viola solo.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

adv: The Symphony Concert.

The 15th symphony concert was given last Saturday evening with a programme including a concerto by Handel for strings and two wind choirs, and a prelude and fugue by Otto Floersheim. The performance of the old Handel concerto was a source of genuine enjoyment to the audience, and the hearty spontaneous applause which attended it was well-merited. The strings were at their best, the precision of attack, the shading and general effect being admirable. The work of the horns was excellent and the whole concerto was played in strict accordance with the character and demands of the music. The difficult passages for the oboes, in the last movement, were exquisitely rendered and the audience was not slow in evincing their keen appreciation of the fact.

The prelude and fugue, by Otto Floersheim, is by far the best and most mature work we have yet heard by this talented composer. It opens with two notes, E and B, in a descending fourth, sounded by the bells (glockenspiel), repeated with continued regularity and harmonized in a very clever manner. This effect was suggested to the composer by being awakened one Easter Sunday morning by the chimes of a neighboring church, whose constant reiteration of two tones set his mind to harmonizing them almost unconsciously. After this ceases a broad theme is introduced, which is worked up with much fervency and richness of orchestral coloring to a sonorous climax, followed again by the chimes and gradually dying away until it ends on one long sustained note for a single flute, a very clever and effective device. The fugue is constructed on the broad theme of the prelude, only this time it is in 4-4 time, where as in the prelude it was 6-4 time.

The programme states that the fugue is written in almost religiously strict style, but it must be confessed that a first hearing of the work does not bear out this statement. The work is admirably written and shows a master hand in the technique of orchestral writing, all the wealth of rich and noble effects of the modern orchestral school being brought into the treatment of it. This fact, coupled with the rather stiff manner in which the orchestra played the composition, may have obscured many of the contrapuntal effects intended by the composer, but the impression left by the performance was, that it was a most admirable and musicianly composition in free fugal style, rather than a "strict fugue." The noble climax rising in the strings in the middle portion was cleverly managed and very effective. The work deserved far greater recognition than it received.

The Saint-Saëns "Spinning Wheel" was delightfully done, and here again the fine work of the strings deserves praise; in fact, the work of the whole orchestra in this number was the best effort of the evening and received the most hearty and prolonged applause.

The Berlioz symphony has been heard too often to elicit extended comment; it was played with the requisite fire and brilliancy but the extreme length of the first and last movements seemed to impress one more than usual on this occasion, possibly from the fact that it followed the bright Saint-Saëns number, with its beauty of treatment and ingenuity of orchestration.

Mr. Kneisel played the viola solo in a thoroughly finished and artistic manner.

C. F. D.

LATE AT THE SYMPHONY.

It is a very fine thing to be rich, but, now and then, the advantage is with the man of humbler means. Friday afternoon, as I stood in the doorway of Music Hall, watching the people on their way to the Symphony concert rehearsal, I thought of this, says a writer in the Mahogany Tree.

A long line of carriages stood, waiting to get up to the entrance. Down there, at the corner of Tremont street, Mrs. Blueblood sat impatiently in her coupe. There were 20 carriages ahead of hers, I fancy, and it was nearly half-past 2 o'clock. She looked out her carriage window and saw the smiling pedestrians hurry by. Just why she did not get out and walk the short distance to the hall I cannot say, but, anyway, she sat there in her carriage, looking very unhappy.

198
In the mean time the pedestrians who had walked by her had taken their seats in the hall, Mr. Nikisch had taken his place, and the concert had begun. In the midst of the second movement of the symphony there was a stir at the door which disturbed the whole audience. Mr. Nikisch, too, I imagine, was disturbed, but there was no help for it—the noise was caused by Mrs. Blueblood and a number of her belated friends.

The gloom of Music Hall during an afternoon performance there of any description is one of the Boston ways of expressing indifference to outward tokens of human comfort and vanity. Art, toujours art, and never a chance for the frivolous to see who's who in the benches in front, is the motto that hangs upon that temple's walls. Whether you go to hear Paderewski or to sit through the solemn service of a symphony rehearsal, the idea seems to prevail that the dim religious light not only helps the hearing, but gives "tone" to the congregation assembled. But people who have to go peering around Music Hall trying to make out their neighbors, generally tumble against somebody they wish to avoid or miss those they really want to see. Perhaps this does not so much matter at a rehearsal, for there all Boston is labelled. There is no difficulty in "spotting" friend or foe, for the season ticket holder could walk blindfold from "A" to "A A" and name the occupants of every row, but for the "casual," who may not possess this unerring instinct and who likes to read the programme without endangering his eyesight, this "Gotterdammerung," as given in Music Hall, is rather trying! One night this season when we heard Patti farewell there, the light was fairly brilliant, and I wondered how it happened; if it could be the extra sparkle of the diva's jewels that so heightened the scene and made such a grateful change in the often darksome hall. It is true one wants to listen to some music without regard to his surroundings, and it must be said the real lover is inclined to shut his eyes when drawing in delight through the sense of hearing. This is particularly the case when Miss Japonica's millinery screens the performer, and the skillful adjustment of feathers has no interest for the person behind her. Then man has no use for eyes, and he can hide his head in a bag without a murmur.

And now while I am grumbling, let me present a much worse affliction to the consideration of patrons of public entertainments. What is the matter with all the clocks and timekeepers in town? Can it be that people like to be always late at concerts? That it is no consequence to them if they miss the first numbers, and bring the artist to a complete pause in order that they may reach their seats? Or is it because they fail to keep any track of time and "drop in" haphazard between shopping and afternoon visits? I have been to many concerts, both afternoon and evening, this season, and in no instance has it ever happened that nearly a third of the audience has not straggled into the hall fully 35 minutes after the time announced in the newspapers or on the tickets. The whole audience has been disturbed by the hurried entrances, by the clash and clatter of seats and the performers themselves have been forced to wait the return of silence with as much dignity and unconcern as the embarrassment warranted. Mr. de Pachmann has more than once shown his displeasure at this gratuitous interruption, and Mr. Paderewski, who evidently hoped to get the better of it by being late himself in arriving, has frowned beneath his mask, and even sworn, so it is said, in the privacy of the dressing room at this rudeness of his fond admirers. Apparently at the symphony rehearsals it is considered "low" to be early. Only the admissionaries, if I may coin a word, arrive betimes and make an afternoon of it. But they go for the sake of the music, and not to be seen. Of course, it can be argued that this is a free country, and when one pays for his or her ticket it is nobody's business at what moment the holder gives it up to the "ticket person," as a well known social light designated one of our hall guardians the other day. Nevertheless, what a blessing it would be if Boston's noble army of concert-goers could be smitten with a fever of punctuality!

41
199
Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1891-92.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

XVI. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 20, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

MOZART.

SYMPHONY, in G minor.

Allegro molto.—Andante.—Minuet.—Allegro assai.

RAFF.

CONCERTO for PIANOFORTE, in C minor, op. 185.

Allegro.—Andante, quasi larghetto.—Finale, Allegro.

BUSONI.

SYMPHONIC SUITE, op. 25. (Three movements)

Gigue.—Gavotte.—Allegro fugato.

(First time.)

WAGNER.

HULDIGUNG'S MARCH.

SOLOIST:

Mr. WILLIAM H. SHERWOOD.

The Pianoforte is a Mason & Hamlin.

198
In the mean time the pedestrians who had walked by her had taken their seats in the hall. Mr. Nikisch had taken his place, and the concert had begun. In the midst of the second movement of the symphony there was a stir at the door which disturbed the whole audience. Mr. Nikisch, too, I imagine, was disturbed, but there was no help for it—the noise was caused by Mrs. Blueblood and a number of her belated friends.

The gloom of Music Hall during an afternoon performance there of any description is one of the Boston ways of expressing indifference to outward tokens of human comfort and vanity. Art, toujours art, and never a chance for the frivolous to see who's who in the benches in front, is the motto that hangs upon that temple's walls. Whether you go to hear Paderewski or to sit through the solemn service of a symphony rehearsal, the idea seems to prevail that the dim religious light not only helps the hearing, but gives "tone" to the congregation assembled. But people who have to go peering around Music Hall trying to make out their neighbors, generally tumble against somebody they wish to avoid or miss those they really want to see. Perhaps this does not so much matter at a rehearsal, for there all Boston is labelled. There is no difficulty in "spotting" friend or foe, for the season ticket holder could walk blindfold from "A" to "A A" and name the occupants of every row, but for the "casual," who may not possess this unerring instinct and who likes to read the programme without endangering his eyesight, this "Gotterdammerung," as given in Music Hall, is rather trying! One night this season when we heard Patti farewell there, the light was fairly brilliant, and I wondered how it happened; if it could be the extra sparkle of the diva's jewels that so heightened the scene and made such a grateful change in the often darksome hall. It is true one wants to listen to some music without regard to his surroundings, and it must be said the real lover is inclined to shut his eyes when drawing in delight through the sense of hearing. This is particularly the case when Miss Japonica's millinery screens the performer, and the skilful adjustment of feathers has no interest for the person behind her. Then man has no use for eyes, and he can hide his head in a bag without a murmur.

And now while I am grumbling, let me present a much worse affliction to the consideration of patrons of public entertainments. What is the matter with all the clocks and timekeepers in town? Can it be that people like to be always late at concerts? That it is no consequence to them if they miss the first numbers, and bring the artist to a complete pause in order that they may reach their seats? Or is it because they fail to keep any track of time and "drop in" haphazard between shopping and afternoon visits? I have been to many concerts, both afternoon and evening, this season, and in no instance has it ever happened that nearly a third of the audience has not straggled into the hall fully 35 minutes after the time announced in the newspapers or on the tickets. The whole audience has been disturbed by the hurried entrances, by the clash and clatter of seats and the performers themselves have been forced to wait the return of silence with as much dignity and unconcern as the embarrassment warranted. Mr. de Pachmann has more than once shown his displeasure at this gratuitous interruption, and Mr. Paderewski, who evidently hoped to get the better of it by being late himself in arriving, has frowned beneath his mask, and even sworn, so it is said, in the privacy of the dressing room at this rudeness of his fond admirers. Apparently at the symphony rehearsals it is considered "low" to be early. Only the admissionaries, if I may coin a word, arrive betimes and make an afternoon of it. But they go for the sake of the music, and not to be seen. Of course, it can be argued that this is a free country, and when one pays for his or her ticket it is nobody's business at what moment the holder gives it up to the "ticket person," as a well known social light designated one of our hall guardians the other day. Nevertheless, what a blessing it would be if Boston's noble army of concert-goers could be smitten with a fever of punctuality!

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1891-92.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

XVI. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 20, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

MOZART.	SYMPHONY, in G minor. Allegro molto—Andante—Allegro—Adagio
RAFF.	CONCERTO for PIANOFORTE, in C minor, op. 185. Allegro—Andante—Moderato—Allegro
BRUNN.	SYMPHONIC SUITE, op. 25. (Three movements) Allegro—Andante—Allegro—Moderato (First time.)
WAGNER.	HULDIGUNG'S MARCH.

SOLOIST:

Mr. WILLIAM H. SHERWOOD.

The Pianoforte is a Mason & Hamlin.

THE SYMPHONIES.

SIXTEENTH CONCERT.

The programme of the sixteenth Symphony concert in Music hall, Saturday evening, Feb. 20, was:

Mozart, Symphony, in G minor.
Allegro molto.—Andante.—Minuet.—
Allegro assai.

Raff, Concerto for pianoforte, in C minor,
op. 185.

Allegro.—Andante, quasi larghetto.—
Finale, allegro.

Busoni, Symphonic suite, op. 25. (Three movements)

Gigue.—Gavotte.—Allegro fugato.
(First time.)

Wagner.—Huldigung's March.

Soloist: Mr. William H. Sherwood.

The symphony in G minor, which is musically interesting, by many thought to be Mozart's liebling, was read splendidly so far as the notes were concerned; but Mr. Nikisch imparted altogether too much modern thunder and lightning into it for a truthful representation of this poetic master. It has already been stated that, while Mozart, Haydn and Schubert's music is susceptible of Wagnerian coloring, such coloring takes away all the beauty, leaving scarcely any charm or reminder of what it was intended to be, what it would be without this transfiguration.

It may be true that Mr. Nikisch does not wish to be called old-fashioned, but may he not make a mistake in modernizing these heavenly inspired and gifted masters? He may think from his standpoint that the public desire sensational noise, but if he will bend his ear to the four corners of Music hall and attentively listen to what is said about his free modernizations, he will realize his error.

The allegro molto was too loud all the way through, but, as stated, well played. The andante was completely enveloped in brilliant effects, losing all its poetic beauty and identity. Why, and where, is the tradition for it? The minuet fared better, and, perhaps, the allegro assai was less impassioned than some other portions of the work. If Mozart had been present, he would have been greatly surprised at the vigorous treatment his symphony received at the hands of Mr. Nikisch, and without doubt, would have expostulated.

Considerable interest was manifested to hear Mr. Sherwood play again, for he is an American pianist who stands deservedly high; not alone in Boston, but throughout the country, as he is known far and near. Mr. Sherwood possesses a fine technique, acquired by faithful, diligent study with some of the best masters of Europe, and behind this lies a musical temperament which enables him to play with expression and fidelity to the master he interprets. For some reason there seemed to be a want of understanding between the soloist and the orchestra for they were not always together. Indeed, at one time it was a matter of doubt who would come out on top, the pianist or brass player, but it must be conceded the trumpeter was triumphant, although Mr. Sherwood gave him a good pull. Mr. Sherwood is one of the very best American pianists and perhaps, as a public performer, stands at the head. There is no occasion to speak in detail. Mr. Sherwood was heartily encored, and appeared several times on the stage to acknowledge the compliment.

Mr. Busoni's three movements from a symphonic suite displayed his musical talent in a pleasant light. The music is more fantastic than deep, but is of such a joyous, light airy nature as to furnish interest and enjoyment to all. Better things may be expected of this young composer.

The concert closed with Wagner's "Huldigung's March." We presume Mr. Nikisch was happy during its performance, for it is a piece in which the brass and drums have full sway.

JAMES M. TRACY.

THE SYMPHONY.

Mozart's Music Arranged for Modern Use.

An Interesting Suite by Ferruccio Busoni.

Musical Gossip and Events Here and Abroad.

The programme of the sixteenth concert of the Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall, Saturday evening, was as follows: Mozart's symphony in G minor, Raff's concerto for pianoforte in C minor, three movements; from Busoni's symphonic suite op. 25 (first time), and Wagner's Huldigungs March. Mr. William H. Sherwood was the pianist.

The first movement of Mozart's famous G minor symphony is an allegro molto. The first subject is a simple melody, passionate and intense; its whole effect is in the sincerity of the appeal to the hearer. The composer was terribly in earnest, he wasted no time in preparing or introducing it; he struck directly at the heart of the hearer. But Mr. Nikisch was not satisfied Saturday evening with the music of Mozart, its simplicity was apparently abhorrent to his genius. He therefore adorned and embellished it to suit his taste. He turned the allegro or Mozart into an allegretto; he coquetted with each phrase; he so exaggerated the penultimate note of each phrase that it became a hiccup; and the whole sentence, which is a rapid flow of melody until the entrance of the first forte, was broken into spasmodic jets. Thus he thought to gain in expression; and he was so pleased with his own inventions that he displayed them at every opportunity. In the andante he was not content with the Mozartian serenity of the opening statement; he used italics and capitals; and so when he came to the first sforzando of the first violins the effect of Mozart was already discounted. The menuetto was taken at such a pace that it might have been an ultra-modern scherzo; the entire character of the movement was lost, although the conductor no doubt thought that the trio would gain by the treatment, and the strongly marked phrases of Mozart were almost a jumble. The exaggerations of Mr. Nikisch were without any musical excuse—they often prevented the proper exposition of the melos, and Wagner claimed, and justly, that the proper tempo is merely the finding out the movement which best suits the melody; they were often directly opposed to the spirit of Mozart and the intentions as explicitly expressed by him. From the standpoint of mechanism the performance, as a whole, was excellent, and these exaggerations of the conductor were, therefore, the more to be regretted.

It may be said that a conductor should be granted a certain liberty; that he should not be the slave of traditions; that his own individuality should have play. There is a vast difference, however, between liberty and licentiousness. When a conductor deliberately chooses a tempo which is contrary to that of the composer, when he reads and punctuates the sentences so that the meaning of the composer is distorted or made false, when in dealing with the masterpieces of such men as Mozart his most earnest endeavor is apparently to make all things new, when the hearers find a greater pleasure in discussing the caprices of the conductor than in the music itself, then the musical sincerity of that conductor may well be questioned.

Extracts from a Symphonic Suite by Mr. Ferruccio Busoni were played for the first time. It is said that in this Suite Mr. Busoni tried to "emancipate himself from the influence of the Italian style." "Italian style" is a vague term. It is here probably used as a reproach; for it is the fashion with many to say openly that music is peculiarly a German invention. We are apt to forget that in Italy the opera and the oratorio first saw the light; that the influence of Italian musical art and song is the leaven of the whole lump; that this influence was felt by Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, Schubert and Wagner; that last year the one opera that was given most frequently in the Imperial Opera House of Berlin was the work of a young Italian, who did not expatriate himself in his music. The Italians that resolutely turn their backs on melody, which seems their birthright, and strive after German profundity, are apt to make a sad mess of it; for in their endeavors to write German music they out-German their models, and their music is too often pretentious, ugly and dull. When, on the contrary, Italians cling fast to that which is already their own, and clothe melody with the substance of Germany and the grace of France, they are still loyal to their country. Mr. Busoni studied chiefly in Germany, but his blood is Italian; and the temperament of the composer as revealed in the fragments of this work, written when he was about eighteen years of age, is Southern. The jig, evidently shaped after the old and approved models, has Southern fire. The unexpected and effective pauses, the sense of color that warms the contrapuntal devices, the unerring sense of rhythm—all these turn that which might have been merely a school-task into a thing of beauty. The gavotte opens with a delightfully quaint melody for the oboe, and throughout the movement charming effects are gained by the simplest of means—and yet this simplicity is so difficult, as Carissimi said years ago. The finale, an allegro fugato, is broadly built, and interesting to musician and layman. For the counterpoint of Mr. Busoni seems so natural, so inevitable, that the knowledge of the composer is almost overlooked on account of the grace of his expression. These movements are melodically and harmonically strong; the counterpoint is fluent and effective; the instrumentation is rich without ostentation, and again, it is often very ingenious without strainings after effect, without whimsicalities. Mr. Busoni knows the peculiarities and the speech of each instrument, and he also knows the value of occasional silence, so that when the trumpet or the clarinet enters into the conversation it is because it has something to say. Mr. Nikisch read these fragments with an evident appreciation of their value, and they were sympathetically treated by the orchestra. They were very favorably received by the audience, and the applause was hearty and long-continued.

Mr. William H. Sherwood gave in many respects a remarkably fine performance of the Raff concerto. His scales, arpeggio work, chord attack and use of pedals have long excited the admiration of musicians. His playing Saturday evening was broad and brilliant, bold and free in the first and last movement; and in the andante he played with marked elegance. The concerto made certain demands on him to which his response was more than adequate; it did not call for any expression of deep emotion. Mr. Sherwood was enthusiastically applauded and he was several times recalled.

202

Louis II. of Bavaria was an unfortunate monarch. He was undoubtedly insane, and his death was tragic; Camille Mendels wrote a most unpleasant book about him; and Richard Wagner dedicated to him a "March of Homage" that was played at his coronation. This march is full of pompous noise; there is one short phrase that suggests the entrance of the riders in the opening exercises of the old-fashioned circus; the rest is fuss and fret, the apotheosis of blatant inanity.

PHILIP HALE.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Director Nikisch was particularly happy in his programme making for last evening's concert by the Symphony orchestra, and the patrons present gave many evidences of their appreciation of the excellent selection of works made for the occasion.

Very great interest centred in the reappearance here of William H. Sherwood, the pianist, formerly a prominent figure in Boston musical circles, and his choice of the concerto in C minor, op. 135, by Raff, as the medium to display his present skill added much to the pleasures of anticipation.

Mr. Sherwood hardly needs any extended reference to his playing in this city, as he was long ago accepted here as one of the standards of ability in this class of musical effort, and his masterly interpretation of all schools of piano compositions have been admitted on all sides. The Raff concerto is a work well calculated to inspire any pianist, and, after the first half of the opening allegro, Mr. Sherwood threw himself into the duty in hand, and from that on held the audience at will by his splendid playing. His command of all the technical details of the pianoforte won him distinction among American pianists at an early period in his career, and this skill is so happily supplemented by a rare degree of musical feeling and expression, which add greatly to his value as an artist.

His success was quickly recognized by the audience after each movement, and the applause which rewarded his efforts was most worthily bestowed.

The novelty of the evening consisted of three of the five movements of the symphonic suite, op. 25, by Ferruccio Busoni, the pianist, who was heard at these concerts earlier in the season. The movements played consisted of the gigue, gavotte and allegro fugato, and in each and all of these the bright, fresh, tuneful ideas of the composer were ever apparent. The suite was written at the age of 18, and its construction shows at times a lack of experience, but this partial defect is more than made good by the vim and dash which the youthful writer put into his work. Its orchestration is at times decidedly humorous, and the three movements heard last evening appear to stamp the work as one written under the influence of the gay carnival time. Mr. Nikisch entered into the spirit of the composition with admirable success, and gave the suite for all it was worth.

An excellent performance of the G minor Mozart symphony introduced the programme, and the pompous "Huldigungs march," by Wagner, brought it to a close.

AT A SYMPHONY REHEARSAL.

One of the Most Noted Features of Boston Life.

Remarkable Way in Which These Concerts Have Grown Away from Their Original Purpose—Fashion Made Them Her Own—An Audience Analyzed—Listeners Who Not.

Of all Boston institutions of the present day there is no doubt that the symphony concerts are the most famous.

Their renown has reached from Dan to Beersheba, and not a stranger ever comes within the gates who does not insist upon being taken to one, at least, to feast his eyes upon the delicious spectacle of the hub of the universe sitting rapt and reverent at its favorite shrine.

Music Hall on a Friday afternoon is the city in little, well worth a visit from the the social philosopher, apart from the music, which in itself will afford him a rare treat.

To begin with, it is amusing to reflect how thoroughly and perversely the concerts have grown away from the original purpose of their founder. Mr. Higginson's avowed object some 10 years ago, when he first began to consider the scheme, was to provide the best of classical music at a price which should bring it within the reach of all.

In the memory of man there has never been a time when good music was not to be heard in Boston, but not everybody could afford to listen to it, and there seemed to be no really sensible reason why a series of subscription concerts should not be possible here on the same plan as that so successful abroad at the Gewandhaus in Leipzig and at a hundred other places in Germany.

So it came about, Mr. Higginson agreeing to make up any deficit which this philanthropical idea might leave at the end of the season. The subscriptions for the series of 24 concerts were placed at a figure which put them practically in reach of every one. Single tickets could be bought for 25 and 50 cents, and it seemed as if a new era of bliss were opening out before music lovers. But hardly two years had gone by before it began to be apparent that fashion had marked the Symphony concerts, and especially the rehearsals, for her own. Vast as the audiences were, they Took on a Back Bay Tone, noticeable at the hastiest glance. The seats on the floor were occupied almost wholly by people whose names are rolled like sweet morsels under the Boston tongue. To secure these places, they paid large premiums on the regular price, which grew greater and greater with each succeeding year.

It was the thing to be seen at the rehearsal. There was a scramble for tickets. The auction sales in the fall came to be a competition between millionaires, and at the present moment it is not often that a good seat on the floor, in the midst of the elect, can be bought for less than $50 for the 24 concerts, which is not too dear, perhaps, for the satisfaction it gives, but certainly proves that the music, marvellous as it is, is not at a marked-down figure.

The same with the balconies. In the top places not reserved are still to be had according to the original plan at the price of admission, 25 cents, but to secure one of them it is necessary to wait for an hour or so outside in an impatient, pushing crowd, to fight one's way up stairs tooth and nail, and finally to fall into a seat so breathless and cross and tired that not even Beethoven has charms enough to sooth the savage breast.

If the programme happen to be a popular one, the chances are against one getting a seat at all. You are far more likely to be obliged to stand during the entire afternoon. For once in a way this is worth while, but, persisted in, will ruin the sweetest disposition and cause curses, not loud, but deep, to be breathed against symphonies and all play therein.

However, nobody cares whether the 25-cent people are pleased or not. Beacon street and Commonwealth avenue are happy. Every Friday 2 o'clock finds them rustling into place, with all those noddings and greetings and whispered inquiries about Aunt Jane and Cousin Curtis which give to every select Boston symposium the air of a large family party.

To be in Boston without relations is very much like being

In Heaven Without Wings.

An outsidest stumbling into this network of connections, feels himself a helpless intruder with blushes mounting to the roots of his hair and an involuntary desire to get up and explain the reason of his being there. Nowhere is this more noticeable than at the rehearsals, which have come to wear very much the air of a large afternoon reception with music, where, seeing an awning up at the door, a few waifs and strays from the street, of no social value or position, have wandered in.

Alas! poor woman from the wrong side of the avenue, you may have money enough to buy your ticket and to adorn yourself with the most gorgeous attire in town, but when you sit week after week surrounded by people who calmly ignore your very existence, talking over and around you as if you were an empty chair, about their most intimate personal concerns, how can you help your soul growing smaller and ending that 24 afternoons of torture crushed by a sense of your own insignificance?

But you, stranger, must not by any means think of going alone. Take somebody with you, if it is only the letter carrier, who knows who is who, and who can let you into all the secrets of society. Otherwise the audience will lose half its savor. For instance, why should you know or how should you guess that the portly lady in black, who always sleeps through the andante movements, has a pedigree longer than your arm, and belongs to a family which speaks of Columbus as a Cook's tourist? Is there any outward and visible sign to tell you which is the celebrated Mrs. Jack Gardner, the accomplished Mrs. Monty Sears, the gentle Mrs. Gray, or to point out the noble army of Lymans, and Salstonstalls, and Lowells, and Cabots, and rys, and Winthrop, who are the pillars of the commonwealth?

204

Dr. Holmes everybody recognizes from the photographs and engravings sown broadcast over the land. The Autocrat of the Breakfast Table rarely misses a concert. His familiar figure, straight and apparently strong as ever, appears Friday after Friday in its accustomed place well down toward the front, and he has a cheery, whimsical greeting for his dear 500 friends. People often stand stock still and watch him as he goes out with a tender affection and admiration.

There are Harvard professors by the dozen, musicians of all ages, degrees, nationalities and accomplishments, editors of magazines and newspapers, artists, with more brains than money, and to offset them the nouveaux riches with more money than brains, scribblers by the hundreds, for every soul in Boston has written, is writing or means to write a book. School teachers with a flock of damsels in tow, and all that vast indescribable miscellany of men and women who live the busy Boston life, full of intellectual enjoyment and philanthropic work.

A Host of Dilettanti

The faces of the women are generally refined, delicate and placid. They dress generally with the greatest simplicity, which may be either costly or inexpensive, and in a quiet taste affording the greatest contrast to an audience of similar quality in New York or Philadelphia or Chicago where gay colors take the feminine fancy and the house blooms like a fairy flower garden.

As for the men, they have the thin nervous features of New England, and the wiry figures, too. They are always in the proper cut of coat and trousers, with a careful attention to the prevailing tying of cravats, and they look like gentlemen, which is saying a great deal. To glance over that sea of human beings you cannot help fancying in each long line the traces of a direct descent from the Puritan settlers whose influence is still felt in this corner of the land.

While you are taking all this in, and feeling the subtle Boston atmosphere penetrating the inmost fibres of your being with a sort of lifting up, as it were, the orchestra is gradually occupying the chairs on the platform over which the bronze Beethoven keeps guard. Do realize that it is he, dear stranger, and don't be deluded, as many have been before, into thinking those mighty features belong to a local celebrity, such as Prof. J. K. Paine or Jonas Chickering.

There is a subdued scraping of strings and fluttering of music books. The audience looks into its neat little programme books to refresh its memory as to the afternoon's menu, and feels a thrill of pride that those programmes are so different from any others with their analyses of the various numbers, and the sketches of the musicians who have furnished the coming entertainments. Even the advertisements boast a certain literary merit and are furtively studied during the intricate passages of the concerts by the very young and the very old.

Presently in slips Nikisch himself, and a little bustle of applause greets

The Idol of the Hour

The pretty girls nudge one another and smile ecstatic rapture. The Harvard boys silently notice that he wears light trousers and a frock coat. The great conductor mounts his perch, turns over the pages of the score, for he no longer keeps up the mighty feats he performed in days of yore in leading his orchestra without a note outside his memory. He raises that magical baton. A hush settles over the whole house, and, with the first wave of his hand, the enchantment begins. It may be Beethoven, Mozart, Mendelssohn—perhaps the glorious overture to "Ruy Blas," given with a verve and precision that sets every pulse to thrilling. Then comes one of St. Saen's symphonic poems, "Le Rouet d'Omphale," played as no other orchestra in America ever has played it, or ever will, for only Nikisch can elicit those exquisite crescendoes diminuendoes. Then something else,—what you will—always perfectly rendered, and then the intermission.

Buzzes of conversation rise all over the hall. People get up and shake themselves. There is a good deal of criticism whispered—some of the music, but more of the neighbors' bonnets and back hair. The girls exchange enraptured comments about that first violin, who is supposed to have half the susceptible hearts in town in his toils. He sits back in his chair languidly, apparently unconscious that several hundred pairs of eyes are focussed upon him admiringly, and bends such affectionate glances upon his fiddle that many a foolish young woman grows wildly jealous of that thing of wood and catgut. Why is it that first violins are always irresistible? Upon the curl of their mustaches a good deal of the success of an orchestra depends—yes, even in Boston.

At last the leader is back again. All the old maids assume the expression of absorbed rapture supposed to be especially suited to symphonies. Old Moneybags who comes because his wife wants to be fashionable and who hates any music above the "Annie Rooney" order, with difficulties suppresses a groan as he settles himself uncomfortably in his leather chair. Mrs. Moneybags grasps her silver-cornered pocketbook tightly and sits up as straight as a ram-rod. Her tailor advises it strongly. Does she adore symphonies? She says so. The real music-lovers prepare for a rich treat, and an hour of happiness begins for them with the opening strains of the Eroica.

And you, stranger, must not be so absorbed by the noble rendering of that noble symphony that you forget to glance around you while it is going on. Choose a moment when the harmonies are too complex and intricate to be intelligible to common clay—the moment in which the student and the musician above all others delight, and look about.

Oh, for the sake of Boston and of culture, tell it not in Gath, nor breathe it in Askelon, how many of the first families are sound asleep! Not only old Moneybags, who, to do him justice, is not a bit of a hypocrite, and honestly declares that he means to get a wink or two if he can, but the gifted and great of the land are unconscious that like so many apples stuck on knitting needles.

Their Heads Are Nodding

What a howl of denial and indignation would go up if they were accused of dozing during a Beethoven symphony.

But there they are, row after row, napping beyond all manner of doubt. Naughty Maud Pinckney amuses herself every week by making a list of the people in her neighborhood who go to sleep. She says that at the end of the season she shall give it to a reporter to publish in a Sunday newspaper, and if she puts that dreadful threat into execution, it is safe to predict that the Back Bay will witness such scenes of excitement as never before in its career.

There is a far-away look in some faces that the enthusiastic believer in Boston might mistake for aesthetic transfiguration. But it is not aesthetic transfiguration—it is just what it appears to be, far away. The mothers of families, who wear it, are busy arranging the family meals for weeks ahead, planning whom they shall ask to stay with them next summer at Nahant or Pride's Crossing, and when, making over the children's clothes and wondering if by any possible manoeuvring they can get Charley and Emily into the Friday afternoon dancing class. Something inexpressibly soothing lies in Beethoven's music, and by the time the slow movement ends these thrifty matrons have smoothed their paths in life for a long time to come, and straightened out a good many tangles that have somehow crept into their households.

To hint that there are other ladies who choose this ill-advised time for the planning of their spring and summer wardrobes would be too base for anything. Only, how very funny it would be if, just for one concert, everybody could be persuaded to write down exactly and honestly what their thoughts were during a single number—the Symphony, let us say! O what shrieks of delight would be heard all over this wicked, flippant land of ours, and what a laughter at Boston humbuggery! I take it there would not be any too much about counterpoints and harmony in those records.

Coming Out After the Finale has awakened the sleepers, and covered the retreat of the players and conductor with tremendous applause, there is plenty of amusing conversation to be overheard by those who keep their ears open, and still more as the crowd surges along through Hamilton place into the Back Bay cars. It certainly seems as if almost the entire audience goes home in those blue vehicles or in the smart broughams waiting along Tremont street.

The criticisms by really intelligent women would convulse Nikisch if he could hear them. Here there comes in more humbuggery. All sorts of stock expressions are tugged in right and left. They give a flavor to talk, and it is well to be able to find fault with the strings and the wood-wind, even if you don't know one from the other. Very few, very, very few have the courage to come out and declare with our friend Moneybags what in the bottoms of their souls they are most likely saying. "Well," he announces, while the whole car looks properly horrified at these vulgar sentiments, "give me tunes; that's what I like. Who wants to sit all the afternoon, and listen to the same little air played over and over again, first on one side of the band, and then on the other, first fast, and then slow? I call it pretty poor fun. I wouldn't give a cent to hear a band that can't turn a tune! Why don't they bring in something jiggy now and then?"

The idea of mentioning tunes and something jiggy after a Symphony concert! It is a wonder the electricity doesn't come right down from the trolley wire and annihilate old Moneybags.

Humbug! All humbug!

But the Girls,

bless their hearts! It would never do to mention the rehearsals without a word for that lovely rosebud garden which makes the dim old hall bright. There never were anywhere in the world such pretty, sweet young things as these genuine Boston maidens, never such rosy cheeks, such white, even teeth, such bright eyes and such glossy curls as theirs.

From Brookline, Longwood, Cambridge, from Roxbury, Dorchester, and even farther away, they come in laughing flocks to join those other bevy from the new-made land. Tremont street and Winter street suddenly become alive with youth and prettiness, and the air is full of merry chatter, often clever enough to surprise one.

They may be lacking in style—their New York cousin says so—but they have certainly no want of charm.

The sourest old cynic smiles in spite of himself as he looks at them, and feels his heart growing light again when they surround him on the way out, sweeping him along in a resistless current toward the great rendezvous at Hayler's, where they all repair to revive themselves after the concert with ice cream soda. The shop is crammed. The atmosphere is faint with the fragrance of violets, for every lassie wears a bunch of them. They are all talking and laughing at once. Chaos is come again, but such a fresh, cheery, blushing, smiling chaos that it seems quite delightful. To see your Symphony rehearsals properly ended this is the place. You will go home with a glow of rapture which you will attribute to the music, but the Boston witches will account for it all. While the concerts bring out such a beauty-show every Friday, may their success never grow less! M. E. W.

Symphony Concert.

Last evening's Symphony concert gave a great deal of pleasure to one of the largest audiences of the season. A varied programme of enjoyable selections was offered by Director Nikisch, and admirable interpretation of all was given by his orchestra.

Mr. William H. Sherwood was the soloist, and he very naturally received an enthusiastic greeting from a host of admirers, who were delighted at the opportunity of hearing him again. Until a few years ago Mr. Sherwood was a resident of Boston, and was esteemed as one of the most talented and popular pianists of the city. He now resides in Chicago.

He played Raff's concerto in C minor yesterday, and gave the work a masterly and finished interpretation. At the conclusion of the number he was recalled four times by the enthusiastic and thoroughly delighted audience.

The novelty on the programme was the first hearing here of three movements from a symphonic suite Op. 25, by F. B. Busoni, a pianist and composer, who has during a residence of but a few months here gained the cordial regard of the Boston musical public.

Although the "Symphonic Suite" was written when the composer was 18 years old, it is a scholarly composition, full of agreeable melodies, and is treated in a thoroughly musicianly manner. The three movements played were Gigue, Gavotte and allegro fugato. The Gigue is vivaciously written and treats with many novel effects, a pleasing sprightly theme.

The Gavotte is rather severe in style, and its chief motive is sombre until near the close of the movement, when it becomes more cheerful. The allegro fugato is the most interesting of the three movements. It is broad in style and the several themes are developed in a masterly way.

Mozart's charming symphony in G minor proved a welcome offering and was finely played by the orchestra. Wagner's "Huldigungs March," also splendidly performed, brought the concert to a close.

Next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening the programme will be as follows:

Overture, Ruy Blas.....Mendelssohn
Symphony No. 4, in G minor.....Dvorak
(First time in America.)
Symphonic poem, Les Preludes.....Liszt

SICAL MATTERS.

The Sixteenth Symphony Concert.

The programme of the 16th symphony concert at the Music Hall Saturday evening, was as follows: "Symphony" in G minor by Mozart; concerto for piano in C minor by Raff, played by Mr. William H. Sherwood; three movements from a symphonic suite by Busoni and the Huldigung's March of Wagner. The novelty on the programme was the Busoni piece. The three movements, gigue, gavotte and allegro fugato, although antique in name and form, were characteristically modern in treatment. Musical knowledge was everywhere evident, the treatment was skilful, the themes original and the orchestral scoring admirable throughout. It is a spontaneous and effective work, and reflects great credit upon the composer. The orchestra saw-sawed the first movement at times; otherwise than that, barring the inherent coarseness that prevails at all times in the playing of the orchestra, it went with precision and effect.

Mr. W. H. Sherwood's playing of the Raff Concerto was characterized by the elegance, brilliancy, freedom and virility that mark the efforts of this eminent pianist, whose return to our concert halls, after a long absence, is an event for congratulation. The list of players counts many, yet are they few, for artistic value is considered. It was gratifying to observe the enthusiastic applause that followed Mr. Sherwood's performance. He was recalled several times. The accompaniment was overloud and coarse at times; it would have been a happy disappointment had it been otherwise.

The performance of the G minor symphony of Mozart was another specimen of the tawdriness and vulgar sentiment that are identical with Mr. Nikisch's efforts with the classics. As the superiority of Mr. Gericke was reflected in his musicianlike and discreet interpretations of the old masters, so also is the inferiority of Mr. Nikisch exhibited in his attempt to improve upon these models.

The opening movement was begun at as unreasonably slow pace and in a coarse, loud manner for a movement marked "Allegro Molto" and piano. As the movement went on the tempo was increased or diminished to suit the caprice of the conductor in his evident effort to better Mozart, resembling the fluctuating rhythm of a circus band keeping time to the canterings of the calico horse that carries the rider on his back in the performances of his lotty tumblings. The reprehensible "pumping" of every phrase, regardless of its character, so dear to the heart of Mr. Nikisch, if one is to judge by its iteration and reiteration upon every occasion, was displayed in all its sickly sentimentality.

The andante followed in the same vein of coarseness and exaggeration that characterized the first movement, without a touch of the serenity and delicacy that is demanded in contrast to the vigor of the forte passages. Both the menuetto and the finale were rasped off in the band's most degenerate style, regardless of the expression indicated by the composer, and it only needed the trombones, tuba and the athletics of the tympani player to have made it audible possibly on Long wharf. In order that our readers may not think that the writer is dealing harshly with this performance, we append the critical review of Mr. Woolf and Mr. Hale, the two eminent musical critics of Boston.

It will be seen that they are unsparing in their denunciation of such an exhibition. The Huldigung's March gave Mr. Nikisch the opportunity to let slip the dogs of war and revel in the roar and rumble of all the noise that could be evoked from the violent efforts of his lusty crew. It was an offering of pomposity and blatancy that might well usher in the morn of the day that we celebrate in honor of the birth of the Father of His Country. "Clang the bells! Let the cannon roar!"

WARREN DAVENPORT.

Disgraced Forever.

[Youth's Companion.]

The Boston symphony concerts have become, in a way, sacred ceremonials, at which even those not born with a musical ear must assist in becoming fashion. One Friday afternoon the two little daughters of a certain family returned from the Music Hall "in a state of mind." "One of them was evidently scornful and the other depressed."

"What's the matter?" asked some one. "Wasn't the concert fine?"

"The concert was all right," said Ethel, superbly. "I don't complain of the concert!"

"Then what did go wrong? Something, I'm sure."

"The amount of the matter is," said the young lady, looking haughtily at her drooping sister, "that Mildred has disgraced herself. She sneezed in the middle of the symphony!"

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Symphony Concert.

Our orchestra has returned from its Southern tour crowned with the laurels which the Washington, Baltimore and New York press always shower upon them. It is singular that the paeans of praise cannot always be re-echoed in Boston, but it is just possible that, as we are behind New York in operatic matters, we may be in advance of that city in orchestral work, and allow a higher criterion to rule. Be that as it may, the first impression made on Saturday, after two weeks of silence, was a poor one. The Mozart G minor symphony is a tender violet among symphonies, but the most gorgeous sunflower could not have made more display than its first movement did on this occasion. It was given with pomp and slowness, instead of with naivete and simplicity; the geniality was changed into turgidity, and everything seemed to go in a "King Cambyzes" vein that was altogether out of place. The second movement followed the first in its too ambitious path, but the third began to show improvement, and if one found but little contrast in the minuet, the trio at least was all grace and delicacy. The finale was still better, and the figure in imitations was well balanced and intelligible as it threaded its way from instrument to instrument, the contrabasses doing exceptionally excellent work.

Mr. Sherwood's high professional rank was never better illustrated than by his performance of the Raff C minor concerto. He seemed to entirely grasp the character of the composition, the best points of his instrument and the just value of the ensemble effects, and the orchestra seconded him in grand style, Mr. Nikisch appearing at his best in the conducting of the work. The concerto begins in the style established by Mendelssohn and Schumann, by allowing the piano to enter at once with thematic material. It is brimful of staccato and chord work, and the pianist in these passages and in octave runs seemed to have wrists of steel. Not less effective, however, was the legato work of the second movement, which was given with a degree of expression entirely commendable. The finale again turned to the bravura school and began with a solo display that seemed like a cadenza occurring in an unexpected place. The presentation of themes entirely unaccompanied, followed by others wholly orchestral, gave a peculiarly antiphonal effect to this movement that militated against that perfect union of forces which should obtain in a concerto. Only Beethoven and Brahms have thoroughly attained this intertwining, and Raff has followed Chopin and Rubinstein in making a concerto which at times seems like a piano solo with an orchestra obligingly filling in the waits between the themes. There was some fine trumpet work in the first movement, but it was a trifle too loud for the piano part which was balanced against it. The oboe work in the second movement deserves recognition, and the floriture woven around the theme by the piano were exquisitely performed. The only faults to be found with the performance were that the bass passages were too light and seemed to lack sustaining power, while the composition as a whole leaned too much toward martial effects, being a sort of military fantasia in its finale, and decidedly lacking depth and subtlety. Mr. Sherwood was recalled with an enthusiasm that was but a just tribute to his merit as an artist.

And now there followed a composition in the old forms, but in the most modern style—three movements from a suite by our newly arrived pianist, Busoni. The suite might also be called a suite de spectres, so weird, uncanny and ghost-like are many of its effects. It began with a gigue that came much nearer to Berlioz than to Bach. All the percussion, from triangle to glockenspiel, were kept busy in this "Queen Mab" like number, and the speed was that of a Tarantelle. The Gavotte also was in the spirit of the new school, while observing the shape of the old. It began with an English horn theme which was very musette like in character, but the real Musette appeared in proper place as Trio, with plentiful horn-playing, and an appropriate drone bass. This movement was altogether charming in its delicate rusticity and its playful syncopations. If the first movement suggested an elf in revel rather than a hilarious gigue, this Gavotte portrayed shepherds and shepherdesses a la Watteau, on the sylvan scene, and the contrast was a delightful one. The final allegro fugato was not so inspired as the two preceding movements, although the musicianly knowledge of the young composer was evinced in every measure, and the scoring throughout was of wonderful efficacy.

The concert ended with Wagner's "Huldigungs Marsch." Even Homer sometimes nodded, and it is not very heterodox to say that the world would not be very much the poorer if Wagner's marches were allowed to fall into obsolescence. They are frequently bombastic and overswollen. But if they passed away, how could our conductor get his fortississississimo effects? Such clatter could not be introduced into Beethoven, or Mozart, or Haydn, and even Liszt is only sporadically deafening! It is the highest compliment that can be paid to the orchestra to say that they played louder in this work than they have ever played before. Their whole attention was directed towards this end, and it is but justice to say that they achieved it; I do not think that any band on this Continent, or any other, could have played louder. The injunction of the psalmist to "play skilfully and with a loud noise" was carried out at least in its latter portion. I do not pretend to say that the tumult was out of place; perhaps the blame should rest on Wagner only, but since the extreme possibilities of uproar have been overcome let us now try to achieve a few good diminuendo efforts, and see what may be done in the direction of perfect ensemble.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

—The engagement has been cabled to Boston of Wilhelm Gericke, former leader of the Symphony Orchestra, and Fraulein Flamm, of Vienna.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

It is hardly possible to deny that the tours of the Symphony Orchestra, while they certainly increase its reputation and put money into their treasury, which must now show a solid balance to the good, are not to the artistic advantage of the band. The fulsome praises of people who have heard no other orchestral playing of distinction and the deliberate manipulation of the truth by some critics whose knowledge is more than their sincerity, have an effect upon the director against which the just and sensible criticism of Boston judges, far less desirous to find fault than anxious that this orchestra shall be perfect, cannot prevail. An eminent musical writer of New York said to us that Mr. Nikisch's directing was not always satisfactory by any means, and added that "if he does not do better next time, we shall really have to say something about it." But as there are prominent critics in New York who have allowed their peculiar interest in German opera to lead them into trivial or injurious comment upon the present Metropolitan season, so there are those who have an antipathy to Mr. Damrosch and his philharmonic orchestra, and make the concerts of the Seidl and the Boston bands the upper and nether millstones between which his enterprises are to be crushed. There is therefore given to Mr. Nikisch's work praise which he does not deserve and blame which he does deserve is withheld.

The sixteenth concert demonstrated this, when Mozart's G-minor symphony was delivered in opposition to tradition, practical sense, interior evidence and the plain directions of all previous time. Technically the performance was fine, for the band obeyed their conductor implicitly. But for the unreasonable individualism of the reading there is no possible excuse.

Three movements—a gigue, a gavotte and an allegro fugato—from a symphonic suite begun by Mr. Busoni, when he was but a youth less than twenty years old, constituted the novelty of the evening, and a delightful novelty they were. The encyclopædic compiler of the programme-book, who seems to be a Wagnerian acharné, remarks enigmatically and contradictorily that Mr. Busoni wrote this when he was trying to "emancipate himself from the influences of the Italian style" and that this is proved by his "opulent contrapuntal work." The compiler has apparently forgotten that some of the chief forms of musical composition originated in Italy and that the early masters of counterpoint—than whom none have been greater—were Italians and taught the world. Be this as it may, Mr. Busoni's writing is no less opulent in beautiful and various melody and in fresh fanciful devices of orchestration than in genuine polyphony and free, graceful and powerful counterpoint. A touch of mystery is felt here and there or a bit of humor shines out; the scoring is full, but not heavy or cloudy, and the leading themes and obbligati are agreeable in themselves and well set for the single instruments. Mr. Nikisch read and the orchestra played with sympathy and effectiveness.

The last number was that blatant commonplace, Wagner's "Huldigungs Marsch," which perhaps the United States Marine Band might play more vociferously and furiously, and which only needed a magic-lantern scene of a grand circus entry to make its din and vulgarity complete.

The soloist of the concert was Mr. W. H. Sherwood, whose playing had even more of the ardent force of mind and hand, the perfect intellectual grasp, the absolutely responsive technique and the emotional enthusiasm which have always characterized him. He was en rapport with his chosen work at every point and in every phase, and his vehement recalls were well won. He had taken Raff's concerto in C-minor, opus 185, which is so generous in melody, so brilliant in figuration, so favorable to both soloist and orchestra, and whose military spirit so often recalls the moods, if not the exact expressions of the "Lenore" symphony. Here again Mr. Nikisch and the orchestra were irreproachable.

It is not exactly in the concert-critic's province, perhaps, but we should like to say a word in honor of the Mason & Hamlin piano, heard for the first time in Music Hall, as a welcome addition to the list of worthy concert-grands. Put forward modestly and almost tentatively, it showed excellent staying qualities, was sweet, clear, even and strong; a little cool in the upper registers, but still agreeable; sufficient in the ensembles and easily modulated for solo passages. Taking this as their coup d'essai, it is probable that the grands of this long established house must obtain and hold a fine position among concert instruments.

Tonight's programme is: Mendelssohn's "Ruy Blas" overture and Liszt's "Preludes," with between them the first hearing in America of Dvorák's fourth symphony.

The Symphony Concert.

The programme for the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, last evening, was: Symphony, G-minor, Mozart; Concerto for pianoforte, op. 185, Raff; three movements of a Symphonic Suite, Busoni (first time); Huldigung's March, Wagner. The Mozart symphony Mr. Nikisch undertook to "improve" after his now familiar fashion, and, as a consequence, this masterpiece that came perfect from its composer's hands, was disfigured by unauthorized and impertinent variations of tempo suggestive of the sickly sentimental devices peculiar to the conventional prima donna. Whenever a great composer is thus, as it were, bedaubed with rouge and decked out with fancy furbelows, it is urged that something must be left to the conductor and his impression of the work performed; but something also must be left to the master's clearly expressed meaning of his own music. If a conductor's impression leads him to set himself in complete opposition to the composer's directions, something may be left to the critical listener, who is certainly entitled to affirm that he prefers Mozart to Nikisch. The opening phrase of the first movement of the symphony was taken at a slow pace, despite the fact that the composer had indicated that the tempo was to be allegro molto. It will not be claimed, we presume, that what a composer has written to be played allegro molto, a conductor has the right to play allegretto moderato. There is no greater reason for playing the opening phrase at a slow pace than there is for playing the whole movement in the same manner. The life and spirit of the movement were neutralized by this treatment, which was repeated whenever the phrase reappeared. Great musical classics are not to be subjected to such "improving" especially when it does not rise to any higher intellectual plane than twaddling sentiment. When Mozart says allegro molto, allegro molto let it be, Mr. Nikisch! If Mozart is a blunderer he is responsible for it; and if he is to be set right, it must be by another Mozart. The probabilities are, however, that Mozart was right and that Mr. Nikisch is wrong. There has been enough and to spare of this trifling with great works of the old composers. The G-minor symphony was recognized as a perfect masterpiece, long, very long before Mr. Nikisch tried to better it by impressing his individuality upon it, and nothing will be added to its chaste and simple beauty by his decking it with a peacock feather here and there. A novelty and a remarkably interesting feature of the programme were found in a gigue, a gavotte and an allegro fugato from a Symphonic Suite by Mr. F. Busoni. The gigue is exceedingly brilliant, though it perhaps suggests a tarantella rather than a gigue. The theme is bright and pleasing, and its orchestration is ingenious, original and effective, especially in the treatment of the wood wind. It is musically in every essential, and the same may be said of the other movements. The gavotte is delightful in its subject, and its grace and delicacy are fascinating. The trio is especially fresh, rich in tone color, and charming in effect. The finale displays the composer's knowledge and his thorough skill in the use of it, and the fugato is developed in a masterly manner. The instrumentation is exceptionally thoughtful and discreet. Every note tells. It is gratifying to know that we have in Mr. Busoni not only a fine pianist, but a composer of such admirable powers as this music proves him to be. The soloist of the evening was Mr. W. H. Sherwood, who played Raff's Concerto for pianoforte, in C-minor, op. 185. His performance may be heartily praised for its brilliancy, clearness, and the splendid technique that was brought to bear on it. The perfection of the playing was absolute. The touch was fine and true, the spirit was admirable, the style was broad, thoughtful and thoroughly artistic. For some reason or other, however, it left the listener unmoved except by admiration for the artist's technical skill; and, despite the fire with which it was played, the sentiment of the whole seemed cold and formal. It was warmly and deservedly applauded, at the close of each movement, and the player was recalled three times with great enthusiasm. The programme for the next concert is: Overture, "Ruy Blas," Mendelssohn; Symphony No. 4, Dvorák (first time); and "Les Preludes," Liszt.

MUSIC. Continued

THE SYMPHONY.

The one novelty on the programme of the sixteenth Symphony rehearsal and concert was in the form of three movements of a Symphonic Suite opus 25, by Mr. F. B. Busoni, the accomplished young pianist of this city. This suite was written by him eight years ago and is in five movements, Praeludium, Gavotte, Gigue, Intermezzo lento and Allegro fugato. Those performed were the second, third and last. These movements created, on a single hearing, a decidedly favorable impression. The two dances are especially interesting and characteristic. The gigue is full of life and energy, and the quaint gavotte is not behind in attractiveness. The finale is the broadest and most elaborately constructed movement of the three. In all are to be found evidences of well trained skill in composition, while the orchestration is generally free, clear and adequate. That the gigue and the gavotte are well calculated to appeal to the popular taste was proved by the hearty applause that followed their performance. All three movements were admirably played.

It was a pleasure to hear Mr. William H. Sherwood once more at these concerts. We cannot help wishing, however, that he had chosen some other work for performance. For Raff's concerto, with all its melodiousness and masterly construction, is merely a show piece, containing little or nothing that appeals to one's deeper feelings. Mr. Sherwood's playing was remarkably fine throughout.

Boldness, fire, fluency and brilliancy characterized his work in the extreme movements, tenderness and grace the charming andante. He was warmly received and enthusiastically recalled.

Mozart's ever delightful symphony in G minor stood first on the programme. In his reading, Mr. Nikisch took fewer liberties with the tempo of the first movement than he has done heretofore; in fact his conducting was notably straightforward throughout the work. The playing of the orchestra was also thoroughly in harmony with the spirit of the music. It was a wholly enjoyable performance.

Wagner's gorgeous "Huldigungs March" was the closing number and was played in a befitting manner.

Arthur Nikisch, on the occasion of the fiftieth anniversary of the New York Philharmonic Society last week, gave a notable instance of his friendship for the profession with which he is associated in his adopted home, by taking the initiative in sending a floral offering to the Philharmonics from the Boston Symphony orchestra.

210 Music Hall: The Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the sixteenth symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Mozart: Symphony in G minor.

Raff: Pianoforte Concerto in C minor, Op. 185.

Busoni: Three Movements from Symphonic Suite, Op. 25.

Wagner: Huldigungs-Marsch.

Mr. William H. Sherwood was the pianist.

The ever-beautiful G minor symphony was admirably played. Nothing of the poetic effect of the performance of the work under Mr. Nikisch during his first year here was lost, and much was gained in the way of symmetry of proportion and regularity of tempo. The exquisite opening phrase in the violins sounded just as romantic, at a normal tempo, as it did two years ago, when Mr. Nikisch took it too slow; and our excellent conductor is much to be thanked for his perfect tempo in the Andante. All that the performance left to be desired was, perhaps, a still finer delicacy and finish in the first and second movements, and a more nervous, definite accent in the accompanying eighth-notes in the violas at the beginning of the first. The viola passage sounded too much like a whispering tremolo; as it stands in the score, it is evidently meant to say something.

The movements from Mr. Busoni's suite are full of life and charm, and are excellently written for the orchestra. One had rather the composer had not used the word fugato in his heading to the last movement; it arouses expectations which the movement fulfils rather stingily. There is enough fugato in it to swear to before a jury, but not enough to be worth mentioning. Not that this impugns the musical value of the movement in the least, but that, when you are told that you are going to hear a fugato, you like to hear something that is a fugato all through. Still the fresh, lively charm of the music is its own defence.

Never before have we heard the Huldigungs-Marsch sound so gloriously as it did last Saturday evening. Here Mr. Nikisch really gave us a new revelation. We had always thought the Huldigungs-Marsch a good and worthy thing enough, decidedly inferior to the Kaiser-Marsch, but just as decidedly superior to that $5000 composition which rejoices in the compendious title of "Grosser Festmarsch zur Eröffnung der hundertjährigen Gedenkfeier der Unabhängigkeits-Erklärung der vereinigten Staaten von Nordamerika." In fact, we had looked upon the Huldigungs-Marsch as a work in which Wagner had joined Homer in nodding a little. But, as Mr. Nikisch takes it, it is simply superb! It took the audience off its feet. If that is what the Huldigungs-Marsch sounds like, then long live the Huldigungs-Marsch! We would almost hazard the wish that, as Mr. Nikisch has made such a triumphant success in this case, he would try his hand at the—well, we really cannot go through all those polysyllables again, but must simply say—"Centennial March." Perhaps he might succeed in making something out of the wonderful triplet, now that a certain college song has passed into oblivion.

Mr. Sherwood was cordially received, and, what is still better, applauded to the echo after finishing the Raff concerto. The composition itself has never seemed to us to be worth very much. To be sure, it cannot rightly be ranked with works of respectable mediocrity; it is both too good and too bad for that. It shows Raff's cleverness, his inventiveness, and brilliancy; but also his want of self-criticism, his tawdriness and lack of true nobility. It cannot be a work to live very long, and there seems to be no sound reason for keeping it above ground. But Mr. Sherwood's playing of it was superb at every point; he played it with a brilliancy, a dash, an incisiveness of accent, and a sustained power that were simply electric. And all through he showed a self-possession—by which we mean a thorough possession of, and mastery over, his own resources—that prevented his ever going too far, or falling short of perfect clearness and coherence. It was a grand piece of pianoforte playing.

The next programme is: Mendelssohn, overture to "Ruy Blas;" Dvorak, symphony No. 4, in G minor; Liszt, symphonic poem, "Les Préludes."

211 Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1891-92.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

XVII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 27, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

MENDELSSOHN.

OVERTURE. "Ruy Blas."

DVOŘÁK.

SYMPHONY No. 4, in G major.

Allegro con brio.—Adagio.—Allegretto grazioso.—

Finale; Allegro ma non troppo.

(First time in America.)

A. BORODIN.

"EINE STEPPENSKIZZE AUS MITTEL-AISEN"

(A Prairie Scene in Central Asia.)

(First time.)

LISZT.

SYMPHONIC POEM. "Les Préludes."

Music Hall: The Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the sixteenth symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Mozart: Symphony in G minor.

Raff: Pianoforte Concerto in C minor, Op. 185.

Busoni: Three Movements from Symphonic Suite, Op. 25.

Wagner: Huldigungs-Marsch.

Mr. William H. Sherwood was the pianist.

The ever-beautiful G minor symphony was admirably played. Nothing of the poetic effect of the performance of the work under Mr. Nikisch during his first year here was lost, and much was gained in the way of symmetry of proportion and regularity of tempo. The exquisite opening phrase in the violins sounded just as romantic, at a normal tempo, as it did two years ago, when Mr. Nikisch took it too slow; and our excellent conductor is much to be thanked for his perfect tempo in the Andante. All that the performance left to be desired was, perhaps, a still finer delicacy and finish in the first and second movements, and a more nervous, definite accent in the accompanying eighth-notes in the violas at the beginning of the first. The viola passage sounded too much like a whispering tremolo; as it stands in the score, it is evidently meant to say something.

The movements from Mr. Busoni's suite are full of life and charm, and are excellently written for the orchestra. One had rather the composer had not used the word fugato in his heading to the last movement; it arouses expectations which the movement fulfils rather stingily. There is enough fugato in it to swear to before a jury, but not enough to be worth mentioning. Not that this impugns the musical value of the movement in the least, but that, when you are told that you are going to hear a fugato, you like to hear something that is a fugato all through. Still the fresh, lively charm of the music is its own defence.

Never before have we heard the Huldigungs-Marsch sound so gloriously as it did last Saturday evening. Here Mr. Nikisch really gave us a new revelation. We had always thought the Huldigungs-Marsch a good and worthy thing enough, decidedly inferior to the Kaiser-Marsch, but just as decidedly superior to that $5000 composition which rejoices in the compendious title of "Grosser Festmarsch zur Eröffnung der hundertjährigen Gedenkfeier der Unabhängigkeits-Erklärung der vereinigten Staaten von Nordamerika." In fact, we had looked upon the Huldigungs-Marsch as a work in which Wagner had joined Homer in nodding a little. But, as Mr. Nikisch takes it, it is simply superb! It took the audience off its feet. If that is what the Huldigungs-Marsch sounds like, then long live the Huldigungs-Marsch! We would almost hazard the wish that, as Mr. Nikisch has made such a triumphant success in this case, he would try his hand at the—well, we really cannot go through all those polysyllables again, but must simply say—"Centennial March." Perhaps he might succeed in making something out of the wonderful triplet, now that a certain college song has passed into oblivion.

Mr. Sherwood was cordially received, and, what is still better, applauded to the echo after finishing the Raff concerto. The composition itself has never seemed to us to be worth very much. To be sure, it cannot rightly be ranked with works of respectable mediocrity; it is both too good and too bad for that. It shows Raff's cleverness, his inventiveness, and brilliancy; but also his want of self-criticism, his tawdriness and lack of true nobility. It cannot be a work to live very long, and there seems to be no sound reason for keeping it above ground. But Mr. Sherwood's playing of it was superb at every point; he played it with a brilliancy, a dash, an incisiveness of accent, and a sustained power that were simply electric. And all through he showed a self-possession—by which we mean a thorough possession of, and mastery over, his own resources—that prevented his ever going too far, or falling short of perfect clearness and coherence. It was a grand piece of pianoforte playing.

The next programme is: Mendelssohn, overture to "Ruy Blas;" Dvorak, symphony No. 4, in G minor; Liszt, symphonic poem, "Les Préludes."

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1891-92.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

XVII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 27, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

MENDELSSOHN.

OVERTURE. "Ruy Blas."

DVOŘÁK.

SYMPHONY No. 4, in G major.

Allegro con brio.—Adagio.—Allegretto grazioso.—

Finale: Allegro ma non troppo.

(First time in America.)

A. BORODIN.

"EINE STEPPENSKIZZE AUS MITTEL-ASIEN"

(A Prairie Scene in Central Asia.)

(First time.)

LISZT.

SYMPHONIC POEM. "Les Préludes."

The Two Novelties of the Symphony Concert.

Concerning the Career of Amalie Joachim.

The Centenary of the Birth of Rossini.

The programme of the seventeenth Symphony Concert was as follows: Mendelssohn's overture, "Ruy Blas;" Dvorak's Symphony No. 4 in G major (first time in America); "A prairie scene in Central Asia," by Borodin (first time at these concerts); and Liszt's symphonic poem, "The Preludes."

Borodin is a composer not utterly unknown in Boston. His first symphony was played under the direction of Mr. Nikisch in January, 1890, and it then provoked much comment. As a musician he was an amateur, an amateur of rare natural gifts and earnest purpose. He was born in St. Petersburg in 1834, and he died in 1886. He studied medicine and chemistry, was an army physician, and finally became a professor at the Imperial Academy of Medicine and Surgery. And he was honored by his Government in various ways. When he was a young man he fell in with Balakireff, who was the centre of the group of the composers of the new Russian school: Cui, Moussorgsky, Rimski-Korsakoff and others. He wrote two symphonies, the "Scene" played last week, some chamber music, including two string quartettes, and a few songs and piano-forte pieces. He left unfinished an opera, "Le Prince Igor," an opera ballet, "Mlada," and a symphony in A minor.

We are apt to associate the compositions of the modern Russian school with alcohol and dynamite. We have been warned against revolutionary principles, and we have been told that Russian musical Nihilism included even the rejection of the modern system of tonality. But certainly this "Scene from Central Asia" is neither amorphous nor Nihilistic. On the contrary, it is charming in its form, clearly written, full of an originality that attracts and does not repel. Its melancholy is not lugubrious; its apparent simplicity is never inane or infantile. The themes are characteristic; they are skillfully brought together, and, as Cui has well remarked in speaking of Borodin as a symphonic writer, "he crosses his melodic phrases with remarkable dexterity and with an irreproachable harmonic purity." The instrumentation is masterly. It is so discreet; it is also so full of color. The effects are gained by simple means, but each note, each instrument tells. And when the effect is gained, the composer is satisfied; he does not repeat it and repeat it, as though the hearer were a reluctant jurymen. Although it is programme-music, it is eminently sane; Borodin leaves the hearer to his imagination, telling him first his own ideas concerning the music; he does not, however, put a cross under a measure, and say "This is a camel," or "This is the hoof-beat of a horse." If the "descriptive comments" were removed, the music itself would give delight; for as absolute music it is beautiful. It is to be hoped that in due time Mr. Nikisch will give us an opportunity of hearing some of the compositions of Rimski-Korsakoff, Balakireff and Glazounoff.

Dvorak's Symphony No. 4 in G was first played in Prague Feb. 2, 1890, under the direction of the composer and from the manuscript. It is, upon the whole, a disappointing work. It is true that there are a few pleasing themes, and the instrumentation is at times ingenious. But we have a right to demand something more than prettiness and clever instrumentation, when Dvorak offers to the world a symphony. The pedagogue might say with some justice to the composer, "I asked for a symphony and you gave me a suite." The amateur might also say, "Yes, that is a good tune in the finale, but it seems to me that I have heard it before; and as for the whole work it is not unlike a potpourri in which Bohemian folk-songs are contrasted with Bohemian dances. The second movement, I frankly admit, is unintelligible to me." Now it is possible, indeed probable, that neither of these two judgments is final, but there is truth in each. The first movement is curiously constructed, and as though Dvorak were hurried in the making of it; the adagio is perhaps "deep," and it is undeniably dull; the third movement is thoroughly delightful from beginning to end; and the bustle of the finale is dangerously near vulgarity. As a whole, the symphony will not add to the fame of the composer.

The "Ruy Blas" overture was well played, with the exception of an occasional lack of precision in the attack of the brass; and the symphony and the "Sketch" were finely played in spite of the horn-wabbling in the former. But is it not about time that Liszt's "Preludes" should be refused admission to our symphony concert hall, or at least admitted only once in ten years, and then as a shocking example? Its gilt is tarnished, its lace is tattered, its plume is broken. Time has turned its ornaments into derision; the stuff of its indispensable clothing is shoddy and through the gaping holes is seen a meagre, wretchedly nourished body.

Amalie Joachim, the celebrated singer, will soon be heard in this city; and a few words concerning her career may not be impertinent. Her maiden name was Schneeweiss, which was afterward changed to Weiss, and she was born the 10th of May, 1839, in Marburg in Steiermark. She sang in the chorus and in minor parts in Hermannstadt and in Vienna during the early fifties. In the latter city she was at first in the chorus of the Kärnthnerthor Theatre, and one of her associates was Pauline Lucca. There she was given few opportunities for the display of her talent. She was then a girl of more than ordinary beauty, "with deep-blue eyes and a serious, bell-like voice." She was the gypsy maiden in Rubinstein's "Kinder der Haide," who sang the wedding song and beat on a tambourine. She was the Fatime in "Oberon," and in 1861 she took the part of Amazilli in "Jessonda." Soon after this, "tired of watching over Norma's children and waiting on Verdi's Leonora," for, in spite of her natural gifts, she was kept back by the manager, she went to the Hannover Court opera. In 1863 she became the wife of Joseph Joachim, and soon forsook the opera for the concert stage. Still she sang with great success in the operas "Iphigenie en Tauride," "Orpheus" and "Fidelio," for her voice, although it had the full and rich quality of the true alto, was in compass a mezzo-soprano. Joachim was called to Berlin to take charge of the newly founded "Music High School" (1868), and his wife became famous throughout Germany as an oratorio singer and an interpreter of German songs. Although there were one, and there was a divorce, not without attendant scandal. Otto Gumprecht, in his second volume of musical essays (1872), paid Amalie Joachim a glowing tribute, in which he spoke of the beauty of her tones "without a blemish;" of her "modest earnestness;" of "the simplicity and at the same time the grandeur of her delivery." "However carefully she colors the detail, she never loses sight of the unity of the whole." And, according to him, neither the intellectual force and depth of the ancients nor the sweetness and nervous intensity of the modern romanticists were foreign to her. Hanslick, when he heard her in 1872 in Vienna, for she gave there concerts with Clara Schumann, said that she made the most profound impression in the shortest songs, in which "a certain universality of sentiment is necessary in the interpretation rather than a sharply defined and specific characteristic;" and he named Mendelssohn's "Greeting" and Brahms' "Cradle Song."

214

One hundred years ago to-day the town trumpeter of Pesaro alternately entreated and threatened the plaster statuettes of the twelve apostles, which were the sole decoration of the room next to the bedchamber of his wife. Relatives and friends, who had lighted little candles and placed them before the statuettes, were scandalized, and the more when, in a burst of southern fury, he seized a stick and attacked the apostles. Three were in pieces. The raging man stood before Saint Giacomo with upraised stick, when, lo, there was the feeble cry of a babe in the adjoining room, and the father of a moment fell on his knees before the saint. Such is the tale of the birth of Gioacchino Antonio Rossini.

To-day the centenary of this birth will be celebrated throughout Italy and generally on the continent. The Government of Italy marks the occasion by the publication of the composer's correspondence. At Pesaro the cottage where he was born is to be turned into a museum, and the festivities will last a week. At Venice there will be a water carnival. At Turin the "Stabat Mater" will be sung, and in the Paris Opera House there will be a performance of "William Tell." It is meet that such honors should be paid to the memory of the great melodist. It is the fashion of the day with not a few to snap derisive thumbs at Rossini and call him a mere music-maker. Yet as long as music endures among men, so long will the name of the composer of "Il Barbiere di Siviglia," the masterpiece, the coming glory of opera buffa, be held in loving reverence. In natural musical endowment, in spontaneity of melody, in fluency and in facility he was only surpassed by Mozart, the idol of his devotion, before whom he humbly bent and confessed his own unworthiness.

PHILIP HALE.

SEVENTEENTH SYMPHONY.

Mendelssohn, Dvorak, Borodin and Liszt on the Programme.

Music Hall was crowded Friday afternoon at the 17th rehearsal of the Symphony orchestra. There was not much enthusiasm on the part of the audience, but the performance, as a whole, was good, and the performance of the several numbers on the programme was marked by considerable technical care. The audience at last night's concert was equally as large and was much more cordial in expressing approval of Mr. Nikisch's offerings.

The programme embraces the names of Mendelssohn, Dvorak, Borodin and Liszt, and the selections were at once classical and popular.

The "Ruy Blas" overture by Mendelssohn, and "Les Preludes" by Liszt, were without question the successful numbers. The "Ruy Blas" overture was well received and finely played by the orchestra.

The Dvorak symphony No. 4, in G major, was new, and, therefore, did not evoke as much applause as the notable work preceding it, with its grand opening chords, its magnificent allegro, and its passionate cantabile, all so well known.

Yet the Dvorak symphony was a grand effort, and each movement was characterized by marked care.

The fortissimo crescendo, in the first movement, was a splendid bit of musical effect, so, also, was the coda in G major in the third movement. The finale was given grandly from the faufare of trumpets to the pianissimo by the cellos, and the symphony, as a whole, was warmly applauded.

The Borodin number, "A Prairie Scene in Central Asia," with its sensational effects, was well received.

The success of the concert was the Liszt number "Les Preludes." Both orchestra and audience warmed to this selection, and at the close it was greeted with merited applause.

The piece is full of weird poetry, musical effect, changing rapidly from grave to gay, and charming the ear at every step. The allegro animato violins and trumpets is a fitting finale to this powerful work, and the audience evinced its pleasure by generous applause. There was no lack of attention to "Les Preludes."

The programme for the 18th rehearsal and concert will be as follows:

Symphonic poem, Hamlet..... Tschalkowsky
First time.
Concerto for violin, No. 3, in D minor..... Bruch
Soloist, Mme. Camilla Urso. First time.
Symphony No. 4, in D minor..... Schumann
First performance in Boston of the original version.

Extra Symphony Concert.

The Boston Symphony orchestra will give an extra concert on Wednesday, March 2, at Music Hall—a benefit for the members of this famous organization, whose meritorious work has given unalloyed pleasure to thousands and made this city famous wherever music is appreciated. They deserve well, and their services for art are worthy of the warmest recognition as well as praise.

Paderewski's appearance at this concert is a voluntary offering in compliment to the superiority of the orchestra's work and an expression of his appreciation of the manner in which it accompanied one of his own compositions.

Among the pieces in this really brilliant programme are the "Suite Esclarmonde," by Massenet, and a symphonic poem, "The Sea," by Nicode, for the orchestra, and Schumann's A minor concerto and Liszt's "Hungarian Fantasia," which will be played by Paderewski.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Symphony Concert.

It is a pleasant task to acknowledge the amount of novelty which is given to the symphony programmes this season. One may not always like the new works, but it is none the less valuable to have the opportunity of hearing different schools and of knowing what the very latest additions to the repertoire are like. On Saturday the novelties were Slavonic, and it must be added that they were caviare to the general public, for the first and last numbers of the programme were the most appreciated features of the concert.

The opening number was Mendelssohn's "Ruy Blas" overture, which received a fiery and dramatic reading well suited to its character. The pomp and blare of the brasses was quite in place here, and the spirited interpretation was evidently relished by the audience. In the string passages there was something left to be desired in ensemble; the chief fault with our excellent string orchestra is that the first violins are allowed to dominate everything; their dash and enthusiasm are never restrained, and as a consequence one rarely hears the seconds or the violas, and as we possess an unusually large body of violas, one of the finest possible effects is lost. The first movement of the recently played G minor symphony by Mozart was an example of this, for it possesses a beautiful viola figure which was inaudible, and in the same manner the string portions of this overture seemed to be first violins, cellos and contrabasses, and nothing else; a little repression of the first violins, and corresponding encouragement of the seconds and the violas will make a wonderful change in many performances.

Dvorak's new symphony was a disappointment at its first hearing. It is not so much a symphony as a fantasia on Slavonic folk music. It is a hopeful sign in the instrumental music of the present that the composers are beginning to draw from the characteristic repertoire of folk-song and national dance, for from this broad field our classical music will derive a new virility, and many new effects of scale form, of weird and effective mode, will be acquired. Let the reader play for himself upon the piano these notes: C, D, E flat, F sharp, G, A flat, B, and C, and he will have a scale which can produce many a strange yet pleasing effect, the scale of the Hungarian folk music; in like manner C, D, flat, E, F, G, A flat, B, and C, used harmonically or melodically, induct us into an almost untrodden field of composition, an Oriental mode; and a half-dozen other modes might be mentioned, were it not for the risk of becoming pedantic, that have influenced folk-music much, and classical music not at all. But the employment of such scales for theme-construction as, for example, in Brahms' slow movement of his last symphony, in E minor, does not preclude musicianly development, and this is just what one did not find in any movement of this work by Dvorak. It seemed a pasticcio of folk-music, each theme leading to a tame and commonplace ending, not far removed from the Italian cadence as exemplified by Verdi in those young days when he deserved his patronymie. The second movement, however, was a curiosity, not as the programme book said, because of its continuance in one key, but because of the strange intermezzo in which an interval of a third, sometimes major, sometimes minor, was repeated over and over, making one of the quaintest imaginable effects. This was by all odds the most interesting movement of the work, and its bizarrerie was attractive in the highest degree. The third movement was more of the same sort, and its strange final cadence, a veritable orchestral sigh, was finely given. The finale was more military, but suggested rather a Tartar horde going out to battle, than anything European. It dealt in every kind of semi-civilized scale. To sum up, then, the work errs in not having a clear development of its thoughts and in giving an overdose of the quaint and the weird, but it is interesting, viewed as a fantasia, and an orchestral study. It was generally well played, and certainly lost nothing of its effect in Mr. Nikisch's hands. The horn played badly, the trumpet overblew, and the flute work was excellent, while of course the phalanx of first violins carried everything before them in their impetuous charge.

A Russian picture by Borodin added to the savagery which seemed rampant in the programme. It was charmingly played and the woodwind instruments had abundant opportunities to display themselves, and used them well. The shading was excellent, but the work came to palates that had already been surfeited with odd progressions.

Liszt's best symphonic poem, "Les Preludes," was given with becoming breadth. Its chief theme is reminiscent, and that, too, in a very unexpected manner. An eminent Bostonian once exclaimed, after hearing the finale of Beethoven's ninth symphony for the first time, "That's only a glorified 'Yankee Doodle!'" in a similar manner the unregenerate can find in Liszt's work an apotheosis of "We won't go home till morning." But the climax is grand, and the breadth of the interpretation was undeniable, for here our conductor's intensity and enthusiasm found proper vent.

THE ORCHESTRA'S CONCERT.

One Wednesday evening next the benefit concert for the Symphony men will take place in Music Hall, and to the pleasure to be expected from the novelties we announced last week will be added the charm of Mr. Paderewski's appearance and the interest attaching to his first performance here of a Schumann concerto. This is the first time that any testimonial has been offered to the orchestra as a body other than that of passing applause and merited praise. If the house be filled as it should be each member should have a substantial sum to put in his pocketbook; and, better than this, an ample audience will be like a personal assurance that the pains, the steady work and the good spirit of these seventy men are appreciated and directly encouraged.

children born, the marriage was an unhappy one, and there was a divorce, not without attendant scandal. Otto Gumprecht, in his second volume of musical essays (1872), paid Amalie Joachim a glowing tribute, in which he spoke of the beauty of her tones "without a blemish," of her "modest earnestness," of "the simplicity and at the same time the grandeur of her delivery." "However carefully she colors the detail, she never loses sight of the unity of the whole." And, according to him, neither the intellectual force and depth of the ancients nor the sweetness and nervous intensity of the modern romanticists were foreign to her. Hanslick, when he heard her in 1872 in Vienna, for she gave there concerts with Clara Schumann, said that she made the most profound impression in the shortest songs, in which "a certain universality of sentiment is necessary in the interpretation rather than a sharply defined and specific characteristic," and he named Mendelssohn's "Greeting" and Brahms' "Cradle Song."

One hundred years ago to-day the town trumpeter of Pesaro alternately entreated and threatened the plaster statuettes of the twelve apostles, which were the sole decoration of the room next to the bedchamber of his wife. Relatives and friends, who had lighted little candles and placed them before the statuettes, were scandalized, and the more when, in a burst of southern fury, he seized a stick and attacked the apostles. Three were in pieces. The raging man stood before Saint Giacomo with upraised stick, when, lo, there was the feeble cry of a babe in the adjoining room, and the father of a moment fell on his knees before the saint. Such is the tale of the birth of Gioacchino Antonio Rossini.

To-day the centenary of this birth will be celebrated throughout Italy and generally on the continent. The Government of Italy marks the occasion by the publication of the composer's correspondence. At Pesaro the cottage where he was born is to be turned into a museum, and the festivities will last a week. At Venice there will be a water carnival. At Turin the "Stabat Mater" will be sung, and in the Paris Opera House there will be a performance of "William Tell." It is meet that such honors should be paid to the memory of the great melodist. It is the fashion of the day with not a few to snap derisive thumbs at Rossini and call him a mere music-maker. Yet as long as music endures among men, so long will the name of the composer of "Il Barbiere di Siviglia," the masterpiece, the coming glory of opera buffa, be held in loving reverence. In natural musical endowment, in spontaneity of melody, in fluency and in facility he was only surpassed by Mozart, the idol of his devotion, before whom he humbly bent and confessed his own unworthiness.

PHILIP HALE.

SEVENTEENTH SYMPHONY.

Mendelssohn, Dvorak, Borodin and Liszt on the Programme.

Music Hall was crowded Friday afternoon at the 17th rehearsal of the Symphony orchestra. There was not much enthusiasm on the part of the audience, but the performance, as a whole, was good, and the performance of the several numbers on the programme was marked by considerable technical care. The audience at last night's concert was equally as large and was much more cordial in expressing approval of Mr. Nikisch's offerings.

The programme embraces the names of Mendelssohn, Dvorak, Borodin and Liszt, and the selections were at once classical and popular.

The "Ruy Blas" overture by Mendelssohn, and "Les Preludes" by Liszt, were without question the successful numbers. The "Ruy Blas" overture was well received and finely played by the orchestra.

The Dvorak symphony No. 4, in G major, was new, and, therefore, did not evoke as much applause as the notable work preceding it, with its grand opening chords, its magnificent allegro, and its passionate cantabile, all so well known.

Yet the Dvorak symphony was a grand effort, and each movement was characterized by marked care.

The fortissimo crescendo, in the first movement, was a splendid bit of musical effect, so, also, was the coda in G major in the third movement. The finale was given grandly from the faufare of trumpets to the pianissimo by the cellos, and the symphony, as a whole, was warmly applauded.

The Borodin number, "A Prairie Scene in Central Asia," with its sensational effects, was well received.

The success of the concert was the Liszt number "Les Preludes." Both orchestra and audience warmed to this selection, and at the close it was greeted with merited applause.

The piece is full of weird poetry, musical effect, changing rapidly from grave to gay, and charming the ear at every step. The allegro animato violins and trumpets is a fitting finale to this powerful work, and the audience evinced its pleasure by generous applause. There was no lack of attention to "Les Preludes."

The programme for the 18th rehearsal and concert will be as follows:

Symphonic poem, Hamlet..... Tchaikowsky
First time.
Concerto for violin, No. 3, in D minor..... Bruch
Soloist, Mme. Camilla Urso. First time.
Symphony No. 4, in D minor..... Schumann
First performance in Boston of the original version.

Extra Symphony Concert.

The Boston Symphony orchestra will give an extra concert on Wednesday, March 2, at Music Hall—a benefit for the members of this famous organization, whose meritorious work has given unalloyed pleasure to thousands and made this city famous wherever music is appreciated. They deserve well, and their services for art are worthy of the warmest recognition as well as praise.

Paderewski's appearance at this concert is a voluntary offering in compliment to the superiority of the orchestra's work and an expression of his appreciation of the manner in which it accompanied one of his own compositions.

Among the pieces in this really brilliant programme are the "Suite Esclarmonde," by Massenet, and a symphonic poem, "The Sea," by Nicode, for the orchestra, and Schumann's A minor concerto and Liszt's "Hungarian Fantasia," which will be played by Paderewski.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Symphony Concert.

It is a pleasant task to acknowledge the amount of novelty which is given to the symphony programmes this season. One may not always like the new works, but it is none the less valuable to have the opportunity of hearing different schools and of knowing what the very latest additions to the repertoire are like. On Saturday the novelties were Slavonic, and it must be added that they were caviare to the general public, for the first and last numbers of the programme were the most appreciated features of the concert.

The opening number was Mendelssohn's "Ruy Blas" overture, which received a fiery and dramatic reading well suited to its character. The pomp and blare of the brasses was quite in place here, and the spirited interpretation was evidently relished by the audience. In the string passages there was something left to be desired in ensemble; the chief fault with our excellent string orchestra is that the first violins are allowed to dominate everything; their dash and enthusiasm are never restrained, and as a consequence one rarely hears the seconds or the violas, and as we possess an unusually large body of violas, one of the finest possible effects is lost. The first movement of the recently played G minor symphony by Mozart was an example of this, for it possesses a beautiful viola figure which was inaudible, and in the same manner the string portions of this overture seemed to be first violins, cellos and contrabasses, and nothing else; a little repression of the first violins, and corresponding encouragement of the seconds and the violas will make a wonderful change in many performances.

Dvorak's new symphony was a disappointment at its first hearing. It is not so much a symphony as a fantasia on Slavonic folk music. It is a hopeful sign in the instrumental music of the present that the composers are beginning to draw from the characteristic repertoire of folk-song and national dance, for from this broad field our classical music will derive a new virility, and many new effects of scale form, of weird and effective mode, will be acquired. Let the reader play for himself upon the piano these notes: C, D, E flat, F sharp, G, A flat, B, and C, and he will have a scale which can produce many a strange yet pleasing effect, the scale of the Hungarian folk music; in like manner C, D, flat, E, F, G, A flat, B, and C, used harmonically or melodically, induct us into an almost untried field of composition, an Oriental mode; and a half-dozen other modes might be mentioned, were it not for the risk of becoming pedantic, that have influenced folk-music much, and classical music not at all. But the employment of such scales for theme-construction as, for example, in Brahms' slow movement of his last symphony, in E minor, does not preclude musicianly development, and this is just what one did not find in any movement of this work by Dvorak. It seemed a pasticcio of folk-music, each theme leading to a tame and commonplace ending, not far removed from the Italian cadence as exemplified by Verdi in those young days when he deserved his patronymic. The second movement, however, was a curiosity, not as the programme book said, because of its continuance in one key, but because of the strange intermezzo in which an interval of a third, sometimes major, sometimes minor, was repeated over and over, making one of the quaintest imaginable effects. This was by all odds the most interesting movement of the work, and its bizarrie was attractive in the highest degree. The third movement was more of the same sort, and its strange final cadence, a veritable orchestral sigh, was finely given. The finale was more military, but suggested rather a Tartar horde going out to battle, than anything European. It dealt in every kind of semi-civilized scale. To sum up, then, the work errs in not having a clear development of its thoughts and in giving an overdose of the quaint and the weird, but it is interesting, viewed as a fantasia, and an orchestral study. It was generally well played, and certainly lost nothing of its effect in Mr. Nikisch's hands. The horn played badly, the trumpet overblew, and the flute work was excellent, while of course the phalanx of first violins carried everything before them in their impetuous charge.

A Russian picture by Borodin added to the savagery which seemed rampant in the programme. It was charmingly played and the woodwind instruments had abundant opportunities to display themselves, and used them well. The shading was excellent, but the work came to palates that had already been surfeited with odd progressions.

Liszt's best symphonic poem, "Les Preludes," was given with becoming breadth. Its chief theme is reminiscent, and that, too, in a very unexpected manner. An eminent Bostonian once exclaimed, after hearing the finale of Beethoven's ninth symphony for the first time, "That's only a glorified 'Yankee Doodle!'" in a similar manner the unregenerate can find in Liszt's work an apotheosis of "We won't go home till morning." But the climax is grand, and the breadth of the interpretation was undeniable, for here our conductor's intensity and enthusiasm found proper vent.

THE ORCHESTRA'S CONCERT.

One Wednesday evening next the benefit concert for the Symphony men will take place in Music Hall, and to the pleasure to be expected from the novelties we announced last week will be added the charm of Mr. Paderewski's appearance and the interest attaching to his first performance here of a Schumann concerto. This is the first time that any testimonial has been offered to the orchestra as a body other than that of passing applause and merited praise. If the house be filled as it should be each member should have a substantial sum to put in his pocketbook; and, better than this, an ample audience will be like a personal assurance that the pains, the steady work and the good spirit of these seventy men are appreciated and directly encouraged.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Seventeenth Symphony Concert.

The programme of the 17th Symphony Concert was: Overture, "Ruy Blas," by Mendelssohn; Symphony No. 4, Dvorak; "A Prairie Scene in Central Asia," by Borodin, and "Les Preludes," by Liszt. Dvorak's No. 4 Symphony was played for the first time in America, and, although interesting in so much as it was a novelty, for which we thank Mr. Nikisch, still it was a disappointing work. It is more in the character of a fantasia, having a number of agreeable themes and a clever working-out of orchestral devices. This the listener might expect from so able and practised a hand as Dvorak's. The Allegretto Grazioso, it must be said, is a charming movement. As a symphonic model, clear in development, however, this work will not reflect credit upon its eminent author.

The other novelty, Borodin piece, is a characteristic work, original both in the themes and its delicate orchestral coloring. Its form is clear and everything is simply but beautifully wrought out. It was finely played by the orchestra, the delicacy of the shading being well preserved. The "Ruy Blas" overture was given a spirited performance, although the brass would get in its furious blasts at times, and the much-abused "Les Preludes" of Liszt with its "won't-go-home-till-morning" tune, was given the benefit of the full draft of the orchestral furnace.

Paderewski's Ninth Recital.

On Saturday afternoon the Music Hall was literally packed with an audience that filled every seat and occupied every bit of available standing room. Such a sight has never before been witnessed in Boston Music Hall; to wit, the gathering of 3200 people to listen to a piano recital. The programme consisted of the Variations Serieuse of Mendelssohn; Sonata, Op. 111, Beethoven; five pieces by Schumann; B-flat Minor Sonata of Chopin; Nocturne by Paderewski, and a Hungarian Rhapsody by Liszt. Paderewski was in his best form, and of course charmed, delighted and thrilled his large audience with his masterly playing. The next and last recital will take place at the Music Hall on the afternoon of March 22. This will be the last opportunity to hear this wonderful artist before he sails for Europe, and it is safe to say that the audience will test the capacity of the hall, as it did on Saturday afternoon, in the desire to bid him a reluctant farewell.

Tomorrow evening Mr. Carl Baermann will give his second chamber concert at Union Hall, with the assistance of Mr. Loeffler and Mr. Schulz. Miss Gertrude Franklin will also sing. There are no more charming occasions than these evenings with Mr. Baermann and his associates. There will be a trio for violin, 'cello and piano by Haydn (in E flat); the D minor trio of Schumann and 2 sonata for 'cello and piano by Saint-Saens. Miss Franklin will sing songs by Schubert and Widor.

The eighth and last concert of the Philharmonic Orchestra will be given at Tremont Theatre on Thursday afternoon, with the assistance of Miss Gertrude Edmonds and Mr. W. H. Sherwood. The latter will play the Grieg Concerto. The orchestral numbers will be the "Rienzi" overture, Wagner; Orpheus Symphonic Poem of Liszt; and "Invitation to the Dance," by Weber. The Philharmonics have struggled against fate in giving their concerts this season, and as there is a deficit, it has been suggested that a benefit performance be given a little later on, which we trust will receive the generous support of musical patrons. The date of the concert will be announced immediately.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

MUSICAL.

The Symphony Concert.

The programme played at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, last evening, was: Overture, "Ruy Blas," Mendelssohn; Symphony No. 4, in G, Dvorak (first time); "A Prairie Sketch in Central Asia," A. Borodin (first time); and "Les Preludes," by Liszt. Of all this, the Mendelssohn overture was, by far, the best music; and it is not one of its composer's finest works in its kind. The Dvorak Symphony ranges all the way from pretentious to dry and trivial. The opening movement is conventional and uninteresting; the adagio says nothing new, and the meaning of much that it says is unintelligible. The third movement is bright and daintily pretty generally, and was the first portion of the work that stirred the audience from the perfunctory applause that had hitherto attended the symphony. The finale has a sharply defined theme with a well-marked rhythm, and is tuneful and pleasing, but of no especial distinction. In fact the world is full of such symphonies as these which are less rigid but no better than Kapellmeister music, and not so good as much music of that class. The Borodin selection is a charming bit of tone color, original in effect and full of character. It was admirably played, as were also the overture and symphony. The Liszt selection was given with great fire and tremendous noisiness, the drum player reveling in the opportunities afforded him. The work sounded more cheap and vulgar than ever. Its day has passed, and it should be permitted to go to the eternal rest that it deserves, and to which so much worthier music has gone. The programme for the next concert is: Symphonic poem, "Hamlet," Tchaikowsky; Concerto, for violin, No. 3, D-minor, Bruch; Symphony No. 4, D-minor, Schumann, according to the original version, for the first time here. The soloist is to be Mme. Camilla Urso.

MUSIC. Continued

THE SYMPHONY.

Dvorak's latest symphony, and "A prairie scene in Central Asia," by Borodin, were the principal features of the seventeenth Symphony rehearsal and concert. The symphony is Dvorak's fourth, and was completed last year. Richter produced it at his concerts in Vienna and London, where it is said to have been warmly received. The word symphony arouses great expectations in the mind of the musician. It is difficult to get rid of the idea that a work bearing that name must be as elaborate in form and as weighty in matter as are the typical works of Beethoven, Schumann and Brahms. From this point of view this new symphony in G minor is disappointing. Neither in matter nor scope does it seem important enough to deserve so high sounding a title. As a whole it appears to be an attempt to lend new interest to the symphonic form by the avoidance of extended development, and by the introduction of rhythms and a general style of treatment that are associated with the orchestral suite. The work also shows a decided falling off on the part of Dvorak as a composer, when his D minor symphony is recalled. Nevertheless, it is in many respects very interesting; and not the least of its merits is that it is of reasonable length. The first theme of the opening allegro con brio given out by the 'cellos and horns makes an impressive beginning and suggests many possibilities of treatment. A lively episodic passage in the major and the second theme in the minor are well contrasted and all three are ingeniously if somewhat sparsely and conventionally developed, while the orchestral coloring is warm and varied. The adagio has a more pronounced vein of originality. Its two strongly opposing themes are treated with much skill and consistency, and the instrumental effects, which are largely confined to the wind, are well calculated to emphasize the intent of the movement. The allegretto grazioso, with its fascinating and unexpected rhythmical effects, suggestive of a valse melancholie, its charming modulations and odd orchestration is very attractive. The finale, which opens with a fanfare, is in strength and interest about on a level with the first movement. The symphony was effectively read and played, the two middle movements winning hearty applause.

The Borodin orchestral "scene" is intended to describe the passage of a caravan across the desert. It is programme music of a very realistic kind. The melancholy Russian folk-song is the key-note of this picture of monotony and desolation; and the orchestral devices employed to suggest the approach of the caravan, the tramp of the horses, the presence of the military escort, are those of a master of the modern orchestra. The scene was well played, and was thoroughly appreciated. The opening and closing numbers were Mendelssohn's overture to "Ruy Blas," and Liszt's "Les Preludes," both of which familiar works were performed in an exceedingly brilliant manner.

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the seventeenth concert given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Mendelssohn: Overture to "Ruy Blas."
Dvorak: Symphony No. 4, in G major.
Borodin: "Eine Steppenskitze aus Mittel-Asien."
Liszt: Symphonic Poem. "Les Preludes."

If Mendelssohn had a hearty detestation of Victor Hugo's play of "Ruy Blas," so much so as to prefer to call his overture the "Overture to the Charitable Association"—having been induced to write it in a single night for a performance in aid of a charity—what would his feelings have been last Saturday evening at finding the overture serve as introduction to such a list of Czech, Russian and Magyar music as was on the programme? He would, likely enough, have thought: "Serve me right for writing it at all!"

Of Dvorak's new symphony we can, with the best will in the world, find nothing good to say. No one can damn a work after a single hearing; but we mistake much if this one will not be found to have damned itself. To perform it, as a composition in an important form by a composer of Dvorak's prestige, was eminently proper; we doubt, however, if Mr. Nikisch or any member of the orchestra will care to look at it again. One is tempted to say, as a French critic once said of a certain requiem, "Brought out at its own funeral!"

Borodin's sketch—a movement from a symphonic poem, entitled "Middle Asia"—gives one a graphically terrible idea of what a Russian steppe must be like. We had always thought that the dreary monotony of those vast tracts of barren country was coupled with something of grandeur; but Borodin has undeceived us, and, as a Russian, he surely ought to know. As far as we could gather from the music any definite idea, we should say that the steppes must be used a good deal for pasturing cattle; for we believe that melancholy and scantily accompanied tunes on wooden wind instruments are usually understood to bear some reference to the shepherd's or cowherd's craft. Whether the long sustained high note in the violins is meant to imply desolation in general, or mosquitoes in particular, we could not determine. But, after the Dvorak symphony, this piece of Borodin's came rather soothingly than otherwise. Liszt's "Les Preludes" sounded positively classical by comparison.

The orchestra played capitally throughout the concert, giving "The Preludes" with especial fire and brilliancy.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Seventeenth Symphony Concert.

The programme of the 17th Symphony Concert was: Overture, "Ruy Blas," by Mendelssohn; Symphony No. 4, Dvorak; "A Prairie Scene in Central Asia," by Borodin, and "Les Preludes," by Liszt. Dvorak's No. 4 Symphony was played for the first time in America, and, although interesting in so much as it was a novelty, for which we thank Mr. Nikisch, still it was a disappointing work. It is more in the character of a fantasia, having a number of agreeable themes and a clever working-out of orchestral devices. This the listener might expect from so able and practised a hand as Dvorak's. The Allegretto Grazioso, it must be said, is a charming movement. As a symphonic model, clear in development, however, this work will not reflect credit upon its eminent author.

The other novelty, Borodin piece, is a characteristic work, original both in the themes and its delicate orchestral coloring. Its form is clear and everything is simply but beautifully wrought out. It was finely played by the orchestra, the delicacy of the shading being well preserved. The "Ruy Blas" overture was given a spirited performance, although the brass would get in its furious blasts at times, and the much-abused "Les Preludes" of Liszt with its "won't-go-home-till-morning" tune, was given the benefit of the full draft of the orchestral furnace.

Paderewski's Ninth Recital.

On Saturday afternoon the Music Hall was literally packed with an audience that filled every seat and occupied every bit of available standing room. Such a sight has never before been witnessed in Boston Music Hall; to wit, the gathering of 3200 people to listen to a piano recital. The programme consisted of the Variations Serieuse of Mendelssohn; Sonata, Op. 111, Beethoven; five pieces by Schumann; B-flat Minor Sonata of Chopin; Nocturne by Paderewski, and a Hungarian Rhapsody by Liszt. Paderewski was in his best form, and of course charmed, delighted and thrilled his large audience with his masterly playing. The next and last recital will take place at the Music Hall on the afternoon of March 22. This will be the last opportunity to hear this wonderful artist before he sails for Europe, and it is safe to say that the audience will test the capacity of the hall, as it did on Saturday afternoon, in the desire to bid him a reluctant farewell.

Tomorrow evening Mr. Carl Baermann will give his second chamber concert at Union Hall, with the assistance of Mr. Loeffler and Mr. Schulz. Miss Gertrude Franklin will also sing. There are no more charming occasions that these evenings with Mr. Baerman and his associates. There will be a trio for violin, 'cello and piano by Haydn (in E flat); the D minor trio of Schumann and a sonata for 'cello and piano by Saint-Saens. Miss Franklin will sing songs by Schubert and Widor.

The eighth and last concert of the Philharmonic Orchestra will be given at Tremont Theatre on Thursday afternoon, with the assistance of Miss Gertrude Edmonds and Mr. W. H. Sherwood. The latter will play the Grieg Concerto. The orchestral numbers will be the "Rienzi" overture, Wagner; Orpheus Symphonic Poem of Liszt; and "Invitation to the Dance," by Weber. The Philharmonics have struggled against fate in giving their concerts this season, and as there is a deficit, it has been suggested that a benefit performance be given a little later on, which we trust will receive the generous support of musical patrons. The date of the concert will be announced immediately.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

MUSICAL.

The Symphony Concert.

They programme played at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, last evening, was: Overture, "Ruy Blas," Mendelssohn; Symphony No. 4, in G, Dvorak (first time); "A Prairie Sketch in Central Asia," A. Borodin (first time); and "Les Preludes," by Liszt. Of all this, the Mendelssohn overture was, by far, the best music; and it is not one of its composer's finest works in its kind. The Dvorak Symphony ranges all the way from pretentious to dry and trivial. The opening movement is conventional and uninteresting; the adagio says nothing new, and the meaning of much that it says is unintelligible. The third movement is bright and daintily pretty generally, and was the first portion of the work that stirred the audience from the perfunctory applause that had hitherto attended the symphony. The finale has a sharply defined theme with a well-marked rhythm, and is tuneful and pleasing, but of no especial distinction. In fact the world is full of such symphonies as these which are less rigid but no better than Kapellmeister music, and not so good as much music of that class. The Borodin selection is a charming bit of tone color, original in effect and full of character. It was admirably played, as were also the overture and symphony. The Liszt selection was given with great fire and tremendous noisiness, the drum player reveling in the opportunities afforded him. The work sounded more cheap and vulgar than ever. Its day has passed, and it should be permitted to go to the eternal rest that it deserves, and to which so much worthier music has gone. The programme for the next concert is: Symphonic poem, "Hamlet," Tchaikowsky; Concerto, for violin, No. 3, D-minor, Bruch; Symphony No. 4, D-minor, Schumann, according to the original version, for the first time here. The soloist is to be Mme. Camilla Urso.

MUSIC. Continued

THE SYMPHONY.

Dvorak's latest symphony, and "A prairie scene in Central Asia," by Borodin, were the principal features of the seventeenth Symphony rehearsal and concert. The symphony is Dvorak's fourth, and was completed last year. Richter produced it at his concerts in Vienna and London, where it is said to have been warmly received. The word symphony arouses great expectations in the mind of the musician. It is difficult to get rid of the idea that a work bearing that name must be as elaborate in form and as weighty in matter as are the typical works of Beethoven, Schumann and Brahms. From this point of view this new symphony in G minor is disappointing. Neither in matter nor scope does it seem important enough to deserve so high sounding a title. As a whole it appears to be an attempt to lend new interest to the symphonic form by the avoidance of extended development, and by the introduction of rhythms and a general style of treatment that are associated with the orchestral suite. The work also shows a decided falling off on the part of Dvorak as a composer, when his D minor symphony is recalled. Nevertheless, it is in many respects very interesting; and not the least of its merits is that it is of reasonable length. The first theme of the opening allegro con brio given out by the 'cellos and horns makes an impressive beginning and suggests many possibilities of treatment. A lively episodic passage in the major and the second theme in the minor are well contrasted and all three are ingeniously if somewhat sparsely and conventionally developed, while the orchestral coloring is warm and varied. The adagio has a more pronounced vein of originality. Its two strongly opposing themes are treated with much skill and consistency, and the instrumental effects, which are largely confined to the wind, are well calculated to emphasize the intent of the movement. The allegretto grazioso, with its fascinating and unexpected rhythmical effects, suggestive of a valse melancholic, its charming modulations and odd orchestration is very attractive. The finale, which opens with a fanfare, is in strength and interest about on a level with the first movement. The symphony was effectively read and played, the two middle movements winning hearty applause.

The Borodin orchestral "scene" is intended to describe the passage of a caravan across the desert. It is programme music of a very realistic kind. The melancholy Russian folk-song is the key-note of this picture of monotony and desolation; and the orchestral devices employed to suggest the approach of the caravan, the tramp of the horses, the presence of the military escort, are those of a master of the modern orchestra. The scene was well played, and was thoroughly appreciated. The opening and closing numbers were Mendelssohn's overture to "Ruy Blas," and Liszt's "Les Preludes," both of which familiar works were performed in an exceedingly brilliant manner.

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the seventeenth concert given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Mendelssohn: Overture to "Ruy Blas."
Dvorak: Symphony No. 4, in G major.
Borodin: "Eine Steppensklizze aus Mittel-Asien."
Liszt: Symphonic Poem, "Les Preludes."

If Mendelssohn had a hearty detestation of Victor Hugo's play of "Ruy Blas," so much so as to prefer to call his overture the "Overture to the Charitable Association"—having been induced to write it in a single night for a performance in aid of a charity—what would his feelings have been last Saturday evening at finding the overture serve as introduction to such a list of Czech, Russian and Magyar music as was on the programme? He would, likely enough, have thought: "Serve me right for writing it at all!"

Of Dvorak's new symphony we can, with the best will in the world, find nothing good to say. No one can damn a work after a single hearing; but we mistake much if this one will not be found to have damned itself. To perform it, as a composition in an important form by a composer of Dvorak's prestige, was eminently proper; we doubt, however, if Mr. Nikisch or any member of the orchestra will care to look at it again. One is tempted to say, as a French critic once said of a certain requiem, "Brought out at its own funeral!"

Borodin's sketch—a movement from a symphonic poem, entitled "Middle Asia"—gives one a graphically terrible idea of what a Russian steppe must be like. We had always thought that the dreary monotony of those vast tracts of barren country was coupled with something of grandeur; but Borodin has undeceived us, and, as a Russian, he surely ought to know. As far as we could gather from the music any definite idea, we should say that the steppes must be used a good deal for pasturing cattle; for we believe that melancholy and scantily accompanied tunes on wooden wind instruments are usually understood to bear some reference to the shepherd's or cowherd's craft. Whether the long sustained high note in the violins is meant to imply desolation in general, or mosquitoes in particular, we could not determine. But, after the Dvorak symphony, this piece of Borodin's came rather soothingly than otherwise. Liszt's "Les Preludes" sounded positively classical by comparison.

The orchestra played capitally throughout the concert, giving "The Preludes" with especial fire and brilliancy.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The patrons of the symphony concerts had a most enjoyable programme performed for their entertainment at Music Hall last evening, and the absence of a soloist was lost sight of in the hearing of the brilliant novelties brought forward by Conductor Arthur Nikisch on this occasion.

Dvorak's fourth symphony made the leading feature of the programme, and the work was given its first American performance. Nothing in this class of composition has proved more pleasing than this symphony was to its hearers of last evening, its wealth of tuneful themes, the beauty of their development and treatment and the marked originality of the several movements all going to make the work a decided departure from the usual symphonic writings of modern composers.

In the opening allegro the nationality of the composer is made distinctly apparent by the strong Slavonic characteristics of the themes, and the odd, almost fantastic manner of their treatment, but there is not a dull moment in it all, and the breezy, independent fashion in which the movement is written is fairly captivating, even upon a first hearing.

The adagio, making the second movement, is a bit of a curiosity in its form, and its strong contrasts give it a charm which was instantly recognized by the audience. Its principal theme, a sombre march; the lovely episode, which is first stated by the flute and oboe, and the masterly ending of the movement, all making it a very notable portion of this most remarkable contribution from the Slavonic composer.

The third movement, allegretto grazioso, which does duty as the scherzo, is a veritable gem of orchestral writing; and the fanciful way in which the bright, tuneful ideas have been treated show the composer in quite a novel light, his work in this movement having a dainty grace and beauty that cannot be too highly commended.

Whatever freedom from conventionalities is shown in the first three movements is entirely eclipsed in the finale, allegro "Ma Non Troppo," for here the composer has not only thrown off all restraint, but amply justified himself by establishing new forms that charm at once by their originality and effectiveness. The leading theme has the simplicity of a folk song, but in its development it is treated with variations which are as quaint as they are enjoyable.

Mr. Nikisch gave his best efforts to the performance of the new work, and his reading brought out its beauties in strong relief.

Another novelty consisted of a contribution from the writings of the Russian composer Borodin, called, in plain English, "A Prairie Scene in Central Asia." No better idea of the style of the composition can be given than that supplied by Borodin, which reads as follows: "In the silence of the sandy steppes of Central Asia there is heard the first refrain of a Russian folk song, also the melancholy notes of the songs of the Orient, followed by the hoof beats of the approaching horses and camels. A caravan crossing the great desert, and escorted by Russian soldiers, pursues its long journey without fear, confidently relying on its military guard. The procession steadily advances. The voices of the Russians and of the natives blend in the same harmony; their songs are heard for a long time, and are finally lost in the distance."

The tone pictures of the composition show the masterly skill of the writer, and as a bit of "programme music" it is most enjoyable. It was admirably played and was heartily applauded.

Mr. Nikisch gave a splendid performance of the "Ruy Blas" overture to introduce the programme, and ended it with a strikingly effective reading of the Liszt "Les Preludes."

Next Saturday evening the soloist will be Mme. Camilla Urso, and the programme Tchaikowsky's Symphonic poem, "Hamlet"; Bruch's concerto for violin No. 3, in D minor, and Shumann's symphony No. 4, in D minor.

Seventeenth Symphony.

The audiences at Music Hall during the last five or six concerts have been strangely cold and unresponsive, and not even the unusual excellence of Saturday night's programme and its rendition were sufficient to create any marked degree of enthusiasm. Two of the numbers were old-time favorites—Mendelssohn's overture "Ruy Blas," and Liszt's symphonic poem, "Les Preludes"—but the novelties offered to the apparently sated audience were Dvorak's symphony, No. 4, in G major, and "A Prairie Scene in Central Asia," by A. Borodin.

The symphony is the latest composition of that character by Dvorak, and was finished only last year. The first movement begins with a distinctly melancholy theme in G minor, for the 'cellos and horns, which soon develops into a bright motif in G major, in which the flute predominates; a tremendous crescendo by the full orchestra ends the movement. It is a grand movement, and was given with fine effect.

The violins had an opportunity for fine work in the dainty motif of the third movement, with an accompaniment by the flute and clarinet. The finale, opening with the fanfare of the trumpets, attaining a brilliant climax, descending to a pianissimo by the 'cellos and ending with a brilliant coda, was grandly given.

The work by the Russian composer, A. Borodin, is somewhat varied in character, depicting a scene on the sandy steppes of Central Asia, where is heard, amid the silence, the first refrain of a Russian folk song and the sad songs of the Orient, followed by the sound of approaching horses and camels, accompanied by Russian soldiers, fearlessly singing as they pursue their way. The piece is full of sensational effects, arranged in a masterly manner, and required a more than ordinary attention to detail on the part of both conductor and orchestra to make it enjoyable.

Next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening will present Mme. Camilla Urso, the violinist, as the soloist. She will give Bruch's concerto for violin, No. 3, in D minor.

VIVIAN.

THE SYMPHONIES

SEVENTEENTH CONCERT.

The seventeenth Symphony concert was given in Music hall Saturday evening, Feb. 27. The programme:

Mendelssohn, Overture, "Ruy Blas."
Dvorak, Symphony No. 4, in G major.
Allegro con brio—Adagio—Allegretto grazioso.

Finale; Allegro ma non troppo.

(First time in America.)

A. Borodin, "Eine Steppenskitze aus Mittelasien" (A Praise Scene in Central Asia)

(First time)

Liszt, Symphonic Poem, "Les Preludes."

When Liszt's "Ruin of Athens" was first played by von Bülow and the King's orchestra at a Court concert in Berlin, it was received with disfavor by some of the royal family, notably the elder princess, who, when the orchestra reached the climax where the big six foot drum and extra cymbals make a tremendous percussion, jumped excitedly to her feet, exclaiming: "Horrible! Horrible!" Von Bülow rose from the piano, stepped to the front of the stage, and addressed the audience in these words: "If there are any present who do not like my father's music let them leave at once. They can have their ticket money refunded them at the box office!" The princess gathered her wraps about her and stalked proudly, but madly, out of the hall. The piece was then re-commenced and played through without further disturbance. The next day von Bülow resigned his position as court pianist, creating at the time much comment.

Now what would have happened at the Symphony Saturday night if that princess had been present? The clash, the roar, and the din of musical instruments far exceeded that heard at the court concert. We believe no greater noise, created by musical instruments, was ever before heard in Music hall. Now, we are fond of good brass band music, provided it is produced at a sufficient distance to preclude being stunned or overpowered by its effect. It must be confessed the orchestra succeeded in reaching the utmost limit of its brazen power. Each and every player vied with every other to see who could make the most noise: it was a trial of purely physical strength and endurance.

The result was too terrific, too demoniac, to contemplate. What influences had been at work on Herr Nikisch the previous week to cause him to bring forth so much noise from his orchestra is, no doubt, a secret.

The overture was well played, though at times there was nice discrimination lacking in soft and loud. It was, as a whole, very brilliantly given, albeit there were sensational nuances injected into the score.

The interest of the evening mainly centered on the new Symphony No. 4, in G major, by Dvorak. First, because it is one of the most advanced, most extreme, of the modern composers whose works are very popular, and eagerly sought by all those tinctured with the modern craze for something strange, stunningly sensational. Second, because he has been engaged by Mrs. Thurber of New York to become director of her National conservatory of music. The music of the Symphony certainly is modern and strange enough to meet the demands of the most ultra extremists. There is genius and scholarship displayed in the construction of its various parts. Some musical, pretty themes are introduced which are apparently interestingly worked out, but they were so weighted down and covered up by the tremendous noise of the orchestra as to make it well nigh impossible to follow them in their intricate windings to a satisfactory conclusion. Perhaps mere noise constitutes music; but if it does, people greatly differ. Whether or no Mr. Dvorak intended such a noisy result is a matter for him to decide. The adagio is the quintessence of eccentricity, commencing in a melancholy, dirgeful manner, though not long continued, for it soon assumes a brazen, demonstrative hue, finally closing in almost furious abruptness, leaving one to wonder whether the world has not come to an abrupt end. The allegretto is very pretty, furnishing the pleasantest imaginative tone picture of the symphony. This movement was beautifully well played, furnishing no cause for complaint on the score of inadequate performance. The finale proved a demonstrative piece of noise and fury, a repetition in this respect of the first movement. The symphony has many qualities to admire, possesses an intensifying charm to the lover of the wild, romantic music, notwithstanding the overpowering loudness with which it was played. The work as a whole made a deep and favorable impression on the minds of the musical people present, which no doubt a second hearing would improve and intensify.

"The Prairie Scene in Central Asia" furnished an extreme contrast to what had gone before, affording ample opportunity for the mind and nerves to recuperate from the overstraining effect of what they had previously passed through, preparing them for the final struggle to come. During the playing of this piece one easily imagines how, in the great silent sandy desert, the approach of horses' hoofs can be distinctly heard, no matter how deeply they may be buried in the soft sand (as the text states), provided one's ears are near enough; but leaving this imaginative part out, how much more readily can be heard the wild, tumultuous voices of the soldiers as they sing and march along. We listened attentively to hear the caravan and the advancing soldiers, which, if not real to life, was quite near enough to give our imagination a little activity in stretching capacity.

220

As many times as we have heard Liszt's "Les Preludes," we never before thought it was designed for an out-door brass band! It has the reputation of being Liszt's best orchestral piece, is the most frequently given of all this master's works; but, if judged by this Saturday evening's performance, it would be condemned to the lower regions for all time to come. We cannot believe, however, that it is often given in such a rude, rough manner, and hope never to hear it again so given, for the sake of the happy recollections we have of it.

221
Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1891-92.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

XXI. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, APRIL 2, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

MENDELSSOHN. SYMPHONY No. 3, in A minor. "Scotch."

MOZART. CONCERTO for FLUTE and HARP.

VOLKMANN. SERENADE for STRING ORCHESTRA, in F major.

WAGNER. "WOTAN'S FAREWELL" and "FIRE CHARM,"
from "Die Walkure."

SOLOISTS:

MR. HEINRICH MEYN. MR. CHARLES MOLÉ.

MR. HEINRICH SCHUECKER.

which, if not real to life, was quite near enough to give our imagination a little activity in stretching capacity.

As many times as we have heard Liszt's "Les Preludes," we never before thought it was designed for an out-door brass band! It has the reputation of being Liszt's best orchestral piece, is the most frequently given of all this master's works; but, if judged by this Saturday evening's performance, it would be condemned to the lower regions for all time to come. We cannot believe, however, that it is often given in such a rude, rough manner, and hope never to hear it again so given, for the sake of the happy recollections we have of it.

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1891-92.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

XXI. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, APRIL 2, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

MENDELSSOHN. SYMPHONY No. 3, in A minor. "Scotch."

MOZART. CONCERTO for FLUTE and HARP.

VOLKMANN. SERENADE for STRING ORCHESTRA, in F major.

WAGNER. "WOTAN'S FAREWELL" and "FIRE CHARM,"
from "Die Walkure."

SOLOISTS:

MR. HEINRICH MEYN. MR. CHARLES MOLÉ.

MR. HEINRICH SCHUECKER.

BOSTON MUSIC HALL.

EXTRA CONCERT

: : BY THE : :

Boston · Symphony · Orchestra.

Mr. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

For the Benefit of the Members of the Orchestra.

Wednesday Evening, March 2, 1892, at 8 o'clock.

SOLOISTS:

Mrs. JULIE L. WYMAN,

Mr. ALWIN SCHROEDER,

AND

Mr. PADEREWSKI,

Who have generously offered their services.

PROGRAMME.

- Wagner - - - - - Overture, "Tannhaeuser"
- Schumann - - - - - Concerto for Pianoforte in A minor
Allegro affettuoso.
Intermezzo; Andantino grazioso.
Allegro vivace.
- Massenet - - - - - Suite from "Esclarmonde"
I. Evocation (Andante maestoso).
II. L'Ile Magique (Andante moderato assai).
III. Hyménée (Andante cantabile).
IV. Dans la Forêt.
a Pastorale (Andantino sans Lenteur).
b Chasse (Allegro).
(First Time.)

SOLI FOR VIOLONCELLO.

- a Bach Sarabande
b Schubert Moment Musical
c Davidoff At the Fountain
- Tschaikowsky Andantino and Scherzo from the Symphony in F minor, No. 4

SONGS WITH PIANO.

- a Delibes Regrets
b Massenet Bonne Nuit
c Ferrari A une Fiancee

- Liszt - Hungarian Fantasie for Pianoforte and Orchestra

THE PIANO USED IS A STEINWAY.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

Benefit Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The members of the Boston Symphony orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Arthur Nikisch, gave, at Music Hall last evening, the first benefit concert in the history of this organization, and the public responded in the most liberal manner.

It would have been a pleasure to have had the large audience called together to listen to the orchestra alone, so that the tribute paid to its members would have been an unqualified one, and a demonstration of the taste of the public for the music of the organization, aside from any interest in the soloists who assisted.

Doubtless, however, a practical hand had charge of the affair, and the value of soloists in addition to the orchestra was conceded by availing of the services of Paderewski, the pianist, Mr. Alvin Schroeder, 'cello, and Mrs. Wyman, the contralto singer, both of whom are understood to have volunteered for last evening as an evidence of their appreciation of the Boston orchestra.

The programme was such a list of selections as the regular patrons of this season's concerts by the orchestra hear all too seldom, and its enjoyment was universal among those present, if applause can be accepted as evidence on this point.

The orchestra introduced the evening's entertaining numbers by a magnificent performance of the "Tannhauser" overture, adding as its novelty for the occasion Massenet's "Esclarmonde" suite, and giving also the andantino and scherzo from Tchaikowsky's fourth symphony. The modern French school of composition finds a very happy illustration in Massenet's pretty suite, and the beautiful tone coloring of its movements was brought out very finely by the performance given the work.

Mr. Paderewski contributed as his first selection the concerto by Schumann in A minor, and ended the programme with a performance of the Hungarian fantasia for pianoforte and orchestra by Liszt, in which his virtuosity fairly dazzled those who heard him.

A half-dozen recalls followed the Schumann concerto, and finally the pianist added another Schumann selection in response to the demands of the audience.

Mrs. Wyman's share in the programme consisted of the songs, a. "Regrets," Delibes; b. "Bonne Nuit," Massenet; c. "A une Fiancee," Ferrari, and a more pleasing choice of numbers could hardly have been made by this great artist. Her singing is at all times a revelation of the beauties of any composition she selects, and the art of vocalization finds in her a perfect interpreter.

Mr. Schroeder, the leader of the 'cello division of the string players, gave a fine exhibition of his skill and taste as a solo player in a "Sarabande," by Bach; the "Moment Musical," Schubert, and "At the Fountain," by Davidoff.

The concert was in every way a credit to the orchestra, its conductor, and the assisting artists, and it is to be hoped that similar programmes may be possible for future concerts in the regular series.

Two presentations were added to the events of the evening announced on the programme. The first consisted of an elegant laurel wreath in silver, given by the orchestra to Mr. Paderewski as a token of the "admiration and gratitude" of the members. The second, an elegant gilt mantel clock in the old French style, presented by the members of the orchestra to Mr. Nikisch also as a token of the "admiration and gratitude" of the members to their conductor. A kind friend also decorated the conductor's stand and all the orchestra desks with flowers in honor of the occasion.

SOLOISTS AND PADEREWSKI.

Extra Concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the Benefit of its Members.

Music Hall was crowded, floor and galleries, last night, at the extra concert by the Symphony orchestra.

It was a benefit concert in the fullest sense, and it was also a Paderewski ovation. Long before the hour of commencing every seat was occupied and standing room was at a premium.

It was a representative musical audience moreover, familiar with the orchestra and its work, and ready to enjoy the pleasure of the evening, and it was an audience composed of the elite of Boston, gathered to do honor to a noble body of artists of which the Hub is justly proud.

The orchestra, too, was at its best, and a brilliant programme was presented. Wagner, Schumann, Massenet, Tchaikowsky and Liszt were the names offered. Mrs. Julie L. Wyman, Mr. Alvin Schroeder and M. Paderewski were the soloists.

Conductor Nikisch was greeted warmly as he took baton in hand to lead the Tannhauser overture, and Wagner's "Music of the Future" had a fine rendering, and at the close applause came from all parts of the hall.

Paderewski's friends must have been numerous, for the moment the great pianist was caught sight of the wildest applause broke forth. A bouquet of beautiful roses lay on the piano, and as Paderewski took them in his hand the audience and orchestra loudly cheered him.

In an instant all was hushed as the opening notes of Schumann's concerto in A minor were heard. Each movement was finely given, the allegro affettuoso, the intermezzo, andantino grazioso, and the allegro vivace.

It was a rare bit of playing, both on the part of the orchestra and pianist. The applause which greeted the pianist was spontaneous and genuine, and somewhat discomposed the artist who awkwardly bowed his acknowledgments.

Then the orchestra presented Paderewski with a silver wreath in a velvet case, Mr. S. S. Kneisel making the presentation. But Paderewski was recalled again and again, and to calm the storm he played a Chopin selection.

The suite from "Esclarmonde," Massenet, followed, and the work of the orchestra was finely done.

Three dainty selections, "Sarabande," Bach; "Moment Musical," Schubert; and "At the Fountain," Davidoff, for the violoncello, were given by Mr. Alvin Schroeder.

The Schubert number was loudly applauded, as was also the orchestra selection by Tchaikowsky, andantino and scherzo, F minor, symphony No. 4.

Mrs. Julie L. Wyman won the audience by her exquisite songs, accompanied by Herr Nikisch on the piano—the vocal morsels being by Delibes, Massenet and Ferrari. Mrs. Wyman was especially delightful when rendering "Bonne Nuit" by Massenet.

This grand concert, opening with the Wagner overture, closed with Liszt's amous "Hungarian Fantasie," for pianoforte and orchestra.

Again the Paderewski furor reigned, and when the pianist came on after playing to take hands with M. Nikisch the vast audience rose en masse and cheered.

AN EXTRA CONCERT

It Was of Benefit to the Orchestra and the Audience.

A concert was given last evening in Music Hall for the benefit of the members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Nikisch, was assisted by Mrs. Julie L. Wyman and Messrs. Paderewski and Schroeder. The three generously offered their services on this occasion. The desks of the leader and the members of the orchestra were ornamented with flowers. There was a very large audience. The programme was as follows: Overture, "Tannhauser," Schumann's pianoforte concerto, A minor; Massenet's suite from "Esclarmonde," three 'cello numbers: Sarabande, by Bach; moment musical, by Schubert, and Davidoff's "At the Fountain," the andantino and the scherzo from Tchaikowsky's symphony, F minor, No. 4; three songs, with pianoforte accompaniment: "Regrets," Delibes; "Bonne Nuit," Massenet, and "A Une Fiancee," Ferrari; Liszt's Hungarian Fantasie for pianoforte and orchestra.

The orchestra was evidently inspired by the occasion; for the performance of the "Tannhauser" overture was eminently worthy of the reputation of the organization, and one long to be remembered. The suite by Massenet was played for the first time in Boston. It was arranged by the composer from numbers of the opera, "Esclarmonde," in which Miss Sibyl Sanderson made her debut in Paris and created at the same time the part of the heroine. The arrangement was first played at a Lamoureux concert. While it is in a measure unfair to judge music that was intended for the stage by the concert version, stripped as it is of the accompaniments of scenery, action and all theatrical illusions, it is still possible to say of the concert music, that it is effective or dull, crudely made or cunningly designed. Now the first number of this suite, "Evocation," an appeal by the heroine to the spirits of air, water and fire, seems to be a collection of commonplaces pompously announced with liberal quotations from Wagner. The second, "L'île Magique," is, in the opera, used to accompany the movements of a ballet, and there are carefully sought-out effects of color and rhythm rather than any originality of theme. The third, "Hymene," is played after the curtain has fallen upon the long embrace of the lovers, and it is the most genuine and the most spontaneous music in the suite. The pastorale is the same old pastorale that we have heard in French music so many times, and the fantastic hunting scene belongs to the theatre, and it should be kept there. The instrumentation of "Esclarmonde" was censured at the time of its production and Massenet was accused of introducing two new instruments, Miss Sanderson's voice and the sarrusophone contra bass; this latter instrument was used in Paris in the place of the contra bassoon, although the composer wrote the part for the more familiar instrument.

Mr. Paderewski gave a masterly performance of the concerto. The first movement was taken a little faster than is the custom, but clearness was not sacrificed thereby. He was enthusiastically recalled, and Mr. Kneisel, in behalf of the orchestra, gave him a silver laurel wreath. There was another enthusiastic scene, and Mr.

Paderewski played Schumann's "Des Abends." The Hungarian fantasia was given with true Hungarian spirit, and the pianist was recalled again and again. He modestly divided the popular tribute by leading Mr. Nikisch with him before the audience. Mrs. Wyman and Mr. Schroeder added greatly to the pleasure of the evening by the display of their art.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Extra Symphony Concert.

The musicians of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have had a benefit. Just why they should be the recipients of beneficence is not altogether clear, but the programme which they gave in Music Hall last night was long enough to atone for the fact that they had not had an eleemosynary occasion before. But every part of it was so interesting that one may not find fault with the fact that it extended a full hour beyond the customary limits. The programme began with the "Tannhauser" overture, which was brilliantly given, although it has had had even better performances in this city.

Then came Paderewski, who certainly was responsible for a large part of the great attendance, and played the A minor concerto by Schumann in a glorious manner, and one can also, in this case, extend the adjective to orchestra and conductor, for the ensemble was excellent. This concerto is one of the masterpieces of its form, and may readily rank with even the best of Beethoven's concertos, the G major and the "Emperor." Is it necessary, at this late day, to say that Paderewski received an ovation? Rather let me state that he never deserved it more, for he proved himself in this work the true poet of the piano, and once more all his great technique was subjugated to the interpretation of the composer's intention, individuality was kept entirely in the background, and this must be a rather difficult task for a so much beworshipped individual. Only at the end could hypercriticism demand a trifle more of sustained power and less of vehemence.

After the work a very quiet presentation took place on the stage, and Mr. Kneisel, on behalf, presumably, of the orchestra, handed the artist a silver laurel wreath. The encore fiend took advantage of this to demand more, a demand which should never have been acceded to, for, after so great a performance, even another Schumann work came as an anticlimax.

The orchestral suite from Massenet's "Esclarmonde" is only a pasticcio, made up from instrumental numbers of the opera, and not half so attractive as Bizet's "Suite Ariésienne," which arose in almost a similar manner. It is altogether a motley affair; the "Magic Isle" presented some good work on the woodwind, of the "horns of elf land" type, the "pastorale" had plenty of English horn pipings, and the "chase" was as weird and uncanny as could be desired, but the "Hymene," particularly to those who know its position in the opera, was the extreme of erotic music, and its sensuous measures can scarcely please thinking musicians. The suite was well played.

Mr. Alwyn Schroeder's solos on the cello were beautifully played, the flexibility displayed in Davidoff's "At the Fountain" being an evidence of the great virtuosity of the performer. In popular concerts virtuosity is its own reward, and the player received hearty recalls.

Two specimens of Russian melancholia, in the shape of two movements from Tchaikowsky's fourth symphony, followed, and contained some fine English horn and flute work. Mrs. Julie L. Wyman is the best singer of French chansons that we have among us at present, and her three numbers were altogether delightful, especially the tender "Bonne Nuit," which evoked a tumult of applause. But the key-stone of the arch was placed by Paderewski with a performance of Liszt's "Hungarian Fantasia," that was more than fiery—it was an entire conflagration! The orchestra seconded this nobly, and Mr. Nikisch seemed quite in his element in the caprice and dash of the performance. Then came a whirlwind of applause which finally tapered down into the stolid clappings of those intent upon an encore. Mr. Paderewski skilfully balked this by shaking hands most effusively with the conductor, and at each recall, and there was a most persistent clapping, which brought forth Mr. Nikisch and the pair bowed as if they were musical Siamese twins. Mr. Nikisch has not received so much applause at any previous concert in Boston.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

On Wednesday evening the Boston Symphony Orchestra had a benefit in Music Hall, Mr. Paderewski and Mrs. Julie L. Wyman volunteering. It is not customary to criticize an occasion of this description, but its most striking features may be noticed briefly. There was a large audience, which it is only fair to presume was attracted chiefly by Paderewski, who was received with tremendous enthusiasm and gave a splendid performance of Schumann's concerto and an exciting rendering of Liszt's Hungarian Fantasia. At the end of the first-named work Mr. Kneisel presented to the artist a silver laurel wreath, whereat the applause became tumultuous, and an encore imperative. At the end of the Liszt fantasia the plaudits were still more stormy, and the demon of encore raged furiously for more; but he was destined to remain unappeased this time, for Mr. Paderewski shook Mr. Nikisch by the hand, which induced a still greater frenzy of applause, and then Mr. Nikisch bowed, and Mr. Paderewski bowed, and then they both bowed together, until the audience was satisfied with the bowing. The orchestra was at its best; but the lion of the occasion was Paderewski, whose Boston apotheosis was fully accomplished, while his halo was so vast that he had sufficient to spare to make a smaller one for Mr. Nikisch.

The benefit concert given in Music Hall last evening by the Boston Symphony Orchestra surpassed in brilliancy any similar entertainment of the season. The hall was completely filled with women in gay attire and well-dressed men, and even the stage partook of the general air of festivity, for the small platform and stand belonging to Mr. Nikisch were artistically trimmed with festoons of green, with a bunch of flowers attached to the stand by a broad pink ribbon. A similar bunch of flowers, also tied with pink, was laid upon the piano. On the upper corners of all the other music racks were small posies tied with red ribbon, making charming bits of color among the black coats of the musicians, who fairly outdid themselves all through the evening.

See opposite page for balance.

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

Symphony Orchestra Benefit.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave an extra concert in the Music Hall last evening for the benefit of the members of the orchestra. Mrs. Julia L. Wyman, Mr. Ignace J. Paderewski and Mr. Alwin Schroeder assisted in the following programme:

Wagner: Overture to "Tannhäuser."
Schumann: Concerto for pianoforte, in A minor.
Massenet: Suite from "Esclarmonde."

Solos for 'cello—

Bach: Sarabande.
Schubert: Moment musical.
Davidoff: At the Fountain.

Tchaikowsky: Andantino and Scherzo from Symphony No. 4, in F minor.

Songs with pianoforte—

Delibes: Regrets.
Massenet: Bonne nuit.
Ferrari: A une fiancée.

Liszt: Hungarian Fantasy for pianoforte and orchestra.

The hall was crowded, and the occasion a particularly brilliant one. The orchestra seemed to play with especial painstaking throughout, and did—notably in the Tchaikowsky scherzo—some exceedingly fine work. The event of the evening was Paderewski's playing of the Schumann concerto; the great pianist differs somewhat from most of his predecessors here in his conception of the work, his tempo in the first and second movements being unusually brisk, although he takes the slow episode in the former very slow indeed, and works up the coda in the latter with more deliberateness than any one we have ever heard. But these innovations seemed in no case excessive, and his performance was a singularly fine, coherent and brilliant one. In nothing that he has played here has Paderewski shown himself in a finer light. In the Liszt fantasy he worked wonders. At the close of the concerto Mr. Kneisel presented him with a handsome silver wreath on the part of the orchestra.

Mrs. Wyman sang the three French songs exquisitely to Mr. Nikisch's sympathetic accompaniment, and Mr. Schroeder played the 'cello solos in capital style.

The new things by Massenet and Tchaikowsky can hardly be greeted as valuable additions to the concert repertory. Tchaikowsky's scherzo is ingenious, with its intermingling of three themes, on the strings pizzicati, on the wood-wind, and on the brass, but has little more than its ingenuity to recommend it; the Andantino is poor enough. Massenet's "Esclarmonde" music is brilliantly, if at times rather coarsely, scored, after the French fashion, but has not much in it beyond its gorgeous coloring. The "Tannhäuser" overture went grandly. The audience was very enthusiastic throughout.

THE "EXTRA" SYMPHONY.

An extra concert by the Symphony Orchestra for the benefit of the members of the orchestra, was given last Wednesday evening, March 2. The soloists were Mrs. Julie L. Wyman, Mr. Alwin Schroeder and Mr. Paderewski, who generously offered their services. The programme:

Wagner: Overture, "Tannhäuser."
Schumann: Concerto for Pianoforte in A minor
Allegro affettuoso.
Intermezzo; Andantino grazioso.
Allegro vivace.

Massenet: Suite from "Esclarmonde"
I. Evocation (Andante maestoso).
II. L'île Magique (Andante moderato assai).

III. Hymène (Andante cantabile).

IV. Dans la Forêt.

a Pastorale (Andantino sans Lenteur).

b Chasse (Allegro).

(First time.

Soli for Violoncello.

a. Bach: Sarabande.

b. Schubert: Moment Musical.

c. Davidoff: At the Fountain.

Tchaikowsky: Andantino and Scherzo from the Symphony in F minor, No. 4.

Songs with Piano.

a. Delibes: Regrets.

b. Massenet: Bonne Nuit.

c. Ferrari: A une Fiancée.

Liszt: Hungarian Fantasy for Pianoforte and Orchestra.

This extra concert really calls for an extended notice, so far as matter and performance are concerned, for both were far above the average. The programme contained a great variety of interesting pieces, the orchestra evidently made great endeavors to do its best, while the solo talent furnished was of the best quality and plenty of it. It was in every respect an unusual programme. The orchestra gave a fine performance of the Tannhäuser overture, though the main portion of it was tamed down to an unusual degree, for Mr. Nikisch. The last episode of the overture was superbly rendered.

The Massenet suite, while more Frenchly modern than musical, is, to say the least, a queer conglomeration of all the resources of the orchestra, including some extra ones brought in. A few pleasant melodies are scattered through the different movements, mostly played by flutes, but it remains for the last, or closing, number to picture out a complete riot of all the good and bad in music, mostly bad. There is no music in it: it descends to a mere whirlwind of noise. However, it furnished a first rate novelty, and as such becomes interesting.

The andante and scherzo of Tchaikowsky's was beautifully played, affording much pleasure to the large audience present.

Mr. Paderewski commenced the concerto in somewhat of an indifferent manner, but soon regained himself, giving a notable interpretation of Schumann's masterpiece. A good deal of liberty was taken in the allegro, the whole movement being given in a more subdued quality of tone than is often heard here, and the tempi were considerably stronger. The andante was made bewitchingly lovely, singing in soft, subdued tones from beginning to end in an unsurpassed, dreamy manner. The orchestra shared with Mr. Paderewski in the honor of helping make this movement seductively beautiful. The allegro vivace, so difficult in rhythmic and technical qualities, was apparently overcome with that ease and repose which have become so characteristic of all Paderewski's work. There is no ostentatious display or style, as many term it, of arms, hands or body about Mr. Paderewski's playing. His style does not come from any "fad," but from the heart to the brain and fingers, which is as it should be. At the close of the concerto, Paderewski was vociferously bravoed and applauded. The Hungarian Rhapsodie was also played with astonishingly brilliant effects. Paderewski was the recipient of a beautiful laurel wreath of silver from the members of the orchestra. He hardly knew what to do with it, but finally succeeded in getting it off the stage in safety.

Mr. Schroeder of the orchestra, played three pieces on the 'cello in a most charming, artistic way. He was loudly praised and applauded.

Mrs. Julie Wyman has been so often spoken of as a superior singer that there is nothing to be said, except in praise of the fine manner in which she sang her three songs. They were of a very musical nature and can be classed thus: pretty, beautiful, brilliant. Only one fault can be found with Mrs. Wyman's singing, and that a common one with most singers—too much tremolo effect. Without this defect, for such it is, Mrs. Wyman would be a perfect singer.

Too much praise cannot be awarded to Mr. Nikisch for his most admirable accompaniments, both to Mrs. Wyman's songs and to Mr. Schroeder's solos.

JAMES M. TRACY.

The programme was of unusual length for a symphony concert, and of unusual excellence, containing Wagner's overture, "Tannhäuser"; Schumann's concerto for pianoforte in A minor; Massenet's Suite from "Esclarmonde"; Bach's "Sarabande," Schubert's "Moment Musical," Davidoff's "At the Fountain," for 'cello; the andantino and scherzo from the symphony in F minor, No. 4; Delibes' "Regrets," Massenet's "Bonne Nuit," Ferrari's "A une Fiancée," for contralto; Liszt's Hungarian Fantasy for pianoforte and orchestra.

Mrs. Julie L. Wyman and Mr. Alwin Schroeder were heartily received and well applauded for the admirable rendition of their solos, but the wildest enthusiasm was bestowed upon Paderewski, who received a more substantial token of appreciation in the form of a silver laurel wreath of exquisite workmanship, accompanied by a silver plate bearing the inscription: "From the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with gratitude and regards. March 2, 1892." Mr. Nikisch was also remembered by the members with a handsome French clock.

At the close of the performance, enthusiasm reached the point of cheers and bravos, and both Paderewski and Mr. Nikisch were recalled many times.

Peter Tschaikowsky

229

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1891-92.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

XVIII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, MARCH 5, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

TSCHAIKOWSKY

SYMPHONIC POEM. "Hamlet."
(First time.)

BRUCH.

CONCERTO for VIOLIN, No. 3, in D minor, op. 58.
Allegro energico.—Adagio.—Allegro molto.
(First time in Boston.)

SCHUMANN.

SYMPHONY No. 4, in D minor, op. 120.
Introduction (adagio non troppo).—Allegro.—
Romance (adagio non troppo).—Scherzo.—
Finale (allegro).

SOLOIST:

MME. CAMILLA URSO.

CAUSERIE.

Hamlet, the Dane, in Russian Musical Dress,

With a Digression Concerning Operatic Hamlets.

The Tragic End of the Inventor of Recitals.

The programme of the eighteenth Symphony concert was as follows: Symphonic poem, "Hamlet," Tschaikowsky (first time); Bruch's concerto for violin No. 3, D minor (first time); Schumann's Symphony No. 4, D minor. Mrs. Camilla Urso was the solo violinist.

Shakspeare's "Hamlet" has been the subject of much musical consideration. First of all, there is the stage music—incidental numbers, overtures, entr'actes and marches—music that is chiefly instrumental; for the songs of Ophelia are almost always sung to traditional airs. There is the music by Mangold, Miltitz, Hirschbach, Pierson, Holland, Holly, Vogler; and the noble funeral march with chorus by Berlioz may here be mentioned. There are the operas by Gasparini, Scarlatti, Caruso, Mercadante, Marczek, Buzzola, Stadfelt, Faccio, Hignard, Thomas. There are the overtures for concert use by Joachim, Gade, Bach, Macfarren, Bischoff, symphonic poems by Liszt and E. A. MacDowell, and a "Psychic sketch" for grand orchestra by H. W. Nichols. Nor is it probable that this list is complete.

Many of these composers, as well as their compositions, are covered with dust. Even the names of some of them are forgotten, save by the compilers of dictionaries. The only operatic Hamlet known to us is the gentlemanly baritone invented by Ambroise Thomas; and his other name is Faure or Lassalle. How was it in those operas given in Rome in the early years of the eighteenth century? Did the heart-sick son meet the awful spectre on the platform of Elsinore in Gasparini's version, and did the Ophelia of Domenico Scarlatti trill in her madness and drown herself in a torrent of roulades? The opera of those days was a formal, rigid thing, not unlike our "grand operatic concert, with scenery, costumes and stage appointments." Hamlet was probably a male soprano; and it is not likely that even the Ghost was allowed to be a bass.

When it was announced that French makers of opera text had laid violent hands on Shak-speare's play there was an outcry from the French; and the Germans, who claim to have discovered Shakspeare as well as music, saw another proof of the immorality of the French character. And yet it is a story to fire the fury of a musician. In the future "Hamlet," the opera as yet unwritten, the hero will be a baritone; the King, Osric, the spies will be tenors. The Ghost will be a member of a Russian choir, the owner of a true contra-bass. Polonius will not be a buffo role; let that be reserved for the First Gravedigger. Ophelia must be an alto, for she and Juliet, Cordelia and Desdemona never were sopranos. The Queen is the soprano, and a light soprano. If the old accusation of want of action be brought against the tragedy and it be again condemned as unfit for operatic purposes, the reply is simple: The modern music drama rejects action; it insists on moods, and the supernatural, intrigue, love, madness, sudden death. Surely here are themes to excite music.

Now, Tschaikowsky in his Overture-Fantasia, or Symphonic Poem, has attempted to give a musical version of the play. He frankly says to the hearer, "This is the way I am affected by the tragedy, and I wish by music to convey to you my impressions." Let us waive the question, whether such a thing be possible; let us consider the attempt of the composer, and not regard the music as absolute music. But the only way of considering the attempt is to judge the performance. First of all it may be said that such a work cannot be grasped at one hearing; yet the composer fails utterly, if a work of such long breath does not make at once a more or less definite impression. What is Tschaikowsky's self-imposed task? To suggest different scenes and different moods: the melancholy of Hamlet; the errand of the Ghost; the revenge of the son, thwarted continually by native irresolution; the Ophelia incident; the gloomy end. The division of these scenes is strongly marked; the hearer is treated as though he chiefly used his eyes, and he is led by the musical showman to different peep-holes. There is an introduction full of despair. The horn announces the unearthly visitor, and the poor Ghost brings with him a gong. The story of the murder is told by instruments of brass. Hamlet confides his purpose to the strings and Ophelia appears in the midst of the wood-wind. There are conflicting scenes in which the lovers are more strongly characterized. The drums remind us that Hamlet was a soldier. A short and simple dead march is the end. As absolute music this composition is patchwork. The prevailing colors are sombre. The stuff of the patches varies in quality. The introduction, the Ghost scene and the close are the strongest features. The Ophelia theme cannot be justly regarded as characteristic in its melodic construction or instrumental dress, however interesting it may be. The Hamlet theme is passionate enough, but in the expression of the passion there is no hint of the beauty that must lurk even in musical raging and commotion. The instrumentation as a whole is affected and not effective, and melodically and harmonically the work seems inferior to other compositions of Tschaikowsky, not to be named, for instance with the "Romeo and Juliet." The straining of the composer is too often apparent, but the most impressive passage is the close, where the effect is gained by artistic simplicity. Now, whether the scenes appeal successfully to the hearer and translate faithfully the tragedy, this question can only be answered individually by the different hearers.

The third violin concerto of Bruch was first played by Joachim in 1891 at a concert under the direction of the composer in Ousseldorf, and it has been played in other towns by Joachim and by Sarasate. Bruch has little to say in the first movement, nevertheless he consumes much valuable time. The second movement is not without pleasing moments. Then comes the inevitable third movement, and when a composer faces this task he may well imitate Henry Fielding, who once drank confusion to the man who invented the fifth act of a play. Bruch girds up his loins and makes a brave start, but after the achievement of the first theme he goes to pieces, nor does he gain his second wind. The concerto as a whole is respectable, long and dull. Mrs. Camilla Urso was unfortunate at the beginning, for her playing was untuneful; she soon recovered herself and played admirably, with full tone, musician-like phrasing, nobility of taste and mastery of technical difficulties. She was loudly and deservedly applauded.

The Symphony Saturday evening was the D minor of Schumann. Next Saturday the early version of this work will be performed, i. e., Messrs. Brahms and Wuellner's edition; for these learned gentlemen arranged the original version according to their taste, now preferring one reading, and now choosing another. Mr. Nikisch's ideas concerning the interpretation of the familiar version are well known. The performance Saturday evening was dramatic, or rather, melo-dramatic. There was fire and there was swing; the brass roared lustily; the drummer never flinched from the assigned duty and there was considerable excitement.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Conductor Nikisch appears to have an ample supply of novelties for the latter part of his season of concerts with the Boston Symphony orchestra, and last evening his programme contained two more works which were given a first hearing.

The symphonic poem "Hamlet," by Tchaikowsky, introduced the evening's selections, and the admirable performance given it displayed its characteristics to excellent advantage.

To the imaginative mind each composition appeals with a force that cannot be appreciated by those who seek for enjoyment in the music itself without the associations which the composer has in mind in his writing. The official description of the work states that the introduction expresses the deep grief of the young prince because of his father's death, and that a passage by the muted horns represents the striking of the midnight hour. There follows a symphonic allegro typical of Hamlet's heroic intent and indecision, and a second broad and beautiful motif depicts the character of Ophelia. These two subjects are marked out at considerable length, and the work comes to a sombre and tragic end.

There is no reason to doubt that this is an accurate statement of the idea that Tchaikowsky intended to convey in his tone pictures, but his intentions are open to misinterpretation if the imagination does not follow his lead.

The poem, however, is an admirable orchestral study and the virtuosity of the band was well shown in its performance.

The second novelty consisted of the violin concerto No. 3, by Max Bruch, in which Mme. Camilla Urso was the soloist. The concerto gained instant favor abroad last season, and was played by Dr. Joachim and other leading violinists in leading European cities.

It has many characteristics which make it attractive to soloists looking for opportunities to display their virtuosity, but it will hardly have the popular favor of audiences to the same extent as the earlier works of this class put forward by Herr Bruch.

The opening movement, an allegro energico, shows the skill of the musician rather than the genius of the composer, and is effective as an illustration of the mastery of the composer in musical construction.

The chief claim of the concerto to popular favor, is found in the graceful and melodious adagio in which the composer has given evidence of being in his most fanciful mood, and he has embellished his tuneful ideas in a very pleasing fashion.

The remarkable difficulty of the final movement undoubtedly makes it a fascinating study to such a player as Mme. Urso, but to the music lover the merits are not of the sort to make it altogether enjoyable.

The work of the composer throughout the concerto is clear and easily appreciated at a first hearing, and its value was made distinctly apparent by the masterly interpretation given it by Mme. Urso, whose popularity with the public was shown by a hearty greeting and an enthusiastic approval of her playing at the close of her performance.

It was intended to have the so-called "original" version of Schumann's fourth symphony for the final number on the programme, but, as this version of the work has, oddly enough, only just been published, with certain editing by Herr Brahms and Herr Wuellner, there was some delay in sending the parts. The second edition of the symphony, which has been used generally since it has been a standard work, was, therefore, substituted on the evening's programme, and the new old version assigned for a hearing at the next concert.

Mr. Nikisch gave the familiar symphony a splendid reading, leaving no chance to object to its lack of fire and virility, as the more brilliant passages were played with fine freedom and dash.

Next week the soloist is to be Herr Eugen d'Albert, pianist, who makes his reappearance in this country on this occasion, and plays the fifth concerto by Beethoven in E flat. The "Leonore" overture No. 2 will introduce the programme, and the new old version of the Schumann fourth symphony will end it.

MORE NOVELTIES

IN SATURDAY'S SYMPHONY CONCERT PROGRAMME.

Shakespeare's "Hamlet" as Filtered Through the Mind of Tchaikowsky—Camilla Urso as the Soloist in Bruch's New Concerto for the Violin—The Pachmann Recital.

Again a programme of novelties. We are having as many novelties in the programmes of the present as we were wont to have in the days of Henschel. It may be confessed that, in Saturday's instance, the new works were not very interesting, but since they were compositions by acknowledged masters of modern music, it was but right that they should have a single hearing. A constant round of the standard masterpieces would mean stagnation; opportunities for comparison generally lead to musical growth. The concert began with a Shakespearian subject filtered through the mind of Tchaikowsky. It was called "Hamlet," but the "melancholy Dane" seemed to have borrowed a few traits of "Bombastes Furioso" and became a military swaggerer. The Fortinbras episode was made far too prominent, and marches and the shocks of battle were in the work until the auditor became half convinced that Hamlet entered upon the revenge of his father's wrongs at the head of a few battalions. The ghost was, however, quite recognizable; he entered after a stroke of the gong, just like his spectral cousin, King Ninus, in Rossini's "Semiramide." A muted horn made desperate attempts to sound like a midnight bell of a most baleful order, and the kettledrums were big with fate as they ushered in the opening theme. The work throughout was scored in the heaviest manner. A long phrase for English horn was charmingly played, but I dare not attempt to guess its Shakespearian meaning, although a slip or two in the woodwind may have illustrated the lines.

Hamlet—Will you play upon this pipe?
Guildenstern—My lord, I cannot.

But the general performance was excellent and so was the conductor's reading; this time the mountain came to Mahomet for the work suited Mr. Nikisch's enjoyment of powerful phrases.

Then came Bruch's new concerto for violin (in D minor), with Camilla Urso as soloist. It is 40 years since Camilla Urso appeared in Boston first as a child prodigy. In Dwight's Journal of Music of Oct. 9, 1852, we read: "Little Camilla Urso, the girl violinist, but 11 years old, announced a concert at Masonic Temple for last evening, just too late for notice in this paper. But we had the pleasure, and a choice one it was, of hearing her the other evening in a company of some 40 invited guests, in Mr. Chickering's saloon. Her playing is not only truly wonderful, but wonderfully true; true in style, expression, feeling, as it is true in intonation and all mechanical respects."

"Her appearance is most interesting; a face full of intellectual and sedate expression; a large forehead wearing the 'pale cast of thought,' etc. Pity only that such a fine life must be lived out so fast, and always in the blaze of too much sun for plants so young and tender."

The prediction has not been fulfilled in its sad prognostication, for the life that seemed destined to run a short but phenomenal course, has now developed into a sturdy musical nature of the worthiest sort. The playing of the artist was not of the astonishing kind, but broad, soulful and majestic, a playing like that of the lamented Wieniawski, that caused technique to be forgotten by the auditor.

But the work, although possessing some noble thoughts, particularly in the adagio, was a disappointment; it is too prolix. It is dwarfed by comparison with Bruch's own concerto in G minor (one of the world famous compositions in this form), and it seems but a dilution of the majesty and breadth of that masterpiece. It was composed in 1891, and was played by Joachim, to whom it is dedicated, at Dusseldorf, last summer, for the first time. It is warlike in many of its themes, as a great deal of the music of this modern Tyrtæus seems to be. The adagio has a touch of Wagner in its ecstatic ending in high positions on the strings, and long notes on the woodwind. The tutti passages of the first movement are more than mere transitions—they are lofty themes, and the stately rhythm of the finale might represent a Greek war dance. But the inordinate length will militate against the success of the work as a concert number. The playing of Mme. Urso, however, won a great triumph, and recall followed recall at the termination of the task.

Schumann's D minor symphony ended the concert. The first movement was taken at a furious speed, which sometimes obscured the accompanying figures. The preponderance of the first violins, to which I have previously alluded, increased this fault. But the two last movements were finely given. The Scherzo is not humorous; none of Schumann's Scherzi are playful (he is the opposite of Mendelssohn in this respect), for what humor there was in the introspective master was as earnest as that of an Aristophanes. The performance seemed to bring out just this earnestness, and was very successful.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA'S TOUR.

The sixth annual tour of the Boston Symphony orchestra will end with the arrival of its members in this city tomorrow morning, the last week having been given to single concerts in Grand Rapids and Ann Arbor, Mich., and Detroit, and a series of three festival concerts in Pittsburg, Pa.

During the tour of 3200 miles so ended, the orchestra has travelled with 81 persons, given 18 concerts in 14 different cities, to over 30,000 people—the full capacity of every concert hall used having been tested to accommodate its audiences.

The soloists have been D'Albert, Mr. and Mrs. Henschel and Messrs. Kneisel, Adamowski, Schroeder and Rath. The tour has been throughout the most successful known in the history of the organization.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Eighteenth Symphony Concert.

The numbers that made up the programme of the 18th Symphony concert on Saturday evening were "Hamlet," a symphonic poem, by Tschalkowsky; Concerto No. 3, Max Bruch, and Schumann's D-minor Symphony, No. 4. Mrs. Camilla Urso was the violinist. Both the Tschalkowsky and Bruch pieces were played for the first time in these concerts, and neither of them are in the best vein of their composer. The "Hamlet" is a pompous, commonplace piece of patchwork, but it gave Mr. Nikisch the opportunity to whip up the band to the dynamic indications of the composer who reaches in his score the extraordinary high-water mark of ffffs. Now, we have often wondered what mark would designate the noise and fury of the Symphony orchestra sometimes, and here came the revelation.

To be sure the band played just as loud when it was marked fff and ff and even f, but this didn't matter in disturbing the conclusion that ffffs was really the indication of the pressure per square inch of loudest noise that we have dealt out to us by the orchestra under the enthusiastic lead of Mr. Nikisch. "The Concerto No. 3 of Bruch is a great falling off from the standard of his No. 1, which takes a place among the greatest works of its class. Mrs. Urso played it with all the well-known grace and skill that we are accustomed to from this eminent artist, although the intonation was not faultlessly perfect. This was more particularly the case in the first movement. The Schumann symphony which ended the concert was rendered in the stereotyped form that is now so familiar in all of Mr. Nikisch's work, a vigorous coarseness being one of the most prominent elements.

Mr. de Pachmann's Recital.

The Chickering Hall was completely filled on Saturday afternoon by an audience that listened with undiminished pleasure and attention from beginning to end of the request programme that this exquisite player presented. The works given that are less familiar to his repertoire were the Sonata op. 54 of Beethoven and the Rondo Capriccioso of Mendelssohn, both of which received a most characteristic and charming rendition. The Chopin pieces were, of course, played in Mr. de Pachmann's inimitable manner. At the end of the programme the audience made little or no effort to depart, and loudly called for Mr. de Pachmann's reappearance. At the end of most piano recitals the audiences are usually glad to escape to the outer air, but the reverse seems to be the case with Mr. de Pachmann's listeners. Well, the applause brought him forth again, and the result was three more numbers were played, ending with Listz's "Rigoletto" fantasia, a marvellous performance.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The eighteenth Symphony concert programme, like those of the four or five preceding concerts, offered novelties of a high nature. Tschalkowsky's symphonic poem "Hamlet," and Bruch's concerto for violin in D minor, Op. 58, No. 3, with Mme. Camilla Urso as soloist.

Tschalkowsky is probably one of the most remarkable composers of the day, his compositions bearing the impress of the Slavonic temperament—fantastic in outline, bold in modulation, with strongly marked rhythms. The symphonic poem is a tone picture of the tragedy of Hamlet. A passage by the muted horns representing the striking of the midnight hour is followed by a symphonic allegro typical of Hamlet's heroic intent and indecision, and a broad and beautiful motif depicting the character of Ophelia. The end of the work is solemn and tragic.

The delicacy of shading and breadth of treatment which Mr. Nikisch demanded from the orchestra was carried even beyond the point of excellence usually attained by this organization. The Schumann symphony in D minor, No. 4, op. 120, was exquisitely done. From the bold measures of the first movement, given with imposing power, through the beautiful mazes of the romance—the gem of the whole work—the heavier and strongly marked scherzo to the brilliant finale, perfect balance of tone, true adjustment of light and shade, virility and purity of tone characterized the rendition.

The second novelty possessed additional interest to the audience, inasmuch as it again brought before them Mme. Urso, whose appearance March 2 and 3, 1888, was remembered with feelings of pleasure. Possibly four years have somewhat dimmed our recollections of the fine points of that other performance, but she seemed to have gained in strength of touch, in size of tone and breadth of treatment. Certainly the concerto throughout was played in a masterly manner, with a beauty of phrasing rarely heard. The beautiful adagio movement, with its rich sustained notes, gave Mme. Urso an opportunity to display her artistic taste and feeling.

Next week's concert will bring Eugen D'Albert and the Beethoven concerto for pianoforte, No. 5, in E flat. The programme will also contain Beethoven's overture, "Leonore, No. 2," and Schumann's symphony, No. 4, in D minor, the first performance in Boston of the original version.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Mme. Urso Plays a Violin Solo and the Orchestra is Heard with Pleasure.

Mme. Camilla Urso was the soloist at yesterday's Symphony concert, and Music Hall was crowded beyond comfort by an audience eager to hear the talented violinist and to enjoy the good things offered by Director Nikisch's band.

The programme was made up of a symphonic poem, "Hamlet," by Tschalkowsky; Bruch's concerto for violin, No. 3, in D minor, and Schumann's splendid symphony in D minor.

The concerto had not before been heard in Boston, and it is a pleasure to record that the high expectations of the audience regarding the composition, awakened by the brilliant success of the composer's first concerto, were fully realized.

It is a magnificent work, full of interesting musical ideas, intelligently set forth, and rich in delightful melodies. Excellent opportunity is offered for display of virtuosity by the solo performer, and the instrumentation of the accompaniment is notably rich and effective.

That Mme. Urso would give an admirable interpretation of the writing was, of course, confidently expected, so generally known is the ability of this talented artist.

Her last appearance with the Symphony orchestra was in 1888, but she has often been heard here in concerts since then, and she has never failed to win the admiration of her most critical auditors.

There are very few women violin players who compare with her either as an exponent of the mechanical possibilities of the instrument or of its resources for expression of musical sentiment.

She plays in a free, unaffected manner; surmounts with ease the most difficult passages; gives artistic expression to every theme, and to every note a delicious, pure and always accurate tone.

At both the afternoon rehearsal and evening concert she was repeatedly recalled by most enthusiastic applause.

Another "first offering" by Conductor Nikisch was the Tschalkowsky symphonic poem, "Hamlet." It is an excellent example of this composer's rare skill in creating effective tone pictures, and it is treated throughout in a thoroughly artistic and musicianly manner. A second hearing of the work will be welcome.

Schumann's symphony in D was the final offering, and very few of the auditors left their seats, or moved from their few inches of standing room until the end of the performance. Few symphonies are more gladly listened to than this masterpiece of Schumann's, and most grateful are the majority of the Boston Symphony concert patrons to Mr. Nikisch for his sympathetic, intelligent and altogether delightful interpretation of the work.

For next Friday afternoon's rehearsal and Saturday evening's concert the programme will be as follows:

Overture, Leonore, No. 2 Beethoven
Concerto for pianoforte, No. 5, in E flat . . . Beethoven
Symphony No. 4, in D minor Schumann
(First performance in Boston of the original version.)
Mr. Eugen d'Albert, soloist.

The Symphony Concert.

The programme for the eighteenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, last night, was: Symphonic Poem, "Hamlet," Tschalkowsky (first time); Concerto for violin No. 3, in D minor, Op. 58, Bruch (first time); Symphony No. 4, D-minor, Op. 120, Schumann. The soloist was Mme. Camilla Urso. Tschalkowsky's "Hamlet" is a fiery work; but there is little in it that attracts or interests on a first hearing, and even the peculiar charm with which this composer generally invests his orchestration is lacking. The effect of the whole is heavy, not to say dreary, and there are portions of it that are arrant commonplace padding, the character of which is but poorly disguised by the pompous instrumentation. Early in the work mid-night is sounded on the horn, and a blast of brass announces the ghost of Hamlet's father. From this point the "poem" becomes almost distractingly fragmentary and noisy. There is a brief glimpse of melody to typify Ophelia. Beyond this nothing is clear. There is a tremendous effort to be impressive, but it ends in becoming fantastic; and to make it at all comprehensible, the listener should be provided with a full description of the composer's intention. As music pure and simple, it is quite unmeaning. It was played with great fire and precision, but it made no very favorable impression. The Bruch concerto is not as pleasing as is either of its predecessors. The solo part is skilfully written and the orchestration is richly colored throughout; but the work is dry, of wearisome length, and too persistently sombre. Even its brilliancy is never exhilarating, and there is little in the concerto that appeals to the emotions by its melodiousness, its grace, or its warmth. It was beautifully played by Mme. Urso, whose perfect technique, purity of taste, chastity of style, large and round tone and artistic phrasing renewed all of their familiar charm, and met with an enthusiastic recognition. Her performance was delightful from beginning to end, and if interest could have been imparted to the work it would have been by her masterly interpretation of it. She was applauded with immense heartiness and twice recalled. The programme for next week is: Overture, "Leonore," No. 2, Beethoven; Concerto for pianoforte, No. 5, in E-flat, Beethoven; and Symphony No. 4, D-minor, Schumann, according to the original version, which will, on this occasion, be heard for the first time in Boston. The soloist is to be Mr. Eugen d'Albert.

In the old theatres the pit, as they called the first floor of the auditorium before the French terms parquet (parquette for variant) and orchestra were adopted, had no reserved seats. The barbaric rule "first come first served" was followed. A desirable seat was secured after competition which generally ended in favor of him whose legs were the fleetest for running or the longest for clambering over the backs of the benches. How long we have waited at the pit door of the National, the Federal Street or the Howard, or at the doors that once opened from the curiosity hall of the Museum into the lobby of the theatre at that house! When at last the reward of patience—there was never much of that virtue, however—came with the swinging back of the barriers, how we have rushed and fought our way into the dimly lighted, gas and peanut-scented pit. The rough ways still prevail in the galleries of our theatres and in both pit and gallery of almost every English theatre. You can see them in full practice at the public rehearsals of our Symphony Orchestra Friday afternoons, when there are enacted scenes that would teach the toughest newsboy new ways to gain his point. You can see them too at the concerts of the hyper-genteel Apollo Club, whose swallow-tailed and bellows-bosomed members may turn faint with horror to hear their shows compared to a circus; but that is what they are most like at 7.15 o'clock on a concert night.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Eighteenth Symphony Concert.

The numbers that made up the programme of the 18th Symphony concert on Saturday evening were "Hamlet," a symphonic poem, by Tschaiakowsky; Concerto No. 3, Max Bruch, and Schumann's D-minor Symphony, No. 4. Mrs. Camilla Urso was the violinist. Both the Tschaiakowsky and Bruch pieces were played for the first time in these concerts, and neither of them are in the best vein of their composer. The "Hamlet" is a pompous, commonplace piece of patchwork, but it gave Mr. Nikisch the opportunity to whip up the band to the dynamic indications of the composer who reaches in his score the extraordinary high-water mark of ffffs. Now, we have often wondered what mark would designate the noise and fury of the Symphony orchestra sometimes, and here came the revelation.

To be sure the band played just as loud when it was marked fff and ff and even f, but this didn't matter in disturbing the conclusion that ffffs was really the indication of the pressure per square inch of loudest noise that we have dealt out to us by the orchestra under the enthusiastic lead of Mr. Nikisch. The Concerto No. 3 of Bruch is a great falling off from the standard of his No. 1, which takes a place among the greatest works of its class. Mrs. Urso played it with all the well-known grace and skill that we are accustomed to from this eminent artist, although the intonation was not faultlessly perfect. This was more particularly the case in the first movement. The Schumann symphony which ended the concert was rendered in the stereotyped form that is now so familiar in all of Mr. Nikisch's work, a vigorous coarseness being one of the most prominent elements.

Mr. de Pachmann's Recital.

The Chickering Hall was completely filled on Saturday afternoon by an audience that listened with undiminished pleasure and attention from beginning to end of the request programme that this exquisite player presented. The works given that are less familiar to his repertoire were the Sonata op. 54 of Beethoven and the Rondo Capriccioso of Mendelssohn, both of which received a most characteristic and charming rendition. The Chopin pieces were, of course, played in Mr. de Pachmann's inimitable manner. At the end of the programme the audience made little or no effort to depart, and loudly called for Mr. de Pachmann's reappearance. At the end of most piano recitals the audiences are usually glad to escape to the outer air, but the reverse seems to be the case with Mr. de Pachmann's listeners. Well, the applause brought him forth again, and the result was three more numbers were played, ending with Listz's "Rigoletto" fantasia, a marvellous performance.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The eighteenth Symphony concert programme, like those of the four or five preceding concerts, offered novelties of a high nature, Tschaiakowsky's symphonic poem "Hamlet," and Bruch's concerto for violin in D minor, Op. 58, No. 3, with Mme. Camilla Urso as soloist.

Tschaiakowsky is probably one of the most remarkable composers of the day, his compositions bearing the impress of the Slavonic temperament—fantastic in outline, bold in modulation, with strongly marked rhythms. The symphonic poem is a tone picture of the tragedy of Hamlet. A passage by the muted horns representing the striking of the midnight hour is followed by a symphonic allegro typical of Hamlet's heroic intent and indecision, and a broad and beautiful motif depicting the character of Ophelia. The end of the work is solemn and tragic.

The delicacy of shading and breadth of treatment which Mr. Nikisch demanded from the orchestra was carried even beyond the point of excellence usually attained by this organization. The Schumann symphony in D minor, No. 4, op. 120, was exquisitely done. From the bold measures of the first movement, given with imposing power, through the beautiful mazes of the romance—the gem of the whole work—the heavier and strongly marked scherzo to the brilliant finale, perfect balance of tone, true adjustment of light and shade, virility and purity of tone characterized the rendition.

The second novelty possessed additional interest to the audience, inasmuch as it again brought before them Mme. Urso, whose appearance March 2 and 3, 1888, was remembered with feelings of pleasure. Possibly four years have somewhat dimmed our recollections of the fine points of that other performance, but she seemed to have gained in strength of touch, in size of tone and breadth of treatment. Certainly the concerto throughout was played in a masterly manner, with a beauty of phrasing rarely heard. The beautiful adagio movement, with its rich sustained notes, gave Mme. Urso an opportunity to display her artistic taste and feeling.

Next week's concert will bring Eugen D'Albert and the Beethoven concerto for pianoforte, No. 5, in E flat. The programme will also contain Beethoven's overture, "Leonore, No. 2," and Schumann's symphony, No. 4, in D minor, the first performance in Boston of the original version.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Mme. Urso Plays a Violin Solo and the Orchestra is Heard with Pleasure.

Mme. Camilla Urso was the soloist at yesterday's Symphony concert, and Music Hall was crowded beyond comfort by an audience eager to hear the talented violinist and to enjoy the good things offered by Director Nikisch's band.

The programme was made up of a symphonic poem, "Hamlet," by Tschaiakowsky; Bruch's concerto for violin, No. 3, in D minor, and Schumann's splendid symphony in D minor.

The concerto had not before been heard in Boston, and it is a pleasure to record that the high expectations of the audience regarding the composition, awakened by the brilliant success of the composer's first concerto, were fully realized.

It is a magnificent work, full of interesting musical ideas, intelligently set forth, and rich in delightful melodies. Excellent opportunity is offered for display of virtuosity by the solo performer, and the instrumentation of the accompaniment is notably rich and effective.

That Mme. Urso would give an admirable interpretation of the writing was, of course, confidently expected, so generally known is the ability of this talented artiste.

Her last appearance with the Symphony orchestra was in 1888, but she has often been heard here in concerts since then, and she has never failed to win the admiration of her most critical auditors.

There are very few women violin players who compare with her either as an exponent of the mechanical possibilities of the instrument or of its resources for expression of musical sentiment.

She plays in a free, unaffected manner; surmounts with ease the most difficult passages; gives artistic expression to every theme, and to every note a delicious, pure and always accurate tone.

At both the afternoon rehearsal and evening concert she was repeatedly recalled by most enthusiastic applause.

Another "first offering" by Conductor Nikisch was the Tschaiakowsky symphonic poem, "Hamlet." It is an excellent example of this composer's rare skill in creating effective tone pictures, and it is treated throughout in a thoroughly artistic and musicianly manner. A second hearing of the work will be welcome.

Schumann's symphony in D was the final offering, and very few of the auditors left their seats, or moved from their few inches of standing room until the end of the performance. Few symphonies are more gladly listened to than this masterpiece of Schumann's, and most grateful are the majority of the Boston Symphony concert patrons to Mr. Nikisch for his sympathetic, intelligent and altogether delightful interpretation of the work.

For next Friday afternoon's rehearsal and Saturday evening's concert the programme will be as follows:

Overture, Leonore, No. 2..... Beethoven
Concerto for pianoforte, No. 5, in E flat..... Beethoven
Symphony No. 4, in D minor..... Schumann
(First performance in Boston of the original version.)
Mr. Eugen d'Albert, soloist.

The Symphony Concert.

The programme for the eighteenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, last night, was: Symphonic Poem, "Hamlet," Tschaiakowsky (first time); Concerto for violin No. 3, in D minor, Op. 58, Bruch (first time); Symphony No. 4, D-minor, Op. 120, Schumann. The soloist was Mme. Camilla Urso. Tschaiakowsky's "Hamlet" is a fiery work; but there is little in it that attracts or interests on a first hearing, and even the peculiar charm with which this composer generally invests his orchestration is lacking. The effect of the whole is heavy, not to say dreary, and there are portions of it that are arrant commonplace padding, the character of which is but poorly disguised by the pompous instrumentation. Early in the work mid-night is sounded on the horn, and a blast of brass announces the ghost of Hamlet's father. From this point the "poem" becomes almost distractingly fragmentary and noisy. There is a brief glimpse of melody to typify Ophelia. Beyond this nothing is clear. There is a tremendous effort to be impressive, but it ends in becoming fantastic; and to make it at all comprehensible, the listener should be provided with a full description of the composer's intention. As music pure and simple, it is quite unmeaning. It was played with great fire and precision, but it made no very favorable impression. The Bruch concerto is not as pleasing as is either of its predecessors. The solo part is skilfully written and the orchestration is richly colored throughout; but the work is dry, of wearisome length, and too persistently sombre. Even its brilliancy is never exhilarating, and there is little in the concerto that appeals to the emotions by its melodiousness, its grace, or its warmth. It was beautifully played by Mme. Urso, whose perfect technique, purity of taste, chastity of style, large and round tone and artistic phrasing renewed all of their familiar charm and met with an enthusiastic recognition. Her performance was delightful from beginning to end, and if interest could have been imparted to the work it would have been by her masterly interpretation of it. She was applauded with immense heartiness and twice recalled. The programme for next week is: Overture, "Leonore," No. 2, Beethoven; Concerto for pianoforte, No. 5, in E-flat, Beethoven; and Symphony No. 4, D-minor, Schumann, according to the original version, which will, on this occasion, be heard for the first time in Boston. The soloist is to be Mr. Eugen d'Albert.

In the old theatres the pit, as they called the first floor of the auditorium before the French terms parquet (parquette for variant) and orchestra were adopted, had no reserved seats. The barbaric rule "first come first served" was followed. A desirable seat was secured after competition which generally ended in favor of him whose legs were the fleetest for running or the longest for clambering over the backs of the benches. How long we have waited at the pit door of the National, the Federal Street or the Howard, or at the doors that once opened from the curiosity hall of the Museum into the lobby of the theatre at that house! When at last the reward of patience—there was never much of that virtue, however—came with the swinging back of the barriers, how we have rushed and fought our way into the dimly lighted, gas and peanut-scented pit. The rough ways still prevail in the galleries of our theatres and in both pit and gallery of almost every English theatre. You can see them in full practice at the public rehearsals of our Symphony Orchestra Friday afternoons, when there are enacted scenes that would teach the toughest newsboy new ways to gain his point. You can see them too at the concerts of the hyper-genteel Apollo Club, whose swallow-tailed and bellows-bosomed members may turn faint with horror to hear their shows compared to a circus; but that is what they are most like at 7.15 o'clock on a concert night.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the eighteenth symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Tschaikowsky: Symphonic Poem, "Hamlet."
Max Bruch: Violin Concerto No. 3, in D minor, op. 53.
Schumann: Symphony No. 4, in D minor, op. 120.
Mme. Camilla Urso was the violinist.

Composers, when writing an overture to, or symphonic poem on, a tragedy, have sometimes been known to select a short quotation from the tragedy itself to serve as a motto for their composition. Thus Wagner took Faust's "Entbehren sollst du, sollst entbehren!" as a motto for his "Eine Faust Overture;" in like manner Tschaikowsky might have taken Hamlet's "Woe't weep? woe't fight? woe't fast? woe't tear thyself?"

Woe't drink up Esil? eat a crocodile?
I'll do't. Nay, and thou'lt mouth.

I'll rant as well as thou." as a motto for his symphonic poem, "Hamlet." When a man throws himself so frankly, so unreservedly, into violence of expression as Tschaikowsky has in this composition, we can not help liking him—if with certain restrictions. There is an immense amount of sound and fury in the work, and yet it does not, somehow, give the impression of signifying nothing; at the very least, it shows the composer to have red blood in his veins. It has been said that the present Russian school derives mainly from Schumann and Berlioz; but in this "Hamlet" the Berlioz influence shows itself as largely predominating. It is as wildly and frantically written as almost anything by the great Frenchman. One finds little musical invention in it; the thematic material is always, as it were, steeped in emotion, but seems rather sterile musically, and often commonplace; some of the recitative-like passages sound terribly like things of a similar sort that we all have heard years ago in violin concertos by Vieuxtemps and writers of that ilk. You look in vain for a phrase of the pithiness, force and distinction of the opening passage in Berlioz's "Roi L  ar" overture, not to speak of the recitative for 'celli and double basses in Beethoven's ninth symphony. These portentous-sounding phrases all seem to smack a little of the stencil. Yet, if Tschaikowsky has apparently little to say here that is either new or musically very valuable, he says what he has to say with such hearty good will, with such vigor of emphasis, that it compels your attention, and seems, for the moment, not unimpressive. Frantic as he is, he does not fall into the absolutely ludicrous, as Berlioz did in the tomb scene in his "Rom  o et Juliette." If, in point of style, construction and general musical value, this "Hamlet" may be put on a par with much that has been written by contemporary French followers of Berlioz—always excepting those of Saint-Sa  ns's symphonic poems—it rises superior in virtue of a certain evident sincerity and depth of feeling. It does not seem entirely written for the gallery. We should rank it between the composer's "Romeo and Juliet" and his "Francesca da Rimini." It was superbly, wonderfully played.

About the performance of Schumann's D minor Symphony—the current, not the original version—we hardly know what to say. As far as the orchestra was concerned, it was a splendid piece of playing; on Mr. Nikisch's part, it was one of those "expressive renderings" against which every musical fibre in us protests instinctively—we must say this. The time is past for considering this sort of thing as a matter of musical principle; we are quite content to abandon this position. As the world is now going, in five years more this style of performance may be called classical, and in ten years, dry and old-foggyish,—who knows? It is in the air, in the spirit of the times. But, as a matter of personal musical feeling, of musical taste, we must regret that, after having had this sort of thing pushed well-nigh ad nauseam by pianists and other solo players, we can no longer hope to find a safe refuge from it in orchestral performances. The modern orchestra seems to be fast giving up what can properly be called concerted playing on the largest scale, and to be converting itself into a huge, complex instrument, on which the conductor performs solos, and "interprets" compositions to the public. The last chance of hearing a classic composition played simply as it stands seems gone, or fast going.

The worst of it all is that one fails to see where this style can logically stop. This spice of personal emotion, of purely individual musical feeling, is like other spices. Once begin with cayenne, and you will go on with more and more cayenne, until at last you get to drinking Worcestershire sauce and tahasco out of Madeira glasses. We have already got far beyond Wagner's "expressive style" of orchestral performance, with its almost infinitesimal and scarcely perceptible modification of tempo; we have got to modifications so intensified that they threaten to tear the phrase limb from limb, and annihilate all unity of impression in a movement. And what is to be done when all this begins to pall upon the jaded ear? Evidently nothing but over-bid once more what has been done already, and so on, until the cohesive power of the music gives out, and the composition flies off into fragments, as over-driven millstones do, by sheer centrifugal force. And, after all, how irksome and disturbing all this "interpretation" of stoutly constructed symphonic compositions is! It is like hearing Shakespeare read, with all the foot-notes. A work like Schumann's D minor symphony can interpret itself; Liszt wrote symphonic poems in which the essence of the music was to be read between the lines, and which consequently needed interpretation; but Schumann's constant endeavor in composing was to express himself. And, to our thinking, he succeeded tolerably well.

Max Bruch's new concerto made no very definite impression upon us, as a work. Not so Mme. Urso's playing of it. Her performance can not be spoken of in terms of too warm admiration. The wonderful warmth, purity and volume of her tone, her admirable style, both stout and graceful, dignified and impassioned, her fine totality of conception and coherent presentation, are all beyond praise. Here is an artist who, from the outset, has steadily grown in force, musical comprehension, and wealth of resource. Such playing leaves nothing to be desired.

THE SYMPHONIES.

EIGHTEENTH CONCERT.

The eighteenth Symphony concert was given in Music hall, Saturday evening, March 5. The programme:

Tschaikowsky Symphonic Poem. "Hamlet."
(First time)
Bruch Concerto for Violin, No. 3, in D minor, op. 58.
Allegro energico—Adagio—Allegro molto.
(First time in Boston)
Schumann Symphony No. 4, in D minor, op. 120.
Introduction (adagio non troppo)—Allegro—Romance (adagio non troppo)—Scherzo—Finale (allegro).
Soloist: Mme. Camilla Urso.

If one is to judge of the symphonic poem music by the performance of the orchestra under Mr. Nikisch last Saturday evening, it must be stamped as having been a riotous, noisy demonstration of the most turbulent character. There is little wonder Ophelia went insane, albeit there is a motif which is supposed to depict her beautiful character. The grief of Hamlet at his father's death, represented by the striking of the midnight hour by muted horns, together with the subject representing Ophelia when the two are brought together, as they are in the music, is astonishingly more like a good-sized earthquake than the solemnities of a death scene. The orchestra undoubtedly did their part well, it being evident they had made careful preparations for the fiery ordeal. This was the first representation of the symphonic poem in Boston.

The violin concerto of Bruch, played by Mme. Camilla Urso, is, as a whole, disappointing. The first part by all odds is the most interesting as music. There are many fine passages which are well calculated to rivet the attention of sincere lovers of good music. The second movement begins with a melody which is carefully worked out to such a length as to become painfully monotonous. It contains so little of tone color, so little virility, that one soon loses all interest in following it to its end. The last and concluding movement is better calculated to show the technical powers of the violinist than any music it contains. Madame Urso is a violinist of rare abilities, musical and technical. Her rendering of the entire concerto was beautifully artistic, which the large audience present fully conceded, showing their appreciation with very hearty applause at the end. The orchestra were not always thoughtful enough to accompany her properly, playing much too loudly most of the time. The last movement demands a more masculine treatment than the madame accorded it, though she is not strikingly effeminate.

The Schumann symphony was well played, Mr. Nikisch imparting to it much of his brilliant, magnetic qualities, which, by the way, really belong to the symphony.

The concert was made particularly interesting by the two novelties presented, and the appearance, after some years' absence, of Madame Camilla Urso, always a great favorite with Boston people.

Eugene D'Albert ("little lion") is to be the next Symphony attraction.

JAMES M. TRACY.

MUSIC MAD.

The storm of music that has poured over Boston during the past few weeks has almost flooded it, and there is every prospect that it will rage to the end of the season. It has already begun to wear on the nerves of many lovers of the art, but there are enthusiasts who, undismayed by all that they are called on to hear, revel in the tone deluge and valiantly face it. Twelve concerts in one week, as was recently the case, would seem sufficient to fill to satiety the most hungry of music lovers; but the excess, instead of allaying, seemed to stimulate the appetite for more. Now and then three or four concerts a day have appealed to the musical public, and not in vain. There has been so much of pianoforte music that it would not be unnatural to imagine that the public ear had grown weary of the tones of the unsympathetic instrument. It has proved, however, far otherwise. At De Pachmann's three concerts the audiences were larger at each, the hall being packed at the last. Paderewski has given nine recitals, and at each succeeding recital the attendance increased until at length was seen that hitherto unprecedented circumstance, Music Hall packed to listen to performances given by one artist. It is true that these two players are among the greatest of the world's pianists; but so are Rubinstein and Von Bulow, and so is D'Albert, but they never played here to such large audiences, which would seem to indicate that we have either grown more appreciative or more sensitive regarding the proper thing to do when celebrities visit us. Two or three eminent pianists from abroad are yet to appear here; and it remains to be seen if the hunger for piano recitals will continue.

It is evident, however, that this is to be essentially a piano season, for chamber concerts have not been as numerous as they have been 238 in past seasons, but vocal recitals have already reached and overtopped the record, and there are, as yet uncounted, more to come. Of these only few have attracted large audiences, and as few can have paid expenses. However, they have served to keep the names of their givers before the public, which was, perhaps, all that was expected from the larger proportion of them. The Symphony concerts, of course, are a regular and an expected feature of our season's music, but the wonder of it is that, after feasting for five days and nights of the week on music, people should have sufficient musical stomach left to partake of and to digest the heavy symphony plum pudding that is provided for dessert at the close of the week. Still, the symphony concerts are a matter of local pride; they have given us an art distinction elsewhere; and of all the proper things in things musical, they are the proper things par excellence. Then, too, they have a special interest in many ways. People discuss them with more or less fervor, and at present the discussion is concerned largely with the momentous question whether the orchestra is at present as finely trained as it has been in the past; whether or no it still deserves to rank among the perfect orchestras of the world.

This state of affairs makes the symphony concerts the nucleus of the musical season. Opinion is divided, and consequently a mild excitement is maintained. There are those who believe that the orchestra has steadily deteriorated since it passed from the charge of Mr. Gericke. There are some who believe that it has lost nothing under Mr. Nikisch's direction. There are none who argue that the latter has improved its efficiency. Then again, there are some who fancy that Mr. Gericke was wholly absorbed in the music he directed, and kept his own personality in the background as much as possible while Mr. Nikisch is notable for pursuing a diametrically opposite course. These, also, have an ardent yearning for the return of Mr. Gericke to the position he formerly held here at the head of this orchestra; and after all, it would not be a bad thing for the orchestra, by any means; and the chances are that he would be welcomed back with tremendous enthusiasm. This and other considerations in kind surround the Symphony concerts with a peculiar interest. In the meanwhile the question is, how much more music Boston is to have this season.

THE SYMPHONY. Continued

Tschaikowsky's latest symphonic poem, "Hamlet" was the opening number of the eighteenth symphony rehearsal and concert and was performed for the first time in this city. A new work by the eminent Russian is a notable event nowadays. The one in question, though not so strikingly effective as his "Romeo and Juliet," is in nowise disappointing at a first hearing. On the contrary, one's impression is that it would grow steadily on further acquaintance.

The broad and gloomy opening measures with an unusual and weirdly suggestive passage for muted horns, are well designed to command attention. The first theme of the allegro is bold and characterful, and its second, though more quiet and melodic, has no elements of weakness. This second theme is subjected to rich and extended treatment until a surprise comes in the shape of a sudden interruption by an episode of martial character. A repetition of these effects ends in a splendidly worked up climax, after which the movement relapses into gloom and comes to a quiet close. As a whole, "Hamlet" is a remarkably coherent work, there being few indications of the episodic form which prevails in most works of the symphonic poem order. It was read in a very expressive and dramatic manner by Mr. Nikisch, and the playing of the orchestra was well up to their standard.

Mme. Camilla Urso, the soloist, had every reason to feel pleased with her reception. It is just four years ago since she was last heard in these concerts. The unrestrained applause that greeted her as she appeared on the platform proved that she had suffered no diminution of popularity in this long interval. And surely, no musical performer before the American public more fully deserves its highest esteem. Mme. Urso has ever been an artist of the highest aims, and to her aims she has always been loyal. For more years than it perhaps would be polite to mention, she has been largely instrumental in familiarizing music-lovers in every part of the country with works of the great composers; and her influence in raising the standard of music can hardly be overestimated. Of her playing in Max Bruch's third and latest concerto for violin and orchestra, scarcely more need be said than that it was fully worthy of her reputation. The same beautiful tone and phrasing, the same technical command, the same artistic apprehension that have always characterized her work were apparent in this performance. The concerto itself is interesting and attractive, although not equal to its composer's second in strength or beauty of thematic material.

Bruch's easy and charming flow of melody is present in a considerable degree and there is no lack of skill displayed in the construction and instrumentation of the three movements, the orchestral coloring being warm and varied. The first and second movements are the best, the finale, though brilliant, showing a decided falling-off in definiteness of purpose. Prolonged applause followed its closing chords and Mme. Urso was recalled several times. 239

A performance of Schumann's D minor symphony with the original instrumentation, had been announced for this week, but postponement was unavoidable, owing to the non-arrival of the parts; and the work, as it is known, was played instead. General interest has been excited in the musical world by Breitkopf and Hartel's publication of this symphony as it was first scored by Schumann; and its performance is once more promised for next week. Mr. Nikisch's reading of this favorite work of his was fully equal to those of previous seasons, and was heartily applauded.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

A concert was given in Music Hall, last Wednesday evening, for the benefit of the members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. An admirably arranged programme was performed by the orchestra, Mrs. Julie P. Wyman, Mr. Alwin Schroeder and Mr. Paderewski giving their services. To musician and layman alike, the occasion was one of the most enjoyable of the season. The very large gathering was representative of musical Boston, and everybody in the hall was imbued with a spirit of enthusiasm. And, though no floral tributes found their way from audience to platform, yet flowers were not wanting to add to the cheerfulness of the scene, for the stands of conductor and players were prettily decorated. The magnificently played "Tannhauser" overture gave immediate assurance that no pains had been spared at rehearsal. But careful rehearsing does not always produce the best results in performance. At the supreme moment much, very much, depends on the moods of the performers. In this instance it was evident that every one on the platform was inspired. Virility, breadth and fullness of tone are a matter of course when this orchestra plays. But it must be said that the degree of artistic excellence it displayed in all its departments in this performance has not been frequently attained of late. Long-continued applause followed. The other orchestral numbers were a suite from Massenet's opera, "Esclarmonde," and the two movements from Tschaikowski's fourth symphony, which were played not long ago. The suite was given for the first time, and consists of four movements, or at least four were performed.

The music is thoroughly theatric in style. There is much gorgeousness of instrumentation and effect, but no part of it, except the third movement, created a strong impression at this single hearing. The symphony movements were beautifully played and warmly received. Mrs. Wyman's contribution to the programme was a group of three French songs, "Regrets," by Delibes; "Bonne Nuit," by Massenet; and "A une Fiancée," by Ferrari, all of which displayed her beautiful voice and artistic style of singing to advantage, and won deserved recalls. In three numbers by Bach, Schubert and Davidoff, Mr. Schroeder fairly outdid himself in beauty of tone and technical finish, and was no less heartily applauded. Naturally, Paderewski was the center of attraction. In the Schumann concerto, he gave one more proof of his greatness as pianist and musician. His conception and execution of it were replete with those characteristics which are now familiar to Boston's army of music lovers. The work of both soloist and orchestra was wholly in harmony with the spirit of Schumann's exquisite music; and one could only lament that this rare performance had not taken place in a smaller hall, where nothing of its most delicate beauties would have been lost. After the concerto, amidst great applause, Paderewski was presented by Mr. Kneisel on behalf of the orchestra with a large silver laurel wreath, and finally in response to repeated recalls, played Schumann's "Des Abends." His remaining number, the last on the programme, was Liszt's Hungarian Fantasia, which he played in an electrifying manner. The entire audience rose and gave vent to its enthusiasm. Again and again he bowed his acknowledgments in company with Mr. Nikisch, but, true to his artistic instincts, refused to spoil this impressive climax of the concert by playing again.

240

241
Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1891-92.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

XIX. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, MARCH 12, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

BEETHOVEN.

OVERTURE. "Lenore, No. 2."

BEETHOVEN.

CONCERTO for PIANOFORTE, No. 5, in E flat.
Allegro.—Adagio un poco mosso.—Rondo (Allegro).

SCHUMANN.

SYMPHONY No. 4, op. 120.
Andante con moto.—Allegro di molto.—
Romanza.—Scherzo.—Largo.—Finale.
(Original version first time).

SOLOIST:

MR. EUGEN D'ALBERT.

The Piano used is a Knabe.

MUSIC AND THE DRAMA.

The Symphony Concert.

The programme of the nineteenth Symphony concert, which was given Saturday evening in Music Hall, was as follows: Overture, "Lenore," No. 2, Beethoven; Concerto for pianoforte No. 5, E flat, Beethoven; Schumann's Symphony No. 4 (original version). Mr. Eugen D'Albert was the pianist.

The manuscript of the original version of Schumann's D minor Symphony is owned by Johannes Brahms. He loaned it to Franz Wuellner of Cologne. It was played in that city in October, 1889, and there was so much talk about it that, under the editorship of Dr. Wuellner, it was published lately by Breitkopf & Haertel. Unfortunately for the student, the learned Brahms and Wuellner were not content with the Schumann version; they revised it, and in one or two instances they adopted the instrumentation of the later and familiar version. A week ago Saturday we heard Schumann's D minor Symphony as interpreted by Mr. Nikisch, full of exaggerations and even contradictions of the composer's expressly indicated wishes. Last Saturday we heard the Symphony in D minor, rejected by the composer and revised by Messrs. Brahms and Wuellner. It might now be a pleasure to hear Schumann's preferred version played with a due regard for his own directions.

It is true that in the first form of this symphony the instrumentation is clearer than it is in the second; for the instrumentation of Schumann's later period is not free from the reproach of muddiness. Nor, indeed, was the cunning mixing of orchestral tone colors ever a distinguishing feature of the genius of this composer. On the other hand, the thematic and contrapuntal alterations in the second version of 1851 are, as a rule, an improvement. In certain respects the performance of last Saturday was an improvement on that of a fortnight ago. The duties of the second violins and the violas were not passed over that the first violins might benefit thereby. The dynamic contrasts were more carefully observed. Schumann was evidently acquainted with fiery and "magnetic" conductors, for he wrote on the outer covering of the manuscript of 1841, "The sudden changes of piano and forte should be strictly observed." In the forte passages, however, there was at times a tendency to exaggerate, and Schumann's body was clothed in Hungarian dress. The dramatic overture of Beethoven was exceedingly well played.

Mr. D'Albert was most enthusiastically applauded after the concerto, and he played a rhapsody by Brahms. His performance of the concerto might justly excite gaudy words of extravagant praise, were it not that polychromatic adjectives would be at variance with the unsurpassable dignity of the occasion. It would be idle to speak of any technical display, for the supreme virtuosoship of Mr. D'Albert has been the wonder of his colleagues and the musical public ever since his first appearance in Germany. This virtuosoship was at first the plaything of his youth. The giant delighted in his strength. He abused it; so that often he smote the keys until the wires shrieked in agony. But now he seems to have fully mastered himself, the only task that remained for him. Saturday evening his mighty powers were used reverently in the service of Beethoven. The reading of the concerto was distinguished by its nobility. There was nothing common, mean or earthy. The soul of a great man was revealed, and the medium was content with the holy mission. Beethoven spoke. The pianist listened. He did not seek to interrupt, to contradict, to explain. He did not question any mood of the master. He accepted passion, tenderness, pride, arrogance, tumultuous joy, grotesque fancy. And it was as though D'Albert knew full well the value of the marvelous apostrophe of the Opium Eater to Shakspeare: "O mighty poet! Thy works are not as those of other men, simply and merely great works of art, but are also like the phenomena of nature, like the sun and the sea, the stars and the flowers, like frost and snow, rain and dew, hail storm and thunder, which are to be studied with entire submission of our own faculties, and in the perfect faith that in them there can be no too much or too little, nothing useless or inert, but that, the farther we press in our discoveries, the more we shall see proofs of design and self-supporting arrangement where the careless eye had seen nothing but accident!"

PHILIP HALE.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The event of last evening's symphony concert was the appearance of Eugen D'Albert, the pianist, who has returned to America for a short tour with the Boston orchestra and a few recitals. He chose the concerto in E flat, No. 5, by Beethoven for this occasion, and gave the work such a performance as it has rarely had in later years.

The reception given the pianist left no doubt as to the sentiments of the audience, and the members of the orchestra joined with unusual enthusiasm in welcoming the soloist of the evening back to the scene of his earlier triumphs in the recitals of his earlier visit here.

His broad, masterly treatment of the opening allegro commanded the instant admiration of the audience, and no pianist could ask for a more attentive hearing than that given the concerto from first to last. The remarkable clearness and purity of tone brought out by this pianist's touch gives an indescribable enjoyment to the listener, and the maintainance of this characteristic of his playing throughout the most stupendous technical difficulties, gives a degree of satisfaction that is seldom realized in the piano work of the most noted soloists.

The beautiful adagio movement was played with admirable taste, and the theme was sung with rare expression and sentiment, the embellishments never interfering with the clearness of the subject thus elaborated. There was a womanly delicacy of touch combined with a masterly control of the instrument in this portion of the work that could but find the heartiest appreciation of the most critical. In the final movement the player surpassed his own remarkable work in former appearances here, and aroused the most pronounced demonstration in his honor at its end that has been known here for many seasons, the musicians all joining in the applause, which called the artist back to the stage repeatedly to make his acknowledgements.

Mr. Nikisch kept his promise of giving a hearing of the fourth of the Schumann symphonies, in its original version, and now that, as a clever man expressed it, "Boston has heard this symphony as Schumann didn't want it," there seems no good cause for a repetition of the work in the form which, thanks to Herr Brahms, has just been made public from the original manuscript, of which Brahms is the owner. There are few marked thematic differences between this original version and that which has been the standard in the orcheslibraries of the day, and the differences in themes and the orchestration are all in favor of the more generally known form of the symphony.

244

A very enjoyable performance of the "Leonore" overture No. 2 began the concert, and the work of the orchestra during the evening was at all times up to its best standard.

The usual monthly tour will take place the coming week, and the 20th of the season's concerts, on Saturday, the 26th inst., will be with Mme. Amalia Joachim as soloist, the programme including Brahms' "Tragic Overture," Aria from "Orpheus," Gluck's "Reigen Seliger Geister und Furien Tanz," from "Orpheus," songs, with piano, and Beethoven's symphony No. 8.

D'ALBERT THE SOLOIST.

Globe
He Plays a Beethoven Concerto at the Symphony Concert.

The 19th rehearsal and concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra was pleasantly anticipated by the regular patrons, and there was scarcely an absentee, and those who take chances for a seat were present to the limit.

This season has been replete with piano recitals. The fact that Paderewski can completely fill the Boston Music Hall at one of his concerts, and hold an audience in deep attention for two hours, speaks well for the hold this form of musical entertainment has on the Boston public.

The announcement that D'Albert was to take part in the Friday afternoon rehearsal doubtless drew many who were anxious to compare his style with that of other pianists who have so recently appeared here.

However that may be, when Mr. Nikisch took his baton in hand an unusually large and attentive audience were prepared to listen.

The concert began with one of the three overtures to Fidelio, Leonore, No. 2. This overture was composed in 1805, and though styled No. 2, is in reality No. 1, since the others were produced in 1806-7 respectively.

This overture opens adagio in the key of C, and at once captivates the ear and senses. The work is well distributed and introduces the well-known air of Florestan, which he sings in the dungeon scene in the second act of the opera.

Then came an allegro, which is in no way associated with the parent theme, but full of original thought.

The pizzicato was a delightful effect at this stage—sustained by the basses—doing accompaniment for the flutes and oboes.

A pleasing feature was the introduction of two trumpet calls announcing the arrival of the governor.

The first violins at this point begin a very faint introduction to the finale, followed in succession by the other strings, until the entire orchestra is involved in a most rapacious termination.

The concerto for pianoforte, No. 5, in E flat, by Beethoven, was selected to introduce the soloist of the occasion, D'Albert. The movements were made up of allegro, adagio un poco mosso, allegro.

This best of Beethoven's concertos has been called a "symphony, with pianoforte obligato."

The pianist begins with a brilliant chromatic scale passage and his work thenceforth exhibits the great resources and fullness of this soloist.

He not only meets all the difficulties of the score, but sustains a volume of sound sufficient to dominate the whole work.

The adagio offered excellent opportunities for delicate shading which were accepted with becoming grace of treatment. In the allegro which followed, D'Albert warmed well to his work and was both spirited and brilliant.

The coda was short but emphatic, and when the artist arose to accept his well-earned applause he showed evidence of the earnestness he had put into his work.

He favored his audience with an encore, after having been called back repeatedly.

D'Albert is a hard worker and intensely earnest. He has the facility of Paderewski, but we would wish he possessed the sympathetic quality of Paderewski. D'Albert unquestionably has a very strong hold on his audiences, and is growing in popularity.

The third and last number was the No. 4 symphony in D minor (original version), by Schumann. This symphony was brought out by the New York Philharmonic Society some three weeks since for the first time in this country. It was delightfully rendered yesterday. It possesses in a high degree the soulful feelings of Schumann, and much of his romantic spirit. It is to be regretted that space does not admit of discussing merits at greater length.

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the nineteenth concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Beethoven: Overture to "Leonore," No. 2.
Beethoven: Pianoforte concerto No. 5, in E-flat, op. 73.
Schumann: Symphony No. 4, in D minor (first version).

the price, pray?"

ut! Know better than to ask the amount of a choir

See the signed check for three consecutive months;

now! Faith has been most cruelly abused on the of choir salaries, hence the demand for tri-visual e.

fortunate individual?"

Carl Alves, who, from being merely a first-class musicale, concert and oratoric work, has suddenly to the pinnacle of musical fame as the engaged in the church of the millionaires—namely Dr.

Presbyterian edifice on Forty-second street.

air change of the decade has been more startling in ance and unexpectedness than this, Mrs. Sara Baron having filled the position for fourteen years and considered a fixture in it, Mrs. Carl Alves, being the contralto of Dr. Terry's South Reformed Church, wer to will and to do according to her own sweet when Dr. Terry, who has sole control of things at South Church, said: "Mrs. Alves sign no con-without letting us know," he thought he was voicing tant danger. So did the little lady herself when ed in all sincerity: "Never fear, doctor!"

e contract binding her to the Forty-second street stands to-day written upon the back of one of the ards of Mr. E. Francis Hyde, musical spokesman house of worship, where it was hastily penned by leman at the very first symptom of hesitation

the sweet voiced singer, whose allegiance to Dr.

church was well known and well rewarded.

'musical ambition' ever since marriage has been raw from public musical work," says Mrs. Alves, lliant seductions like this keep ever coming up to my intentions."

laughter, daughter and wife of musicians, Mrs.

nce seven years of age has not been out of public re through the birth of her two children. Her t musical achievement in that time has been the of Rubinstein's "Hagar in the Wilderness," in where, all unheralded, she won unquestioned

ing at the inauguration of the Music Hall, also symphony concerts and "Passion" music, is remem-

Yorkers. In April she is to sing in "The given by the Handel and Haydn Society, of an engagement won by her recent singing of a

D'Albert's playing of the great Beethoven concerto was so absolutely magnificent, exhaustive and great that, having said this, one can find nothing more to say about it. It was a model at every point. He was four times recalled and played a rhapsody by Brahms wonderfully.

The next programme is: Brahms, Tragic Overture; Gluck, Aria from "Orpheus;" Gluck, Dance of blessed spirits and dance of furies, from "Orpheus;" songs with pianoforte; Beethoven, Symphony No. 8, in F. Mme. Amalie Joachim will be the singer.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Symphony Concert.

The performance of the "Leonora" overture, which opened the concert of Saturday, was an epitome of the merits and defects of the Nikisch system. It was emphatically dramatic, and this, in a school of free overture of which Beethoven was, next to Gluck, the most earnest advocate, was a decided merit. We obtain now in our orchestral performances the virility which we have desired in previous years, and although it would be unjust to two conductors to allude to the fable of King Log and King Stork, it may be stated that we are getting too much of it. There was an abandon and a power in the performance that was refreshing, but the extreme exaggeration of the pauses, the ferocity of the kettledrum and the obliteration of the interior figures, were blemishes that are not to be condoned. Probably the last-named fault is the one most dangerous to the orchestra. In following any recent performance with a score one will see many figures and phrases with the eye which he will listen in vain for with the ear. The first violins overbalance the string quartette, and the brasses dominate the rest. The violas and second violins have seldom any prominence, and are often lost in the violent ensemble passages. Spite of these faults the overture was brilliant and exciting, the attacks of the orchestra more united than usual and the pizzicato of the contra basses almost as effective as the celebrated one which follows the horn quartette in the "Freischuetz" overture.

Then came the hero of the concert. Which is the bolder, a lion or a tiger? Which has the more delicious flavor, Johannisberger or Lacryma Christi? Answer these questions authoritatively and I can tell whether D'Albert eclipsed Paderewski or no. I can only compare D'Albert with D'Albert. In doing this I found the tone less resonant than heretofore and perhaps a trifle less sympathetic; but the performance of the "Emperor" concerto was one beyond and above criticism. Never a trace of exaggeration, never a suspicion of individuality! It was Beethoven pure and undefiled, not Beethoven spiced for an extra round of applause. The final rondo was a triumph of virtuosity, but of virtuosity applied to its proper end. At its termination there was recall after recall. The orchestra and its leader had a right to share in this triumph, for seldom has a concerto received more faithful orchestral treatment. But to give an encore-piece after the great work was a mistake; encores should never be allowed in libraries of the day, and the differences in themes and the orchestration are all in favor of the more generally known form of the symphony.

244

A very enjoyable performance of the "Leonore" overture No. 2 began the concert, and the work of the orchestra during the evening was at all times up to its best standard.

The usual monthly tour will take place the coming week, and the 20th of the season's concerts, on Saturday, the 26th inst., will be with Mme. Amalia Joachim as soloist, the programme including "Tragic Overture," Aria from Gluck's "Reigen Seliger Geister Tanz," from "Orpheus," songs, and Beethoven's symphony No.

D'ALBERT THE SOLOIST

He Plays a Beethoven Concerto in the Boston Symphony Concert

The 19th rehearsal and concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra was anticipated by the regular public, there was scarcely an absentee, who take chances for a seat were the limit.

This season has been replete with recitals. The fact that Paderewski completely fill the Boston Music Hall of his concerts, and hold an undivided deep attention for two hours, is for the hold this form of musical entertainment has on the Boston public.

The announcement that D'Albert would take part in the Friday afternoon concert doubtless drew many who were to compare his style with that of others who have so recently appeared.

However that may be, when he took his baton in hand an unusually attentive audience were listening.

The concert began with one of the overtures to Fidelio, Leonore, No. 2, styled No. 2, is in reality No. 1, others were produced in 1805.

This overture opens adagio, and at once captivates the ear. The work is well distributed and the well-known air of Florestan sings in the dungeon scene in act of the opera.

Then came an allegro, which was associated with the parent theme of the original thought.

The pizzicato was a delightful stage-sustained by the bass accompaniment for the flutes and violins.

A pleasing feature was the part of two trumpet calls announcing the arrival of the governor.

The first violins at this point, faint introduction to the finale, succeeded by the other strings, entire orchestra is involved in a furious termination.

The concerto for pianoforte, No. 5, by Beethoven, was selected to introduce the soloist of the occasion. The movements were made up of adagio, un poco mosso, allegro.

This best of Beethoven's concertos has been called a "symphony," with obbligato.

The pianist begins with a brilliant scale passage and his forthright exhibits the great resourcefulness of this soloist.

He not only meets all the

the score, but sustains a volume of sound sufficient to dominate the whole work.

The adagio offered excellent opportunities for delicate shading which were accepted with becoming grace of treatment. In the allegro which followed, d'Albert warmed well to his work and was both spirited and brilliant.

The coda was short but emphatic, and when the artist arose to accept his well-earned applause he showed evidence of the earnestness he had put into his work.

He favored his audience with an encore.

BOSTON OFFICE OF THE MUSICAL COURIER.
157 Tremont Street, Saturday, March 12, 1892.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

THE program for the nineteenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall this evening was: Overture, "Leonore," No. 2, Beethoven; concerto for piano, No. 5, in E flat, Beethoven, and Symphony No. 4, in D minor, Schumann (according to the original version.) The soloist was Mr. Eugen d'Albert.

In the opening number the orchestra reached a state of perfection which should fill every individual member with merited pride, and did, as it was, fill every member of the audience with melodious delight. Nothing was wanting in the performance of this number. If ever a faultless rendering were given this earliest of the four great "Leonore" overtures it surely was by Mr. Nikisch and the Boston Symphony Orchestra this evening. The "original version" of the Schumann symphony played this evening is not so widely different from the edition heard last week. At least the difference is not so great as we have been led to expect from the many annotators who have felt called upon to make themselves shine with reflected glory.

The more modern color given the orchestration in the revised version seems to be its principal distinguishing mark and is possibly the favorite form at the present time. Scarcely less praiseworthy was the work of the orchestra in this than in the preceding number.

The most enjoyable feature of the program, quite needless to observe, was the great "Emperor" concerto, so called, and to write of Mr. d'Albert and his performance of it, as should be written, calls for greater descriptive powers than are at our command and a more profound appreciation of master workmanship than we possess. Such breadth of conception, such straightforward methods, such true piano playing have certainly not been equalled in Boston since Rubinstein's visit. As a Beethoven player, religiously faithful to the every intention of the composer, he surely has no rival.

Mr. d'Albert was recalled five times, at last responding with an impromptu by Schubert.

The program for the next concert is: "Tragic" Overture, Brahms; aria from "Orpheus," Gluck; ballad from "Orpheus," Gluck; songs by Schubert and Schumann, and Beethoven symphony No. 8. The soloist is to be Mrs. Amelie Joachim.

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the nineteenth concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Beethoven: Overture to "Leonore," No. 2.
Beethoven: Pianoforte concerto No. 5, in E-flat, op. 73.
Schumann: Symphony No. 4, in D minor (first version).

Mr. Eugen d'Albert was the pianist.

It was interesting to hear two "first versions" given at the same concert, and first versions, too, by men who were especially noted for subjecting their works to an elaborate process of retouching. Curiously enough, one finds that the changes made in both these works by their respective composers, in writing the second versions, are often of a very similar sort. It is reported that Schumann was prompted to make the second (generally accepted) version of his D minor symphony because of the poor quality of the wind in his orchestra at Düsseldorf, he having found that the wind players were not up to playing the frequent solo passages in the first version satisfactorily. Thus the second version was prepared mainly with an eye to giving prominence to no single wind instrument. But when Schumann once got to work on his second version he also made some changes of another sort, changes which may in general be described as of much the same nature as those made by Beethoven in writing the second version of his "Leonore" overture. (It should be remembered that the so-called overtures "No. 2" and "No. 3" are in reality the first and second versions. The so-called "No. 1" and "No. 4"—overture to "Fidelio"—have nothing to do with these; they were written later, on totally different thematic material.)

Now, the differences between the "Leonore" overtures Nos. 2 and 3, and between the first and second versions of Schumann's D minor symphony, consist largely in the suppression of a good deal of contrapuntal thematic work, and in filling out long silences between crashing staccato chords for the full orchestra with melodic matter.

As for the "Leonore" overture, one can hardly feel any hesitation about much preferring the No. 3, in spite of Moscheles's opinion that the No. 2 was the "more perfect" of the pair. The immense improvement in the second theme, and in the development of the coda, the introduction of the beautiful slow passage from the prison-scene between the trumpet calls, and the superior conciseness and dramatic simplicity of the Durchführung, all contribute to make the No. 3 the finer and more titanic work. On the other hand, it would be hard to give the preference to either version of the Schumann symphony. Some of the changes made in the second are evidently improvements; but others are not.

Both overture and symphony were superbly played. We see no reason to change anything in what we wrote last week about Mr. Nikisch's "treatment" of the latter work, except to add that this treatment has the full and enthusiastic endorsement of Mme. Clara Schumann. But even this fact cannot change our feeling in the matter.

245
D'Albert's playing of the great Beethoven concerto was so absolutely magnificent, exhaustive and great that, having said this, one can find nothing more to say about it. It was a model at every point. He was four times recalled and played a rhapsody by Brahms wonderfully.

The next programme is: Brahms, Tragic Overture; Gluck, Aria from "Orpheus," Gluck, Dance of blessed spirits and dance of furies, from "Orpheus," songs with pianoforte; Beethoven, Symphony No. 8, in F. Mme. Amalie Joachim will be the singer.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Symphony Concert.

The performance of the "Leonore" overture, which opened the concert of Saturday, was an epitome of the merits and defects of the Nikisch system. It was emphatically dramatic, and this, in a school of free overture of which Beethoven was, next to Gluck, the most earnest advocate, was a decided merit. We obtain now in our orchestral performances the virility which we have desired in previous years, and although it would be unjust to two conductors to allude to the fable of King Log and King Stork, it may be stated that we are getting too much of it. There was an abandon and a power in the performance that was refreshing, but the extreme exaggeration of the pauses, the ferocity of the kettledrum and the obliteration of the interior figures, were blemishes that are not to be condoned. Probably the last-named fault is the one most dangerous to the orchestra. In following any recent performance with a score one will see many figures and phrases with the eye which he will listen in vain for with the ear. The first violins overbalance the string quartette, and the brasses dominate the rest. The violas and second violins have seldom any prominence, and are often lost in the violent ensemble passages. Spite of these faults the overture was brilliant and exciting, the attacks of the orchestra more united than usual and the pizzicato of the contra basses almost as effective as the celebrated one which follows the horn quartette in the "Freischuetz" overture.

Then came the hero of the concert. Which is the bolder, a lion or a tiger? Which has the more delicious flavor, Johannesberger or Lacryma Christi? Answer these questions authoritatively and I can tell whether D'Albert eclipsed Paderewski or no. I can only compare D'Albert with D'Albert. In doing this I found the tone less resonant than heretofore and perhaps a trifle less sympathetic; but the performance of the "Emperor" concerto was one beyond and above criticism. Never a trace of exaggeration, never a suspicion of individuality! It was Beethoven pure and undefiled, not Beethoven spiced for an extra round of applause. The final rondo was a triumph of virtuosity, but of virtuosity applied to its proper end. At its termination there was recall after recall. The orchestra and its leader had a right to share in this triumph, for seldom has a concerto received more faithful orchestral treatment. But to give an encore-piece after the great work was a mistake; encores should never be allowed in libraries of the day, and the differences in themes and the orchestration are all in favor of the more generally known form of the symphony.

244

A very enjoyable performance of the "Leonore" overture No. 2 began the concert, and the work of the orchestra during the evening was at all times up to its best standard.

The usual monthly tour will take place the coming week, and the 20th of the season's concerts, on Saturday, the 26th inst., will be with Mme. Amalia Joachim as soloist, the programme including "Tragic Overture," Aria from Gluck's "Reigen Seliger Geister Tanz," from "Orpheus," songs, and Beethoven's symphony No.

D'ALBERT THE SOLO

He Plays a Beethoven Concerto

The 19th rehearsal and concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra was anticipated by the regular public, there was scarcely an absentee, who take chances for a seat well within the limit.

This season has been replete with recitals. The fact that Paderewski completely fills the Boston Music Hall of his concerts, and holds the deep attention for two hours, is a monument has on the Boston public.

The announcement that D'Albert will take part in the Friday afternoon concert doubtless drew many who were anxious to compare his style with that of others who have so recently appeared.

However that may be, when he took his baton in hand an untiring and attentive audience were listening.

The concert began with one of the overtures to Fidelio, Leonore, No. 2, which was composed in 1805, and is in reality No. 2, others were produced in 1805.

This overture opens adagio, and at once captivates the ear. The work is well distributed and the well-known air of Florestan sings in the dungeon scene in the act of the opera.

Then came an allegro, which was associated with the parent theme of the original thought.

The pizzicato was a delight to this stage—sustained by the bass accompaniment for the flutes.

A pleasing feature was the part of two trumpet calls announcing the rival of the governor.

The first violins at this point, with a faint introduction to the finale, succeeded by the other strings, the entire orchestra is involved in a furious termination.

The concerto for pianoforte, in E-flat, by Beethoven, was selected to introduce the soloist of the occasion. The movements were made in an adagio un poco mosso, allegro.

This best of Beethoven's concertos has been called a "symphony," with obligato.

The pianist begins with a brilliant scale passage and his forthright exhibits the great resourcefulness of this soloist.

He not only meets all the

the score, but contains a volume of sound sufficient to dominate the whole work.

The adagio offered excellent opportunities for delicate shading which were accepted with becoming grace of treatment. In the allegro which followed, d'Albert warmed well to his work and was both spirited and brilliant.

The coda was short but emphatic, and when the artist arose to accept his well-earned applause he showed evidence of the earnestness he had put into his work.

He favored his audience with an encore.

BOSTON OFFICE OF THE MUSICAL COURIER,
157 Tremont Street, Saturday, March 12, 1892.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

THE program for the nineteenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall this evening was: Overture, "Leonore," No. 2, Beethoven; concerto for piano, No. 5, in E-flat, Beethoven, and Symphony No. 4, in D minor, Schumann (according to the original version.) The soloist was Mr. Eugen d'Albert.

In the opening number the orchestra reached a state of perfection which should fill every individual member with merited pride, and did, as it was, fill every member of the audience with melodious delight. Nothing was wanting in the performance of this number. If ever a faultless reading were given this earliest of the four great "Leonore" overtures it surely was by Mr. Nikisch and the Boston Symphony Orchestra this evening. The "original version" of the Schumann symphony played this evening is not so widely different from the edition heard last week. At least the difference is not so great as we have been led to expect from the many annotators who have felt called upon to make themselves shine with reflected glory.

The more modern color given the orchestration in the revised version seems to be its principal distinguishing mark and is possibly the favorite form at the present time. Scarcely less praiseworthy was the work of the orchestra in this than in the preceding number.

The most enjoyable feature of the program, quite needless to observe, was the great "Emperor" concerto, so called, and to write of Mr. d'Albert and his performance of it, as should be written, calls for greater descriptive powers than are at our command and a more profound appreciation of master workmanship than we possess. Such breadth of conception, such straightforward methods, such true piano playing have certainly not been excelled in Boston since Rubinstein's visit. As a Beethoven player, religiously faithful to the every intention of the composer, he surely has no rival.

Mr. d'Albert was recalled five times, at last responding with an impromptu by Schubert.

The program for the next concert is: "Tragic" overture, Brahms; aria from "Orpheus," Gluck; ballad music from "Orpheus," Gluck; songs by Schubert and Schumann, and Beethoven symphony No. 8. The soloist is to be Mrs. Amelie Joachim.

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the nineteenth concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Beethoven: Overture to "Leonore," No. 2.
Beethoven: Pianoforte concerto No. 5, in E-flat, op. 73.
Schumann: Symphony No. 4, in D minor (first version).

Mr. Eugen d'Albert was the pianist.

It was interesting to hear two "first versions" given at the same concert, and first versions, too, by men who were especially noted for subjecting their works to an elaborate process of retouching. Curiously enough, one finds that the changes made in both these works by their respective composers, in writing the second versions, are often of a very similar sort. It is reported that Schumann was prompted to make the second (generally accepted) version of his D minor symphony because of the poor quality of the wind in his orchestra at Düsseldorf, he having found that the wind players were not up to playing the frequent solo passages in the first version satisfactorily. Thus the second version was prepared mainly with an eye to giving prominence to no single wind instrument. But when Schumann once got to work on his second version he also made some changes of another sort, changes which may in general be described as of much the same nature as those made by Beethoven in writing the second version of his "Leonore" overture. (It should be remembered that the so-called overtures "No. 2" and "No. 3" are in reality the first and second versions. The so-called "No. 1" and "No. 4"—overture to "Fidelio"—have nothing to do with these; they were written later, on totally different thematic material.)

Now, the differences between the "Leonore" overtures Nos. 2 and 3, and between the first and second versions of Schumann's D minor symphony, consist largely in the suppression of a good deal of contrapuntal thematic work, and in filling out long silences between crashing staccato chords for the full orchestra with melodic matter.

As for the "Leonore" overture, one can hardly feel any hesitation about much preferring the No. 3, in spite of Moscheles's opinion that the No. 2 was the "more perfect" of the pair. The immense improvement in the second theme, and in the development of the coda, the introduction of the beautiful slow passage from the prison-scene between the trumpet calls, and the superior conciseness and dramatic simplicity of the Durchführung, all contribute to make the No. 3 the finer and more titanic work. On the other hand, it would be hard to give the preference to either version of the Schumann symphony. Some of the changes made in the second are evidently improvements; but others are not.

Both overture and symphony were superbly played. We see no reason to change anything in what we wrote last week about Mr. Nikisch's "treatment" of the latter work, except to add that this treatment has the full and enthusiastic endorsement of Mme. Clara Schumann. But even this fact cannot change our feeling in the matter.

245
D'Albert's playing of the great Beethoven concerto was so absolutely magnificent, exhaustive and great that, having said this, one can find nothing more to say about it. It was a model at every point. He was four times recalled and played a rhapsody by Brahms wonderfully.

The next programme is: Brahms, Tragic Overture; Gluck, Aria from "Orpheus;" Gluck, Dance of blessed spirits and dance of furies, from "Orpheus;" songs with pianoforte; Beethoven, Symphony No. 8, in F. Mme. Amalia Joachim will be the singer.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Symphony Concert.

The performance of the "Leonore" overture, which opened the concert of Saturday, was an epitome of the merits and defects of the Nikisch system. It was emphatically dramatic, and this, in a school of free overture of which Beethoven was, next to Gluck, the most earnest advocate, was a decided merit. We obtain now in our orchestral performances the virility which we have desired in previous years, and although it would be unjust to two conductors to allude to the fable of King Log and King Stork, it may be stated that we are getting too much of it. There was an abandon and a power in the performance that was refreshing, but the extreme exaggeration of the pauses, the ferocity of the kettledrum and the obliteration of the interior figures, were blemishes that are not to be condoned. Probably the last-named fault is the one most dangerous to the orchestra. In following any recent performance with a score one will see many figures and phrases with the eye which he will listen in vain for with the ear. The first violins overbalance the string quartette, and the brasses dominate the rest. The violas and second violins have seldom any prominence, and are often lost in the violent ensemble passages. Spite of these faults the overture was brilliant and exciting, the attacks of the orchestra more united than usual and the pizzicato of the contra basses almost as effective as the celebrated one which follows the horn quartette in the "Freischuetz" overture.

Then came the hero of the concert. Which is the bolder, a lion or a tiger? Which has the more delicious flavor, Johannisberger or Lacryma Christi? Answer these questions authoritatively and I can tell whether D'Albert eclipsed Paderewski or no. I can only compare D'Albert with D'Albert. In doing this I found the tone less resonant than heretofore and perhaps a trifle less sympathetic; but the performance of the "Emperor" concerto was one beyond and above criticism. Never a trace of exaggeration, never a suspicion of individuality! It was Beethoven pure and undefiled, not Beethoven spiced for an extra round of applause. The final rondo was a triumph of virtuosity, but of virtuosity applied to its proper end. At its termination there was recall after recall. The orchestra and its leader had a right to share in this triumph, for seldom has a concerto received more faithful orchestral treatment. But to give an encore-piece after the great work was a mistake; encores should never be allowed in these programmes, that is, if the programmes are made with any artistic ideal. There should be a certain homogeneity in a concert of this class, and any interpolated number does away with this. When the encore fiend is aided and abetted by conductor and soloist, it proves that the art of programme-making is undervalued or not understood. Any thoughtful auditor would have preferred to have had the impression of the concerto left undisturbed.

There is not enough of difference between the original version of Schumann's D minor symphony and its later revision to make it worth while to resuscitate the former; a few slight variations of development, and especially a fuller scoring, seem to be the chief points of change. The advantage is certainly on the side of the later version, although it may be pleaded that the first is clearer because of its rarer doubling of the parts. This advantage, however, if any, was lost by the tremendously forcible manner in which it was played, and the work seemed but a recapitulation of the symphony of the previous week so far as its general effect went. Brahms has not added much to the repertoire by fostering the performances of the version which Schumann discarded. It is not the first time that the Viennese master has dug up Schumann relics, for the very last theme that Schumann wrote, when his brain had practically given way, was a subject that he maintained had been communicated to him by spirits, and this sad reminder of an unsettled mind was made into piano variations by the phlegmatic musical heir. LOUIS C. ELSON.

THE SYMPHONIES.

NINETEENTH CONCERT.

The programme for the nineteenth concert of the Symphony Orchestra in Music hall Saturday evening, March 12, was:

Beethoven. Overture. "Lenore, No. 2."
Beethoven. Concerto for Pianoforte, No. 5, in E flat.
Schumann. Allegro. — Adagio un poco mosso. — Rondo (Allegro).
Symphony No. 4, op. 120.
Andante con moto. — Allegro di molto. — Romanza. — Scherzo. — Largo. — Finale.
(Original version first time.)
Soloist:—Mr. Eugen D'Albert.

If our memory serves us rightly, we heard the Gewandhaus orchestra give this original version of Schumann's great D minor symphony twice. Whatever may be said concerning the two versions, there is no question about the second being far the best. This fact being conceded, we can only speak of the revised version as one of the great masterpieces of Schumann: in it he tries to picture to the world a life-like tone picture of his inmost soul. Whether he has succeeded in this or not, is an open question, one which each must answer for himself. There are beautiful passages in the work which appeal directly to the innermost soul, while there are others exactly the opposite, almost revolting. The treatment of the themes is ingenious, scholarly and vigorous, like most of this master's compositions. There are strong reminders of Wagner's music in the brass effects, but of course it was Wagner who copied, not Schumann. No fault can be found with Mr. Nikisch's reading of the score, the whole symphony being well and adequately played by his orchestra.

The E flat concerto of Beethoven, the ne plus ultra of pianoforte concertos, was the chief attraction of the evening, because that "little giant," as Liszt called him, was to be in command. It matters not what people may say, one thing is absolutely certain: Mr. D'Albert knows how, has the technique, the physique, and the true perception to play Beethoven's music in an honest, straightforward, vigorous manner, as tradition says it must be played. There are no moments of effeminacy or mawkish sentiment about D'Albert's Beethoven playing, not a bit. The moment the first chord was struck, there was a feeling that a master-hand was at the helm, and no fears were entertained that it would not remain so to the end. So far as we remember, the concerto has never received a more noteworthy or satisfactory presentation in Boston. It was quite evident that the soloist suffered somewhat from nervousness, owing in a measure, no doubt, to fears that the orchestra would not fully support him. While they were not entirely perfect in this respect, they did much better than at some other times during the season. The whole work of D'Albert was marked by a brilliant, clean-cut technique, an intense force and power in interpretive skill, not equalled, or at least not surpassed, by any pianist who has gone before. In response to a persistent encore, D'Albert played a rather sombre piece, we think by Liszt.

The second "Lenore" overture has quite a lengthy history, but it is not necessary to go into it here. Suffice it to say, the Third symphony, so often played here, is a much more elaborated form of almost the identical themes contained in the second, and certainly is the one best suited to our taste.

The orchestral work of the evening was more than usually satisfactory, and from our position down-stairs, instead of way up, the brasses did not produce the headache they often have in the past. After a tour of observation around the musical circle, the orchestra will return with new laurels and gay feathers, giving the next concert, Saturday evening, March 26. Madame Amalie Joachim will be the soloist. She is the wife of the greatest violinist (so thought) in the world. Thirty years ago the madame was the great singer of Berlin's Royal opera, but retired many years since from an overtaxed and worn voice.

JAMES M. TRACY.

MUSICAL.

The Symphony Concert.

The programme for the nineteenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall, last evening was:—Overture, "Lenore," No. 2, Beethoven; Concerto for pianoforte No. 5, in E flat, Beethoven; and Symphony No. 4, in D minor, Schumann, (according to the original version). The soloist was Mr. Eugen d'Albert. The overture was carefully read and admirably played. The differences between the original and the revised versions of the Schumann symphony are not easy to describe. They are chiefly in the instrumentation, the version to which we are accustomed being more fully scored than the other. There are changes in the thematic development, but only two or three are of any marked importance. It may be possibly lack of taste or of appreciation, but we really find it difficult to prefer the second version to the first or the first to the second. If there be a choice it is in favor of the greater clearness of the original scoring; though in the revised edition the finale is an improvement on its original form. Still, if Schumann had permitted the first version to go to the world without revising it in another version, the work would have passed current as a fine one and nobody would have thought of a revision. It was spiritedly performed, though at times with a noisy bluster that might have been modified with excellent result. Mr. d'Albert's performance of the concerto was noble and masterly in every way. It was glorious Beethoven playing from beginning to end; free from affectation, from all attempt to make the composer say what he never meant to say, and from any effort to paint an old masterpiece in new colors. It is too late in the day to pay tribute to the artist's technique. To his reading of the work it would be hard to pay too much tribute. It was keenly in sympathy with the composer, manly in style and musicianly and dignified in all things. The tempi were perfect. The adagio was exquisitely given, and rarely have we heard the finale played with more nobility of taste and beauty of expression. The artist was applauded with immense enthusiasm and recalled four times. On the last occasion he responded at the piano, playing, if we are not mistaken, a Brahms rhapsody. The programme for the next concert is: Tragic Overture, Brahms; aria from "Orpheus," Gluck; Ballet music from "Orpheus," Gluck; songs by Schubert and Schumann, and Beethoven Symphony No. 8. The soloist is to be Mme. Amalie Joachim.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

One of the most expert and experienced lapidaries was wont to say that it was practically impossible to compare one jewel with another unless the two were side by side—to inspect one and then to judge another by the memory of it, even if only a few minutes of time and a few rods of space separated his first examination from the second. And so if one in a hundred of the Symphony audience could carry over from the eighteenth concert—even with all the support of previous acquaintance with the work—a sufficiently exact memory of Schumann's fourth symphony, as heretofore played, to enable him to detect and pass judgment upon the original version of that symphony, first heard here at the nineteenth concert, it was as much as could be reasonably expected. The professional musician might do so, and the connoisseur experienced in score-reading, if he had before him a copy of the standard edition, might recognize the differences in themes and perceive an unfamiliar treatment or the modifications in the distribution of parts and tone-colors. To make successfully the experiment which Mr. Nikisch tried most laudably in giving the two versions, both ought to have been played, movement by movement, on the same evening, and a carefully made synopsis, explaining the differences in a way which even moderately good musical scholars could understand and follow, should have been in every hand. Mr. Nikisch showed his enterprise in bringing this hitherto unknown score before his audience so soon after Brahms, who owns the manuscript of it, had made it public, and of course hundreds were glad to get the gist of so beautiful and favorite a symphony twice over; but we cannot help thinking that most of the differential details were lost on the hearers. The playing was generally excellent, and in directing it Mr. Nikisch held rather more closely to the evident intentions of the composer than at the previous concert. Praise is also to be awarded for a good rendering of Beethoven's second "Lenore" overture.

The soloist of the evening was Mr. Eugen D'Albert, who then made his first appearance of the tour upon which he now enters under the management of Mr. C. A. Ellis. He chose Beethoven's fifth pianoforte concerto, that superb creation in E-flat, which ends the master's short series of compositions in this form. Of Mr. D'Albert's command of his instrument, it is needless now to speak, for all the musical world knows it. This mastery, once used quite as much for personal display as to give art its proper support and strength, has gradually been turned to its right use, and he read the concerto with respect, giving its form definiteness and its sentiment vitality. We should have liked to find the final rondo just a degree more cheerful in pace and temper; but even a considerable reserve would be better than any excess of levity or speed. The performance was received at its full value and Mr. D'Albert was applauded to his heart's content.

There is no concert tonight. Next week Mme. Joachim will sing, and the orchestra will play from Gluck, Beethoven and Brahms.

MUSIC.

THE SYMPHONY.

After an absence of two years Mr. Eugen D'Albert is once more in Boston. During his last visit here this distinguished pianist gave on more than one occasion convincing proof of his greatness as a pianist, and especially as an interpreter of Beethoven. His performance of the "Emperor" concerto, at the nineteenth Symphony rehearsal Friday afternoon was further proof that he is still one of the first pianists of the day.

In every respect it was masterly; noble in conception; broad, expressive and fiery in execution. His tempi were just and sufficiently elastic to avoid any suggestion of rigidity, and his phrasing was thoroughly in harmony with the spirit of the music. Of his technical work too these programmes. That is, if the programmes are made with any artistic ideal. There should be a certain homogeneity in a concert of this class, and any interpolated number does away with this. When the encore fiend is aided and abetted by conductor and soloist, it proves that the art of programme-making is undervalued or not understood. Any thoughtful auditor would have preferred to have had the impression of the concerto left undisturbed.

There is not enough of difference between the original version of Schumann's D minor symphony and its later revision to make it worth while to resuscitate the former; a few slight variations of development, and especially a fuller scoring, seem to be the chief points of change. The advantage is certainly on the side of the later version, although it may be pleaded that the first is clearer because of its rarer doubling of the parts. This advantage, however, if any, was lost by the tremendously forcible manner in which it was played, and the work seemed but a recapitulation of the symphony of the previous week so far as its general effect went. Brahms has not added much to the repertoire by fostering the performances of the version which Schumann discarded. It is not the first time that the Viennese master has dug up Schumann relics, for the very last theme that Schumann wrote, when his brain had practically given way, was a subject that he maintained had been communicated to him by spirits, and this sad reminder of an unsettled mind was made into piano variations by the phlegmatic musical heir.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

THE SYMPHONIES.

NINETEENTH CONCERT.

The programme for the nineteenth concert of the Symphony orchestra in Music hall Saturday evening, March 12, was:

Beethoven.	Overture, "Lenore, No. 2."
Beethoven.	Concerto for Pianoforte, No. 5, in E flat.
	Allegro. — Adagio un poco mosso. — Rondo (Allegro).
Schumann.	Symphony No. 4, op. 120.
	Andante con moto. — Allegro di molto. — Romanza. — Scherzo. — Largo. — Finale.
	(Original version first time.)
Soloist:—Mr. Eugen D'Albert.

If our memory serves us rightly, we heard the Gewandhaus orchestra give this original version of Schumann's great D minor symphony twice. Whatever may be said concerning the two versions, there is no question about the second being far the best. This fact being conceded, we can only speak of the revised version as one of the great masterpieces of Schumann: in it he tries to picture to the world a life-like tone picture of his inmost soul. Whether he has succeeded in this or not, is an open question, one which each must answer for himself. There are beautiful passages in the work which appeal directly to the innermost soul, while there are others exactly the opposite, almost revolting. The treatment of the themes is ingenious, scholarly and vigorous, like most of this master's compositions. There are strong reminders of Wagner's music in the brass effects, but of course it was Wagner who copied, not Schumann. No fault can be found with Mr. Nikisch's reading of the score, the whole symphony being well and adequately played by his orchestra.

The E flat concerto of Beethoven, the ne plus ultra of pianoforte concertos, was the chief attraction of the evening, because that "little giant," as Liszt called him, was to be in command. It matters not what people may say, one thing is absolutely certain: Mr. D'Albert knows how, has the technique, the physique, and the true perception to play Beethoven's music in an honest, straightforward, vigorous manner, as tradition says it must be played. There are no moments of effeminacy or mawkish sentiment about D'Albert's Beethoven playing, not a bit. The moment the first chord was struck, there was a feeling that a master-hand was at the helm, and no fears were entertained that it would not remain so to the end. So far as we remember, the concerto has never received a more noteworthy or satisfactory presentation in Boston. It was quite evident that the soloist suffered somewhat from nervousness, owing in a measure, no doubt, to fears that the orchestra would not fully support him. While they were not entirely perfect in this respect, they did much better than at some other times during the season. The whole work of D'Albert was marked by a brilliant, clean-cut technique, an intense force and power in interpretive skill, not equalled, or at least not surpassed, by any pianist who has gone before. In response to a persistent encore, D'Albert played a rather sombre piece, we think by Liszt.

The second "Lenore" overture has quite a lengthy history, but it is not necessary to go into it here. Suffice it to say, the Third symphony, so often played here, is a much more elaborated form of almost the identical themes contained in the second, and certainly is the one best suited to our taste.

The orchestral work of the evening was more than usually satisfactory, and from our position down-stairs, instead of way up, the brasses did not produce the headache they often have in the past. After a tour of observation around the musical circle, the orchestra will return with new laurels and gay feathers, giving the next concert, Saturday evening, March 26. Madame Amalie Joachim will be the soloist. She is the wife of the greatest violinist (so thought) in the world. Thirty years ago the madame was the great singer of Berlin's Royal opera, but retired many years since from an overtaxed and worn voice.

JAMES M. TRACY.

MUSICAL.

The Symphony Concert.

The programme for the nineteenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall, last evening was:—Overture, "Lenore," No. 2, Beethoven; Concerto for pianoforte No. 5, in E flat, Beethoven; and Symphony No. 4, in D minor, Schumann, (according to the original version). The soloist was Mr. Eugen D'Albert. The overture was carefully read and admirably played. The differences between the original and the revised versions of the Schumann symphony are not easy to describe. They are chiefly in the instrumentation, the version to which we are accustomed being more fully scored than the other. There are changes in the thematic development, but only two or three are of any marked importance. It may be possibly lack of taste or of appreciation, but we really find it difficult to prefer the second version to the first or the first to the second. If there be a choice it is in favor of the greater clearness of the original scoring; though in the revised edition the finale is an improvement on its original form. Still, if Schumann had permitted the first version to go to the world without revising it in another version, the work would have passed current as a fine one and nobody would have thought of a revision. It was spiritedly performed, though at times with a noisy bluster that might have been modified with excellent result. Mr. D'Albert's performance of the concerto was noble and masterly in every way. It was glorious Beethoven playing from beginning to end; free from affectation, from all attempt to make the composer say what he never meant to say, and from any effort to paint an old masterpiece in new colors. It is too late in the day to pay tribute to the artist's technique. To his reading of the work it would be hard to pay too much tribute. It was keenly in sympathy with the composer, manly in style and musicianly and dignified in all things. The tempi were perfect. The adagio was exquisitely given, and rarely have we heard the finale played with more nobility of taste and beauty of expression. The artist was applauded with immense enthusiasm and recalled four times. On the last occasion he responded at the piano, playing, if we are not mistaken, a Brahms rhapsody. The programme for the next concert is: Tragic Overture, Brahms; aria from "Orpheus," Gluck; Ballet music from "Orpheus," Gluck; songs by Schubert and Schumann, and Beethoven Symphony No. 8. The soloist is to be Mme. Amalie Joachim.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

One of the most expert and experienced lapidaries was wont to say that it was practically impossible to compare one jewel with another unless the two were side by side—to inspect one and then to judge another by the memory of it, even if only a few minutes of time and a few rods of space separated his first examination from the second. And so if one in a hundred of the Symphony audience could carry over from the eighteenth concert—even with all the support of previous acquaintance with the work—a sufficiently exact memory of Schumann's fourth symphony, as heretofore played, to enable him to detect and pass judgment upon the original version of that symphony, first heard here at the nineteenth concert, it was as much as could be reasonably expected. The professional musician might do so, and the connoisseur experienced in score-reading, if he had before him a copy of the standard edition, might recognize the differences in themes and perceive an unfamiliar treatment or the modifications in the distribution of parts and tone-

colors. To make successfully the experiment which Mr. Nikisch tried most laudably in giving the two versions, both ought to have been played, movement by movement, on the same evening, and a carefully made synopsis, explaining the differences in a way which even moderately good musical scholars could understand and follow, should have been in every hand. Mr. Nikisch showed his enterprise in bringing this hitherto unknown score before his audience so soon after Brahms, who owns the manuscript of it, had made it public, and of course hundreds were glad to get the gist of so beautiful and favorite a symphony twice over; but we cannot help thinking that most of the differential details were lost on the hearers. The playing was generally excellent, and in directing it Mr. Nikisch held rather more closely to the evident intentions of the composer than at the previous concert. Praise is also to be awarded for a good rendering of Beethoven's second "Lenore" overture.

The soloist of the evening was Mr. Eugen D'Albert, who then made his first appearance of the tour upon which he now enters under the management of Mr. C. A. Ellis. He chose Beethoven's fifth pianoforte concerto, that superb creation in E-flat, which ends the master's short series of compositions in this form. Of Mr. D'Albert's command of his instrument, it is needless now to speak, for all the musical world knows it. This mastery, once used quite as much for personal display as to give art its proper support and strength, has gradually been turned to its right use, and he read the concerto with respect, giving its form definiteness and its sentiment vitality. We should have liked to find the final rondo just a degree more cheerful in pace and temper; but even a considerable reserve would be better than any excess of levity or speed. The performance was received at its full value and Mr. D'Albert was applauded to his heart's content.

There is no concert tonight. Next week Mme. Joachim will sing, and the orchestra will play from Gluck, Beethoven and Brahms.

MUSIC.

THE SYMPHONY.

After an absence of two years Mr. Eugen D'Albert is once more in Boston. During his last visit here this distinguished pianist gave on more than one occasion convincing proof of his greatness as a pianist, and especially as an interpreter of Beethoven. His performance of the "Emperor" concerto, at the nineteenth Symphony rehearsal Friday afternoon was further proof that he is still one of the first pianists of the day.

In every respect it was masterly; noble in conception; broad, expressive and fiery in execution. His tempi were just and sufficiently elastic to avoid any suggestion of rigidity, and his phrasing was thoroughly in harmony with the spirit of the music. Of his technical work too much cannot be said in praise. The difficulties of the concerto were simply child's play for him. His passage playing throughout was wonderfully clear, fluent and musical in quality; the chain trill in the adagio being especially noteworthy for its firmness, evenness and rapidity, and the closing scale runs for their extraordinary strength and brilliancy. At the conclusion of the work Mr. D'Albert was recalled five times, and finally returned to the piano and played the Schubert Impromptu, opus 90, in G. The accompaniment to the concerto was played with unusual finish and was in every way an enjoyable part of the performance. The symphony was the original version of Schumann's in D minor, No. 4. It certainly was interesting to hear this work as it was first performed (excepting the few changes made by Messrs. Brahms and Wullner). The principal points wherein the original version differs from the one which has been given for over forty years are plainly noticeable; the weaker scoring of the opening measures of the introduction, the tameness of the passage leading to the first allegro, and the slower tempo of the allegro itself; the run leading to the finale; the absence of the whirling figure (taken from the first allegro) from the opening measures of the finale; and several others of minor importance. It is evident that Schumann well knew what he was about when he rewrote this symphony. There is little probability that its original version will find a place in concert repertories of today, although it may be produced occasionally for educational purposes. The performance as a whole was rather unfinished and ineffective, which was without doubt owing to insufficient rehearsals, and to the comparative ineffectiveness of the score.

A dramatic performance of the second "Leonore" overture preceeded the concerto.

MUSICAL MATTERS. Post

Saturday night's symphony concert was one of the most brilliant of the course, introducing Eugen D'Albert, the pianist, in Beethoven's concerto in E flat, No. 5, and giving a first rendition of Schumann's symphony, No. 4, Op. 120, as it was originally written.

Every seat in the hall was occupied, and all the available space in the outside aisles was taken up by the many who were not regular attendants, but had been attracted by the prospect of an unusually fine performance by the pianist whom all Europe unites in calling the greatest living exponent of piano music. As an interpreter of Beethoven he probably has no equal, and Saturday night's concert fully sustained the judgment passed upon him by foreign critics and those of our own country, during his visit two years ago.

D'Albert's treatment of the opening allegro was broad and masterly, and characterized by remarkable clearness and purity of tone. His easy mastery of the prodigious technical difficulties commanded the instant admiration of the audience.

The second movement, adagio, was beautifully rendered, the theme distinctly traceable and admirably disclosing his delicacy of touch, his taste and conception of technical finish, while the final movement brought forth the heartiest applause from the audience and the members of the orchestra as well.

It is something to have heard the original version of the Schumann symphony, but opinions concerning its merits are diversified, a few claiming its superiority to the one with which the public is familiar. In both arrangements it is soulful and beautiful and has been intelligently and well rendered by Mr. Nikisch and his orchestra.

The opening number on the programme was one of the three overtures to Fideho, Leonora, No. 2, containing a lovely adagio in C, an original allegro and an exquisite pizzicato, in which the orchestra excelled. In no other composition has been exhibited such precision and purity of tone, such delicacy and beautiful manner of phrasing.

The organization will make its usual monthly tour this week, but the twentieth concert will take place March 26, with Mme. Amalie Joachim as soloist and a programme consisting of Brahms's "Tragic Overture," aria from "Orpheus," Gluck's "Reigen Seliger Geister und Furien Tanz," from Orpheus, Schubert's "Liebesbotschaft," Schumann's "Schoene Wiegemeiner Leiden," Schubert's "Elkoenig," and Beethoven's Symphony No. 8.

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1891-92.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

XX. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, MARCH 26, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

BRAHMS.

TRAGIC OVERTURE.

GLUCK.

ARIA from "Orpheus."

GLUCK.

REIGEN SELIGER GEISTER UND FURIEN TANZ, from "Orpheus."

SONGS with PIANO.

a) SCHUBERT.

"LIEBESBOTSCHAFT."

b) SCHUMANN.

"SCHOENE WIEGE MEINER LEIDEN."

c) SCHUBERT.

"ERLKOENIG."

BEETHOVEN.

SYMPHONY No. 8, in F major.
Allegro vivace e con brio.—Allegretto scherzando.—
Tempo di minuetto—Allegro vivace.

SOLOIST:

MME. AMALIE JOACHIM.

The Piano used is a Steinway.

much cannot be said in praise. The difficulties of the concerto were simply child's play for him. His passage playing throughout was wonderfully clear, fluent and musical in quality; the chain trill in the adagio being especially noteworthy for its firmness, evenness and rapidity, and the closing scale runs for their extraordinary strength and brilliancy. At the conclusion of the work Mr. D'Albert was recalled five times, and finally returned to the piano and played the Schubert Impromptu, opus 90, in G. The accompaniment to the concerto was played with unusual finish and was in every way an enjoyable part of the performance. The symphony was the original version of Schumann's in D minor, No. 4. It certainly was interesting to hear this work as it was first performed (excepting the few changes made by Messrs. Brahms and Wullner). The principal points wherein the original version differs from the one which has been given for over forty years are plainly noticeable; the weaker scoring of the opening measures of the introduction, the tameness of the passage leading to the first allegro, and the slower tempo of the allegro itself; the run leading to the finale; the absence of the whirling figure (taken from the first allegro) from the opening measures of the finale; and several others of minor importance. It is evident that Schumann well knew what he was about when he rewrote this symphony. There is little probability that its original version will find a place in concert repertories of today, although it may be produced occasionally for educational purposes. The performance as a whole was rather unfinished and ineffective, which was without doubt owing to insufficient rehearsals, and to the comparative ineffectiveness of the score.

A dramatic performance of the second "Leonore" overture preceeded the concerto.

MUSICAL MATTERS. Post

Saturday night's symphony concert was one of the most brilliant of the course, introducing Eugen D'Albert, the pianist, in Beethoven's concerto in E flat, No. 5, and giving a first rendition of Schumann's symphony, No. 4, Op. 120, as it was originally written,

Every seat in the hall was occupied, and all the available space in the outside aisles was taken up by the many who were not regular attendants, but had been attracted by the prospect of an unusually fine performance by the pianist whom all Europe unites in calling the greatest living exponent of piano music. As an interpreter of Beethoven he probably has no equal, and Saturday night's concert fully sustained the judgment passed upon him by foreign critics and those of our own country, during his visit two years ago.

D'Albert's treatment of the opening allegro was broad and masterly, and characterized by remarkable clearness and purity of tone. His easy mastery of the prodigious technical difficulties commanded the instant admiration of the audience.

The second movement, adagio, was beautifully rendered, the theme distinctly traceable and admirably disclosing his delicacy of touch, his taste and conception of technical finish, while the final movement brought forth the heartiest applause from the audience and the members of the orchestra as well.

It is something to have heard the original version of the Schumann symphony, but opinions concerning its merits are diversified, a few claiming its superiority to the one with which the public is familiar. In both arrangements it is soulful and beautiful and has been intelligently and well rendered by Mr. Nikisch and his orchestra.

The opening number on the programme was one of the three overtures to Fidelio, Leonora, No. 2, containing a lovely adagio in C, an original allegro and an exquisite pizzicato, in which the orchestra excelled. In no other composition has been exhibited such precision and purity of tone, such delicacy and beautiful manner of phrasing.

The organization will make its usual monthly tour this week, but the twentieth concert will take place March 26, with Mme. Amalie Joachim as soloist and a programme consisting of Brahms' "Tragic Overture," aria from "Orpheus," Gluck's "Reigen Seliger Geister und Furien Tanz," from Orpheus, Schubert's "Liebesbotschaft," Schumann's "Schoene Wiegemeiner Leiden," Schubert's "Elkoenig," and Beethoven's Symphony No. 8.

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1891-92.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

XX. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, MARCH 26, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

BRAHMS.	TRAGIC OVERTURE.
GLUCK.	ARIA from "Orpheus."
GLUCK.	REIGEN SELIGER GEISTER UND FURIEN TANZ, from "Orpheus."
	SONGS with PIANO.
a) SCHUBERT.	"LIEBESBOTSCHAFT."
b) SCHUMANN.	"SCHOENE WIEGE MEINER LEIDEN."
c) SCHUBERT.	"ERLKOENIG."
BEETHOVEN.	SYMPHONY No. 8, in F major. Allegro vivace e con brio.—Allegretto scherzando.— Tempo di minuetto.—Allegro vivace.

SOLOIST:

MME. AMALIE JOACHIM.

The Piano used is a Steinway.

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

Symphony Orchestra.

The twentieth concert of the season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Music Hall was given on Saturday night in accordance with this programme—

Brahms: Tragic Overture.
Gluck: Selections from "Orpheus"—Air "Che faro senza Eurydice;" Dance of Spirits; Dance of Furies.
Songs with pianoforte—
Schubert: Liebesbotschaft.
Schumann: Schöne Wiege meiner Leiden.
Schubert: Die Erbkönig.
Beethoven: Symphony, No. 8, in F major.
Mme. Amalie Joachim was the singer.

This was a noble programme, well balanced between old and new schools, but fresh throughout; short, but satisfactory; familiar, but not commonplace. The overture quickly commands attention by the virility that is early manifested, and holds it by the clearness that is an all-pervading quality. Mr. Nikisch treated it with sympathetic earnestness, making its more forceful moments tell with convincing power, and producing all the effect of contrast possible in the less gloomy passages. The ballet movements from "Orpheus," simple in form and modest in treatment, compared with modern manners in music, were played in a style that testified strongly to the conductor's purpose to give the composer as he is, and not as the conductor will have him. It was a satisfaction to see that the audience recognized and admired this purpose, though, possibly, a good part of the applause that followed the performance was an expression of admiration for the very simplicity and comparative modesty of the compositions. Mr. Molé's flute solo in the first of these movements was deliciously played. The symphony went off with the heartiness and breezy out-door feeling that characterizes the work, for even the minuet sounds as though danced on the sward in the sunlight by gentle countryfolk, and not on a polished floor, beneath myriads of candles, by wigged and painted lords and ladies. There are many touches of humor in this symphony—the frequent assignment of figures to the bassoon, the unexpected changes of key, the sudden forte bursts after a piano passage, or actual silence.

Mme. Joachim's singing had much that was of distinct and peculiar interest. Her superb physical strength enabled her to sing the song of lament for Eurydice as if it were really a man that was mourning a lost wife, though without coarseness of effect, be it understood. The interpolation of a tone to give the feeling of a return to the original key after the modulation to the dominant was not pleasing, however. Let this sort of thing remain with our friends the minstrels. Her variations in time also were distracting and apparently unjustified. Mme. Joachim's singing of the first Schubert song was an apt illustration that the strongest lungs can best sing pianissimo, provided, of course, the apparatus has been properly trained, and is directed by intelligence; as the biggest trip-hammer can be made to strike the gentlest blow; or as the most powerful locomotive will draw a train at a slow pace with the greatest steadiness, and least exhaustion of material. Schumann's song was aptly sung, and the audience was well satisfied with "The Erl-King," though here and there the singer again disturbed some ears by her changes in time. Still, her strong dramatic style was exhibited in lights that fully warranted the demonstration of favor on the part of the hearers.

The programme for this week's public rehearsal and concert, includes Mendelssohn's "Scotch Symphony." Mozart's concerto for flute and harp, Volkmann's serenade in F major for string orchestra, and Wotan's farewell and the fire charm from "Die Walküre."

Mrs. Joachim Sings at the Symphony Concert.

A Digression Concerning "Intellectuality" in Song.

A Few Words About the Late Operatic Season.

The twentieth Symphony concert was given Saturday evening in Music Hall. The programme was as follows:

Tragic Overture.....Brahms
Aria from "Orpheus".....Gluck
Reigen Seliger Geister und Furien Tanz, from "Orpheus".....Gluck

Songs with Piano.
"Liebesbotschaft".....Schubert
"Schöne Wiege meiner Leiden".....Schumann
"Erlkönig".....Schubert
Symphony No. 8, in F Major.....Beethoven

Mrs. Amalie Joachim was the singer.

The orchestral numbers are familiar, and they require no words of explanation or criticism. The work of the orchestra was excellent. Mr. Nikisch gave a sane and manly reading of the Beethoven symphony. It was free from the caprices, the mannerisms and the theatrical spirit that on former occasions have often disfigured the performance of the compositions of Beethoven as conducted by him. The ballet music from "Orpheus" was effective, and the effects were due to the fact that Mr. Nikisch was in sympathy with the old writer of operas. There was no attempt at modernization. The pure, almost severe, simplicity of Gluck was reverently preserved. The flute solo in the ballet music was played in a delightful manner. All in all, the concert was worthy of the high reputation of the orchestra.

Mrs. Joachim appears in certain respects to better advantage, as a singer, in Music Hall than in a room of small dimensions. For the full exhibition of the breadth of her style she needs space and freedom. Saturday evening she displayed passionate power and dramatic intelligence. But the same faults were seen in this concert and in her three recitals. There is no need, perhaps, of dwelling on them, but two are grievous and not to be excused. Her intonation is often false, and in her attack she frequently strikes under and slides up to the desired tone. Now, the Symphony concerts are supposed to serve an educational purpose. When a singer comes before a Symphony audience, the student should be able to profit by the

When the student finds that vocal art is quickly forgiven, she may well be the wisdom of her teacher, who finds her for similar omissions and com-

It is true that the curiosity to hear famous singers of other lands is legitimate, even when they have passed the zenith of their glory. Applause is often justly given as a tribute paid to the glorious past. The intelligence displayed by Mrs. Joachim is admirable, worthy of all praise. Even now there are excellent points in the mechanical means employed to convey this mental intelligence. There is a danger, however, in the unqualified acceptance of her art, and the danger is this: That students hearing her and knowing her reputation may be induced to regard the rudiments of the science of song as things of little moment, and to seek only the expression of emotions without providing themselves with the means of full expression. And there are many in these days who claim that the first thing required of a singer is intelligence. This intelligence is not vocal; it is vaguely described as "intellectuality." That is to say, a singer may have an unpleasant voice, he may sing habitually below or above the true pitch, he may show ignorance of important rudiments of the art of song; and he is promptly pardoned for his vocal ignorance or vocal inability, provided there is a rumor that he in some mysterious manner has caught the true spirit of the composer and will consent to serve as a medium between the composer and the hearer. When it is once announced that Mr. X or Mrs. Z sings with uncommon "intellectuality," the fortune of the singer is made for a season, and possibly for two seasons. There is a cult. Unfortunately for Mr. X or Mrs. Z, some one, whose "intellectuality" is said to be even more pronounced, raps at the stage door. The old shrine is hastily abandoned. For music is too often the sport of the constantly changing fashion.

THE SYMPHONIES. Times

TWENTIETH CONCERT.

The programme of the twentieth Symphony concert in Music hall, Saturday evening, March 26, was:

- | | |
|--------------|--|
| Brahms. | Tragic Overture. |
| Gluck. | Aria from "Orpheus." |
| Gluck. | Reigen Seliger Geister und Furien Tanz, from "Orpheus." |
| a) Schubert. | Songs with Piano. |
| b) Schumann. | "Liebesbotschaft." |
| | "Schoene Wiege meiner Leiden." |
| c) Schubert. | "Erlkoenig." |
| Beethoven. | Symphony No. 8, in F major. |
| | Allegro vivace e con brio.—Allegretto scherzando.—Tempo di minuetto.—Allegro vivace. |
- Soloist: Mme. Amalie Joachim.

The overture is one of Brahms's long-winded compositions, solidly but not over-richly orchestrated. It is elaborated on a dry theme, though not entirely uninteresting to the student of music. That it is interesting as music to a promiscuous audience, is somewhat doubtful. The orchestra did not at all times seem at its best, which caused the nervous movements of the conductor to multiply.

Apropos of the movements of a conductor's baton, the advice one of the best conductors of Germany, Dr. Julius Rietz, once gave to his class at the Leipsic Conservatory of Music is recalled: "Young men, this baton (holding it up) is useful only when properly used. In the hands of some, it is an intelligent object, conveying time, expression, and phrasing of the music to all the members of the orchestra; but in the hands of others, it becomes confusing and embarrassing in the extreme. It should be used sparingly, without ostentatious display, and only to mark the time, expression and phrasing of the music, which can be done with very slight motions. Remember, you are not handling a gun, drum-sticks, or an Indian club, and the less display the better."

The extra motions Conductor Nikisch imparted to his body and baton in commencing the overture were, to us, perfectly sensational and useless. One stroke, in a direct line down, would have answered the purpose just as well, expressed more decision, and attracted more attention to the music from both orchestra and audience. After the tragic event in the overture of brass, wood-wind and drums, conveying the death of somebody or something by their intense noise, a very pleasant little funeral chant is introduced, the music of which was truly delightful, because it furnished such a relief from former excitement of the tragic events. However, through all the din and struggles of the various instruments, nobody was apparently hurt, and the overture closed calmly.

Thirty years ago, Madame Joachim was a famous singer at Berlin; indeed, was considered the finest in Germany. She is yet a great artiste, but her voice is not what it once was. There are some reminders of the past worth preserving, worth looking at, and worth hearing, if they happen to be animate ones. Madame Joachim, notwithstanding her long service, is yet good for another decade. We will not enter into a close criticism of her vocal efforts, but simply say that she seemingly carried away all the honors of the evening. If hearty, spontaneous applause gives pleasure to artists, she ought to be more than satisfied, for she was many times called back to acknowledge marks of appreciation. Mme. Joachim is a fine, noble, queenly appearing woman, and was elegantly attired in a white gown. The Schubert songs were most artistically rendered, showing her art to perfection, while the accompaniments by Mr. Nikisch on the piano were admirable.

The symphony, one of the pleasantest of Beethoven's, was, for the most part, well read and played, affording great satisfaction to all those who remained to hear it to the end.

We have been looking for great improvement in the orchestra, on account of the increased rehearsals said to have taken place recently, but so far, there are no signs of any having taken place.

JAMES M. TRACY.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Twentieth Symphony Concert.

The programme of the 20th Symphony Concert at the Music Hall Saturday evening embraced Brahms's "Tragic Overture," two movements from the ballet music in "Orpheus," by Gluck; Beethoven's 8th Symphony; an aria from "Orpheus," "Che faro," Gluck; two songs by Schubert and one by Schumann. The vocalist was Mme. Amalia Joachim, who appeared to much better advantage in the large area of the Music Hall than in the more confined space of Steinert's concert room. Her false intonation was just as pronounced, however, and her method of voice production just as reprehensible for the observance of the student in vocal culture.

Mr. Nikisch accompanied her songs upon the piano in a most artistic and charming manner. In fact, the accompaniment of the "Erl King" of Schubert attracted more attention, and rightly so, than did the singing of the piece. It is a rare gift of Mr. Nikisch, this ability to so superbly accompany a singer. The "Tragic Overture" of Brahms is a noble work, bold and original in many respects, but wanting in something to brighten it up and relieve the dramatic or heroic intensity of much of the music. Mr. Henschel first brought it out in these concerts in 1881.

Mr. Gericke also played it, and to him we are indebted for the favorable impression it has created, for under his masterly direction all that there is of repose in it was revealed in relief to the tragic energy that prevails so generously. It was played Saturday evening by Mr. Nikisch with fierceness and harshness and almost devoid of any contrast, so slight was the variation between the more or less loudness of the rendering. Such indications as P sotto voce, PP sempre, Sempre P e dolce, PP tranquillo were never for one moment experienced in the playing. But, then, one has little reason for expecting any refinement from Mr. Nikisch's orchestral efforts. For three years he has revelled among the delicate nuances of compositions of every class as a bull would in a china shop.

I cannot understand how a man can sit at a piano and play with such wonderful delicacy and artistic judgment as he did in accompanying Mme. Joachim at this concert, and then climb up on his two boxes and go at the playful, humorous eighth symphony with his whole band rasping and blowing ffff's, as on Saturday night. The delightful strains of this symphony have been given us so beautifully and effectively by the refined Gericke that it will take several seasons more of this violent discipline under Nikisch before the intelligent and musical listener at the symphony concerts can become accustomed to having it fired at them out of a 20-inch gun, so to speak, and not rebel. The Allegretto Scherzando was taken too slowly, having neither the sense of Allegretto or Scherzando about it.

It has been a most unfortunate thing for Mr. Nikisch's reputation as a classic interpreter that Theodore Thomas and Wilhelm Gericke have set a standard in the rendering of Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven years ago in Boston—a standard so far above anything that Nikisch has shown that the critical or even the refined musical listener cannot accept what Nikisch has given us as other than an example of coarseness, if not to say vulgarity of interpretation.

The Gluck numbers went fairly well, the first one particularly so. The flute solo by Mr. Mole was played in a masterly manner. The "Furientanz," however, got a good rasping from the strings; the dim poco a poco smorzando PP could hardly have been discovered with a telescope of high power.

The two weeks' season of Italian and French opera at the Mechanics' Hall ended on Saturday with a performance of "Faust" in the afternoon and with Patti in "La Traviata" in the evening. The house was crowded to overflowing on each occasion. The greatest enthusiasm prevailed at "Faust." Patti has probably made her last appearance in Boston. WARREN DAVENPORT.

Symphony Concert.

The twentieth concert of the course presented Mme. Amalie Joachim, the famous German lieder songstress, and a programme consisting of Brahms's "Tragic Overture"; aria from Gluck's "Orpheus," and "Reigen Seliger Geister und Furien Tanz," from the same work; three songs for piano—Schubert's "Liebesbotschaft," "Schoene Wiege Meiner Leiden," by Schumann, and Schubert's "Erlkoenig"; Beethoven's eighth symphony in F major.

As an interpreter of German songs, Mme. Joachim has few equals. She possesses a voice of unusual power with which she can secure wonderfully softened tones that are infinitely more pleasing than those of greater power. Her high tones were always admirable, but the quality of the lower register is not as good. This was the first opportunity she has had to sing in a hall which did not restrain her power. Her rendering added new beauty to the familiar "Orpheus" aria, and her delicate shading was shown to decided advantage in the charming group of songs with Mr. Nikisch for accompanist.

The orchestral numbers were well chosen, clearly showing Mr. Nikisch's keen perception of the value of contrast. The overture was splendidly treated by the orchestra, but the charming first movement of the Orpheus number called forth great enthusiasm, the lion's share of which was due to M. Mole's beautiful flute solo.

Beethoven's brightly colored eighth symphony was a fitting close to a carefully chosen programme. As the course nears its close the audience is beginning to appreciate the fact that this year the Boston Symphony Orchestra has given the public a quantity of rarely good music.

Next Saturday evening will bring a trio of soloists and a programme with Mendelssohn's Scotch symphony, No. 3, in A minor; Mozart's concerto for flute and harp; Volkmann's serenade for string orchestra, in F major; and "Wotan's Farewell" and "Fire Charm" from "Die Walkure."

TWENTIETH SYMPHONY.

Mme. Amalie Joachim Receives a Flattering Reception.

The twentieth Symphony concert was given at Music Hall yesterday evening. The interest of the occasion was centred in Mme. Amalie Joachim, who has already made many friends in Boston. As she moved along to the front of the stage amidst a most cordial welcome, her manner had all the easy grace of the hostess receiving her friends. The reception accorded her was genuine and was justified by her subsequent work.

At her initial performance in Union Hall she labored under the disadvantage of a contracted auditorium, but yesterday at the Music Hall the conditions were much more favorable to her voice, which is not only acceptable in tone but of very considerable volume. She selected an aria from Orpheus as her opening number, accompanied by full orchestra, which she sang with admirable taste and skill. Her rich, round voice was fully equal to all demands made upon it.

In addition to the above she sang three songs, by Schubert, Liebesbotschaft and Erlkoenig, together with Schumann's "Schoene Wiege Meiner Leiden." She was accompanied on the piano by Mr. Nikisch with that grace and delicacy which has won so much praise for him.

Mme. Joachim was at her best in these songs, which she gave with extreme tenderness, and returned at the finish no less than three times to receive the flattering attention of the audience.

The instrumental portion of the rehearsal consisted of Brahms' "Tragic Overture," which met careful treatment at the hands of the orchestra, though we cannot help feeling the overture might be called an ode to melancholy.

The second number consisted of Gluck's "Reigen Seliger Geister und Furien Tanz," from "Orpheus." Symphony No. 8, in F major, Beethoven, was selected for the occasion, sometimes known as the little symphony. This cheery and refreshing music was charmingly played. The scherzo work its merry measures delighted the audience into applause at its termination, and it is fair to say the little symphony will not soon lose its place amongst the pleasant musical memories of these delightful concerts.

The next rehearsals and concert will be given April 1 and 2.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The appearance of Mme. Amalia Joachim, the contralto whose vocal recitals have attracted so much attention, made one of the interesting features of last evening's symphony concert, the complete programme of which was as follows:

Tragic Overture..... Brahms
Aria from "Orpheus"..... Gluck
Reigen Seliger Geister und Furien..... Gluck
Tanz from "Orpheus".....
Songs with piano.....
"Liebesbotschaft" (a)..... Schubert
"Schoene Wiege meiner Leiden" (b)..... Schumann
"Erlkoenig" (c)..... Schubert
Symphony No. 8, in F major..... Beethoven

Mme. Joachim's delivery of the familiar aria from "Orpheus" displayed the rich sympathetic tones of her voice to fine advantage, and her singing of the selection was marked by a degree of dramatic strength and sentiment which quite realized all its beauties, and she honestly won the commendation which was awarded her at the conclusion. In the group of songs at the piano she again displayed her rare gifts as a vocalist and won especial favor by the intelligent and artistic fashion in which she gave the Schubert songs.

The strong contrast afforded by introducing the old-time music of Gluck with the modern mysteries of a Brahms' overture heightened the effect of both these styles of composition and added largely to the enjoyment of the older forms from the "Orpheus."

No better flute playing has ever been heard here than that of M. Mole in the theme of the first movement of the Orpheus music, for it was sung upon the instrument with faultless taste and such skill that the player was compelled to repeatedly bow his acknowledgments from his seat in the orchestra at its conclusion.

The dance of the furies was splendidly given by Mr. Nikisch, who also made intelligible the intentions of the composer of the "Tragic" overture. An admirable reading of the eighth symphony greatly pleased the audience.

Next Saturday evening the soloists will be Mr. Heinrich Meyn, baritone, Mr. Charles Mole, flute, Mr. Heinrich Schuecker, harp; the programme including Mendelssohn's symphony No. 3, in A minor, "Scotch"; Mozart's concerto for flute and harp; Volkmann's serenade for string orchestra, in F major, and Wagner's "Wotan's Farewell" and "Fire Charm," from "Die Walkure."

ING, MARCH 28, 1892

LACK OF CONTRAST.

THE CHIEF DEFECT OF THE "TRAGIC OVERTURE."

Saturday's Symphony Concert—Mme. Joachim, the Soloist, Appeared to Good Advantage—Her Dramatic Conceptions a Study in Themselves—Close of the Grand Opera Season.

Brahms' "Tragic Overture" began the programme. This work is not intended to represent any special plot, only presenting a strongly dramatic or tragic element as justification for its title. It opens with two ponderous chords, exactly as Beethoven's "Heroic Symphony" does, and it might as readily deserve the adjective "heroic" as that of "tragic." The chief defect of the work is its lack of contrast; it is almost constantly sombre or agitated. It was played with great spirit and unanimity, although the violins pushed their fury to the verge of harshness, and there was little intermediate shading between the extremely soft and the extremely loud passages.

Gluck's ballet music gained immensely by being performed in Music Hall; in Mechanics' Hall, last week, the opera of "Orpheus" seemed entirely out of place, the delicate touches were lost, and the simplicity could not charm. In this performance everything was restored to its proper balance and perspective. The flute solo (or obligato) in the picture of the blest spirits, was finely performed by Mr. Mole, and the entire picture was given with commendable conservatism, only the 19th century ghosts would be apt to find such saccharine enjoyments as are here portrayed a trifle cloying. A few blurs towards the close of the "Dance of the Furies" may readily be condoned in view of the lack of exaggeration, which made the work a very acceptable representation of the beginning of dramatic music. In the performance of the eighth symphony by Beethoven, however, the first violins ruled the roost in their usual forcible manner, and the development of the first movement was so tumultuous that it might have pictured battle rather than a mere outburst of animal spirits. The whole symphony is the playful Beethoven, but this composer had rather a brusque humor, and his sport took him into the domains of the grotesque, rather than into the piquant and dainty as was the case with Mendelssohn. The bassoon was Beethoven's favorite instrument; that is, he generally used it when he was in a thoroughly good humor; and as he was in the best of spirits in the writing of this work (it might be called "the humorous symphony") we find plenty of comical bassoon work in its measures. All through the symphony the instrument was well played, and in the finale its odd octave figure with the kettle drum was charming. Next to the bassoon the contrabasses came into prominence and they were magnificently played.

In fact, whenever these ponderous instruments have anything like obligato phrases they give them in a most artistic manner; they are one of the most perfect departments of our orchestra. Yet I could have wished for more force in that exquisitely grotesque presentation of the chief figure in the finale. The chattering theme has become sweeter and sweeter, and finally is given to flutes and violins when, just as one is lulled into tranquillity,—presto! there is a leap from the garret into the cellar of the orchestra, and the contrabasses ferociously mock the sweeter instruments! It is all a practical joke, but it cannot have too much emphasis. One does not often have to call our conductor to account for lack of emphasis, and the symphony was in the main well done.

Madame Joachim was the soloist. She has never appeared to such good advantage since she has been in Boston. The large hall suited to her heavy voice far better than any smaller concert-room could possibly do, and if there was a slight flattening from pitch occasionally, it was far less perceptible than heretofore, and her undeniable wealth of dramatic expression was employed in the best possible way. "Che faro senza Euridice" was sung with great earnestness, although in the final appearance of the theme of this vocal ronde the singer took the tempo at a very rapid pace and the orchestra was often left far behind, for the conductor seemed not in accord with the artist's view.

I could not entirely agree with the overwhelming enthusiasm with which the public greeted the performance of the "Erl King," for there were unnecessary caprices of tempo, and of accompaniment too. The Erl-king's "Willst du mich, du mit mir geh'n" was far quicker than Kreissmann or Schott used to take it, and the climax, "So brauch ich Gewalt," showed but little "Gewalt," for the singer was evidently tired, as was evinced both by huskiness and flattening—a little from pitch. It seems odd to read in a Hanslick review of 20 years ago, that the singer charmed by a quiet reserve rather than by a vehement presentation of lieder; nous avons change tout cela; there is now less reserve and more passion. Nevertheless, the work of Mme. Joachim must command respect. Her dramatic conceptions are in themselves a study, and she has fought a good fight for art through all her days.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

The Symphony Concert.

The programme for the twentieth Symphony Concert in Music Hall, last night, was: Tragic Overture, Brahms; "Che faro senza Euridice," Gluck; selections from the ballet music of "Orpheus," Gluck; "Liebesbotschaft," Schubert; "Schoene Wiege Meiner Leiden," Schumann, and "Erlkoenig," Schubert; Symphony No. 8 in F, Beethoven. The work of the orchestra was excellent throughout. The Brahms overture was clearly and impressively read and effectively played; and the Gluck ballet music was interpreted in a wholly sympathetic spirit and admirably performed. The symphony was given without any important innovations on the traditional reading and with a frank simplicity and a graceful flexibility that may be heartily commended. The soloist was Mme. Amalie Joachim. Her singing was often painfully false in intonation, and this fault, which seems to be a radical one with the artist, overtops whatever may be praise-worthy in her work. Purity of intonation is the first requisite in a vocalist, and the lack of it cannot be condoned, without setting a bad example to young singers and proving unfaithful to the best interests of vocal art. To encourage it at the Symphony concerts is to assist in lowering the standard that should prevail there. Not having heard Mme. Joachim in the meridian of her powers, we cannot tell what she has been; we can only know what she is, and, unpleasing as it is, to write thus harshly of an artist of her repute, we do not feel that it is just to pass by in her that which we would condemn severely in a less noted artist. Her singing last evening had little in it that can be honestly commended, and though it may have shown traces of an excellence that has passed away, it was scarcely worthy of a hearing at these concerts. However, the audience evidently thought otherwise, for it recalled her twice after the Gluck aria, and after the group of Schubert and Schumann songs it broke forth in a rapture of delight and recalled her five times. The programme for the next concert is: Symphony, A-minor, Mendelssohn; Concerto for flute and harp, Mozart; Serenade for strings, Volkmann; and "Wotan's Farewell" and "The Fire Charm," Wagner. The soloists will be: Messrs. H. Meyn, C. Molé and H. Schuecker.

256

257
Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1891-92.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

XXI. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, APRIL 2, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

MENDELSSOHN.

SYMPHONY No. 3, in A minor. "Scotch."
 Andante con moto; Allegro un poco agitato.—
 Vivace non troppo.—Adagio.—
 Allegro vivacissimo; Allegro maestoso assai.

MOZART.

ANDANTE AND ALLEGRO from CONCERTO for FLUTE and HARP.

VOLKMANN.

SERENADE for STRING ORCHESTRA, in F major.

WAGNER.

"WOTAN'S FAREWELL" and "FIRE CHARM,"
 from "Die Walkure."

SOLOISTS:

MR. HEINRICH MEYN.

MR. CHARLES MOLÉ.

MR. HEINRICH SCHUECKER.

Music Notes.

The programme of the concert of Saturday evening, April 2, given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was: "Scotch Symphony," Mendelssohn; concerto for flute and harp, Mozart; serenade for strings, in F, Volkmann, and "Wotan's Farewell" and the "Fire Chorus" from "Die Walküre," Wagner. The soloists were Mr. H. Meyn, Mr. C. Molé and Mr. H. Schuecker. The symphony was un-Mendelssohnized and subjected to a Nikischization that wholly misrepresented the composer's clearly-expressed intentions. The opening movement is marked "allegro un poco agitato"; but Mr. Nikisch, for some undiscoverable motive, began it at a pace closely bordering on andante, and the poco agitato was conspicuous by its absence. The second movement, marked "vivace non troppo," was, on the contrary, hurried along at a break neck speed, the non troppo being wholly ignored. The slow movement was better used, but the finale was subjected to an almost complete revision in respect to tempo. Not only this, but the dynamic marks were boldly disregarded. Mr. Nikisch doubtless imagined that he improved the symphony by subjecting it to this treatment; but we must confess, in view of the immense distance between the reputation of the composer and that of the conductor, that we greatly prefer Mendelssohn to Mr. Nikisch, to say nothing of the fact that the former took the trouble to indicate, with great exactness, the manner in which he desired his work to be read. It would seem, however, that in regard to this symphony, at least, that he had no rights which Mr. Nikisch felt bound to respect, for in addition to the other liberties taken by him, he utterly pooh-poohed Mendelssohn's injunction that the separate movements of the work must follow each other without any halt between them. When we add that the playing was rough and noisy, we feel that we are not unjustified in claiming that the performance was radically bad and thoroughly reprehensible. The trouble seems to be either that Mr. Nikisch fancies it to be imperative on him to inject his own individuality into every work that he conducts, or that he does it through ignorance. In any case, the result is an exasperating misrepresentation, not to say belittling, of great masterpieces. If our conductor would only remember that it is of great consequence that Beethoven, Mozart, Mendelssohn, and other famous composers should be read according to the directions they have given, and that it is of no consequence whatever if Mr. Nikisch thinks they ought to be read differently, we should reach a consummation devoutly to be wished. The Mozart concerto was delightfully played by Messrs. Molé and Schuecker; but, unfortunately, the pitch of the harp was painfully at variance with that of the orchestra in the first movement. The Volkmann serenade has some graceful moments of melody and effect, but does not as a whole rise above the level of labored, highly proper Kapellmeister music. It was well played. The Wagner selections were given with immense vigor and almost deafening noisiness. Mr. Meyn sang his share in them in a style wholly in sympathy with the turmoil. It was a struggle between him and the orchestra; but he bore himself bravely, and though now and then his voice was nearly extinguished by the storm of tone against which it was pitted, it was never quite eclipsed, and if he did not come in a winner in the race, he was not left far in the rear.

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the twenty-first Symphony Concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Mendelssohn: Symphony No. 3, in A minor ("Scotch").

Mozart: Andante and Allegro from concerto for flute and harp.

Volkmann: Serenade for string orchestra, in F major.

Wagner: "Wotan's Abschied" and "Feuerzauber," from "Die Walküre."

Mr. Heinrich Meyn was the singer, Mr. Charles Molé the flutist, and Mr. Heinrich Schuecker the harpist.

It is not unlikely that Mendelssohn knew the old story of the monk who summoned a familiar of the devil to fetch him some ale, and found that the forthcoming supply of ale so far exceeded his personal demand that it ended by drowning him. But, if Mendelssohn did know it, he probably did not think of applying its moral to himself. He, as a "romantic" composer, player and conductor, asked for a certain elasticity of rhythm in the performance of his own and other people's music; for an intelligent and sympathetic reading of the composer's intention between the lines, as it were; nothing was more irksome to him than a metronome. We believe that he even did not care to take the usual indications of tempo—such as Andante, Allegro, etc.—too much au pied de la lettre, but liked, even in this matter, to have a certain freedom allowed. His discussion with Berlioz about metronome marks is tolerably well known. Yet it is out of all likelihood that he would have advocated a complete disregard for a composer's expressed wishes; and it is toward this fashion that the performing musical world of today seems tending with ever increasing speed. Take, for instance, Mr. Nikisch's conducting of the "Scotch" symphony. On the fly leaf of the score stands the following direction to the conductor: "The separate movements of this symphony must follow, one after the other, immediately, and not be separated by the usual longish interruptions." Mr. Nikisch made the usual longish waits between the movements, quite in the usual way; just as he would have done in any other symphony. The first movement is marked "Allegro un poco agitato"; Mr. Nikisch began it so slow as to make all "agitato" out of the question, and even to leave one in doubt as to its being "allegro" at all. The second movement is marked "Vivace non troppo;" if Mr. Nikisch thinks the rattling tempo at which he took it "not too lively," one asks in dismay what rate of speed he would consider "too lively"? The peroration of the finale is marked "Allegro maestoso assai," the dotted quarter-note=104;" Mr. Nikisch took the dotted quarter at 86. Now this seems to us bringing on ale with a vengeance! almost, if not quite, enough to drown the good Mendelssohn. Add to this that our excellent conductor seems to have a deeply rooted objection to a piano cantilena on the violins; so soon as it comes to a melodic phrase on the violins, he seems to have no shades on his palette between a murmuring pianissimo and a frank, outspoken forte; a bit of cantilena, played simply piano on the strings, seems not to exist for him. Of course he can reply to this criticism by pointing to the invariably strong effectiveness of his rendering of the "Scotch" symphony; it was undoubtedly an enormously effective piece of playing throughout, as effective a performance of the work as we can remember ever to have heard. But a reply of this sort is no satisfactory answer. In the matter of musical performance, the proof of the pudding is not wholly in the eating; to make music sound well is doubtless no mean achievement; but, in the case of works of the character and calibre of Mendelssohn's "Scotch" symphony, it is a still higher achievement to make the music sound right. And we insist upon our criticism with all the more emphasis, because, although Mr. Nikisch's prevailing tendency to put a good deal of himself into his performances is, after all, essentially Mendelssohnian, we are thoroughly persuaded that the excess to which he inclines to push this tendency, his frequent running freedom of interpretation into the ground, is the most un-Mendelssohnian thing in the world; of all the composers of the post-Beethoven period, Mendelssohn is just the one who should be most jealously guarded against it. We can, however, say heartily that, apart from the restrictions we have made, the performance of the symphony was wonderfully fine, vital and exciting. As a piece of playing, it was magnificent.

Of the two movements given from Mozart's flute and harp concerto, the Andante seems to us exceedingly beautiful, and the Allegro rather commonplace and unworthy of the composer. The performance by Messrs. Molé and Schuecker would have been utterly masterly but for one unlucky circumstance—both the flute and the harp were well out of tune with the orchestra. Truly musical enjoyment was possible only in the cadenzas, where the orchestra was silent. Perhaps "unlucky" is rather a mild term for this accident; we know that extremes of temperature affect string and wind instruments very differently, and the Music Hall was hotter than Tophet last Saturday evening; but no state of the atmosphere should make it impossible for an artist to put his instrument into what tune he pleases, and if it is out of tune the fault is presumably his.

The (new?) Volkmann serenade has more life and fluency of musical invention—in its second and third movements, at least—than anything of his that we have yet heard; here the composer evidently had, what was almost as great a rarity with him as bread and coal during his unhappy life, an inspiration. The first movement does little more than catch the attention, and the fourth is trivial enough; but the two middle movements are full of charm and grace, and show conspicuous cleverness in construction. The whole serenade was admirably played by the strings.

It was good to hear some thoroughly Wagnerish Wagner once more. We would by no means be understood to complain of the comparative infrequency of his name on the programmes of late, for but few of his works are properly in place at a symphony concert, and one cannot keep giving these few over and over again. Still, when anything particularly good and characteristic by him does come our way, we cannot but rejoice; it is inspiring to feel the stroke of his lion's paw from time to time. There are not many finer nor more Titanic passed in his works than Wotan's "Farewell" and the wonderful "Feuersüber." What a wealth of tragic power, of all-subduing anguish of soul, there is in that "Farewell" to Brünnhilde! What a delicacy of expressive beauty in the closing lullaby! Here is true greatness, if ever there was. Mr. Meyn sang the scene with the profoundest sentiment and with irreproachable beauty of expression; it was finely artistic singing (or lyrical declamation, if Wagnerians prefer the term) throughout. At moments the orchestra—which, by the way, was not quite complete, according to the score—threatened to overpower his voice, but such moments were few, and he made himself, for the most part, perfectly well heard. He was enthusiastically recalled at the close, and never was applause better earned.

200

The next programme is: Goldmark, overture to "Sakuntala;" Edmond de Mihalovich, ballad for orchestra, "The Mermaid;" John K. Paine, symphony No. 2, in A major, "In the Spring."

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Beethoven
 People who like to get excitement and effect out of their Symphony concerts ought to have been satisfied at the twenty-first of the series; for although the middle part of the programme moved placidly enough, the last number was intrinsically tremendous in noise, while in the first Mr. Nikisch exceeded even the extravagant limits of false reading which he is wont to allow himself when the fantasy takes him. Mendelssohn's "Scotch" symphony is so well known and its beauties are so obvious that the Music Hall audience is always prepared to welcome it. Perhaps on this account and to give the hearers something to astonish them, or perhaps again to contend against the almost mephitic torpor and torridity of the atmosphere, Mr. Nikisch chose to deliver this work in frequent violation of principle, custom, good sense and the author's express injunctions. It is probably idle now to protest against the wrong which Mr. Nikisch does to the cause, the study and the understanding of music; he seems to feel himself so firm in his position as to defy any criticism and to set at naught judgment and propriety. But truth demands that his unmusically freaks shall be set down as falsifications of art and that the thoughtless and ignorant shall be warned against being led by nervous excitement into accepting them as true and good expositions. The symphony was followed by the andante and allegro from a harp and flute concerto by Mozart, which Mr. Schuecker and Mr. Molé played delightfully after they got into tune with the band. Not great music nor exciting—such could not be got out of these two instruments; but suave, fluent, bright, naive and wholesome. The honesty and purity of it deserve to be kept fresh in mind by an occasional performance in these days of sophistication and learned dogmatism. Next came Volkmann's serenade in F for strings, which might better have been omitted, for it has no particular quality except an easy-going cleverness and a respectable prettiness to recommend it to a place in an important programme. The concert ended with one of the few extracts from the master which the Wagnerians ever dare to put forward as absolute music—"Wotan's Farewell" and the "Fire Charm" from the "Valkyre." The orchestra went at it with a will and all the earlier part roared and blared and crashed so that only now and then could anybody hear Mr. Meyn, who was making herculean efforts to have Wotan's speeches appear (vari nantes in gurgite vasto) now and then in the oceanic volumes of sound. The fire music had a lighter movement and a more elastic force, but even this not only lost some character by displacement from the stage, but did not equal in brilliancy, flash and sweep some other renderings which we remember.

For tonight the programme will be Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture; a new Russian work, the orchestral ballad called "The Mermaid," by Edmond De Mihalovich, and Professor J. K. Paine's "Spring" symphony.

The Symphony Concert of Last Saturday Evening.

The Story of the Origin of a Mozart Concerto.

The Thoughts of Walt Whitman Concerning Music.

The programme of the twenty-first Symphony concert, which was given in Music Hall Saturday evening, was as follows:

Symphony No. 3, in A minor, "Scotch".... Mendelssohn
Andante and Allegro from concerto for flute and harp

Serenade for string orchestra, in F major..... Volkmann
 "Wotan's Farewell" and "Fire Charm" from "Die Walküre"..... Wagner

The solo parts were taken by Mr. Heinrich Meyn, baritone; Mr. Charles Molé, flute, and Mr. Heinrich Schuecker, harp.

It was a pleasure to find the symphony in its proper place, at the beginning of the programme and not at the end. The programme was too long, however, and the Volkmann Serenade might have been omitted, for, with the exception of the waltz movement, it is dull and commonplace. The dryness of the serenade enhanced the effect of the gorgeous instrumentation of the Wagner excerpt which followed. There is no doubt that the concert, as a whole, was thoroughly enjoyed by the audience, for the applause at the end of the symphony, after the Mozart selection, and after the final number, was hearty and long continued. The "Scotch" symphony, as well as the "Italian," is always relished by concert-goers. They know the tunes. They have the utmost confidence in the composer. When a work is played for the first time they are obliged to exert the faculties of perception and judgment. Amusement is turned into a task. An unexpected modulation, a strange instrumental effect, or a veiled melody may affect the process of calm digestion. Ferdinand Hiller recognizes this fact in his entertaining essay, "Too Much Music," and he speaks of the natural curiosity of the musician to hear constantly that which is new as opposed to the wish of the public at large to take enjoyment "easily and conveniently." Nor is the average concert-goer seriously disturbed by an extravagance or an exaggeration in the reading. He does not question, as a rule, the pace set by the conductor, and he is not inclined to be criticised in matters of detail. It is enough that he greets an old friend. The costume may follow the present fashion, or the coat and trousers and cravat may be of somewhat antiquated cut and style; the features of the friend are the same, the voice is not changed. And when he hears again the old, familiar story that pleased him he does not complain if the incidents are varied, he is not shocked by a stray solecism or a touch of slang. The point of the story is the same, and he is satisfied. Nor does he understand why others are so precise and exact, and refuse to join in the merriment, and even shake the head.

The movements from Mozart's concerto for flute and harp are perhaps more interesting on account of the history of the composition than from any great intrinsic merit. When Mozart made his second visit to Paris he was introduced by Grimm to the Duke de Guines. The Duke was an accomplished courtier. He gave much attention to his coiffure and his clothes, that is, if Mrs. de Genlis's malicious sketch was founded on fact. He had a mocking wit, and he was a brilliant flute player. His daughter played the harp with unusual skill. Mozart was asked to write a concerto for the purpose of this family display. Now the two instruments that Mozart detested, according to the testimony of Joseph Frank, were the flute and the harp. He wrote the concerto, however, and gave the girl a two-hour lesson daily in composition. This was the father's wish, and he told Mozart that he would be happy if she could write sonatas for flute and harp; he did not expect her to make operas or airs, or symphonies. Unfortunately the girl had no musical ideas, and the teacher could not put them in her head; furthermore it turned out that she was stupid and lazy in her exercises. The father was Ambassador to Prussia and to England. The daughter met a more tragic fate. She married the Duke de Castries and died in childhood.

The concerto in question is amiable music. It soothes for a time, and it might be of medicinal influence in certain cases of nerve disorders. But its very tranquillity becomes irritating. It will be remembered that Saul was at first kindly disposed toward David, and he listened to his performance on the harp; afterward he sought to slay him. Last Saturday evening Mr. Schuecker's instrument was tuneful through the first movement, and no one knew this better than the accomplished player. An opportunity was given him for proper tuning, and the second movement was played delightfully. Mr. Molé displayed his accustomed beauty of tone and technical skill.

Ferdinand Praeger in "Wagner as I knew him," describing certain inconsistencies of the great maker of music dramas, writes as follows: "Whilst vehemently protesting the inseparability of his music from its related stage representation and scenic accessories, compelled by fate, he traversed Europe from London to St. Petersburg to produce in the concert room orchestral excerpts from the very works upon whose inviolability he had in such unequivocal terms insisted." Such contradictions between a man's theories and practices however do not affect the real value of his work. But from the Wagnerian point of view, it is a mistake to put these excerpts on the concert stage. The devoted disciples of Wagner accept, without doubt, this statement of Maurice Kufferath: "The aim of Richard Wagner is neither poetry nor music, as these terms are generally understood. His only aim is the drama itself. It is not necessary then to ask, 'Shall I hear beautiful melodies,' or 'Shall I hear beautiful verses?' It is necessary to say, 'I shall be present at the performance of a drama; shall I be moved?'" pages in his works than Wotan's "Farewell" and the wonderful "Feuerzauber." What a wealth of tragic power, of all-subduing anguish of soul, there is in that "Farewell" to Brünnhilde! What a delicacy of expressive beauty in the closing lullaby! Here is true greatness, if ever there was. Mr. Meyn sang the scene with the profoundest sentiment and with irreproachable beauty of expression; it was finely artistic singing (or lyrical declamation, if Wagnerians prefer the term) throughout. At moments the orchestra—which, by the way, was not quite complete, according to the score—threatened to overpower his voice, but such moments were few, and he made himself, for the most part, perfectly well heard. He was enthusiastically recalled at the close, and never was applause better earned.

When the excerpt is heard in the concert hall the drama disappears: the music alone remains. The music for a particular dramatic situation is then turned into absolute, untrammelled music. Wotan is a singer in evening dress. The different themes are without dramatic significance. We have an amorphous musical composition, in which the human voice is introduced as an orchestral instrument. The brilliancy of the instrumentation and the boisterous performance excited the admiration of the audience of Saturday evening. Mr. Meyn struggled heroically with a thankless and unvocal task. His earnestness and his sincerity were such that he declaimed vigorously in certain passages where more experienced Wagnerian declaimers, realizing the vanity of an attempt to be heard in such an orchestral storm, content themselves wisely with pantomimic display.

The next programme is: Goldmark, overture to "Sakuntala;" Edmond de Mihalovich, ballad for orchestra, "The Mermaid;" John K. Paine, symphony No. 2, in A major, "In the Spring."

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

People who like to get excitement and effect out of their Symphony concerts ought to have been satisfied at the twenty-first of the series; for although the middle part of the programme moved placidly enough, the last number was intrinsically tremendous in noise, while in the first Mr. Nikisch exceeded even the extravagant limits of false reading which he is wont to allow himself when the fantasy takes him. Mendelssohn's "Scotch" symphony is so well known and its beauties are so obvious that the Music Hall audience is always prepared to welcome it. Perhaps on this account and to give the hearers something to astonish them, or perhaps again to contend against the almost mephitic torpor and torridity of the atmosphere, Mr. Nikisch chose to deliver this work in frequent violation of principle, custom, good sense and the author's express injunctions. It is probably idle now to protest against the wrong which Mr. Nikisch does to the cause, the study and the understanding of music; he seems to feel himself so firm in his position as to defy any criticism and to set at naught judgment and propriety. But truth demands that his unmusically freaks shall be set down as falsifications of art and that the thoughtless and ignorant shall be warned against being led by nervous excitement into accepting them as true and good expositions. The symphony was followed by the andante and allegro from a harp and flute concerto by Mozart, which Mr. Schuecker and Mr. Molé played delightfully after they got into tune with the band. Not great music nor exciting—such could not be got out of these two instruments; but suave, fluent, bright, naive and wholesome. The honesty and purity of it deserve to be kept fresh in mind by an occasional performance in these days of sophistication and learned dogmatism. Next came Volkmann's serenade in F for strings, which might better have been omitted, for it has no particular quality except an easy-going cleverness and a respectable prettiness to recommend it to a place in an important programme. The concert ended with one of the few extracts from the master which the Wagnerians ever dare to put forward as absolute music—"Wotan's Farewell" and the "Fire Charm" from the "Valkyre." The orchestra went at it with a will and all the earlier part roared and blared and crashed so that only now and then could anybody hear Mr. Meyn, who was making herculean efforts to have Wotan's speeches appear (rari nantes in gurgite vasto) now and then in the oceanic volumes of sound. The fire music had a lighter movement and a more elastic force, but even this not only lost some character by displacement from the stage, but did not equal in brilliancy, flash and sweep some other renderings which we remember.

For tonight the programme will be Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture; a new Russian work, the orchestral ballad called "The Mermaid," by Edmond De Mihalovich, and Professor J. K. Paine's "Spring" symphony.

The Symphony Concert of Last Saturday Evening.

The Story of the Origin of a Mozart Concerto.

The Thoughts of Walt Whitman Concerning Music.

The programme of the twenty-first Symphony concert, which was given in Music Hall Saturday evening, was as follows:

Symphony No. 3, in A minor. "Scotch".....Mendelssohn
Andante and Allegro from concerto for flute and harp

Serenade for string orchestra, in F major.....Volkmann
"Wotan's Farewell" and "Fire Charm" from "Die Walküre".....Wagner

The solo parts were taken by Mr. Heinrich Meyn, baritone; Mr. Charles Molé, flute, and Mr. Heinrich Schuecker, harp.

It was a pleasure to find the symphony in its proper place, at the beginning of the programme and not at the end. The programme was too long, however, and the Volkmann Serenade might have been omitted, for, with the exception of the waltz movement, it is dull and commonplace. The dryness of the serenade enhanced the effect of the gorgeous instrumentation of the Wagner excerpt which followed. There is no doubt that the concert, as a whole, was thoroughly enjoyed by the audience, for the applause at the end of the symphony, after the Mozart selection, and after the final number, was hearty and long continued. The "Scotch" symphony, as well as the "Italian," is always relished by concert-goers. They know the tunes. They have the utmost confidence in the composer. When a work is played for the first time they are obliged to exert the faculties of perception and judgment. Amusement is turned into a task. An unexpected modulation, a strange instrumental effect, or a veiled melody may affect the process of calm digestion. Ferdinand Hiller recognizes this fact in his entertaining essay, "Too Much Music," and he speaks of the natural curiosity of the musician to hear constantly that which is new as opposed to the wish of the public at large to take enjoyment "easily and conveniently." Nor is the average concert-goer seriously disturbed by an extravagance or an exaggeration in the reading. He does not question, as a rule, the pace set by the conductor, and he is not inclined to be criticised in matters of detail. It is enough that he greets an old friend. The costume may follow the present fashion, or the coat and trousers and cravat may be of somewhat antiquated cut and style; the features of the friend are the same, the voice is not changed. And when he hears again the old, familiar story that pleased him he does not complain if the incidents are varied, he is not shocked by a stray solecism or a touch of slang. The point of the story is the same, and he is satisfied. Nor does he understand why others are so precise and exact, and refuse to join in the merriment, and even shake the head.

The movements from Mozart's concerto for flute and harp are perhaps more interesting on account of the history of the composition than from any great intrinsic merit. When Mozart made his second visit to Paris he was introduced by Grimm to the Duke de Guines. The Duke was an accomplished courtier. He gave much attention to his coiffure and his clothes, that is, if Mrs. de Genlis's malicious sketch was founded on fact. He had a mocking wit, and he was a brilliant flute player. His daughter played the harp with unusual skill. Mozart was asked to write a concerto for the purpose of this family display. Now the two instruments that Mozart detested, according to the testimony of Joseph Frank, were the flute and the harp. He wrote the concerto, however, and gave the girl a two-hour lesson daily in composition. This was the father's wish, and he told Mozart that he would be happy if she could write sonatas for flute and harp; he did not expect her to make operas or airs, or symphonies. Unfortunately the girl had no musical ideas, and the teacher could not put them in her head; furthermore it turned out that she was stupid and lazy in her exercises. The father was Ambassador to Prussia and to England. The daughter met a more tragic fate. She married the Duke de Castries and died in childhood.

The concerto in question is amiable music. It soothes for a time, and it might be of medicinal influence in certain cases of nerve disorders. But its very tranquillity becomes irritating. It will be remembered that Saul was at first kindly disposed toward David, and he listened to his performance on the harp; afterward he sought to slay him. Last Saturday evening Mr. Schuecker's instrument was tuneful through the first movement, and no one knew this better than the accomplished player. An opportunity was given him for proper tuning, and the second movement was played delightfully. Mr. Molé displayed his accustomed beauty of tone and technical skill.

Ferdinand Praeger in "Wagner as I knew him," describing certain inconsistencies of the great maker of music dramas, writes as follows: "Whilst vehemently protesting the inseparability of his music from its related stage representation and scenic accessories, compelled by fate, he traversed Europe from London to St. Petersburg to produce in the concert room orchestral excerpts from the very works upon whose invariability he had in such unequivocal terms insisted." Such contradictions between a man's theories and practices however do not affect the real value of his work. But from the Wagnerian point of view, it is a mistake to put these excerpts on the concert stage. The devoted disciples of Wagner accept, without doubt, this statement of Maurice Kufferath: "The aim of Richard Wagner is neither poetry nor music, as these terms are generally understood. His only aim is the drama itself. It is not necessary then to ask, 'Shall I hear beautiful melodies,' or 'Shall I hear beautiful verses?' It is necessary to say, 'I shall be present at the performance of a drama; shall I be moved?'"

When the excerpt is heard in the concert hall the drama disappears: the music alone remains. The music for a particular dramatic situation is then turned into absolute, untrammelled music. Wotan is a singer in evening dress. The different themes are without dramatic significance. We have an amorphous musical composition, in which the human voice is introduced as an orchestral instrument. The brilliancy of the instrumentation and the boisterous performance excited the admiration of the audience of Saturday evening. Mr. Meyn struggled heroically with a thankless and unvocal task. His earnestness and his sincerity were such that he declaimed vigorously in certain passages where more experienced Wagnerian declaimers, realizing the vanity of an attempt to be heard in such an orchestral storm, content themselves wisely with pantomimic display.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

Return of "The Queen's Mate" at the Tremont Theatre.

The Symphony Concert—Success of the Henschel Recitals—Notable Oratorio Performances—The Kneisel and Adamowski Quartet Concerts—Events of the Spring Season.

The patrons of the Symphony concerts were afforded a rare treat in last evening's programme, as the selections were of unusual interest and variety, excellent soloists took part and the performance of the several numbers was in the main admirable.

Beginning his programme with the "Scotch" symphony by Mendelssohn, Mr. Nikisch afforded his audience an opportunity to hear its inspired movements under the most favorable circumstances, and his reading of the work was thoroughly enjoyed. There was a conservative following of accepted interpretations in the opening movement which predisposed those familiar with other performances of the symphony in favor of the conductor's ideas, and when he made a radical departure from custom, in playing the bivace, his audience was quite ready to, and did, applaud the spirited fashion in which this movement was given. The beauties of the adagio were all made delightfully clear by Mr. Nikisch, and the final movement was also given with rare success under his skillful direction.

Following the symphony came the andante and allegro from Mozart's concerto for flute and harp, played by Messrs. Mole and Schuecker, and these two men of the orchestra gave a splendid exhibition of their best work in the performance of this tuneful number. Mr. Mole sang the beautiful theme of the andante upon his flute with faultless taste and with fine expression, having excellent support in the equally artistic harp playing of Mr. Schuecker. The allegro was brilliantly interpreted by the two players, Mr. Mole excelling in all the difficult execution demanded in the flute part, giving a free, pure, true tone at all times, and displaying a mastery of the instrument that charmed and delighted all who listened.

Volkman's serenade for string orchestra in F major made the third number, and, despite the fact that, aside from its third movement, it is little more than a study for the string players, it made a pleasing effect and afforded a good contrast to "Wotan's Farewell" and the "Fire Charm" from "Die Walkure," which made the last selection on the evening's list.

Mr. Heinrich Meyn was the soloist in the "Farewell," and he met with fair success in overcoming the difficulties it presents to the single soloist opposed to all the instrumental forces arrayed against him. His delivery of the declamatory measures of Wotan was characterized by intelligence and good taste, but his voice is not quite of the heroic quality demanded to realize all the possibilities of this untuneful, unthankful selection which loses well nigh all its meaning when stripped of the stage surroundings of the opera house.

In the playing of the "Fire Charm" Mr. Nikisch was not altogether successful; for, despite the purity of the string tone, there was a lack of the brilliancy which has been given to this wonderful tone picture by other conductors. The audience, however, appeared delighted with the interpretation of both these Wagner numbers.

TWENTY-FIRST SYMPHONY.

Mendelssohn, Mozart, Volkmann and Wagner Pleasingly Interpreted.

The symphony concert season is nearing its close, but three more concerts of the series remaining to be given. The offerings yesterday consisted of Mendelssohn's "Scotch" symphony, the andante and allegro from Mozart's concerto for flute and harp, Volkmann's serenade of string orchestra, and "Wotan's Farewell" and "Fire Charm" from "Die Walkure."

Mendelssohn's familiar and always welcome symphony was particularly well played by the orchestra, and extremely cordial were the plaudits which rewarded its performance.

The concerto for flute and harp gave opportunities for hearing two of the most popular soloists of Mr. Nikisch's band, Charles Mole, flute, and H. Schuecker, harp. Each received a warm welcome and at the close of their performances were repeatedly recalled. Mr. Mole's exquisite tones and perfect technique gave a charm to Volkmann's splendid concerto that previous performances of the work here, excellent as they were, had not made manifest. Of Mr. Schuecker's harp playing only words of highest praise are to be said. The graceful passages in which the concerto abounds were played with exceeding delicacy, finish and expression. The accompaniment was finely and sympathetically played by the orchestra.

The Volkmann serenade was played for the first time by the Boston Symphony orchestra. It was given a magnificent performance, but failed to make a particularly favorable impression upon the audience. Although a scholarly composition there is a deal of sameness in it which is apt to become wearisome before the ending. Of the four movements the waltz is rather the most pleasing.

Mr. Heinrich Meyer was the vocal soloist in the scenes from "Die Walkure." Mr. Heinrich is undoubtedly an able artist, and his voice is one which is usually heard with pleasure. Unfortunately very little of his singing was heard yesterday. The thunderous tones of the brasses, basses and drums, which Wagner so delighted in, were too much for his moderately strong voice. He sang with a good deal of expression, however, and received kindly recognition from the audience.

The programme announced for the next concert is as follows:

Gohlmart.....Overture, "Sakuntala"
Edmond de Mihalevich.....
Ballade for Orchestra, "The Mermaid"
(First time.)

J. K. Paine.....
Symphony No. 2, in A major, "In the Spring."

PRAISE AND BLAME

BOTH DESERVED BY THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Mendelssohn's Scotch Symphony Excellently Given, but the Performance of the Wagnerian Number Was Extremely Poor and Misleading to Those Who do not Know Wagner's Ideal.

Mendelssohn's Scotch Symphony is one of the most popular of the works in this form, and is undoubtedly the best of the four great symphonies of the master. Its performance on Saturday was a notable one, and both conductor and orchestra can be unreservedly praised. The first movement shows how Mendelssohn was impressed by the forbidding scenery of the north, and the deep clarinette notes (the so-called "chalumeau register") have just the right tone-color to portray this dark and awe-inspiring effect. The coda of this movement is, however, a slight blemish, and does not seem a logical sequence of the preceding matter. The scherzo is daintiness personified, its themes are full of character, and their treatment is throughout masterly. Mendelssohn is the only one of the German composers who was able to attain the Scotch style in his musical work. Beethoven, Schumann, Bruch, Franz and a host of others have attempted the vein, and have failed to produce anything that could be called really characteristic of Scotland; Mendelssohn has, however, here given a movement which Hamish MacCunn or any other Scotch composer could not excel in the matter of national character—it is Scotch as a Haggis. All through the symphony Mendelssohn shows a great fondness for the woodwind, and in the finale the bassoon and clarinette have some very important phrases to give; the playing of these instruments was especially good in this performance, and as already intimated, the entire work was a success.

Two movements of Mozart's concerto for harp and flute followed, and Messrs. Schuecker and Mole won a triumph in a work that is by no means an inspiring one. Of their playing only the highest praise can be spoken, but of the composition not so much can be said. It was only piece d'occasion in the first place, and Mozart was never much inspired by the flute, and in fact used it less than any other of the great masters. It must be remembered also that both harp and flute have undergone radical changes since Mozart's day, the double-action harp coming in through Erard in 1810, and the Boehm flute in 1834. At the time that this concerto was composed there existed only Simon's single-action pedal harp and the old keyed flute, neither of which could modulate freely. The result of this was heard in the very few modulations used in the work, and in the fact that the harp player had scarcely to use the pedals at all. Spite of such a handicap the work was carried to success by the brilliant performance of the artists. The cadenza in the last movement was a grand display of virtuosity, and in every measure there was not only surety of execution, but beauty of tone and delicacy of shading. Of course the gifted pair were recalled with enthusiasm after the performance.

Volkman's serenade for string orchestra demonstrated that the art of shading is not yet lost in our great musical organization. The first movement had not much to say for itself, but the second was delicate in the extreme, and the pizzicati on the deeper strings were in excellent balance against the dainty bowings of the violins. The waltz (spite of the rhapsodies of Eugene Field) is but a musical bombon such as Delibes could have written ad infinitum. But the whole serenade was well played. I wish that the eulogy of the performance could continue to the end, but the performance of the Wagnerian number was as poor as the preceding numbers had been excellent. The artistic baritone, Heinrich Meyn, has not the herculean voice to cope with the measures of Wotan's "Farewell," and at times he was almost obliterated by the orchestra. The fire motive was given in a coarse and heavy manner, and very many of the leit motiven vanished altogether in the hurly-burly. This number has been performed in Boston in vastly superior style before this. It is doubly a pity to give it poorly, for the public have come to imagine that Wagner loved noise and deafening racket, and such a coarse performance only confirms them in their error. In half a dozen Bayreuth performances I have not heard a tumult such as that of this interpretation. In the performance of such a work no amount of enthusiasm on the part of conductor or of orchestra can suffice to atone for a lack of the most careful drilling; there must be the most perfect balance or many of the sub-themes will be drowned out, and such a rough performance of music so pregnant with meaning will cause those who do not know the ideal the composer aimed at to imagine that Wagner was only a sort of musical ogre who dwelt in a palace of fortissimo dissonances.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

"Bravo Paderewski" was the cry that came from every part of the Metropolitan Opera House, last Sunday night, as the Polish virtuoso ended the third movement of his concerto, and "Bravissimo Paderewski!" was the cry, and, when he took Herr Nikisch by the hand and pulled him forward to share in the honors, the applause redoubled. Paderewski then turned toward Mr. Higginson's orchestra and kissed his hand several times to show his appreciation of their superb accompaniment. By this good deed of Paderewski and the symphony orchestra, $4275 goes into the Washington Arch Fund complete. Mr. Higginson sent the orchestra on free, even paying all the hotel and travelling expenses of its 85 members, and Steinway & Sons shouldered the rent of the hall, the printing and the other local expenses. Am 4/19/2

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Twenty-First Symphony Concert.

The 21st concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, given at Music Hall on Saturday evening, presented the following programme: Symphony No. 3, in A minor "Scotch," Mendelssohn; andante and allegro, from concerto for flute and harp, Mozart; serenade, for string orchestra, Volkmann; "Wotan's Farewell" and "Fire Charm," from "Die Walkure," Wagner. The soloists were Mr. Charles Mole, Mr. Heinrich Schuecker and Mr. Heinrich Meyer. The music of Mendelssohn's "Scotch" symphony excited the enthusiasm of the audience, which was liberal with its applause. The beautiful melodies and the exquisite treatment displayed in this work must ever command the attention of the musical listener. It was played with little or no regard for the necessity of contrast, being rasped and blowed after the now established standard of coarseness of Mr. Nikisch's band.

The scherzo was disjointed and lacking in precision, and the first movement and finale were rough and blatant. Mendelssohn indicated that the drums should be tuned to A and E, which, by the way, is a good idea, as the symphony is in A minor. It has been claimed by some unknown party on the Transcript, who hid behind a nom-de-plume, not having the courage of his convictions, that Nikisch is a genius. Well, if a disregard of a composer's indications is a sign of genius, the accusation must be admitted. On this same basis Nikisch's drummer must also be regarded as a genius, for he disregards the composer's request concerning the tuning of the drums, and displays this genius upon about every opportunity that is presented. Now on Saturday night he tuned his drums to A flat and nearly to E flat, instead of A natural and E natural.

Of course it was rankly out of tune with the rest of the orchestra, but it appeared to be perfectly agreeable, however, as far as any sign of disturbance was indicated on the part of the genius posing on the two boxes. Now, Mr. Schuecker's harp was out of tune in the first movement of the Mozart piece, and it really seemed to annoy him, and to the extent that he took the opportunity before beginning the second movement to thoroughly tune his instrument, a most commendable performance upon his part, but he can never expect to ascend the pedestal of genius if he is as particular as that, not if he is to remain in the atmosphere that surrounds the glory of our local organization.

The Mozart concerto is pleasant enough in its way, but it is a very feeble one as it employs the harp in a tinkling manner, not the fault of the composer, however, for it was a tinkling instrument in his day. Mr. Mole and Mr. Schuecker played with their well-known skill and were recalled with loud applause.

The Volkmann Serenade is dry, commonplace music. There is a waltz movement in the piece that is agreeable enough, but so are hundreds of other waltzes that would not be permitted to appear upon the programmes of the Symphony concerts.

The concert ended with a most violent, coarse and bombastic performance of the Wagner number. It was absolutely deafening in its racket. Mr. Meyer stood forth and heroically endeavored to do his part in the cyclone of disturbance, but he was distanced from the start. The concert was unnecessarily long. Nikisch shows little judgment in this particular. The serenade should have been left out of the programme for more reasons than one.

Next Saturday Professor Paine's "Spring Symphony" will be performed.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

MUSIC. Continued

THE SYMPHONY.

The programme of the twenty-first Symphony rehearsal and concert was well designed to reveal the possibilities of the orchestra, and the virtuosity of two of its most distinguished members. Mendelssohn's "Scotch" symphony, which came first, received a remarkably fine performance. The quality of tone produced by the strings was unusually full and warm, that of the cellos in the adagio being notably beautiful; and the wood-wind and brass were also at their very best. The performance throughout was rich in rhythmic and color effects; in brief, the orchestra has done no more finished work during the season.

Volkmann's Serenade for Strings sounded somewhat tame and commonplace after the symphony, though it does not lack in pleasing themes and effective treatment. It is a work of slight dimensions, but its four movements possess a certain individuality of their own, and are happily contrasted. It was delightfully played.

"Wotan's Farewell" and "Fire Charm," from "Die Walkure," which was the closing number, was all the more welcome for the reason that the symphony programmes of this season have contained few selections from Wagner's works. It was given in all respects, save one, magnificently. Never before, perhaps, has the playing of our orchestra in any Wagnerian work been more delicate and finished, and freer from coarseness and noise; and this, too, at no loss of breadth and sonority. The effect was as near like that which is produced by the covered orchestra at Bayreuth as is, in all probability, possible.

With an Edouard de Reszke to sing Wotan's lines, the entire performance would have been a memorable one; but with Mr. Heinrich Meyn as the singer, it can only be remembered as an extraordinary instance of orchestral virtuosity. If Mr. Meyn's tone production in volume, purity and freedom, had been equal to the earnestness that he displayed, his effort might be set down as fairly successful. As it was, his forced and "throaty" tones and labored delivery were not conducive to pleasure; and the only part of his performance that can be praised is the seriousness of his intentions.

It remains to speak of the superb playing of Mr. Mole and Mr. Schuecker in the charming concerto by Mozart for flute and harp. The former fairly surpassed himself in beauty and variety of tone and brilliancy of execution; and such harp playing—so smooth and fluent, so delicious in quality—is seldom heard in any musical center of the world.

Music Hall.

1891-92.

NY ORCHESTRA,

NIKISCH, Conductor.

CONCERT.

FRIDAY 30, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

NY No. 3, in C minor.

ave; Allegro.—Larghetto.—

inale; Allegro.

at these Concerts.)

NO for VIOLIN, in G minor.

lerato.—Adagio.—Finale; Allegro energico.

ORAL PRELUDE.

t time.)

LAVONIC DANCES.

DIST:

AMOWSKI.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Twenty-First Symphony Concert.

The 21st concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, given at Music Hall on Saturday evening, presented the following programme: Symphony No. 3, in A minor "Scotch," Mendelssohn; andante and allegro, from concerto for flute and harp, Mozart; serenade, for string orchestra, Volkmann; "Wotan's Farewell" and "Fire Charm," from "Die Walkure," Wagner. The soloists were Mr. Charles Mole, Mr. Heinrich Schuecker and Mr. Heinrich Meyer. The music of Mendelssohn's "Scotch" symphony excited the enthusiasm of the audience, which was liberal with its applause. The beautiful melodies and the exquisite treatment displayed in this work must ever command the attention of the musical listener. It was played with little or no regard for the necessity of contrast, being rasped and blowed after the now established standard of coarseness of Mr. Nikisch's band.

The scherzo was disjointed and lacking in precision, and the first movement and finale were rough and blatant. Mendelssohn indicated that the drums should be tuned to A and E, which, by the way, is a good idea, as the symphony is in A minor. It has been claimed by some unknown party on the Transcript, who hid behind a nom-de-plume, not having the courage of his convictions, that Nikisch is a genius. Well, if a disregard of a composer's indications is a sign of genius, the accusation must be admitted. On this same basis Nikisch's drummer must also be regarded as a genius, for he disregards the composer's request concerning the tuning of the drums, and displays this genius upon about every opportunity that is presented. Now on Saturday night he tuned his drums to A flat and nearly to E flat, instead of A natural and E natural.

Of course it was rankly out of tune with the rest of the orchestra, but it appeared to be perfectly agreeable, however, as far as any sign of disturbance was indicated on the part of the genius posing on the two boxes. Now, Mr. Schuecker's harp was out of tune in the first movement of the Mozart piece, and it really seemed to annoy him, and to the extent that he took the opportunity before beginning the second movement to thoroughly tune his instrument, a most commendable performance upon his part, but he can never expect to ascend the pedestal of genius if he is as particular as that, not if he is to remain in the atmosphere that surrounds the glory of our local organization.

The Mozart concerto is pleasant enough in its way, but it is a very feeble one as it employs the harp in a tinkling manner, not the fault of the composer, however, for it was a tinkling instrument in his day. Mr. Mole and Mr. Schuecker played with their well-known skill and were recalled with loud applause.

The Volkmann Serenade is dry, commonplace music. There is a waltz movement in the piece that is agreeable enough, but so are hundreds of other waltzes that would not be permitted to appear upon the programmes of the Symphony concerts.

The concert ended with a most violent, coarse and bombastic performance of the Wagner number. It was absolutely deafening in its racket. Mr. Meyer stood forth and heroically endeavored to do his part in the cyclone of disturbance, but he was distanced from the start. The concert was unnecessarily long. Nikisch shows little judgment in this particular. The serenade should have been left out of the programme for more reasons than one.

Next Saturday Professor Paine's "Spring Symphony" will be performed.
WARREN DAVENPORT.

MUSIC. Continued

THE SYMPHONY.

The programme of the twenty-first Symphony Music Hall. rehearsal and concert was well designed to reveal the possibilities of the orchestra, and the virtuosity of two of its most distinguished members. Mendelssohn's "Scotch" symphony, which came first, received a remarkably fine performance. The quality of tone produced by the strings was unusually full and warm, that of the cellos in the adagio being notably beautiful; and the wood-wind and brass were also at their very best. The performance throughout was rich in rhythmic and color effects; in brief, the orchestra has done no more finished work during the season.

Volkmann's Serenade for Strings sounded somewhat tame and commonplace after the symphony, though it does not lack in pleasing themes and effective treatment. It is a work of slight dimensions, but its four movements possess a certain individuality of their own, and are happily contrasted. It was delightfully played.

"Wotan's Farewell" and "Fire Charm," from Music Hall Programme January 30, at 8, P. M. "Die Walkure," which was the closing number, was all the more welcome for the reason that the symphony programmes of this season have contained few selections from Wagner's works. It was given in all respects, save one, magnificently. Never before, perhaps, has the playing of our orchestra in any Wagnerian work been more delicate and finished, and freer from coarseness and noise; and this, too, at no loss of breadth and sonority. The effect was as near like that which is produced by the covered orchestra at Bayreuth as is, in all probability, possible.

With an Edouard de Reszke to sing Wotan's lines, the entire performance would have been a memorable one; but with Mr. Heinrich Meyn as the singer, it can only be remembered as an extraordinary instance of orchestral virtuosity. If Mr. Meyn's tone production in volume, purity and freedom, had been equal to the earnestness that he displayed, his effort might be set down as fairly successful. As it was, his forced and "throaty" tones and labored delivery were not conducive to pleasure; and the only part of his performance that can be praised is the seriousness of his intentions.

It remains to speak of the superb playing of Mr. Mole and Mr. Schuecker in the charming concerto by Mozart for flute and harp. The former fairly surpassed himself in beauty and variety of tone and brilliancy of execution; and such harp playing—so smooth and fluent, so delicious in quality—is seldom heard in any musical center of the world.

NY ORCHESTRA,

KISCH, Conductor.

CONCERT.

RY 30, AT 8, P. M.

RAMME.

NY No. 3, in C minor.

ave; Allegro.—Larghetto.—

inale; Allegro.

at these Concerts.)

IO for VIOLIN, in G minor.

erato.—Adagio.—Finale; Allegro energico.

RAL PRELUDE.

t time.)

LAVONIC DANCES.

DIST:

AMOWSKI.

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1891-92.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

XV. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 6, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

DVOŘÁK.

SYMPHONIC VARIATIONS.

OTTO FLOERSHEIM.

PRELUDE AND FUGUE.

(First time.)

BERLIOZ.

SYMPHONY. "Harold in Italy."

(Viola Solo, MR. FRANZ KNEISEL.)

268

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1891-92.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

XXII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, APRIL 9, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

GOLDMARK.

OVERTURE. "Sakuntala."

J. K. PAINE.

SYMPHONY No. 2, in A major. "In the Spring."

1. Introduction. Adagio sostenuto. THE DEPARTURE OF WINTER. Allegro ma non troppo. THE AWAKENING OF NATURE.
 2. Scherzo. Allegro. MAY NIGHT FANTASY.
 3. Adagio. A ROMANCE OF SPRINGTIME.
 4. Allegro gioioso. THE GLORY OF NATURE.
-

BEETHOVEN.

OVERTURE. "Egmont."

NOTE. Next week's Public Rehearsal will be held on Thursday Afternoon, to allow time to arrange the stage for the Handel and Haydn Society's Concert, on Good Friday Evening.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Symphony Concert.

Goldmark is one of the most oriental of modern composers. Not that he uses the oriental scale in his tone progressions, or that even the monotonous and constantly recurring rhythms of the East are present in his music, but he presents a sumptuous orchestration combined with a languor of melody that suggests the eastern subjects more thoroughly to the occidental mind than a faithful reproduction of Hindu themes could do. The overture to "Sakuntala" once more showed this heavy, incense-laden vein, in the concert of Saturday. It received a good performance; what there was of caprice in the interpretation seemed not only permissible but commendable. The thematic treatment was clear, and the violas for once, sounded forth with their effective and sombre tone, without being obliterated by their rich relations, the first violins. The climaxes which are so well worked up by the composer, also lost nothing in the performance.

Almost as much can be said of the "Egmont" overture, which was given with great spirit, although its beginning was not free from exaggeration. The overture is of course, according to Goethe, and Motley's unflattering picture of the hero is widely departed from, but at least the voice of freedom is in the finale, and Beethoven, more than any other composer, was the bard of liberty. It was refreshing, in this part, to hear the piccolo, with its proper predominance; the phrase in the last measures (the final cadence) is one of the most characteristic piccolo touches ever written, yet in previous performances the snapping runs on this instrument have been curbed and repressed too much, while this time freedom shrieked (without any falling Kosciusko) to her heart's content.

Prof. Paine's spring symphony is as yet the best work in this form which America has produced. It is not so great a work as the composer's "Oedipus" (which I hold to be the high water mark of American music) but it is shapely, has well contrasted themes, is developed with musicianly skill, and displays more versatility than any native symphony. It was but just that our Boston orchestra should recognize American music in a work by its leading representative, yet I wish that another symphony by one of the best of the younger composers in Boston, Mr. Templeton Stroug, had not been forced to go to New York and to Mr. Seidl, for its first performance. The Spring Symphony has been much better played in this city than it was on this occasion; the Adagio was given with much expression, and here the cellos did some excellent work, and the swing of the Scherzo was also effective, but the nobility of the finale was thoroughly eliminated. In this finale there is a broad and massive theme like a hymn of thanksgiving, in splendid contrast with the bubbling joy of the other themes; the composer marked this "Meno Mosso, e Maestoso"; three times does this occur, and three times was it disregarded. What should have been majesty became mere bluster, and even the Allegro Gioioso became a wild Allegro Furioso.

Possibly the conductor, but newly accustomed to our climate, endeavored to adapt the Spring symphony to New England conditions, but I cannot believe that Prof. Paine had a Boston spring in mind when he evolved this tone picture, and in any case his marks of Tempo should have been respected without regard to the local thermometers.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

The Symphony Concert.

The programme of the twenty-second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, last evening, was: Overture, "Sakuntala," Goldmark; Symphony No. 2 in A, "In the Spring," J. K. Paine; Overture "Egmont," Beethoven. The "Sakuntala" overture was read with something too much of sickly sentimentality now and then, and something too much of blatant noisiness at other times; but it was brilliantly played and with much richness of tone color. Mr. Paine's fine symphony gave much delight in the rehearing, and would have given more if due attention had been paid to the composer's time indications and dynamic marks. As it was, the composer's ideas, according to the custom unhappily prevalent at these concerts, were persistently disregarded in favor of the conductor's ideas of what they ought to be. Not only this, but the tempi, especially of the lovely scherzo and of the finale, were taken so rapidly that there was a painful hurrying on the part of the players to bring out all the notes clearly. The work has been much more intelligently read and much better performed here than it was on this occasion. The "Egmont" overture was the best played work of the concert, but Beethoven was again submitted to Mr. Nikisch's improving process, which has about passed its vexatious stage and is becoming amusing. The programme for the next concert is: Symphony in F, D'Albert, (first time); Aria "Alessandro," Handel; Suite from the music to Shakespeare's Hamlet, Henschel, (first time); aria from "Herodias," Massenet; overture, "Oberon," Weber. Mrs. Georg Henschel is to be the soloist, and Mr. Henschel will conduct his suite.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Twenty-second Symphony Concert.

The programme of the 22d Symphony concert was listened to by the smallest audience of the season at the Music Hall on Saturday evening. It was as follows: Overture, "Sakuntala," Goldmark; "Spring" Symphony, No. 2, in A-major, John K. Paine; overture, "Egmont," Beethoven.

The remarkable feature of this concert is that for the first time in his engagement of three years Mr. Nikisch has presented a work of the most eminent American composer, and more than that, a resident composer and the professor of music at Harvard University—national and local reasons that the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra should have recognized at the very beginning of his engagement.

Prof. Paine's "Spring" Symphony, in its spontaneity, its wealth of ideas and its classic model of the highest form, resting entirely upon the most exalted plane of symphonic writing, throws down the gauntlet to any work of its class that has ever been composed.

Prof. Paine is a master in every form of musical composition, as well as in the art of modern orchestration, and this rare gift is displayed in this noble symphony in a superb degree. Prof. Paine's fine symphony, however, fell into poor hands when Mr. Nikisch undertook its interpretation, for a more coarse, careless and misconceived performance could hardly have been expected from the leader of an orchestra that formerly stood so highly as did our local organization. This symphony has been played here under the direction of Prof. Paine, Theodore Thomas, Carl Zerrahn and Mr. Bernard Listemann, and as the three conductors named played it in accordance with the composer's ideas and indications, we have had a good model presented of its worth and beauties. There has been much said in the public prints regarding Mr. Nikisch's ability to comprehend and interpret a composer, and he has been most severely arraigned for the vulgarities of his efforts with the classics.

There has been some doubt whether this misrepresentation of great composers is a matter of a coarse individuality or of ignorance. To such an extent has this reprehensible display been exhibited by Mr. Nikisch that, to quote the criticism of the eminent critic of the Saturday Evening Gazette, "it has passed its vexatious stage and is becoming amusing." When Mr. Nikisch first came here it was announced in an interview that he would pay particular attention to a liberal presentation of the works of native composers. Perhaps when he came to look at Prof. Paine's works and found that they were of magnificent proportions, and had been performed under the baton of that great conductor, Theodore Thomas, he may have felt some timidity in undertaking the task himself.

In producing this symphony he would have to expose his own ability as one capable of comprehending and interpreting an author or in displaying his inability to successfully do so.

Whatever his feelings may have been, the performance on Saturday evening left no doubt in the minds of his critical listeners, for the symphony was played regardless of the composer's indication, and its effect was ruined. The manner in which Mr. Nikisch galloped off the magnificent great theme of praise and thanksgiving in the last movement marked Meno mosso e maestoso, and which appears three times, should in my opinion be evidence enough to stamp the incapacity of a conductor. The intention of the composer is so evident and so plainly indicated that even the merest tyro of a conductor should comprehend the meaning. It matters little whether it be Nikischism or ignorance it is equally reprehensible.

The Goldmark overture and the Beethoven overture were both subjected to the coarse grinding of Nikisch's grist mill, and the public will have to wait for some other hand to set the gauge if the more refined brand is desirable. In the mean time the judicious grieve. Concerning this performance of Prof. Paine's symphony, Mr. Woolf of the Gazette says the "composer's ideas were persistently disregarded in favor of the conductor's ideas of what they ought to be." Mr. Hale of the Journal says "the symphony was read carelessly, almost recklessly; little attention was paid to the wishes of the composer. The tempi of Prof. Paine was not respected. Piano was mezzo forte and forte was fortissimo. The balance of the parts was so neglected that the effect was often wholly lost. Calm cantabile was fretted into spasmodic eruption. Ingenious and delicate figuration was roughly hurried over." Mr. Elson of the Advertiser says that "What should have been majesty became mere bluster, and even the allegro gioioso became allegro furioso." Unfortunate is the composer who trusts to such hands a revelation of his genius. When our minds turn back to the delicate, artistic, conscientious and at the same time viril interpretation under the baton of that superb conductor and musician, Wilhelm Gericke, we yearn for his reappearance, and shiver over our present experiences with his follower in office.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

Echoes from Last Night's Symphony Concert.

Summer Opera at the Tremont—Vocal and Instrumental Recitals.

Damrosch's Orchestra Harmonic—Happenings and Announcements.

There were no novelties on the programme of yesterday's symphony concert, but the familiar offerings, splendidly played by Mr. Nikisch's band, proved thoroughly welcome to the large assemblage. "The Mermaid," a ballade for orchestra, by Edmond de Mihalovich, was promised for a first performance, but a postponement was necessary.

The programme as given consisted of Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture, J. K. Paine's "In the Spring" symphony, and Beethoven's "Egmont" overture.

The expressive music, brilliant, weird and sentimental in swiftly changing moods which Goldmark has given his famous overture was most sympathetically read by Mr. Nikisch, and afforded exceeding pleasure to his audience.

The master work of one of the few really eminent American composers was naturally listened to with rapt attention by a gathering which is presumed to represent the musical intelligence of Boston. Mr. Paine is broad, dignified and scholarly in his writings; his style is graceful and free from affectation, his ideas are bright and original and clearly expressed; his treatment of a theme is always scholarly and follows the best of classic models; his command of orchestral resources is most uncommon, and refinement of taste ever characterizes the rich ornamentations which he gives his works.

The "Spring" symphony is truly a grand composition, and the oftener it is heard the greater becomes one's admiration for its beauties. It is distinctly programme music, and thoroughly effective is the instrumentation in presenting the composer's thoughts.

The orchestra's performance of the work was most enjoyable, even more satisfying than when last played here.

Beethoven's overture was played, as it has been in the past, under Mr. Nikisch's direction with superb effect.

The next public rehearsal of the Symphony orchestra will take place Thursday afternoon instead of Friday afternoon. The programme of that rehearsal and the concert of the following Saturday evening will be this: Symphony, F major, op. 4, D'Albert; suite, "Hamlet," Henschel; overture, "Oberon," Weber. Mrs. Georg Henschel will sing arias from Handel's "Alessandro" and Massenet's "Herodiade," Mr. Henschel will conduct his suite.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The twenty-second Symphony programme was well made up, but it represented in its performance that Sir Oracle determination of Mr. Nikisch to have the music he chooses given according to his fantasy and his obstinacy. It is a thousand pities that Mr. Higginson—whose noble initiative and sustaining power in the matter of these concerts cannot be too much commended or too well remembered—cannot make up his mind to replace his too bumptious conductor with a man who knows more and is consequently more reasonable. If an actor were to play Hamlet in top-boots and spurs, read "To Be or Not to Be" like a comedy soliloquy and slay Laertes with a navy revolver, the general sense would rebel and general indignation would put down such an "interpretation" instantly. Unfortunately, a large part of the Symphony audiences do not know what is right—they attend the concerts in the hope of learning—and another large part do not dare to protest. But the wrong Mr. Nikisch is allowed to do may become irreparable, unless at great cost of pains and labor, if he be not brought into subjection or dismissed. At this concert two overtures felt his reconstructive hand—Goldmark's "Sakuntala," which, being purely romantic, might permit some injection of fantastic personality, and Beethoven's "Egmont," to alter a bar or a tempo of which is evidence of ignorance or conceit and perhaps of both. Between these came Professor John K. Paine's long unheard "Spring" symphony, which is one of the illustrations which its author has given of the most serious and lofty talent for composition yet found in this country. It is often eloquent, constantly beautiful, full of fine original thought and expression, and yet always in consonance with the best classical theses of composition. That it did not always shine and sparkle, glow and warm, as it should, was the fault of the conductor, who, apparently because he could not find opportunities for erratic display—read much of it irregularly and without due respect or sympathy for the composer's evident intentions and clear indications.

The programme for tonight is a notable one. It begins with Schumann's first symphony, and it ends with the "Oberon" overture. The central number will be the suite from Mr. Henschel's incidental music to "Hamlet," which the composer will conduct—won't he get a reception, though!—and each side of this will be placed large airs from Handel's "Alessandro" and Massenet's "Herodiade," which Mrs. Henschel will sing.

CAUSERIE.

The Symphony Concert of Saturday Evening.

The programme of the twenty-second Symphony concert, given in Music Hall Saturday evening, was as follows:

Overture, "Sakuntala".....Goldmark
Symphony No. 2, A major, "In the Spring".....Paine
Overture, "Egmont".....Beethoven

This programme does not call for extended criticism, for the numbers are familiar. "The Mermaid," one of the orchestral ballades of Edmond de Mihalovich, was announced and rehearsed; the Beethoven overture was substituted for it, and the ballade of the Slavonic composer disappeared, as the boy Xury in Robinson Crusoe. The performance of the numbers of the programme was not wholly satisfactory; and here the conductor was chiefly in fault. His readings, especially in the matter of tempo, were at times injudicious, and at times contrary to the expressed intentions of the composers. In the Goldmark overture, for instance, the sensuous theme was treated sympathetically and with effect; but the opposing allegro was taken at such a pace that the notes were without apparent value; the players, particularly the workers in brass, suffered thereby; there was scrambling, there was raggedness.

Prof. Paine's "Island Fantasy" was played at a Symphony concert, under the direction of Mr. William Gericke, April 20, 1889. For nearly three years no one of his orchestral compositions has been heard at a Symphony concert in Music Hall. The tardy recognition of the just claims of a local composer, who is held in honor in this country and in Germany, was, unfortunately, incomplete. For the Spring symphony was read carelessly, almost recklessly. Little attention was paid to the wishes of the composer. The tempi of Prof. Paine were not respected. Pianissimo was mezzo forte; forte was fortissimo. The balance of the parts was so neglected that the effect was often wholly lost. Calm cantabile was fretted into spasmodic eruption. Ingenious and delicate figuration was roughly hurried over. Nor did Beethoven escape. Unwarrantable liberties were taken with the tempo, that there might be a greater effect.

In connection with the performance of last Saturday evening, it may be of advantage to consider the words of Ferdinand Hiller, who was, in his day, a conductor of no mean skill. "A conductor is a necessary evil. The more completely his individuality disappears from the sight of the audience the better it is. There is nothing worse than a conductor who usurps the place of the virtuoso and seeks to direct the attention of the public to his own personality, to his own performance. By their fruits ye shall know them." The conductor should hide behind the performance of his orchestra and find his chief reward in its excellence. Nor should he ever forget, nor should he ever wish it to be forgotten, that he himself serves a superior officer, the composer—even when it happens by chance that he himself is really the superior man.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

Saturday night's Symphony concert presented a programme of excellence, notwithstanding the fact that the numbers were all familiar ones, and rarely has the orchestra appeared to such advantage. Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture, John K. Paine's symphony, "In the Spring," consisting of five movements—the departure of winter, the awakening of nature, May night fantasy, a romance of springtime, and the glory of nature—with Beethoven's "Egmont" overture, served to make this concert one of the most enjoyable of the course. The absence of a soloist was a most refreshing change, as the opportunities for hearing the orchestra in a programme specially adapted to bring out its best points have been rare. The best number, if there could be a choice in a performance of such uniform merit, was the symphony, "In the Spring." It is a grand work and calls for brilliancy of orchestration, for unusually fine gradations of tone and precision in the solo instruments.

Next week's public rehearsal will take place Thursday afternoon, instead of Friday, and the programme for both Thursday afternoon and evening will consist of D'Albert's symphony in F major, Op. 4, first time in America; Handel's aria, "Alessandro"; Henschel's suite from the music to Shakspeare's "Hamlet," written for Beerbohm Tree; Massenet's aria from "Herodiade"; Weber's overture, "Oberon." The music of "Hamlet" will receive its first American production on this occasion and will be conducted by the composer. Mrs. Henschel will be the soloist.

APRIL 10, 1892

MUSICAL MATTERS.

A Notable Array of Attractions for the Coming Week.

The Symphony Concert—New York's Orchestra to Be Heard Here Again—The Oratorios of the Handel and Haydn—D'Albert's Recitals—News Notes, Gossip, Comment.

The programme performed last evening in Music Hall at the 22d of the present season's concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra had nothing of novelty, but was made interesting by the generally excellent way in which the familiar selections were played under Mr. Nikisch's direction.

The "Sakuntala" overture began the programme, and this wonderfully clever bit of tone coloring was given with splendid effect throughout, the orchestra showing the skilful direction of its leader in all the masterly combinations with which the composer has treated its tuneful themes.

Prof. John K. Paine's "Spring" symphony followed, and the reading given this scholarly work revealed all its beauties to the best advantage. The graceful "scherzo" was given with a dainty airiness that was

of that superb conductor and musician, Wilhelm Gericke, we yearn for his reappearance, and shiver over our present experiences with his follower in office.
WARREN DAVENPORT.

Echoes from Last Night's Symphony Concert.

Summer Opera at the Tremont—Vocal and Instrumental Recitals.

Damrosch's Orchestra Harmonic—Happenings and Announcements.

There were no novelties on the programme of yesterday's symphony concert, but the familiar offerings, splendidly played by Mr. Nikisch's band, proved thoroughly welcome to the large assemblage. "The Mermaid," a ballade for orchestra, by Edmond de Mihalovich, was promised for a first performance, but a postponement was necessary.

The programme as given consisted of Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture, J. K. Paine's "In the Spring" symphony, and Beethoven's "Egmont" overture.

The expressive music, brilliant, weird and sentimental in swiftly changing moods which Goldmark has given his famous overture was most sympathetically read by Mr. Nikisch, and afforded exceeding pleasure to his audience.

The master work of one of the few really eminent American composers was naturally listened to with rapt attention by a gathering which is presumed to represent the musical intelligence of Boston. Mr. Paine is broad, dignified and scholarly in his writings; his style is graceful and free from affectation, his ideas are bright and original and clearly expressed; his treatment of a theme is always scholarly and follows the best of classic models; his command of orchestral resources is most uncommon, and refinement of taste ever characterizes the rich ornamentations which he gives his works.

The "Spring" symphony is truly a grand composition, and the oftener it is heard the greater becomes one's admiration for its beauties. It is distinctly programme music, and thoroughly effective is the instrumentation in presenting the composer's thoughts.

The orchestra's performance of the work was most enjoyable, even more satisfying than when last played here.

Beethoven's overture was played, as it has been in the past, under Mr. Nikisch's direction with superb effect.

The next public rehearsal of the Symphony orchestra will take place Thursday afternoon instead of Friday afternoon. The programme of that rehearsal and the concert of the following Saturday evening will be this: Symphony, F major, op. 4, D'Albert; suite, "Hamlet," Henschel; overture, "Oberon," Weber. Mrs. Georg Henschel will sing arias from Handel's "Alessandro" and Massenet's "Herodiade." Mr. Henschel will conduct his suite.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The twenty-second Symphony programme was well made up, but it represented in its performance that Sir Oracle determination of Mr. Nikisch to have the music he chooses given according to his fantasy and his obstinacy. It is a thousand pities that Mr. Higginson—whose noble initiative and sustaining power in the matter of these concerts cannot be too much commended or too well remembered—cannot make up his mind to replace his too bumptious conductor with a man who knows more and is consequently more reasonable. If an actor were to play Hamlet in top-boots and spurs, read "To Be or Not to Be" like a comedy soliloquy and slay Laertes with a navy revolver, the general sense would rebel and general indignation would put down such an "interpretation" instantly. Unfortunately, a large part of the Symphony audiences do not know what is right—they attend the concerts in the hope of learning—and another large part do not dare to protest. But the wrong Mr. Nikisch is allowed to do may become irreparable, unless at great cost of pains and labor, if he be not brought into subjection or dismissed. At this concert two overtures felt his reconstructive hand—Goldmark's "Sakuntala," which, being purely romantic, might permit some injection of fantastic personality, and Beethoven's "Egmont," to alter a bar or a tempo of which is evidence of ignorance or conceit and perhaps of both. Between these came Professor John K. Paine's long unheard "Spring" symphony, which is one of the illustrations which its author has given of the most serious and lofty talent for composition yet found in this country. It is often eloquent, constantly beautiful, full of fine original thought and expression, and yet always in consonance with the best classical theses of composition. That it did not always shine and sparkle, glow and warm, as it should, was the fault of the conductor, who, apparently because he could not find opportunities for erratic display—read much of it irregularly and without due respect or sympathy for the composer's evident intentions and clear indications.

The programme for tonight is a notable one. It begins with Schumann's first symphony, and it ends with the "Oberon" overture. The central number will be the suite from Mr. Henschel's incidental music to "Hamlet," which the composer will conduct—won't he get a reception, though!—and each side of this will be placed large arias from Handel's "Alessandro" and Massenet's "Herodiade," which Mrs. Henschel will sing.

CAUSERIE.

The Symphony Concert of Saturday Evening.

The programme of the twenty-second Symphony concert, given in Music Hall Saturday evening, was as follows:

Overture, "Sakuntala" Goldmark
Symphony No. 2, A major, "In the Spring" Paine
Overture, "Egmont" Beethoven

This programme does not call for extended criticism, for the numbers are familiar. "The Mermaid," one of the orchestral ballades of Edmond de Mihalovich, was announced and rehearsed; the Beethoven overture was substituted for it, and the ballade of the Slavonic composer disappeared, as the boy Xury in Robinson Crusoe. The performance of the numbers of the programme was not wholly satisfactory; and here the conductor was chiefly in fault. His readings, especially in the matter of tempo, were at times injudicious, and at times contrary to the expressed intentions of the composers. In the Goldmark overture, for instance, the sensuous theme was treated sympathetically and with effect; but the opposing allegro was taken at such a pace that the notes were without apparent value; the players, particularly the workers in brass, suffered thereby; there was scrambling, there was raggedness.

Prof. Paine's "Island Fantasy" was played at a Symphony concert, under the direction of Mr. William Gericke, April 20, 1889. For nearly three years no one of his orchestral compositions has been heard at a Symphony concert in Music Hall. The tardy recognition of the just claims of a local composer, who is held in honor in this country and in Germany, was, unfortunately, incomplete. For the Spring symphony was read carelessly, almost recklessly. Little attention was paid to the wishes of the composer. The tempi of Prof. Paine were not respected. Pianissimo was mezzo forte; forte was fortissimo. The balance of the parts was so neglected that the effect was often wholly lost. Calm cantabile was fretted into spasmodic eruption. Ingenious and delicate figuration was roughly hurried over. Nor did Beethoven escape. Unwarrantable liberties were taken with the tempo, that there might be a greater effect.

In connection with the performance of last Saturday evening, it may be of advantage to consider the words of Ferdinand Hiller who was, in his day, a conductor of no mean skill. "A conductor is a necessary evil. The more completely his individuality disappears from the sight of the audience the better it is. There is nothing worse than a conductor who usurps the place of the virtuoso and seeks to direct the attention of the public to his own personality, to his own performance. By their fruits ye shall know them." The conductor should hide behind the performance of his orchestra and find his chief reward in its excellence. Nor should he ever forget, nor should he ever wish it to be forgotten, that he himself serves a superior officer, the composer—even when it happens by chance that he himself is really the superior man."

MUSICAL MATTERS.

Saturday night's Symphony concert presented a programme of excellence, notwithstanding the fact that the numbers were all familiar ones, and rarely has the orchestra appeared to such advantage. Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture, John K. Paine's symphony, "In the Spring," consisting of five movements—the departure of winter, the awakening of nature, May night fantasy, a romance of springtime, and the glory of nature—with Beethoven's "Egmont" overture, served to make this concert one of the most enjoyable of the course. The absence of a soloist was a most refreshing change, as the opportunities for hearing the orchestra in a programme specially adapted to bring out its best points have been rare. The best number, if there could be a choice in a performance of such uniform merit, was the symphony, "In the Spring." It is a grand work and calls for brilliancy of orchestration, for unusually fine gradations of tone and precision in the solo instruments.

Next week's public rehearsal will take place Thursday afternoon, instead of Friday, and the programme for both Thursday afternoon and evening will consist of D'Albert's symphony in F major, Op. 4, first time in America; Handel's aria, "Alessandro"; Henschel's suite from the music to Shakspeare's "Hamlet," written for Beerbohm Tree; Massenet's aria from "Herodiade"; Weber's overture, "Oberon." The music of "Hamlet" will receive its first American production on this occasion and will be conducted by the composer. Mrs. Henschel will be the soloist.

APRIL 10, 1892 ---

MUSICAL MATTERS.

A Notable Array of Attractions for the Coming Week.

The Symphony Concert—New York's Orchestra to Be Heard Here Again—The Oratorios of the Handel and Haydn—D'Albert's Recitals—News Notes, Gossip, Comment.

The programme performed last evening in Music Hall at the 22d of the present season's concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra had nothing of novelty, but was made interesting by the generally excellent way in which the familiar selections were played under Mr. Nikisch's direction.

The "Sakuntala" overture began the programme, and this wonderfully clever bit of tone coloring was given with splendid effect throughout, the orchestra showing the skilful direction of its leader in all the masterly combinations with which the composer has treated its tuneful themes.

Prof. John K. Paine's "Spring" symphony followed, and the reading given this scholarly work revealed all its beauties to the best advantage. The graceful "scherzo" was given with a dainty airiness that was quite charming, and the noble theme of the final movement was brought out with grand effect. All in all, the symphony has never had a better performance than that given it on this occasion.

A satisfying interpretation of the familiar "Egmont" overture ended the programme, and left a very pleasant impression of the evening's concert.

Next Saturday evening Mr. and Mrs. Henschel appear, the former taking his old place at the conductor's desk to direct the first American performance of a suite from his "Hamlet" music, and the latter contributing arias from "Alessandro" and "Herodiade."

The public rehearsal, it should be noted, will be given on Thursday, instead of Friday afternoon, the coming week.

THE SYMPHONIES.

TWENTY-SECOND CONCERT.

The twenty-second Symphony concert was given in Music hall Saturday evening, April 9. This was the programme:

Goldmark. Overture. "Sakuntala."
J. K. Paine. Symphony No. 2, in A major. "In the Spring."

1. Introduction. Adagio sostenuto.
The Departure of Winter.
Allegro ma non troppo. The Awakening of Nature.

2. Scherzo. Allegro. May Night Fantasy.

3. Adagio. A Romance of Springtime.

4. Allegro gioioso. The Glory of Nature.

Beethoven. Overture. "Egmont."

The overture is a remarkably fine one, and is by one of the very best of modern composers. It is happily conceived, ingeniously worked out, richly orchestrated and quite fascinating. As it is music after Mr. Nikisch's own heart, it was faultlessly performed.

The symphony, a noble, manly composition, would be so considered in any country; and emanating from an American it should receive the warmest commendation and praise from our people which it is possible to bestow. It is not a fascinating piece; is not interesting as music, to the musical world at large, but to the musically educated and refined, it shines out with glowing colors, resplendent with beauties of the art divine. All credit and praise is due the composer, Mr. J. K. Paine. It received good treatment at the hands of Mr. Nikisch. More regard for American composers would have a tendency to encourage those who are now lost in oblivion for the want of patronage and kindly sympathy.

The Beethoven overture was remarkably well played.

JAMES M. TRACY.

THE SYMPHONY. Continued

Goldmark's now familiar overture to "Sakuntala" was the first number on the programme of the twenty-second symphony rehearsal and concert. The tale of Hindu mythology concerning this beautiful maiden, certain phases of whose life are portrayed in Goldmark's music, is well known, and nothing more need be said except that the performance was fine, both technically and dramatically considered. It was a pleasure to hear Professor John K. Paine's "Spring" symphony once more and an added pleasure to discover that this admirable work, written and first performed in 1880, still holds its own as one of the strongest orchestral compositions that have yet come from the hand of an American composer. There can be no doubt about its sterling worth. That Professor Paine could have adhered so closely to the classic symphonic form, and yet have produced a work so full of buoyancy and melody, so picturesque in treatment, without its pages being subject to the charge of freely suggesting those of its models, is proof sufficient of the nature of his musical ability. It is true that there are moments when his inspiration seems to have failed him, when his presentation of his ideas seems a trifle pedantic and diffuse. One feels this at times in the development of the first allegro, in the treatment of the broad and beautiful theme of the adagio, and even in the finale, in spite of its strength and fire and triumphant ending. On the other hand its almost restless activity, relieved by reposeful passages, charming in thought and execution, and the spirit of unity which pervades the entire work easily command attention, and preserve one's interest throughout. The smooth, expressive and brilliant performance, and the fidelity with which Mr. Nikisch adhered to the spirit and letter of the score, gave evidence of careful preparation. Each movement was heartily appreciated, and the close of the symphony was followed by prolonged applause. Another overture made the third and concluding number, Beethoven's "Egmont." The withdrawal of a ballade for orchestra, "The Mermaid," by Edmond de Mihalovich, which was at first announced for this concert, caused disappointment. Mihalovich is, if we mistake not, a Bohemian. He is not a young composer, yet he is, comparatively speaking, unknown. He has written many works which seem to have shared the same fate that has overtaken those of—well, of Bruckner, for instance. They have been published, have excited great interest among musicians, have been performed under distinguished auspices, and then have been practically dropped. It is to be hoped that the one announced may be given before the season closes.

MUSICAL. Continued

The Symphony Concert.

The programme of the twenty-second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, last evening, was: Overture, "Sakuntala," Goldmark; Symphony No. 2 in A, "In the Spring," J. K. Paine; Overture "Egmont," Beethoven. The "Sakuntala" overture was read with something too much of sickly sentimentality now and then, and something too much of blatant noisiness at other times; but it was brilliantly played and with much richness of tone color. Mr. Paine's fine symphony gave much delight in the rehearsing, and would have given more if due attention had been paid to the composer's time indications and dynamic marks. As it was, the composer's ideas, according to the custom unhappily prevalent at these concerts, were persistently disregarded in favor of the conductor's ideas of what they ought to be. Not only this, but the tempo, especially of the lovely scherzo and of the finale, were taken so rapidly that there was a painful hurrying on the part of the players to bring out all the notes clearly. The work has been much more intelligently read and much better performed here than it was on this occasion. The "Egmont" overture was the best played work of the concert, but Beethoven was again submitted to Mr. Nikisch's improving process, which has about passed its vexatious stage and is becoming amusing. The programme for the next concert is: Symphony in F, D'Albert, (first time); Aria "Alessandro," Handel; Suite from the music to Shakespeare's Hamlet, Henschel, (first time); aria from "Herodiade," Massenet; overture, "Oberon," Weber. Mrs. George Henschel is to be the soloist, and Mr. Henschel will conduct his suite.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the twenty-second concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Goldmark: Overture to "Sakuntala."
Paine: Symphony No. 2, in A major, "In the Spring."
Beethoven: Overture to "Egmont."

Once more a symphony concert without a solo; for which much thanks! Goldmark's "Sakuntala" is not precisely a novelty—indeed, we believe it was given no less than six times the first season it was brought out here, by the Harvard Musical Association, under Mr. Zerrahn—neither is it the strongest work in the world. We remember being lately in a company of musicians who all agreed that the "Sakuntala" marked about the lowest point attainable by a composition that one would care to listen to more than once. Still, it is not disagreeable in thematic material, and is really gorgeous in orchestration. We have often thought that a tolerably high pitch of human well-being might be reached by listening to this overture, while looking at the old "Black Crook" prismatic fountain, and thinking of nothing at all. Its oriental sensuousness would set off that shifting play of bright color to fine advantage. But at a concert, with nothing more poetic than a lot of electric lights staring you out of countenance, you do begin to tire of it especially after having heard it numberless times. Yet it was made interesting, and even exciting last Saturday evening by the incomparably superb way the orchestra played it under Mr. Nikisch. He takes it very differently from Mr. Gericke; and we are fully persuaded that Mr. Gericke, as an old and intimate friend of Goldmark's, took it just the way the composer intended it to go. But this does not trouble us in the least; it is a work of no earthly importance, and it sounds for better as Mr. Nikisch takes it. There is no question of right or wrong in the matter. We enjoyed it to the top of our bent.

Mr. Paine's "Spring" symphony has not been heard here in some years. It is eminently characteristic of the composer's second manner, the individual style he developed after his earlier pianoforte and organ works, and his "Mass in D." Indeed, Mr. Paine seems to stand almost alone among American composers, in that he distinctly has an absolutely individual style and accent of his own; no doubt, there are in this symphony certain things which recall devices employed by other composers before him. For instance, those four half-notes (E, D, B, D) that become eight quarter notes, then sixteen eighth notes, and at last thirty-two twittering sixteenth notes, at the beginning of the first Allegro ma non troppo, smack strongly of Beethoven. But this is only a device, a trick of rhythm, of which Beethoven may have been fond, but for which no composer could take out a copyright. Mr. Paine's themes, their melodic character, and often their rhythm, are essentially his own, and very seldom recall any other composer; you are free to like them or not, as the case may be, but their thoroughly personal and individual cut is indisputable. There is much genial beauty in this symphony, much that is strong and forcible, side by side with a good deal that seems obscure and rather far-fetched. The Scherzo, with its lovely Trio, seems to us the most wholly fine of the four movements; but there is great beauty, too, in the first movement, and the opening theme of the Finale is delightful. The grandiose second theme of this Finale we like less, although it would be hard to say exactly what in it fails to satisfy us. The symphony was admirably played and loudly applauded.

Beethoven's "Egmont" overture was grandly given, although we cannot like the very moderate tempo, especially the over-moderate beginning, of the Coda. Look at the matter in what light we may, we cannot but feel that a Beethoven Allegro con brio, at the close of a brilliant overture, ought to go with more headlong impetuosity. And then, that beginning the climax slow, and gradually increasing the speed as it goes on, it is utterly needless; we want to feel the kettle boiling from the first three beats. No doubt it may be claimed that Mr. Nikisch's tempo gives more dignity to this glowing peroration; but Beethoven had that of the ancient Greek in him that he was, at times, willing to throw dignity to the dogs, as in the last Prestissimo of the Ninth Symphony, which is sheer tossing up of caps and shouting; and it seems to us that this Coda of the "Egmont" overture is one of those times. We are sorry to differ with Mr. Nikisch so often on this matter of "reading;" there are even moments when we heartily wish that Wagner had never written that infernal pamphlet "Ueber das Dirigiren," much good as there is in it, too.

The next programme is: D'Albert, symphony in F major, op. 4; Handel, aria from "Alessandro;" Henschel, suite from the music to Shakespeare's "Hamlet" (conducted by the composer); Massenet, aria from "Herodiade;" Weber, overture to "Oberon." Mrs. George Henschel will be the singer.

quite charming, and the noble theme of the final movement was brought out with grand effect. All in all, the symphony has never had a better performance than that given it on this occasion.

A satisfying interpretation of the familiar "Egmont" overture ended the programme, and left a very pleasant impression of the evening's concert.

Next Saturday evening Mr. and Mrs. Henschel appear, the former taking his old place at the conductor's desk to direct the first American performance of a suite from his "Hamlet" music, and the latter contributing arias from "Alessandro" and "Herodiade."

The public rehearsal, it should be noted, will be given on Thursday, instead of Friday afternoon, the coming week.

THE SYMPHONIES.

TWENTY-SECOND CONCERT.

The twenty-second Symphony concert was given in Music hall Saturday evening, April 9. This was the programme:

Goldmark. Overture. "Sakuntala."
J. K. Paine. Symphony No. 2, in A major. "In the Spring."

1. Introduction. Adagio sostenuto. The Departure of Winter. Allegro ma non troppo. The Awakening of Nature.
 2. Scherzo. Allegro. May Night Fantasy.
 3. Adagio. A Romance of Spring-time.
 4. Allegro gioioso. The Glory of Nature.
- Beethoven. Overture. "Egmont."

The overture is a remarkably fine one, and is by one of the very best of modern composers. It is happily conceived, ingeniously worked out, richly orchestrated and quite fascinating. As it is music after Mr. Nikisch's own heart, it was faultlessly performed.

The symphony, a noble, manly composition, would be so considered in any country; and emanating from an American it should receive the warmest commendation and praise from our people which it is possible to bestow. It is not a fascinating piece; is not interesting as music, to the musical world at large, but to the musically educated and refined, it shines out with glowing colors, resplendent with beauties of the art divine. All credit and praise is due the composer, Mr. J. K. Paine. It received good treatment at the hands of Mr. Nikisch. More regard for American composers would have a tendency to encourage those who are now lost in oblivion for the want of patronage and kindly sympathy.

The Beethoven overture was remarkably well played.

JAMES M. TRACY.

THE SYMPHONY. Continued

Goldmark's now familiar overture to "Sakuntala" was the first number on the programme of the twenty-second symphony rehearsal and concert. The tale of Hindu mythology concerning this beautiful maiden, certain phases of whose life are portrayed in Goldmark's music, is well known, and nothing more need be said except that the performance was fine, both technically and dramatically considered. It was a pleasure to hear Professor John K. Paine's "Spring" symphony once more and an added pleasure to discover that this admirable work, written and first performed in 1880, still holds its own as one of the strongest orchestral compositions that have yet come from the hand of an American composer. There can be no doubt about its sterling worth. That Professor Paine could have adhered so closely to the classic symphonic form, and yet have produced a work so full of buoyancy and melody, so picturesque in treatment, without its pages being subject to the charge of freely suggesting those of its models, is proof sufficient of the nature of his musical ability. It is true that there are moments when his inspiration seems to have failed him, when his presentation of his ideas seems a trifle pedantic and diffuse. One feels this at times in the development of the first allegro, in the treatment of the broad and beautiful theme of the adagio, and even in the finale, in spite of its strength and fire and triumphant ending. On the other hand its almost restless activity, relieved by reposeful passages, charming in thought and execution, and the spirit of unity which pervades the entire work easily command attention, and preserve one's interest throughout. The smooth, expressive and brilliant performance, and the fidelity with which Mr. Nikisch adhered to the spirit and letter of the score, gave evidence of careful preparation. Each movement was heartily appreciated, and the close of the symphony was followed by prolonged applause. Another overture made the third and concluding number, Beethoven's "Egmont." The withdrawal of a ballade for orchestra, "The Mermaid," by Edmond de Mihalovich, which was at first announced for this concert, caused disappointment. Mihalovich is, if we mistake not, a Bohemian. He is not a young composer, yet he is, comparatively speaking, unknown. He has written many works which seem to have shared the same fate that has overtaken those of—well, of Bruckner, for instance. They have been published, have excited great interest among musicians, have been performed under distinguished auspices, and then have been practically dropped. It is to be hoped that the one announced may be given before the season closes.

MUSICAL. Continued

The Symphony Concert.

The programme of the twenty-second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, last evening, was: Overture, "Sakuntala," Goldmark; Symphony No. 2 in A, "In the Spring," J. K. Paine; Overture "Egmont," Beethoven. The "Sakuntala" overture was read with something too much of sickly sentimentality now and then, and something too much of blatant noisiness at other times; but it was brilliantly played and with much richness of tone color. Mr. Paine's fine symphony gave much delight in the rehearsing, and would have given more if due attention had been paid to the composer's time indications and dynamic marks. As it was, the composer's ideas, according to the custom unhappily prevalent at these concerts, were persistently disregarded in favor of the conductor's ideas of what they ought to be. Not only this, but the tempo, especially of the lovely scherzo and of the finale, were taken so rapidly that there was a painful hurry-scurry on the part of the players to bring out all the notes clearly. The work has been much more intelligently read and much better performed here than it was on this occasion. The "Egmont" overture was the best played work of the concert, but Beethoven was again submitted to Mr. Nikisch's improving process, which has about passed its vexatious stage and is becoming amusing. The programme for the next concert is: Symphony in F, D'Albert, (first time); Aria "Alessandro," Handel; Suite from the music to Shakespeare's "Hamlet," Henschel, (first time); aria from "Herodiade," Massenet; overture, "Oberon," Weber. Mrs. Georg Henschel is to be the soloist, and Mr. Henschel will conduct his suite.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the twenty-second concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Goldmark: Overture to "Sakuntala."
Paine: Symphony No. 2, in A major, "In the Spring."
Beethoven: Overture to "Egmont."

Once more a symphony concert without a solo; for which much thanks! Goldmark's "Sakuntala" is not precisely a novelty—indeed, we believe it was given no less than six times the first season it was brought out here, by the Harvard Musical Association, under Mr. Zerrahn—neither is it the strongest work in the world. We remember being lately in a company of musicians who all agreed that the "Sakuntala" marked about the lowest point attainable by a composition that one would care to listen to more than once. Still, it is not disagreeable in thematic material, and is really gorgeous in orchestration. We have often thought that a tolerably high pitch of human well-being might be reached by listening to this overture, while looking at the old "Black Crook" prismatic fountain, and thinking of nothing at all. Its oriental sensuousness would set off that shifting play of bright color to fine advantage. But at a concert, with nothing more poetic than a lot of electric lights staring you out of countenance, you do begin to tire of it especially after having heard it numberless times. Yet it was made interesting, and even exciting last Saturday evening by the incomparably superb way the orchestra played it under Mr. Nikisch. He takes it very differently from Mr. Gericke; and we are fully persuaded that Mr. Gericke, as an old and intimate friend of Goldmark's, took it just the way the composer intended it to go. But this does not trouble us in the least; it is a work of no earthly importance, and it sounds for better as Mr. Nikisch takes it. There is no question of right or wrong in the matter. We enjoyed it to the top of our bent.

Mr. Paine's "Spring" symphony has not been heard here in some years. It is eminently characteristic of the composer's second manner, the individual style he developed after his earlier pianoforte and organ works, and his "Mass in D." Indeed, Mr. Paine seems to stand almost alone among American composers, in that he distinctly has an absolutely individual style and accent of his own; no doubt, there are in this symphony certain things which recall devices employed by other composers before him. For instance, those four half-notes (E, D, B, D) that become eight quarter notes, then sixteen eighth notes, and at last thirty-two twittering sixteenth notes, at the beginning of the first Allegro ma non troppo, smack strongly of Beethoven. But this is only a device, a trick of rhythm, of which Beethoven may have been fond, but for which no composer could take out a copyright. Mr. Paine's themes, their melodic character, and often their rhythm, are essentially his own, and very seldom recall any other composer; you are free to like them or not, as the case may be, but their thoroughly personal and individual cut is indisputable. There is much genial beauty in this symphony, much that is strong and forcible, side by side with a good deal that seems obscure and rather far-fetched. The Scherzo, with its lovely Trio, seems to us the most wholly fine of the four movements; but there is great beauty, too, in the first movement, and the opening theme of the Finale is delightful. The grandiose second theme of this Finale we like less, although it would be hard to say exactly what in it fails to satisfy us. The symphony was admirably played and loudly applauded.

Beethoven's "Egmont" overture was grandly given, although we cannot like the very moderate tempo, especially the over-moderate beginning, of the Coda. Look at the matter in what light we may, we cannot but feel that a Beethoven Allegro con brio, at the close of a brilliant overture, ought to go with more headlong impetuosity. And then, that beginning the climax slow, and gradually increasing the speed as it goes on, it is utterly needless; we want to feel the kettle boiling from the first three beats. No doubt it may be claimed that Mr. Nikisch's tempo gives more dignity to this glowing peroration; but Beethoven had that of the ancient Greek in him that he was, at times, willing to throw dignity to the dogs, as in the last Prestissimo of the Ninth Symphony, which is sheer tossing up of caps and shouting; and it seems to us that this Coda of the "Egmont" overture is one of those times. We are sorry to differ with Mr. Nikisch so often on this matter of "reading;" there are even moments when we heartily wish that Wagner had never written that infernal pamphlet "Ueber das Dirigiren," much good as there is in it, too.

The next programme is: D'Albert, symphony in F major, op. 4; Handel, aria from "Alessandro;" Henschel, suite from the music to Shakespeare's "Hamlet" (conducted by the composer); Massenet, aria from "Herodiade;" Weber, overture to "Oberon." Mrs. George Henschel will be the singer.

Mrs & Mr Georg Henschel

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1891-92.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

XXIII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, APRIL 16, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

SCHUMANN.

SYMPHONY No. 1, in B flat, op. 38.

Andante un poco maestoso.—Allegro molto vivace.—
Larghetto.—Scherzo, molto vivace with Trio I. & Trio II.
Allegro animato e grazioso.

HANDEL.

ARIA. "Alessandro."

HENSCHEL.

SUITE from the MUSIC to SHAKESPEARE'S
"HAMLET," op. 50.

- a) Prelude. (Hamlet.)
- b) Prelude to Act II. (Ophelia.)
- c) Interlude. (Act III.) and Pastorale, (Act V.)
- d) Prelude to Act IV, (Ophelia's death.)

There is a willow grows aslant a brook,
That shows his hoar leaves in the glassy stream;
There with fantastic garlands did she come
Of crow-flowers, nettles, daisies, and long purples,
There, on the pendant bows her coronet weeds
Clambering to hang, an envious sliver broke,
When down her weedy trophies and herself
Fell in the weeping brook, Her clothes spread wide
And, mermaid-like, awhile they bore her up;
Which time she chanted snatches of old tunes,
As one incapable of her own distress,
Or like a creature native and indued
Unto that element; but long it could not be
Till that her garments, heavy with their drink,
Pull'd the poor wretch from her melodious lay
To muddy death.

e) Danish March.

(First performance in America. Conducted by the Composer.)

MASSENET.

ARIA from "HERODIADE."

WEBER.

OVERTURE. "Oberon."

SOLOIST:

MRS. GEORG HENSCHEL.

The performance of the D'ALBERT SYMPHONY announced for this Concert, is unavoidably postponed, on account of the non-arrival of the Orchestral parts from Europe.

Mrs. & Mr. Georg Henschel

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1891-92.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

XXIII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, APRIL 16, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

SCHUMANN.

SYMPHONY No. 1, in B flat, op. 38.

Andante un poco maestoso.—Allegro molto vivace —
Larghetto.—Scherzo, molto vivace with Trio I. & Trio II.
Allegro animato e grazioso.

HANDEL.

ARIA. "Alessandro."

HENSCHEL.

SUITE from the MUSIC to SHAKESPEARE'S
"HAMLET," op. 50.

- a) Prelude. (Hamlet.)
- b) Prelude to Act II. (Ophelia.)
- c) Interlude. (Act III.) and Pastorale, (Act V.)
- d) Prelude to Act IV. (Ophelia's death.)

There is a willow grows aslant a brook,
That shows his hoar leaves in the glassy stream;
There with fantastic garlands did she come
Of crow-flowers, nettles, daisies, and long purples,
There, on the pendant bows her coronet weeds
Clambering to hang, an envious sliver broke,
When down her weedy trophies and herself
Fell in the weeping brook, Her clothes spread wide
And, mermaid-like, awhile they bore her up;
Which time she charmed snatches of old tunes
As one incapable of her own distress,
Or like a creature native and indued
Unto that element; but long it could not be
Till that her garments, heavy with their drink
Pull'd the poor wretch from her melodious lay
To muddy death.

e) Danish March.

(First performance in America. Conducted by the Composer.)

MASSENET.

ARIA from "HERODIADE."

WEBER.

OVERTURE. "Oberon."

SOLOIST:

MRS. GEORG HENSCHEL.

The performance of the D'ALBERT SYMPHONY announced for this Concert, is unavoidably postponed, on account of the non-arrival of the Orchestral parts from Europe.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

In considering Mr. Henschel's "Hamlet" suite, which had the central place on the twenty-third Symphony programme, the fact should be kept in mind that this music was written for a theatre and should not be subjected to as exigent examination as if it had been composed independently and for the concert-room. Not only is the best theatre band less in numbers and effect to a full concert orchestra, but the time assigned to its share in a composite performance is necessarily limited in conformity to the prime requirements of the stage. If the composer of music for a spectacle or a standard drama outlines moods and suggests characters which are ultimately to be shown in words and acts, or accompanies them allusively, he has done his duty; if his music will bear translation to an entirely different locale and environment, he has succeeded in doing more than this. Nobody, we are sure, would be more prompt than Mr. Henschel to say this "Hamlet" music, prepared under commission to introduce and accompany certain parts of the play, is just what he would have made it if he had set out de proprio motu and under inspiration, as one might say, to create a suite or fantasy after Shakespeare. That it maintains itself so well, indicates so clearly those elements of the tragedy with which it is to be connected, and is wrought out in such excellent and musicianly ways, is in itself high praise and honor. To ask from it the fulness of a free composition and the expansion of unrestricted time, is unreasonable. All the same, we should like to hear it as it was meant to be heard, with the influences of speech and action blent into its own, before judging it absolutely. But if it be not inspired, it is certainly well moulded upon substantial and sensible subjects, and the chief exception that criticism can find with it is its brevity of development, its occasional slight weakness of assertion, and its narrow range of effect in scoring. The suite includes a general introduction of variable character, preparatory to the presentation of the fluctuant Prince of Denmark; a softer and sweeter prelude to the second act, intended to be typical of Ophelia, although we thought it somewhat sombre and dense for this; an interlude, relative to the first prelude, preceding the third act; an elegiac introduction to the fourth act, significant of Ophelia's fate, and a pastoral episode following it, indicative of the calm, rural nature of the churchyard, together with a Danish march for some professional purposes. The music is honest and interesting, and ought to be of unusual value in its place, besides showing the knowledge and care of the wise student of orchestral scores. The other instrumental numbers were the "Oberon" overture, in a generally commendable reading, and Schumann's first symphony, some parts of which were admirably done, while others were harsh, hard and almost pugnaciously assertive of the conductor's personal notions. [It may be noted in passing that this symphony was given because the parts for Mr. D'Albert's, which had been promised, did not arrive in time, and that Mr. Henschel conducted his suite and had nothing less than an ovation from the audience.] Mrs. Henschel sang airs from Handel's "Alessandro" and Massenet's "Herodiade" in her delightful style, but of course with too little power for the hall.

The season will end tonight with Haydn's G-minor and Brahms's first symphonies, with a Paganini violin concerto for Mr. Kneisel sandwiched between them.

THE SYMPHONIES.

TWENTY-THIRD CONCERT.

The twenty-third concert by the Symphony orchestra was given in Music hall Saturday, April 16. The programme:

Schumann. Symphony No. 1, in B flat, op. 38. Andante un poco maestoso.—Allegro molto vivace.—Larghetto.—Scherzo, molto vivace with Trio I. & Trio II.—Allegro animato e grazioso.
Handel. Aria, "Alessandro."
Henschel. Suite from the Music to Shakespeare's "Hamlet," op. 50. (First performance in America. Conducted by the Composer.)
Massenet. Aria from "Herodiade."
Weber. Overture, "Oberon."
Soloist: Mrs. Georg Henschel.

The Schumann Spring symphony is, perhaps, the most melodiously beautiful of all this celebrated author's compositions. We are told it was written at that happy period of his life, on the eve of his marriage with that remarkable woman and renowned pianist, Clara Wiek. He had met with great opposition from the stern old father, because he looked upon Schumann as a nobody who had never done anything, and, in his opinion, never would. Schumann, put to his mettle, composed this symphony and, through its beauties and success, gained the father's consent to marry the daughter. This music is such as to prove attractive to all classes of music lovers. There seems to be no use in expending powder on Mr. Nikisch's overwrought, bombastic, brass-band noise, for he does not heed the united efforts of the critics who have kindly suggested that he modify his ideas and discriminate between mere noise and music. However, as most of the critics are consistent, they will continue to offer their advice and no doubt Mr. Nikisch will continue to disregard it. The first movement of the symphony was not entirely ruined by sensational effects, though it was too demonstrative to prove as effective as it might under a more conservative director. It is not in the nature of Mr. Nikisch to be anything but demonstrative, except in his

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Twenty-third Symphony Concert.

The programme of the 23d Symphony concert, at the Music Hall, on Saturday evening, embraced the following numbers: Schumann's Symphony in B flat, No. 1; Aria from "Alessandro," Handel; Suite from the music to Shakespeare's "Hamlet," Henschel; Aria from "Herodiade," Massenet; Overture to "Oberon," Weber. Mrs. Georg Henschel was the soloist. The feature of the programme was the first performance in America of Mr. Henschel's "Hamlet" Suite and the conducting of the work by the composer. The music of the Suite, if lacking in spontaneity, is nevertheless of a high character, and the treatment is that of a composer of marked skill and invention.

The orchestration is also of commendable richness and variety. There were points of melodic value in the "Ophelia" movement and in the "Pastorale" that made the hearer wish the composer had been more prolific in this direction in all the movements. Still, however, if it does lack the vital spark the "Suite" must interest the musician and cause a desire for a further hearing. It is infinitely above and beyond the majority of programme pieces that are dispensed so liberally by the rising generation of composers, for it is not exaggerated in the working out and has much that is reposeful within its borders. It is a work that requires just such masterly playing as it received from the Boston Symphony orchestra, and this in turn was the result of the fine conducting of Mr. Henschel.

Had the representation of the work fallen to the hands of Mr. Nikisch for a rendering it would have no doubt wearied the audience, for it is music that must be accurately and artistically given if the intended effect is to be gained. The coarse, blatant style that characterizes all that Mr. Nikisch conducts would have extinguished what there is that is commendable in its construction. How wonderfully Mr. Henschel has improved in his conducting since he last wielded the baton here. What a fine presence he has before the players; in his face can be traced the ever-varying moods of the music; how graceful, how simple, how reposeful are his movements while conducting. His musical stature and his conducting ability are sufficiently exalted not to require that he poses himself upon two boxes. He stood upon his feet as Gerike did, and was not perched on stilts in an apparent effort to emulate the altitude of the Beethoven statue.

This performance of the orchestra under Mr. Henschel's conducting is the only one, with one exception, that has shown that our orchestra is still the unrivalled body of musicians that it was when Mr. Gerike left us. For five years Gerike had drilled and disciplined the Boston Symphony orchestra, until there was nothing to be desired in its wonderfully perfect playing. At the very first concert under Mr. Nikisch's conducting a demoralization of this discipline was plainly evident, and the degeneration following was of rapid growth, until the playing of this formerly fine body became, as it is today, coarse, careless and unworthy such a combination of skilful performers. How charming it was on Saturday evening to listen to the beautiful expression that Mr. Henschel obtained from the players. The delightful contrasts of tone, the precision in every department of the orchestra, the repose, the real pianissimo, and the gratifying gradations of tone were apparent. We know now where the blame can be laid for all the mediocrity that is identical with the playing of our local orchestra. It isn't with the players themselves. The exception mentioned above, that goes hand in hand with Mr. Henschel's fine effort as a conductor, was the occasion of Mr. Kneisel's conducting last season when Mr. Nikisch was absent from sickness. It is an ill wind that blows no one good, and the critical listeners were benefited by Mr. Kneisel's appearance as conductor if but for once only.

The playing of the orchestra, under Mr. Nikisch, on Saturday evening, was, as usual, rough and without contrast. There was one notable event, however, and that is when the second violins in the last movement of the Symphony got to see-sawing with the first violins in the figure that characterizes that movement, Mr. Nikisch turned towards them and really looked disturbed, and vigorously beat the time at them. I have never seen him recognize similar fumbling with the music before in all the three years he has been here.

The opera overture was played in the now familiar Nikisch style. Mrs. Henschel sang the "Handel" aria in a clear, brilliant manner and was warmly recognized for her happy effort.

The orchestra accompanied her in a most discreet and charming manner. The Massenet aria was a little over-heavy for her style and capacity, and the effort with it brought forth the incessant tremolo that marred her singing at

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

In considering Mr. Henschel's "Hamlet" suite, which had the central place on the twenty-third Symphony programme, the fact should be kept in mind that this music was written for a theatre and should not be subjected to as exigent examination as if it had been composed independently and for the concert-room. Not only is the best theatre band less in numbers and effect to a full concert orchestra, but the time assigned to its share in a composite performance is necessarily limited in conformity to the prime requirements of the stage. If the composer of music for a spectacle or a standard drama outlines moods and suggests characters which are ultimately to be shown in words and acts, or accompanies them allusively, he has done his duty; if his music will bear translation to an entirely different locale and environment, he has succeeded in doing more than this. Nobody, we are sure, would be more prompt than Mr. Henschel to say this "Hamlet" music, prepared under commission to introduce and accompany certain parts of the play, is just what he would have made it if he had set out de proprio motu and under inspiration, as one might say, to create a suite or fantasy after Shakespeare. That it maintains itself so well, indicates so clearly those elements of the tragedy with which it is to be connected, and is wrought out in such excellent and musicianly ways, is in itself high praise and honor. To ask from it the fulness of a free composition and the expansion of unrestricted time, is unreasonable. All the same, we should like to hear it as it was meant to be heard, with the influences of speech and action blent into its own, before judging it absolutely. But if it be not inspired, it is certainly well moulded upon substantial and sensible subjects, and the chief exception that criticism can find with it is its brevity of development, its occasional slight weakness of assertion, and its narrow range of effect in scoring. The suite includes a general introduction of variable character, preparatory to the presentation of the fluctuant Prince of Denmark; a softer and sweeter prelude to the second act, intended to be typical of Ophelia, although we thought it somewhat sombre and dense for this; an interlude, relative to the first prelude, preceding the third act; an elegiac introduction to the fourth act, significant of Ophelia's fate, and a pastoral episode following it, indicative of the calm, rural nature of the churchyard, together with a Danish march for some professional purposes. The music is honest and interesting, and ought to be of unusual value in its place, besides showing the knowledge and care of the wise student of orchestral scores. The other instrumental numbers were the "Oberon" overture, in a generally commendable reading, and Schumann's first symphony, some parts of which were admirably done, while others were harsh, hard and almost pugnaciously assertive of the conductor's personal notions. [It may be noted in passing that this symphony was given because the parts for Mr. D'Albert's, which had been promised, did not arrive in time, and that Mr. Henschel conducted his suite and had nothing less than an ovation from the audience.] Mrs. Henschel sang airs from Handel's "Alessandro" and Massenet's "Herodiade" in her delightful style, but of course with too little power for the hall.

The season will end tonight with Haydn's G-minor and Brahms's first symphonies, with a Paganini violin concerto for Mr. Kneisel sandwiched between them.

THE SYMPHONIES.

TWENTY-THIRD CONCERT.

The twenty-third concert by the Symphony orchestra was given in Music hall Saturday, April 16. The programme:

- Schumann. Symphony No. 1, in B flat, op. 38.
Andante un poco maestoso.—Allegro molto vivace.—Larghetto.—Scherzo, molto vivace with Trio I. & Trio II.—Allegro animato e grazioso.
Handel. Aria, "Alessandro."
Henschel. Suite from the Music to Shakespeare's "Hamlet," op. 50. (First performance in America. Conducted by the Composer.)
Massenet. Aria from "Herodiade."
Weber. Overture, "Oberon."
Soloist: Mrs. Georg Henschel.

The Schumann Spring symphony is, perhaps, the most melodiously beautiful of all this celebrated author's compositions. We are told it was written at that happy period of his life, on the eve of his marriage with that remarkable woman and renowned pianist, Clara Wiek. He had met with great opposition from the stern old father, because he looked upon Schumann as a nobody who had never done anything, and, in his opinion, never would. Schumann, put to his mettle, composed this symphony and, through its beauties and success, gained the father's consent to marry the daughter. This music is such as to prove attractive to all classes of music lovers. There seems to be no use in expending powder on Mr. Nikisch's overwrought, bombastic, brass-band noise, for he does not heed the united efforts of the critics who have kindly suggested that he modify his ideas and discriminate between mere noise and music. However, as most of the critics are consistent, they will continue to offer their advice and no doubt Mr. Nikisch will continue to disregard it. The first movement of the symphony was not entirely ruined by sensational effects, though it was too demonstrative to prove as effective as it might under a more conservative director. It is not in the nature of Mr. Nikisch to be anything but demonstrative, except in his

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Twenty-third Symphony Concert.

The programme of the 23d Symphony concert, at the Music Hall, on Saturday evening, embraced the following numbers: Schumann's Symphony in B flat, No. 1; Aria from "Alessandro," Handel; Suite from the music to Shakespeare's "Hamlet," Henschel; Aria from "Herodiade," Massenet; Overture to "Oberon," Weber. Mrs. Georg Henschel was the soloist. The feature of the programme was the first performance in America of Mr. Henschel's "Hamlet" Suite and the conducting of the work by the composer. The music of the Suite, if lacking in spontaneity, is nevertheless of a high character, and the treatment is that of a composer of marked skill and invention.

The orchestration is also of commendable richness and variety. There were points of melodic value in the "Ophelia" movement and in the "Pastorale" that made the hearer wish the composer had been more prolific in this direction in all the movements. Still, however, if it does lack the vital spark the "Suite" must interest the musician and cause a desire for a further hearing. It is infinitely above and beyond the majority of programme pieces that are dispensed so liberally by the rising generation of composers, for it is not exaggerated in the working out and has much that is reposeful within its borders. It is a work that requires just such masterly playing as it received from the Boston Symphony orchestra, and this in turn was the result of the fine conducting of Mr. Henschel.

Had the representation of the work fallen to the hands of Mr. Nikisch for a rendering it would have no doubt wearied the audience, for it is music that must be accurately and artistically given if the intended effect is to be gained. The coarse, blatant style that characterizes all that Mr. Nikisch conducts would have extinguished what there is that is commendable in its construction. How wonderfully Mr. Henschel has improved in his conducting since he last wielded the baton here. What a fine presence he has before the players; in his face can be traced the ever-varying moods of the music; how graceful, how simple, how reposeful are his movements while conducting. His musical stature and his conducting ability are sufficiently exalted not to require that he poses himself upon two boxes. He stood upon his feet as Gericke did, and was not perched on stilts in an apparent effort to emulate the altitude of the Beethoven statue.

This performance of the orchestra under Mr. Henschel's conducting is the only one, with one exception, that has shown that our orchestra is still the unrivalled body of musicians that it was when Mr. Gericke left us. For five years Gericke had drilled and disciplined the Boston Symphony orchestra, until there was nothing to be desired in its wonderfully perfect playing. At the very first concert under Mr. Nikisch's conducting a demoralization of this discipline was plainly evident, and the degeneration following was of rapid growth, until the playing of this formerly fine body became, as it is today, coarse, careless and unworthy such a combination of skilful performers. How charming it was on Saturday evening to listen to the beautiful expression that Mr. Henschel obtained from the players. The delightful contrasts of tone, the precision in every department of the orchestra, the repose, the real pianissimo, and the gratifying gradations of tone were apparent. We know now where the blame can be laid for all the mediocrity that is identical with the playing of our local orchestra. It isn't with the players themselves. The exception mentioned above, that goes hand in hand with Mr. Henschel's fine effort as a conductor, was the occasion of Mr. Kneisel's conducting last season when Mr. Nikisch was absent from sickness. It is an ill wind that blows no one good, and the critical listeners were benefited by Mr. Kneisel's appearance as conductor if but for once only.

The playing of the orchestra, under Mr. Nikisch, on Saturday evening, was, as usual, rough and without contrast. There was one notable event, however, and that is when the second violins in the last movement of the Symphony got to see-sawing with the first violins in the figure that characterizes that movement, Mr. Nikisch turned towards them and really looked disturbed, and vigorously beat the time at them. I have never seen him recognize similar fumbling with the music before in all the three years he has been here.

The opera overture was played in the now familiar Nikisch style. Mrs. Henschel sang the "Handel" aria in a clear, brilliant manner and was warmly recognized for her happy effort.

The orchestra accompanied her in a most discreet and charming manner. The Massenet aria was a little over-heavy for her style and capacity, and the effort with it brought forth the incessant tremolo that marred her singing at the oratorio the evening before. Still, however, Mrs. Henschel is a capable musician, and shows it in her singing. She should keep within her scope, and profit thereby.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

Notable Programme by the Symphony Orchestra.

Handel and Haydn to Sing "The Creation" in Music Hall Tonight.

D'Albert's Recitals—Happenings Interesting to Music Lovers.

The audience at the last but one of this season's Symphony concerts was even larger than the average assemblage which has crowded Music Hall for the pleasure of hearing Director Nikisch's offerings.

The programme last evening was of more than common interest, affording as it did an opportunity of hearing for the first time in Boston a suite for orchestra by Mr. Georg Henschel, and again enjoying the singing of his charming wife.

The Henschels were so closely identified with the early history of the Symphony orchestra that their reappearance with this now unrivalled organization was naturally an event of exceeding interest.

There were enthusiastic plaudits to welcome both of these favorites, and their offerings were received with cordial favor.

The orchestral suit as given yesterday was arranged from the music which Mr. Henschel composed for Mr. Beerbohm Tree's production of "Hamlet." It consisted of the prelude, the entr'acte and the Danish march. The music incidental to the play was not given.

The music is for the most part of a scholarly nature and is rather of a more ambitious character than Mr. Henschel's previous works. He has generally employed the Wagnerian method of leit motif to express the various characters and ideas, and the work is throughout decidedly modern in style.

The overture is founded upon two delightful themes, the one identified with Hamlet being changeable and irresolute and the Ophelia subject most tender and pathetic. These subjects are repeated in the succeeding entr'actes with greater strength and more elaborate orchestral effects.

The entr'acte that precedes the fourth act is elegiac in character and is written solely for the strings of the orchestra, reinforced by the drums. It is a most effective and beautiful number and was exquisitely played. The final interlude is of pastoral nature, delicate and sympathetic, and is intended to represent Mr. Tree's idea of Ophelia's burial in a sunlit churchyard.

The Danish march, which concludes the suit, is suggestive of national airs and is treated in a vigorous but exceedingly simple style.

Mr. Henschel conducted with the masterly skill which is so pleasantly remembered here, and he was repeatedly and enthusiastically recalled at the conclusion of the performance.

Mrs. Henschel sang two arias from Handel's "Alessandro" and Massenet's "Herodiade." She sang the Handel number with much expression and a great deal of artistic finish. She was also very successful in Massenet's beautiful aria. Of course there were cordial plaudits unnumbered.

Schumann's Symphony No. 1, in B flat, was substituted for the promised D'Albert symphony. The performance of the latter was postponed on account of the non-arrival of the orchestral parts from Europe. Mr. Nikisch read the Schumann symphony very satisfactorily, and its performance by the orchestra afforded much pleasure to the audience. Weber's "Oberon" overture concluded the concert.

The last concert of the season will be given next Saturday. Franz Kneisel will be the soloist, and the programme promised is as follows: Symphony, G major, No. 13, B. & H., Haydn; concerto for violin, Paganini; symphony No. 1, C minor, Brahms.

pianoforte accompaniments, which are truly models of elegant refinement. The lovely second movement was delightfully played, and deserves all possible praise. The scherzo, also, was given a very fair representation, giving real pleasure to the general listener. It is bright, lively and effective. The fourth movement, allegro animato, requires vigorous treatment by the orchestra, and it received it; aye, more than this, it was boisterous in the extreme. A little more subdued calmness would have commanded more attention and represented more truthfully the music in hand.

With due respect for Mr. Henschel's ability as musician and composer, we were not particularly pleased with this Suite of his. Without doubt the music is far more beautiful when presented in connection with the accessory stage effects, and it is, perhaps, unfair to speak without first hearing it in this connection; but if a composer puts his music before the public regardless of fitness, he must accept the consequences.

The Oberon overture was splendidly played, without cause for faultfinding. All of Weber's overtures are delightful as music, and "Oberon" is the best of them.

The singing of Mrs. Henschel furnished pleasurable delight. She is charming in appearance, an artiste of exquisite taste and of perfection in vocal art. There are few, if any, who can compare with her in the singing of songs and ballads which come within her reach. She does not attempt more, and therefore succeeds in captivating her hearers. She is claimed as a Bostonione, and it may truly be said that Boston is very proud of her. She was recalled again and again after each song.

JAMES M. TRACY.

CAUSERIE.

Mr. Henschel's Music to the Tragedy, "Hamlet."

Haydn's "Creation" as Sung by the Handel and Haydn.

Concerts of the Week and Notes of Interest.

The programme of the twenty-third Symphony concert in Music Hall Saturday evening was as follows:

Symphony No. 1, B flat, op. 38.....Schumann
Aria, "Alessandro".....Handel
Suite from the music to Shakespeare's "Hamlet," op. 50.....Henschel
Aria from "Herodiade".....Massenet
Overture, "Oberon".....Weber

Mrs. Henschel was the singer. Mr. Henschel conducted his suite, which was played for the first time in America.

The suite was a disappointment. It does not seem well adapted to the purposes of the theatre, and its contents are not of such moment or individuality as to warrant performance in a symphony concert. The music is devoid of originality and spontaneity, nor is it so skillfully made that it excites respectful attention. The themes are neither striking nor melodious; the development of the themes is commonplace; the instrumentation is dry. The best of the numbers is the pastoral, which at the start is promising; this promise, however, is not fulfilled, and the constant use of the same instrumental effects brings monotony. The first prelude is called "Hamlet," the second is "Ophelia," and if the titles were interchanged, the hearer would not suffer, for the music of the one seems as appropriate, or inappropriate, to the character as that of the other. Hamlet and Ophelia in Mr. Henschel's music are twins of tender age; they are dressed alike, they speak with the same inflections, and it is impossible to distinguish the sex. The prelude, "Ophelia's Death," is devoid of pathos, and the Danish march is without a climax. In a word, the suite is manufactured music. It was well played by the orchestra. The composer was welcomed warmly and recalled after the march.

Mrs. Henschel sang the aria "Lusing he piu Care" from Handel's "Alessandro" in a most delightful manner, and she was applauded with enthusiasm. The air was written for Faustina Bordoni, the reckless beauty who, at the age of 18, was called in Italy "the new siren" and "the tenth muse." The fame of her song was only equaled by the prodigality of her life. Medals were struck in her honor at Naples.

Coarse and vindictive pamphlets were written against her in London. Not until she married Hasse did she assume the role of respectability. The learned Dr. Chrystander in his ponderous "Life of Handel," as yet unfinished, does not disdain to quote in footnotes the scandals of her London visit. She made her first appearance in that city in 1726 in "Alessandro," and the rivalry between "Madam Faustina, the rare singing woman," and Cuzzoni led to social dissension. Faustina, on account of her surpassing physical charms, was the favorite of the debauched nobility and the heroine of the masquerades. No wonder that protests were many and loud and fierce. From one of the least outrageous in its defiance of decency, the following lines may be quoted; for they show the temper of the time:

"Cuzzoni can no longer charm,
Faustina now does all alarm (sic)
And we must buy her pipe so clear
With hundreds twenty-five a year.
Britons! For shame, give all these follies o'er,
The ancient British nobleness restore."

But how did Faustina sing? Her voice was a demi-soprano, and its compass was from B flat to G. She was mistress of the cantar granito, the firm and bound song. Her execution was brilliant, and she was able to enunciate with great rapidity. Her trill was without a flaw, and the most complicated passages were sung as easily as though they were played by a violinist. Her intonation was sure; her breathing was remarkable. She first introduced with success the rapid repetition of the same note. She improvised cadenzas with taste. She was a chanteuse legere. And so she was accused of a lack of passion, a want of soul. Sara Goudar, whose knack of being disagreeable on all occasions amounted to positive genius, refused to join in the general chorus of praise. According to her, Faustina was the first that sang sixteen eighth notes in a measure, and "this agility was the signal for the introduction of bad taste in song. Natural simplicity was soon changed into artificial gayety. There was no longer a question of singing well, but the chief thing desired was the ability to sing quickly." So Faustina prevailed against Cuzzoni, who moved the soul. Born in 1700, Faustina left the stage at the age of 53. Dr. Burney saw her in Vienna when she was 72. She was still beautiful, and her spirits were high. She would not sing for the Englishman, and he listened to her daughters. Her rival, Cuzzoni, died in Bologna in 1770 in abject poverty, having supported herself some time by making buttons.

Mrs. Henschel sang the air from Massenet's "Herodiade" with taste, but the air itself demands a fuller, warmer voice, a broader style and a more pronounced personality. When the opera was produced at the Theatre de la Monnaie in Brussels Dec. 19, 1881, the air was sung by Duvivier, who was then receiving $400 a month. When it was first brought out in Paris at the Theatre-Italien in 1884, and in Italian, the air was sung by Fides Devries. It is interesting to note in this connection that Jean de Reszke then made his appearance in Paris as a tenor, and he was accused of wanting power.

The Schumann B flat symphony and the "Oberon" overture are familiar numbers. The symphony started with blatant indecision, and it was played throughout with little regard for Schumann's dynamic marks. Coarse and indiscriminating as was the reading of Mr. Nikisch, the performance evidently gave pleasure to many in the audience. But neither the programme nor the performance as a whole was worthy of the reputation of the Symphony Orchestra.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Conductor Nikisch is making a memorable ending of the season's symphony concerts, and the 23d of the season's series, given at Music Hall last evening, will be an excellent model to follow in future years in the making of programmes. Schumann's tuneful symphony No. 1, in B flat, was played first, and its several movements were given a most interesting reading, the performance of the work as a whole commanding high praise for the orchestra and its conductor.

The orchestral novelty of the evening consisted of a suite of five movements, arranged by the composer, Mr. Georg Henschel, for the concert room, from the music composed for the recent London production of "Hamlet," by Manager Beerholm Tree. Mr. Henschel directed the performance of his own music, and his assumption of his old place at the conductor's desk called out quite an ovation in his honor. The music selected and arranged for the concert room by Mr. Henschel had its first American hearing on this occasion, and its merits were quickly and heartily appreciated by the audience.

The selections made were as follows: (a) Prelude (Hamlet), (b) prelude to act II. (Ophelia), (c) interlude (act III.) and pastorello (act V.), (d) prelude to act V. (Ophelia's death), (e) Danish March. Aside from the opening number, the several movements have characteristics which give them a distinct and definite value apart from their association with the play, and the suite will make a valuable addition to the concert music of the day.

Mr. Henschel's marked individuality shows itself in all his work, and the themes of his "Hamlet" music are as original and clear in their ideas and development as one would expect from this capable musician and born composer.

The admirably contrasted motives which are associated with the characters of Hamlet and Ophelia are among the evidences of the inspiration of the composer, and the use made of these themes is at all times masterly and artistic.

The prelude to act 2, the "interlude" in act 3 and the "Danish march" are compositions which will readily be accepted as standards of excellence in the modern style, and these numbers of the suite met with especial favor at their hearing last evening. The music is richly and skilfully scored for full orchestra, and can hardly fail of gaining a recognition of its merits wherever it is heard.

Mr. Henschel directed the orchestra in a masterly fashion, showing in his beat the same decisive and definite purpose as in the old days; but with this degree of repose and self-command that has evidently resulted from his added years of experience since he first entered the field of the conductor in this city.

Mrs. Henschel was the soloist, and she sang in her own delightful fashion arias from Handel's "Alessandro" and Massenet's "Herodiade," winning a genuine appreciation of her charming gifts as a singer after both her contributions to the programme. The "Oberon" overture ended the evening's programme.

A somewhat curious misunderstanding necessitated the abandonment of the promised first American performance of Eugen D'Albert's symphony, No. 4. It is not often that a pianist of today becomes so identified with Beethoven as to have his compositions mixed up in the mind of a publisher with those of the man who wrote the "Immortal Nine." Such, however, has proved to be the case with D'Albert, for, in response to an order for D'Albert's fourth symphony, a leading European publisher forwarded to the manager of these concerts a full score and parts of Beethoven's fourth symphony. The error was not discovered in season to remedy it and give the performance of D'Albert's symphony in a proper fashion.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The twenty-third Symphony concert given at Music Hall Saturday evening was one of the most thoroughly enjoyable concerts of the course. Not only was the programme one of rare taste, but the soloist, Mrs. Henschel, was the personification of perfect musical taste.

Schumann's spring symphony was substituted for the promised D'Albert symphony, which was postponed on account of the non arrival of the orchestral parts. The rendition of the Schumann number was wholly satisfactory, appealing to the taste of the large audience in its finish of phrasing and its beauty of interpretation.

Mr. Henschel's orchestral suite from the music to Shakspeare's "Hamlet," consisting of the prelude, the entr'acte and Danish march, is an ambitious work full of merit and worthy a place with Schumann's and Weber's best efforts. It is modern in style, but constructed on the principles of strict beauty in orchestration; it is founded upon two delightful themes—the restlessness and instability of Hamlet and the tenderness of Ophelia. These themes are repeated in the succeeding movements with greater elaboration. The entr'acte preceding the fourth act is written solely for strings, with occasional aid from the drums. It is a beautiful movement, calling forth the best powers of the strongest part of the orchestra. The final movement is a pastoral, quaint and pathetic in nature, contrasting strongly with the vigorous measure of the Danish march. Its interpretation was as nearly like the composer's conception as his complete mastery of the orchestra could command.

Had there been sufficient time the audience would have more vigorously expressed its appreciation of the grand manner in which Mr. Nikisch and his men gave the "Oberon" overture. It is true art to arrange a programme with the view of making each number more interesting, and certainly Weber's work was a fitting close to a fine performance.

Mrs. Henschel sang two arias with orchestral accompaniment—Handel's aria, "Alessandro," and an aria from Massenet's "Herodiade," with rare taste. The orchestration of the last number was a trifle heavy for her voice, but the skill of execution, the delicate finish of the phrases, the clear enunciation, which characterized her former appearances, were all present.

The Symphony Concert.

Schumann's first symphony is even more a poem of spring than the spring symphony which had been given a week before, and it is so ineffably beautiful that it is almost impossible to spoil it entirely. If any symphony deserves the title of "the 10th" in the sense of continuing the series of Beethoven epics and idylls, it is surely this work. Mr. Nikisch certainly does not recede from his exaggerations because of criticism; the very first notes were as a gauntlet of defiance, and the call of trumpets and horns was rather like a summons to a tournament than a signal of approaching spring. It may not be generally known that Schumann originally wrote this opening phrase a third deeper, thereby committing an error of instrumentation, for the natural horns could only produce the sixth note of the figure by "stopping," thus producing a most hideous sound in the midst of a romantic figure, and causing great mirth among the musicians. Yet now that the keyed horn is used it would be well to restore the notes as the composer originally wrote them, as the effect is finer in every way. It is unpleasant to repeat the same tale week after week, and it must become decidedly tiresome to the reader; yet I can only reiterate that, in spite of many beauties in certain phrases, as for example the theme on the cellos in the second movement, and the oboe and horn work in scherzo and finale (and the individual players deserve much of the credit here) the spirit of exaggeration and of noise hung over almost everything, and the end was absolutely deafening. It may be urged that the large audience appreciated just this ending in the highest degree, but after all, would not Gilmore win as great applause for a noisy climax? And does not the vocalist who ends a badly sung aria with a chest "C" win the same popular approval? In the Oberon overture, which ended the concert, there were contrasts made that were the very reductio ad absurdum of tonal effect; the force of kettledrums could no further go, and Haydn's "Surprise Symphony" was entirely eclipsed.

Mr. Henschel was welcomed back to his old post as conductor with much enthusiasm. He directed his own suite of "Hamlet" music. He has gained greatly in his control of the orchestral forces, and in his reading of his own work there were no such extremes as we have recently been accustomed to. The music was noble in the highest degree, and while it was of the modern school, it was original in treatment and themes. The first movement, "Hamlet," was gloomy and brooding, and was too earnest to win an immediate popular success, but the sweetness of the succeeding "Ophelia" movement was the more delicious by contrast. It began with trumpet, but the reiterated tones on the instrument were not allowed to become too prominent. Throughout it all the balance of parts was well observed. The richness of melody of this movement, and the musicianly treatment of the subject matter, leading to a true and effective climax caused this to become one of the gems of the work.

The quaint melancholy of the pastorello (English horn and clarinet chiefly) was very attractive, and the ineffable tenderness of the muted violins against the soft strokes of kettledrum in "Ophelia's Death," reminded of the romantic style of Schumann. The final march had a true Danish flavor, and dealt largely in fanfares, and ended with a cymbal clash. The best numbers were the pastorello, the "Ophelia" movement and "Ophelia's Death," although I think that the "Hamlet," movement will grow more attractive with repeated hearing, and the entire suite is a work which stamps Mr. Henschel as a most poetic composer.

Mrs. Henschel also won a triumph at this concert, and deserved it. She wisely forbore to force her voice, and although it seemed too light for the large hall, it retained that sweet purity which is its chief charm, and the flexibility of the Handelian air was most gracefully presented, while the tenderness of Massenet's aria from "Herodiade" was commendable altogether. At the close of this, the artist was able to give a burst of power that was a very triumphant end of a most artistic effort, and recall after recall testified the appreciation of the large audience. Decidedly this was the best work Mrs. Henschel has recently done in Boston.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

MUSICAL.

The Symphony Concert.

The audience at last night's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra filled every seat in the hall and all the available standing room. The special attraction was doubtless the reappearance of Mr. Georg Henschel at the conductor's stand which he occupied for the first three years of the Symphony Orchestra's existence.

His reception was enthusiastically cordial when he came forward to conduct his suite from the music he composed to Shakspeare's "Hamlet" for Mr. Beerholm Tree's production of the tragedy in London. The suite opens with a prelude intended to typify the character of Hamlet. It is followed by another prelude meant to suggest the sweetness of Ophelia's nature. Then comes an interlude that deals again with Hamlet in a more resolute mode, and this in turn is followed by a pastorello, after which comes another prelude illustrating the death of Ophelia, the whole concluding with a Danish march. This music is all in the extreme modern school, is very chromatic in its harmonies, restless in its modulations and exceedingly rich in its orchestral coloring. It is musicianly, but it is not especially felicitous in invention, and it has no originality decided enough to give it the distinction of an individuality essentially the composer's. The themes are very brief and are reiterated and reiterated again until they become almost wearisomely monotonous. The hearer carries nothing away with him except the memory of a distant Wagnerian echo. The Ophelia prelude has a certain warmth and graceful flow, but the pastorello is the gem of the suite in its quaint and well rounded melody, its tender melancholy, its charming simplicity and its delicate orchestration. The music shows in all directions the skill and the taste of a thorough musician, and a fine artistic temperament; but it is music that has been laboriously "made," and is of the head rather than the heart. It was beautifully played, Mr. Henschel conducting firmly and without display, and obtaining with ease every shade of color and of expression that he desired. His method is clear and unostentatious, and judging by his success of last night, he has, since he last led this orchestra some eight seasons ago, become an able and a finished conductor. His music met with warm appreciation, and he was applauded with great enthusiasm and twice recalled. The other instrumental selections were Schumann's Symphony, No. 1, and We-

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Conductor Nikisch is making a memorable ending of the season's symphony concerts, and the 23d of the season's series, given at Music Hall last evening, will be an excellent model to follow in future years in the making of programmes. Schumann's tuneful symphony No. 1, in B flat, was played first, and its several movements were given a most interesting reading, the performance of the work as a whole commanding high praise for the orchestra and its conductor.

The orchestral novelty of the evening consisted of a suite of five movements, arranged by the composer, Mr. Georg Henschel, for the concert room, from the music composed for the recent London production of "Hamlet," by Manager Beerholm Tree. Mr. Henschel directed the performance of his own music, and his assumption of his old place at the conductor's desk called out quite an ovation in his honor. The music selected and arranged for the concert room by Mr. Henschel had its first American hearing on this occasion, and its merits were quickly and heartily appreciated by the audience.

The selections made were as follows: (a) Prelude (Hamlet), (b) prelude to act II. (Ophelia), (c) interlude (act III.) and pastorello (act V.), (d) prelude to act V. (Ophelia's death), (e) Danish March. Aside from the opening number, the several movements have characteristics which give them a distinct and definite value apart from their association with the play, and the suite will make a valuable addition to the concert music of the day.

Mr. Henschel's marked individuality shows itself in all his work, and the themes of his "Hamlet" music are as original and clear in their ideas and development as one would expect from this capable musician and born composer.

The admirably contrasted motives which are associated with the characters of Hamlet and Ophelia are among the evidences of the inspiration of the composer, and the use made of these themes is at all times masterly and artistic.

The prelude to act 2, the "interlude" in act 3 and the "Danish march" are compositions which will readily be accepted as standards of excellence in the modern style, and these numbers of the suite met with especial favor at their hearing last evening. The music is richly and skilfully scored for full orchestra, and can hardly fail of gaining a recognition of its merits wherever it is heard.

Mr. Henschel directed the orchestra in a masterly fashion, showing in his beat the same decisive and definite purpose as in the old days; but with this a degree of repose and self-command that has evidently resulted from his added years of experience since he first entered the field of the conductor in this city.

Mrs. Henschel was the soloist, and she sang in her own delightful fashion arias from Handel's "Alessandro" and Massenet's "Herodiade," winning a genuine appreciation of her charming gifts as a singer after both her contributions to the programme. The "Oberon" overture ended the evening's programme.

A somewhat curious misunderstanding necessitated the abandonment of the promised first American performance of Eugen D'Albert's symphony, No. 4. It is not often that a pianist of today becomes so identified with Beethoven as to have his compositions mixed up in the mind of a publisher with those of the man who wrote the "immortal nine." Such, however, has proved to be the case with D'Albert, for, in response to an order for D'Albert's fourth symphony, a leading European publisher forwarded to the manager of these concerts a full score and parts of Beethoven's fourth symphony. The error was not discovered in season to remedy it and give the performance of D'Albert's symphony in a proper fashion.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The twenty-third Symphony concert given at Music Hall Saturday evening was one of the most thoroughly enjoyable concerts of the course. Not only was the programme one of rare taste, but the soloist, Mrs. Henschel, was the personification of perfect musical taste.

Schumann's spring symphony was substituted for the promised D'Albert symphony, which was postponed on account of the non arrival of the orchestral parts. The rendition of the Schumann number was wholly satisfactory, appealing to the taste of the large audience in its finish of phrasing and its beauty of interpretation.

Mr. Henschel's orchestral suite from the music to Shakspeare's "Hamlet," consisting of the prelude, the entr'acte and Danish march, is an ambitious work full of merit and worthy a place with Schumann's and Weber's best efforts. It is modern in style, but constructed on the principles of strict beauty in orchestration; it is founded upon two delightful themes—the restlessness and instability of Hamlet and the tenderness of Ophelia. These themes are repeated in the succeeding movements with greater elaboration. The entr'acte preceding the fourth act is written solely for strings, with occasional aid from the drums. It is a beautiful movement, calling forth the best powers of the strongest part of the orchestra. The final movement is a pastoral, quaint and pathetic in nature, contrasting strongly with the vigorous measure of the Danish march. Its interpretation was as nearly like the composer's conception as his complete mastery of the orchestra could command.

Had there been sufficient time the audience would have more vigorously expressed its appreciation of the grand manner in which Mr. Nikisch and his men gave the "Oberon" overture. It is true art to arrange a programme with the view of making each number more interesting, and certainly Weber's work was a fitting close to a fine performance.

Mrs. Henschel sang two arias with orchestral accompaniment—Handel's aria, "Alessandro," and an aria from Massenet's "Herodiade," with rare taste. The orchestration of the last number was a trifle heavy for her voice, but the skill of execution, the delicate finish of the phrases, the clear enunciation, which characterized her former appearances, were all present.

The Symphony Concert.

Schumann's first symphony is even more a poem of spring than the spring symphony which had been given a week before, and it is so ineffably beautiful that it is almost impossible to spoil it entirely. If any symphony deserves the title of "the 10th" in the sense of continuing the series of Beethoven epics and idylls, it is surely this work. Mr. Nikisch certainly does not recede from his exaggerations because of criticism; the very first notes were as a gauntlet of defiance, and the call of trumpets and horns was rather like a summons to a tournament than a signal of approaching spring. It may not be generally known that Schumann originally wrote this opening phrase a third deeper, thereby committing an error of instrumentation, for the natural horns could only produce the sixth note of the figure by "stopping," thus producing a most hideous sound in the midst of a romantic figure, and causing great mirth among the musicians. Yet now that the keyed horn is used it would be well to restore the notes as the composer originally wrote them, as the effect is finer in every way. It is unpleasant to repeat the same tale week after week, and it must become decidedly tiresome to the reader; yet I can only reiterate that, in spite of many beauties in certain phrases, as for example the theme on the cellos in the second movement, and the oboe and horn work in scherzo and finale (and the individual players deserve much of the credit here) the spirit of exaggeration and of noise hung over almost everything, and the end was absolutely deafening. It may be urged that the large audience appreciated just this ending in the highest degree, but after all, would not Gilmore win as great applause for a noisy climax? And does not the vocalist who ends a badly sung aria with a chest "C" win the same popular approval? In the Oberon overture, which ended the concert, there were contrasts made that were the very reductio ad absurdum of tonal effect; the force of kettledrums could no further go, and Haydn's "Surprise Symphony" was entirely eclipsed.

Mr. Henschel was welcomed back to his old post as conductor with much enthusiasm. He directed his own suite of "Hamlet" music. He has gained greatly in his control of the orchestral forces, and in his reading of his own work there were no such extremes as we have recently been accustomed to. The music was noble in the highest degree, and while it was of the modern school, it was original in treatment and themes. The first movement, "Hamlet," was gloomy and brooding, and was too earnest to win an immediate popular success, but the sweetness of the succeeding "Ophelia" movement was the more delicious by contrast. It began with trumpet, but the reiterated tones on the instrument were not allowed to become too prominent. Throughout it all the balance of parts was well observed. The richness of melody of this movement, and the musicianly treatment of the subject matter, leading to a true and effective climax caused this to become one of the gems of the work.

The quaint melancholy of the pastorello (English horn and clarinet chiefly) was very attractive, and the ineffable tenderness of the muted violins against the soft strokes of kettledrum in "Ophelia's Death," reminded of the romantic style of Schumann. The final march had a true Danish flavor, and dealt largely in fanfares, and ended with a cymbal clash. The best numbers were the pastorello, the "Ophelia" movement and "Ophelia's Death," although I think that the "Hamlet" movement will grow more attractive with repeated hearing, and the entire suite is a work which stamps Mr. Henschel as a most poetic composer.

Mrs. Henschel also won a triumph at this concert, and deserved it. She wisely forebore to force her voice, and although it seemed too light for the large hall, it retained that sweet purity which is its chief charm, and the flexibility of the Handel air was most gracefully presented, while the tenderness of Massenet's aria from "Herodiade" was commendable altogether. At the close of this, the artist was able to give a burst of power that was a very triumphant end of a most artistic effort, and recall after recall testified the appreciation of the large audience. Decidedly this was the best work Mrs. Henschel has recently done in Boston.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

MUSICAL.

The Symphony Concert.

The audience at last night's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra filled every seat in the hall and all the available standing room. The special attraction was doubtless the reappearance of Mr. Georg Henschel at the conductor's stand which he occupied for the first three years of the Symphony Orchestra's existence.

His reception was enthusiastically cordial when he came forward to conduct his Suite from the music he composed to Shakspeare's "Hamlet" for Mr. Beerholm Tree's production of the tragedy in London. The suite opens with a prelude intended to typify the character of Hamlet. It is followed by another prelude meant to suggest the sweetness of Ophelia's nature. Then comes an interlude that deals again with Hamlet in a more resolute mode, and this in turn is followed by a pastorello, after which comes another prelude illustrating the death of Ophelia, the whole concluding with a Danish march. This music is all in the extreme modern school, is very chromatic in its harmonies, restless in its modulations and exceedingly rich in its orchestral coloring. It is musically, but it is not especially felicitous in invention, and it has no originality decided enough to give it the distinction of an individuality essentially the composer's. The themes are very brief and are reiterated and reiterated again until they become almost wearisomely monotonous. The hearer carries nothing away with him except the memory of a distant Wagnerian echo. The Ophelia prelude has a certain warmth and graceful flow, but the pastorello is the gem of the suite in its quaint and well rounded melody, its tender melancholy, its charming simplicity and its delicate orchestration. The music shows in all directions the skill and the taste of a thorough musician, and a fine artistic temperament; but it is music that has been laboriously "made," and is of the head rather than the heart. It was beautifully played, Mr. Henschel conducting firmly and without display, and obtaining with ease every shade of color and of expression that he desired. His method is clear and unostentatious, and judging by his success of last night, he has, since he last led this orchestra some eight seasons ago, become an able and a finished conductor. His music met with warm appreciation, and he was applauded with great enthusiasm and twice recalled. The other instrumental selections were Schumann's Symphony, No. 1, and Weber's "Oberon" overture. The first was read with immense vigor, but with that obstinate disregard of the composer's intentions that seems to be a mania with Mr. Nikisch, and of which it has become wearisome to complain. Mrs. Henschel was the soloist, and sang the air, "Lusinghe plu care," from Handel's "Alessandro," in which she has frequently been heard here, and the familiar air from Massenet's "Herodiade." The first she sang prettily and neatly, and with much grace of florid execution, though without great variety of expression. The second she sang with more warmth, but her voice is not large enough to do it full justice, especially in so vast a hall. She was applauded with immense fervor, and recalled three times after her first effort, and twice after her second. The season will close with this week's concert, the programme for which is: Symphony in G, Haydn; Concerto for violin, Paganini, and Brahms's Symphony No. 1. Mr. Franz Kneisel will be the soloist.

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the twenty-third Symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Schumann.....Symphony No. 1, in B-flat, op. 38.
Handel.....Aria from "Alessandro."
Henschel. Suite from the music to Shakespeare's "Hamlet."
Massenet.....Aria from "Herodiade."
Weber.....Overture to "Oberon."
Mrs. Georg Henschel was the singer.

We had been promised a symphony by Eugen d'Albert, but it seems the orchestral parts did not arrive in time to have the work put through the due rehearsal, so the ever welcome Schumann symphony was substituted for it. The beautiful Larghetto was admirably played, and we cannot remember hearing the Finale given with such perfection before. In this Allegro animato e grazioso, which has now and then moments of the most tremendous energy and seriousness, Mr. Nikisch had some wonderful inspirations in the way of making sharp contrasts, without in the least impairing the musical coherence of the movement; some of the accents he brought out were a new revelation. We have so often had to differ with Mr. Nikisch on matters of "interpretation," that we are doubly glad now to express our hearty admiration of his conducting of this symphony; it may have been a "reading," but it sounded to us very like the Schumann-pure.

Mr. Henschel's suite from his music to "Hamlet" has a history which it is well to know. The five movements played on Saturday evening were taken from the prelude, entr'actes and incidental music written by Mr. Henschel for Mr. Beerbohm-Tree's production of the tragedy at the Haymarket in London. They comprise—1, Prelude (a tone painting of Hamlet); 2, Prelude to act ii. (tone picture of Ophelia); 3, Interlude before the play scene in act iii. and Pastorale before act v.; 4, Prelude to act iv. (Ophelia's death); 5, Danish March (for the entrance of king and court in act i, and introduced afterward in other scenes). In writing these several numbers Mr. Henschel has made unstinted use of the Leitmotiv, in the Wagnerian sense, almost every theme in the music being associated either with a character or incident in the play. Naturally this quasi-dramatic element falls out, when the suite is given as concert music, as it was last Saturday; but one little touch, which some old theatre-goers may have noticed, is worth speaking of here: in the music descriptive of Ophelia's death, the composer has woven in the themes of some of the songs that stage Ophelias have sung, time out of mind, in the mad scene in act iv. It is not often that music, written with so purely dramatic a purpose as this of Mr. Henschel's, for a special production of a play, can hold its own in the concert room; the meaning of the various themes, which may be perfectly plain to the listener at the theatre, is too liable to be a sealed book to a concert audience. But there is enough of purely musical beauty and strength in this dramatic suite of Mr. Henschel's to make it worth listening to for its own sake. What struck us particularly at this first hearing was the general likeness it bears, in style, melodic character, and sentiment, to much of the quasi-dramatic music that has been written of late by French composers; it is French in the out of its melody and harmony. French in its grace and poignancy of expression, more than all French in its knowing when it has said what it has to say. But one thing separates it from anything of the sort we have heard lately by French composers, and this is its solidity of musical construction, the admirable workmanship it shows. One finds in it none of that mere "Song without Words" spirit, none of that mere melody with accompaniment, that is the bane of contemporary French music; on the contrary, the themes are often worked out almost contrapuntally, the bass takes cognizance of and responds to what the treble has said, and the middle parts have something to say. It is music that not only pleases, but also interests you; it has consistency and something more than a merely emotional purpose. In a word, it is music worth writing. Mr. Henschel conducted the suite as only a composer can conduct his own music. It was not uninteresting to see him once more at the head of his old orchestra, changed in its membership though it is. The greeting by the audience showed that all present remembered him as the first conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Weber's overture to "Oberon" has surely never had a more brilliant performance here than that under Mr. Nikisch on Saturday evening. It went to a charm; not only was there no fault to be found, but there was everything to praise—and that, too, roundly. Mrs. Henschel sang the Handel air beautifully; Massenet's "Il est bon, il est beau," from "Herodiade," a little overweighs her vocally, but her singing of it is admirable; she was loudly recalled time after time.

The next programme is: Haydn, Symphony in G major (No. 13, B. and H.); Paganini, Concerto for violin; Brahms, Symphony No. 1, in C minor. Mr. Franz Kneisel will be the violinist. With this concert the season will be brought to a close.

THE program for the twenty-third Symphony concert this evening was:

Symphony No. 1, in B flat, op. 38.....Schumann
Aria, "Alessandro".....Händel
Suite from the music to Shakespeare's "Hamlet," op. 50.....Henschel
Prelude ("Hamlet").
Prelude to Act II. ("Ophelia")
Interlude, Act III., and pastorale, Act V.
Prelude to Act IV. ("Ophelia's" death).
Danish March.

(First performance in America. Conducted by the composer.)

Aria from "Herodiade".....Massenet
Overture, "Oberon".....Weber

The soloist was Mrs. Georg Henschel.

The performance of the d'Albert symphony, announced for this concert, was postponed on account of the non-arrival of the orchestral parts from Europe.

Although the Schumann symphony, selected by Mr. Nikisch as a substitute for the d'Albert work, is and will ever be a favorite, there was considerable disappointment expressed because of the unfortunate circumstance which precluded all possibility of hearing the d'Albert symphony this season.

The Schumann symphony was given an animated and energetic reading by Mr. Nikisch. The orchestra, however, was somewhat rough, particularly in the first two movements. On the other hand, the "larghetto" was smoothly and carefully performed and may be considered quite as satisfactory as any playing during the evening.

Owing to its novelty the Henschel suite from the "Music to Shakespeare's 'Hamlet'" was the feature of the program in which was centred the greater interest.

Although the composition is artistically conceived, fully, effectively and even richly scored, it could not be called original by the composer's most enthusiastic admirer. The short and commonplace themes were repeated again and again, and but for the colored instrumentation would have been tiresome to a degree. The pastorale seemed to be the only bit unsuggestive of "midnight oil," and gave evident pleasure to its hearers. The orchestra played each movement excellently well. Mr. Henschel conducted, and in a firm, graceful, dignified manner. That he had improved since his absence from Boston was seen at once, and the increased control which he had acquired, both over himself and his men, was plainly apparent.

Mrs. Henschel, however, has not improved. Not that there was a deal of room for it at the time she was last heard here, as her singing was ever finished and satisfying as far as the limitations of voice permitted. In her second selection, the Massenet aria from "Herodiade," these limitations were especially noticeable. Though cleverly sung it sadly needed the breadth and impressive force which this aria requires in order to be most effective.

The last concert of the present season will be given next Saturday evening, and the program as announced will be: Symphony in G, Haydn; concerto for violin, Paganini, and Brahms' symphony No. 1. Mr. Franz Kneisel will be the soloist.

ber's "Oberon" overture. The first was read with immense vigor, but with that obstinate disregard of the composer's intentions that seems to be a mania with Mr. Nikisch, and of which it has become wearisome to complain. Mrs. Henschel was the soloist, and sang the air, "Lusinghe piu care," from Handel's "Alessandro," in which she has frequently been heard here, and the familiar air from Massenet's "Herodiade." The first she sang prettily and neatly, and with much grace of florid execution, though without great variety of expression. The second she sang with more warmth, but her voice is not large enough to do it full justice, especially in so vast a hall. She was applauded with immense fervor, and recalled three times after her first effort, and twice after her second. The season will close with this week's concert, the programme for which is: Symphony in G, Haydn; Concerto for violin, Paganini, and Brahms's Symphony No. 1. Mr. Franz Kneisel will be the soloist.

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the twenty-third Symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Schumann.....Symphony No. 1, in B-flat, op. 38.
Handel.....Aria from "Alessandro."
Henschel. Suite from the music to Shakespeare's "Hamlet."
Massenet.....Aria from "Herodiade."
Weber.....Overture to "Oberon."
Mrs. Georg Henschel was the singer.

We had been promised a symphony by Eugen d'Albert, but it seems the orchestral parts did not arrive in time to have the work put through the due rehearsal, so the ever welcome Schumann symphony was substituted for it. The beautiful Larghetto was admirably played, and we cannot remember hearing the Finale given with such perfection before. In this Allegro animato e grazioso, which has now and then moments of the most tremendous energy and seriousness, Mr. Nikisch had some wonderful inspirations in the way of making sharp contrasts, without in the least impairing the musical coherence of the movement; some of the accents he brought out were a new revelation. We have so often had to differ with Mr. Nikisch on matters of "interpretation," that we are doubly glad now to express our hearty admiration of his conducting of this symphony; it may have been a "reading," but it sounded to us very like the Schumann-pure.

Mr. Henschel's suite from his music to "Hamlet" has a history which it is well to know. The five movements played on Saturday evening were taken from the prelude, entr'actes and incidental music written by Mr. Henschel for Mr. Beerbohm-Tree's production of the tragedy at the Haymarket in London. They comprise—1, Prelude (a tone painting of Hamlet); 2, Prelude to act ii. (tone picture of Ophelia); 3, Interlude before the play scene in act iii. and Pastorale before act v.; 4, Prelude to act iv. (Ophelia's death); 5, Danish March (for the entrance of king and court in act i. and introduced afterward in other scenes). In writing these several numbers Mr. Henschel has made unstinted use of the Leitmotiv, in the Wagnerian sense, almost every theme in the music being associated either with a character or incident in the play. Naturally this quasi-dramatic element falls out, when the suite is given as concert music, as it was last Saturday; but one little touch, which some old theatre-goers may have noticed, is worth speaking of here: in the music descriptive of Ophelia's death, the composer has woven in the themes of some of the songs that stage Ophelias have sung, time out of mind, in the mad scene in act iv. It is not often that music, written with so purely dramatic a purpose as this of Mr. Henschel's, for a special production of a play, can hold its own in the concert room; the meaning of the various themes, which may be perfectly plain to the listener at the theatre, is too liable to be a sealed book to a concert audience. But there is enough of purely musical beauty and strength in this dramatic suite of Mr. Henschel's to make it worth listening to for its own sake. What struck us particularly at this first hearing was the general likeness it bears, in style, melodic character, and sentiment, to much of the quasi-dramatic music that has been written of late by French composers; it is French in the cut of its melody and harmony. French in its grace and poignancy of expression, more than all French in its knowing when it has said what it has to say. But one thing separates it from anything of the sort we have heard lately by French composers, and this is its solidity of musical construction, the admirable workmanship it shows. One finds in it none of that mere "Song without Words" spirit, none of that mere melody with accompaniment, that is the bane of contemporary French music; on the contrary, the themes are often worked out almost contrapuntally, the bass takes cognizance of and responds to what the treble has said, and the middle parts have something to say. It is music that not only pleases, but also interests you; it has consistency and something more than a merely emotional purpose. In a word, it is music worth writing. Mr. Henschel conducted the suite as only a composer can conduct his own music. It was not uninteresting to see him once more at the head of his old orchestra, changed in its membership though it is. The greeting by the audience showed that all present remembered him as the first conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Weber's overture to "Oberon" has surely never had a more brilliant performance here than that under Mr. Nikisch on Saturday evening. It went to a charm; not only was there no fault to be found, but there was everything to praise—and that, too, roundly. Mrs. Henschel sang the Handel air beautifully; Massenet's "Il est bon, il est beau," from "Herodiade," a little overweighs her vocally, but her singing of it is admirable; she was loudly recalled time after time.

The next programme is: Haydn, Symphony in G major (No. 13, B. and H.); Paganini, Concerto for violin; Brahms, Symphony No. 1, in C minor. Mr. Franz Kneisel will be the violinist. With this concert the season will be brought to a close.

BOSTON OFFICE OF THE MUSICAL COURIER,
157 TREMONT STREET, April 16, 1892.

THE program for the twenty-third Symphony concert this evening was:

Symphony No. 1, in B flat, op. 38.....Schumann
Aria, "Alessandro".....Händel
Suite from the music to Shakespeare's "Hamlet," op. 50.....Henschel
Prelude ("Hamlet").
Prelude to Act II. ("Ophelia")
Interlude, Act III., and pastorale, Act V.
Prelude to Act IV. ("Ophelia's" death).
Danish March.

(First performance in America. Conducted by the composer.)

Aria from "Herodiade".....Massenet
Overture, "Oberon".....Weber

The soloist was Mrs. Georg Henschel.

The performance of the d'Albert symphony, announced for this concert, was postponed on account of the non-arrival of the orchestral parts from Europe.

Although the Schumann symphony, selected by Mr. Nikisch as a substitute for the d'Albert work, is and will ever be a favorite, there was considerable disappointment expressed because of the unfortunate circumstance which precluded all possibility of hearing the d'Albert symphony this season.

The Schumann symphony was given an animated and energetic reading by Mr. Nikisch. The orchestra, however, was somewhat rough, particularly in the first two movements. On the other hand, the "larghetto" was smoothly and carefully performed and may be considered quite as satisfactory as any playing during the evening.

Owing to its novelty the Henschel suite from the "Music to Shakespeare's 'Hamlet'" was the feature of the program in which was centred the greater interest.

Although the composition is artistically conceived, fully, effectively and even richly scored, it could not be called original by the composer's most enthusiastic admirer. The short and commonplace themes were repeated again and again, and but for the colored instrumentation would have been tiresome to a degree. The pastorale seemed to be the only bit unsuggestive of "midnight oil," and gave evident pleasure to its hearers. The orchestra played each movement excellently well. Mr. Henschel conducted, and in a firm, graceful, dignified manner. That he had improved since his absence from Boston was seen at once, and the increased control which he had acquired, both over himself and his men, was plainly apparent.

Mrs. Henschel, however, has not improved. Not that there was a deal of room for it at the time she was last heard here, as her singing was ever finished and satisfying as far as the limitations of voice permitted. In her second selection, the Massenet aria from "Herodiade," these limitations were especially noticeable. Though cleverly sung it sadly needed the breadth and impressive force which this aria requires in order to be most effective.

The last concert of the present season will be given next Saturday evening, and the program as announced will be: Symphony in G, Haydn; concerto for violin, Paganini, and Brahms' symphony No. 1. Mr. Franz Kneisel will be the soloist.

MR. NIKISCH'S CRITICAL ENVIRONMENT.

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, does not recline on a bed of roses in Boston. His critical environment is at present singularly unpleasant, for, while the popularity of the symphony concerts and his personal popularity continue unabated, the most determined opposition on the part of a half-dozen well-known music critics of the Hub to all he does must be very unpleasant for such an amiable, good hearted man as Arthur Nikisch certainly is. THE MUSICAL COURIER has always contended that there is no orchestra in America that can be compared to the famous Boston organization, a contention, by the way, that originated in Boston itself, for no epithets could be endearing enough to characterize Arthur Nikisch and his work during his first two years as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

All this, too, from the pens of the very men who to-day declare absolutely that no good can come forth from Nazareth.

Mr. Nikisch, they have suddenly discovered, is not an interpreter of music, and possibly later they will assert that he is neither a conductor nor a musician. THE MUSICAL COURIER gladly puts itself on record by declaring that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is unique as an orchestral organization and its conductor, Arthur Nikisch, as conductor and musician, is the most versatile in this country.

To show the extent of critical perversity in Boston it is only necessary to state that when a traveling orchestral organization appeared in that city its performances were lauded to the sky at the expense of the home orchestra, when it is notorious that the two orchestras are not on the same artistic plane at all. There must be a very large colored gentleman hidden somewhere in the critical wood pile of the Hub.

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1891-92.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

XXIV. CONCERT.

(LAST OF THE SEASON.)

SATURDAY, APRIL 23, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

HAYDN.

SYMPHONY, G major No. 13, B. & H.
Adagio; Allegro.—Largo.—Menuet (Allegretto).—
Allegro con spirito.

PAGANINI.

CONCERTO (in one movement) for VIOLIN, in D major.
(Revised and with additions by Wilhelmj).

BRAHMS.

SYMPHONY No. 1, in C minor, op. 68.
Un poco sostenuto; Allegro.—Andante sostenuto.—
Un poco allegretto e grazioso.—
Adagio piu andante; Allegro non troppo, ma con brio.

SOLOIST:

Mr. FRANZ KNEISEL.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

TWELFTH SEASON.

OPENING CONCERT,

SATURDAY EVENING, OCTOBER 15, 1892.

CAUSERIE.

The Last Concert of the Symphony Series.

Thoughts Suggested by the Close of the Season.

The Last Pianoforte Recital of Eugen D'Albert.

The programme of the 24th and last concert of the Symphony Orchestra, given in Music Hall Saturday evening, was as follows:

Symphony, G major, No. 13, B. & H. Haydn
Concerto (in one movement) for violin, D major, Paganini
(Revised and with additions by Wilhelmj.)
Symphony No. 1, C minor, op. 68. Brahms
Mr. Kneisel was the solo violinist.

The Haydn symphony, sometimes called the "Letter V," was written in 1787 for Paris, where it was given by the society known as the Concert de la Loge Olympique. It is a delightful example of the spontaneity and skill of the composer, and it was played exceedingly well. David Strauss, in his "Old and New Faith," says that if a Haydn symphony does not please an audience the fault is always in the performance. "And it happens easily that the best orchestras, so-called, play it the worst. For they delight in spending their means of effect, such as rough and sudden changes in strength of tone and in tempo (on which so many modern compositions depend) on music to which only the simplest execution does justice." The reading of Mr. Nikisch was free from exaggeration, and the mechanism of the orchestra was worthy of high praise. So, too, was the performance of the Brahms symphony admirable in many respects; and all in all, this concert, both in sane interpretation and in technical finish, was one of the most satisfactory of the season. Mr. Nikisch was greeted at the beginning of the concert with hearty and long continued applause.

Paganini left to his only son Achille, the child of the singer Antonia Bianchi de Como, beside two million francs and valuable instruments, the manuscripts of many incomplete compositions. Four violin concertos were found, with the orchestral accompaniments, and four were unfinished. The first concerto is in E flat major for the orchestra, but the solo part is written in D major, and the strings are tuned a half tone higher. The arrangement of the Wilhelmj, played by Mr. Kneisel, abounds in modernization, and there are in it occasional reminiscences of Wagner. It is an effective composition, and even its difficulties are not ungrateful to the player. These difficulties were surmounted by Mr. Kneisel with such apparent ease that the hearer did not lose in enjoyment by the thought of the task of the player. His performance was also distinguished by elegance and by feeling that was artistically controlled. It is interesting to note in this connection that, according to tradition, the tone of Paganini was pure and beautiful, but it was not great, "except in certain effects where the exertion to gain extraordinary results was marked." Mr. Kneisel was most enthusiastically applauded by the audience and his colleagues. He was recalled several times, and he received a wreath and flowers. It was a fitting tribute to the eminent talent of the violinist.

Now that the eleventh series of these concerts is a matter of historical record, it is neither impertinent nor irrelevant to consider briefly the character of the programmes and the present condition of the orchestra. Without doubt the concerts have given many agreeable amusement, for the outward and conventional manifestations of delight have followed the performance of various selections. If this organization existed merely for the purpose of amusing the public, it would be idle to consider seriously the character of the performances or the taste of the public; for it would then be simply a matter between the manager and the hearer. It might be said, however, that in this case the experiment of gratifying the general public is attended with many risks. The popular taste is capricious. As it was in the time of the Jesuit Father Louis Bertrand Castel, so it is to-day. "The pleasure derived from a popular concert is only real for a certain number of connoisseurs and zealous amateurs. Many in the audience are bored, and they go, as to a theatre, from force of habit, because it is the fashion, or from a desire to be anywhere except at home. The rapture of the majority is a moderate pleasure, which often comes from the sight of the crowd, or circumstances that are foreign to the music. One is tired of hearing always cantatas, and one wishes sonatas; tired of sonatas, he wishes motets; wearied by French music, he longs for the Italian school; bored by the violinist, he yearns for the sound of the viol."

But these concerts are not promenade or "grand operatic" concerts. They were designed to serve, at least in a measure, an educational purpose. They should make for musical brightness. With this end in view, the programme should be chosen with great care and at the same time with catholicism of taste. The worthy compositions of the so-called classical school, the romantic and even the ultra-radical should be heard in due proportion. The programme should be neither frivolous nor dull. Legitimate amusement should go hand in hand with positive education. The making of an ideal programme is a difficult task. It is almost impossible to gratify in one concert the varied tastes of the members of the audience. But it is not impossible to make a programme of well contrasted numbers. Take at random the programmes of the Sunday concerts in Paris, say the concerts of January 24. At the Conservatory the following pieces were heard: Mozart's "Jupiter Symphony," Meyerbeer's Pater Noster, Widor's fantasia for pianoforte and orchestra, the "Egmont" music of Beethoven. Colonne arranged this programme: Schubert's C major symphony, Beethoven's "King Stephen" overture, Saint-Saen's Danse Macabre, two airs by Godard and Pauline Viardot and pieces for the clavichord by Couperin, Rameau and Bach. Lamoureux was more inclined to the radical school: Fourth symphony of Beethoven, overture "Polyenete," Durkas; Liszt's E flat concerto for pianoforte, fragments of "Romeo and Juliet," Berlioz; funeral march from "Goetterdaemmerung" and Saint-Saen's "Ronet d'Omphale." Now, I do not say that these programmes are faultless; and it will be seen at once that they are too long; but in historical interest, in educational value and in pleasing contrast the programmes of the French conductors are throughout the season superior to the programmes of Mr. Nikisch. Nor is it perhaps necessary to cross the ocean. Mr. Nikisch showed during the past season liberality in his taste; he can composers. But he has not yet learned the art of arranging his programmes. One concert is a pyrotechnical display from the opening explosion to the final apotheosis. Another concert is a treatise on the symphony in three volumes, with various readings of text and italicized foot notes by the editor. Contrast is too often neglected, and the hearer then leaves the hall jaded and not refreshed.

292

A lack of experience may be an excuse for occasional errors of judgment in the arrangement of a programme, and time may bring improvement in this respect. Nor is it the fault of a conductor if a singer or a player of an instrument is found unworthy of the reputation that preceded the arrival and the appearance. But it is the fault of the conductor if there is a marked deterioration in the quality of the work of the men under his control. It is said that when Mr. Nikisch first listened to the Boston Symphony Orchestra he was so delighted with the perfection of its mechanism that he hailed the opportunity of being at once a "poetical conductor" without preliminary drudgery. Eternal vigilance, however, is the price of musical liberty. He has shown himself a poet and not a disciplinarian; the quality of the poetry has not always been above reproach; and his ingenious imitations of the old masters have not yet superseded the original models. Romantic spirit, startling effects, surprising readings do not atone for carelessness in attack and a general lack of precision. At times, as on Saturday evening in the Haydn symphony, the mechanism of the orchestra is characterized by the finish that in former days was the just pride of this city, but too often one is reminded of the remark of Mozart in answer to Frederick William II. of Prussia. "What do you think of my orchestra?" said the monarch. "It is made up of the best of virtuosos, your Majesty, and if the gentlemen would only play together the effect would be marvelous."

Now Mr. Nikisch was taken from the opera house at Leipzig and placed suddenly in Music Hall. His experience as a conductor was gained chiefly in the theatre. He is apparently by nature a theatrical—or lest that word be regarded as objectionable—a dramatic conductor. He still breathes the hot air of the opera house. He is ever anxious for effects. In his desire to gain these effects, he is apt to slur the detail, to exaggerate the simplest cantabile, to fall in discriminating between ancient and modern style, to mistake noise for sound. He is impatient of all grades of tone between piano and a forte that borders on fortissimo. The crescendo is very dear to him, and he uses it so freely and so recklessly, that he often anticipates the climax of the composer. His treatment of the ritardando and of the fermata is frequently marked by sensational exaggeration. But it would be tedious to repeat the exceptions that have already been taken in The Journal to his musical rulings. He has during his engagement given brilliant performances of ultra modern works; he has shown that if he thinks it advisable he can subordinate himself and follow the indications of the composer; but he is happiest when he "rides in the whirlwind and directs the storm." Many of his readings of the masters of the so-called classic period have been false to the original text and without gain in the perversion.

Let it be granted cheerfully that the display of his own individuality leads often to orchestral results of an exciting nature; that in certain compositions congenial to his temperament he sweeps all before him; it still remains true that the performance of the orchestra, week in and week out, is not so distinguished by its nobility and purity of tone, its precision, its exquisite finish, its reverent treatment of the composer as in October, 1889. Nor is it to be wondered at if these concerts for the purpose of musical instruction, lose, little by little, the faculty of discrimination, regard Mozart and Wagner as contemporaries, disdain in their own performances the dynamic indications of a composer and strive, in their turn, for effect at any cost. For mighty is the influence of men in high places.

PHILIP HALL.

Critic's. MUSIC. 4/24/92.

THE LAST SYMPHONY.

The Symphony concerts did not end in a blaze of glory as they were wont to do under Mr. Gericke's leadership; but the closing one was intensely interesting, nevertheless, and the performance was worthy of our orchestra, its concertmaster and conductor. Haydn's symphony in G, No. 13, of Breitkopf and Hartel's edition, and Brahms's first symphony were separated by Paganini's concerto in D major; these three numbers completing the list, and making an admirably balanced programme.

A Haydn symphony is always welcome, especially at this time of year. One can listen to such music without straining every nerve, enjoy its easy flow of melody, its piquant rhythms, its naturally resulting harmonies, its apt and expressive orchestration with the ease and contentment that one enjoys a pretty comedy.

The symphonies are all pretty much alike; one has to be on terms of solid intimacy with them to readily know one from the other, just as one has to be with the Liszt rhapsodies. The one in question was delightfully played, the strings doing some especially fine work.

It is something of a leap from a Haydn symphony to Brahms's first. But what a tremendous work this last is! To us it is the greatest and most interesting of the four, the one most pregnant with meaning. The strength of the first movement in particular seems more and more titanic with each successive hearing, while hitherto unobserved beauties of form and expression throughout the work are constantly claiming attention. The performance was a noble one in breadth, clearness and expressiveness and it received the closest attention from the audience.

Mr. Kneisel met with an ovation as he stepped forward just before the opening tutti of the concerto and it was well deserved. The character of his artistic work during the years of his residence in Boston fully entitles him to the secure place he holds in the affections of the cultivated musical people of the city. The performance by him of any important work at the symphony concerts has invariably demonstrated preparation of the most exhaustive kind. His wonderfully fine playing in the Paganini concerto was not only an added proof of this fact, but proof also that he more than holds his own as a violinist; that he is still growing in his art. Such clear, pure, masterly technical work, exquisite and expressive phrasing, are rarely heard. His talent as a musician was also shown in his cadenza, which was artistically conceived and put together. The whole performance was a triumph. Mr. Kneisel was recalled again and again. The concerto itself is a coherent and attractive work in one long movement; it was given according to Wilhelmj's revision.

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The twenty-fourth and last concert of the eleventh season was given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, the programme being as follows:

Haydn: Symphony in G major (Breitkopf & Härtel, No. 13.)

Paganini: Violin Concerto in D major (revised, and with additions by Wilhelmj.)

Brahms: Symphony No. 1, in C minor, Op. 68.

Mr. Franz Kneisel was the violinist.

The Haydn symphony used to be a prime favorite here in the days of the Harvard Musical Association; we remember well the impression made by its final Allegro con spirito at its first performance in the Music Hall. It seemed to the audience for the moment, as if they had never heard anything so charming before. And now, over twenty years later, the work is as fresh, lovely and sparkling as then. It was admirably played, and heartily enjoyed; especially good was the way in which the Trio of the Minuet was given.

Brahms's C-minor symphony, once famous as "The 10th Symphony," is a horse of another color, but none the worse for not being of the same. The more we hear this astounding work, the greater does it seem: every fresh hearing brings with it some new revelation of beauty or strength. There seems to us little need of calling it the greatest symphony since Beethoven; that would be leaving out Mendelssohn and Schumann, which we are not quite ready to do. No doubt, Brahms has planned this first symphony of his on a larger, broader scale than any of the Mendelssohn or Schumann symphonies, and has, moreover, kept himself steadily up to the magnitude of his plan; one can say, too, that, since Beethoven's C minor and "Pastoral,"—which latter, by the way, is of a totally different character—no symphonic first movement has appeared which shows such admirably close, what the French call "serre," workmanship as this one. Still, it should be said on the other hand that Brahms shows in his work far less melodic invention than either Mendelssohn or Schumann, less clearness of purpose and treatment, a less pervasive sense for the beautiful. Upon the whole, superlatives are misleading; this symphony is great enough, in all conscience, to afford not to be "greatest." The performance was wonderfully fine—one of the grandest Mr. Nikisch and his orchestra have ever given us. No more triumphant close of a season could be desired.

We do not know the Paganini concerto well enough in its original shape to be sure how much, or what, Wilhelmj has done for it in the way of retouching; we suspect, however, that he has done a good deal, especially to the orchestral portions, and that what he has done is wholly to the advantage of the work. It seems to us, nevertheless, that it is rather futile to play Paganini in any shape nowadays; the man was a player entirely sui generis, he wrote his compositions for his own playing, and both internal and external evidence go to show that the main secret of their effectiveness lay in his performance. Paganini, as a player, had much of the Liszt magnetism in him; but with the important difference that, whereas Liszt played almost everything under the sun, and about equally superbly, Paganini was musically in touch with no composer but himself. All competent authorities agree that Paganini's playing of other people's music was pretty bad. In this respect he was far more like Gottschalk than like Liszt; he was at home only on his own ground, and there he worked wonders. As Gottschalk's music virtually died with him, past all hope of resurrection, so did Paganini's also die with him; he carried the secret of its effectiveness to the grave. No matter how superbly any violinist today may play a concerto of his, of one thing we may be quite sure; that what we hear is really "Hamlet" with the part of Hamlet left out. That demonic, and often demoniacal, personality, which was the true gist of the whole business, is perforce absent. And to speak the downright truth, what is left, after the elimination of that personality, does not seem to us of great importance or value. Mr. Kneisel fairly outdid himself; it was an utterly magnificent performance at every point; it cannot be praised too highly. But Mr. Kneisel is perhaps the last man in the world to play like Paganini; we may all be heartily thankful for that, for, if he could play like Paganini, it is as certain as certain can be, it even would follow as a necessary consequence, that he could not play the Beethoven, Mendelssohn, nor Joachim concertos as he now does, and could not play in quartets at all. The one precludes the other; if you do not believe it, just think for a moment of Ole Bull—this is certainly no logical proof of our proposition, but it proves it better than logic. And, as for our single self, we far prefer Mr. Kneisel with this one limitation; if he cannot do what Paganini did, he can do a thousand times better. He is thrown away on the Paganini concerto; que diable aussi allait-il faire dans cette maudite galère? But then a man cannot go on playing classic concertos forever! "Wanted: A concerto!" This placard has been up in every violinist's front window for a good while, and will probably stay up for some time to come.

293

The Last Symphony Concert.

The man who could find fault with either the programme or the rendition at Saturday night's concert in Music Hall must indeed be hard to please.

Haydn's symphony in C major, Paganini's concerto for violin and Brahms's splendid first symphony in C minor made up a programme of unusual strength and brilliancy.

The appearance of Franz Kneisel, the soloist of the evening, was greeted with prolonged applause. He has been rightly named the "tenderness of violinists," but the expression does not express enough; it conveys no idea of the mellowness of the notes which follow the movement of the bow, of the sweetness of each tone. It would be difficult to imagine a more finished performance, his purity of tone and brilliancy of execution meriting all the applause he received with such a modest and unassuming air. The orchestra gave him able support throughout the number.

The Brahms symphony was grandly performed, the whole beauty of this splendid organization coming home with new emphasis to the audience, which year after year has welcomed French, Russian, Italian and American composers. But he has not yet learned the art of arranging his programmes. One concert is a pyrotechnical display from the opening explosion to the final apotheosis. Another concert is a treatise on the symphony in three volumes, with various readings of text and italicized foot notes by the editor. Contrast is too often neglected, and the hearer then leaves the hall jaded and not refreshed.

292

A lack of experience may be an excuse for occasional errors of judgment in the arrangement of a programme, and time may bring improvement in this respect. Nor is it the fault of a conductor if a singer or a player of an instrument is found unworthy of the reputation that preceded the arrival and the appearance. But it is the fault of the conductor if there is a marked deterioration in the quality of the work of the men under his control. It is said that when Mr. Nikisch first listened to the Boston Symphony Orchestra he was so delighted with the perfection of its mechanism that he hailed the opportunity of being at once a "poetical conductor" without preliminary drudgery. Eternal vigilance, however, is the price of musical liberty. He has shown himself a poet and not a disciplinarian; the quality of the poetry has not always been above reproach; and his ingenious imitations of the old masters have not yet superseded the original models. Romantic spirit, startling effects, surprising readings do not atone for carelessness in attack and a general lack of precision. At times, as on Saturday evening in the Haydn symphony, the mechanism of the orchestra is characterized by the finish that in former days was the just pride of this city, but too often one is reminded of the remark of Mozart in answer to Frederick William II. of Prussia. "What do you think of my orchestra?" said the monarch. "It is made up of the best of virtuosos, your Majesty, and if the gentlemen would only play together the effect would be marvelous."

Now Mr. Nikisch was taken from the opera house at Leipsic and placed suddenly in Music Hall. His experience as a conductor was gained chiefly in the theatre. He is apparently by nature a theatrical—or lest that word be regarded as objectionable—a dramatic conductor. He still breathes the hot air of the opera house. He is ever anxious for effects. In his desire to gain these effects he is apt to slur the detail, to exaggerate the simplest cantabile, to fail in discriminating between ancient and modern style, to mistake noise for sound. He is impatient of all grades of tone between piano and a forte that borders on fortissimo. The crescendo is very dear to him, and he uses it so freely and so recklessly that he often anticipates the climax of the composer. His treatment of the ritardando and of the fermata is frequently marked by sensational exaggeration. But it would be tedious to repeat the exceptions that have already been taken in The Journal to his musical rulings. He has during his engagement given brilliant performances of ultra modern works; he has shown that if he thinks it advisable he can subordinate himself and follow the indications of the composer; but he is happiest when he "rides in the whirlwind and directs the storm." Many of his readings of the masters of the so-called classic period have been false to the original text and without gain in the perversion.

Let it be granted cheerfully that the display of his own individuality leads often to orchestral results of an exciting nature; that in certain compositions congenial to his temperament he sweeps all before him; it still remains true that the performance of the orchestra, week in and week out, is not so distinguished by its nobility and purity of tone, its precision, its exquisite finish, its reverent treatment of the composer as in October, 1889. Nor is it to be wondered at if the student and the amateur, who frequent these concerts for the purpose of musical instruction, lose, little by little, the faculty of discrimination, regard Mozart and Wagner as contemporaries, disdain in their own performances the dynamic indications of a composer and strive, in their turn, for effect at any cost. For mighty is the influence of men in high places.

PHILIP HALE.

293 Cancels. MUSIC. 9/24/92. THE LAST SYMPHONY.

The Symphony concerts did not end in a blaze of glory as they were wont to do under Mr. Gericke's leadership; but the closing one was intensely interesting, nevertheless, and the performance was worthy of our orchestra, its concertmaster and conductor. Haydn's symphony in G, No. 13, of Breitkopf and Hartel's edition, and Brahms's first symphony were separated by Paganini's concerto in D major; these three numbers completing the list, and making an admirably balanced programme.

A Haydn symphony is always welcome, especially at this time of year. One can listen to such music without straining every nerve, enjoy its easy flow of melody, its piquant rhythms, its naturally resulting harmonies, its apt and expressive orchestration with the ease and contentment that one enjoys a pretty comedy.

The symphonies are all pretty much alike; one has to be on terms of solid intimacy with them to readily know one from the other, just as one has to be with the Liszt rhapsodies. The one in question was delightfully played, the strings doing some especially fine work.

It is something of a leap from a Haydn symphony to Brahms's first. But what a tremendous work this last is! To us it is the greatest and most interesting of the four, the one most pregnant with meaning. The strength of the first movement in particular seems more and more titanic with each successive hearing, while hitherto unobserved beauties of form and expression throughout the work are constantly claiming attention. The performance was a noble one in breadth, clearness and expressiveness and it received the closest attention from the audience.

Mr. Kneisel met with an ovation as he stepped forward just before the opening tutti of the concerto and it was well deserved. The character of his artistic work during the years of his residence in Boston fully entitles him to the secure place he holds in the affections of the cultivated musical people of the city. The performance by him of any important work at the symphony concerts has invariably demonstrated preparation of the most exhaustive kind. His wonderfully fine playing in the Paganini concerto was not only an added proof of this fact, but proof also that he more than holds his own as a violinist; that he is still growing in his art. Such clear, pure, masterly technical work, exquisite and expressive phrasing, are rarely heard. His talent as a musician was also shown in his cadenza, which was artistically conceived and put together. The whole performance was a triumph. Mr. Kneisel was recalled again and again. The concerto itself is a coherent and attractive work in one long movement; it was given according to Wilhelmj's revision.

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The twenty-fourth and last concert of the eleventh season was given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, the programme being as follows:

Haydn: Symphony in G major (Breitkopf & Härtel, No. 13.)

Paganini: Violin Concerto in D major (revised, and with additions by Wilhelmj.)

Brahms: Symphony No. 1, in C minor, Op. 68.

Mr. Franz Kneisel was the violinist.

The Haydn symphony used to be a prime favorite here in the days of the Harvard Musical Association; we remember well the impression made by its final Allegro con spirito at its first performance in the Music Hall. It seemed to the audience for the moment, as if they had never heard anything so charming before. And now, over twenty years later, the work is as fresh, lovely and sparkling as then. It was admirably played, and heartily enjoyed; especially good was the way in which the Trio of the Minuet was given.

Brahms's C-minor symphony, once famous as "The 10th Symphony," is a horse of another color, but none the worse for not being of the same. The more we hear this astounding work, the greater does it seem: every fresh hearing brings with it some new revelation of beauty or strength. There seems to us little need of calling it the greatest symphony since Beethoven; that would be leaving out Mendelssohn and Schumann, which we are not quite ready to do. No doubt, Brahms has planned this first symphony of his on a larger, broader scale than any of the Mendelssohn or Schumann symphonies, and has, moreover, kept himself steadily up to the magnitude of his plan; one can say, too, that, since Beethoven's C minor and "Pastoral,"—which latter, by the way, is of a totally different character—no symphonic first movement has appeared which shows such admirably close, what the French call "serré," workmanship as this one. Still, it should be said on the other hand that Brahms shows in his work far less melodic invention than either Mendelssohn or Schumann, less clearness of purpose and treatment, a less pervasive sense for the beautiful. Upon the whole, superlatives are misleading; this symphony is great enough, in all conscience, to afford not to be "greatest." The performance was wonderfully fine—one of the grandest Mr. Nikisch and his orchestra have ever given us. No more triumphant close of a season could be desired.

We do not know the Paganini concerto well enough in its original shape to be sure how much, or what, Wilhelmj has done for it in the way of retouching; we suspect, however, that he has done a good deal, especially to the orchestral portions, and that what he has done is wholly to the advantage of the work. It seems to us, nevertheless, that it is rather futile to play Paganini in any shape nowadays; the man was a player entirely sui generis, he wrote his compositions for his own playing, and both internal and external evidence go to show that the main secret of their effectiveness lay in his performance. Paganini, as a player, had much of the Liszt magnetism in him; but with the important difference that, whereas Liszt played almost everything under the sun, and about equally superbly, Paganini was musically in touch with no composer but himself. All competent authorities agree that Paganini's playing of other people's music was pretty bad. In this respect he was far more like Gottschalk than like Liszt; he was at home only on his own ground, and there he worked wonders. As Gottschalk's music virtually died with him, past all hope of resurrection, so did Paganini's also die with him; he carried the secret of its effectiveness to the grave. No matter how superbly any violinist today may play a concerto of his, of one thing we may be quite sure; that what we hear is really "Hamlet" with the part of Hamlet left out. That demonic, and often demoniacal, personality, which was the true gist of the whole business, is perforce absent. And to speak the downright truth, what is left, after the elimination of that personality, does not seem to us of great importance or value. Mr. Kneisel fairly outdid himself; it was an utterly magnificent performance at every point; it cannot be praised too highly. But Mr. Kneisel is perhaps the last man in the world to play like Paganini; we may all be heartily thankful for that, for, if he could play like Paganini, it is as certain as certain can be, it even would follow as a necessary consequence, that he could not play the Beethoven, Mendelssohn, nor Joachim concertos as he now does, and could not play in quartets at all. The one precludes the other; if you do not believe it, just think for a moment of Ole Bull—this is certainly no logical proof of our proposition, but it proves it better than logic. And, as for our single self, we far prefer Mr. Kneisel with this one limitation; if he cannot do what Paganini did, he can do a thousand times better. He is thrown away on the Paganini concerto; que diable aussi allait-il faire dans cette maudite galère? But then a man cannot go on playing classic concertos forever! "Wanted: A concerto!" This placard has been up in every violinist's front window for a good while, and will probably stay up for some time to come.

The Last Symphony Concert.

The man who could find fault with either the programme or the rendition at Saturday night's concert in Music Hall must indeed be hard to please.

Haydn's symphony in C major, Paganini's concerto for violin and Brahms's splendid first symphony in C minor made up a programme of unusual strength and brilliancy.

The appearance of Franz Kneisel, the soloist of the evening, was greeted with prolonged applause. He has been rightly named the "tenderest of violinists," but the expression does not express enough; it conveys no idea of the mellowness of the notes which follow the movement of the bow, of the sweetness of each tone. It would be difficult to imagine a more finished performance, his purity of tone and brilliancy of execution meriting all the applause he received with such a modest and unassuming air. The orchestra gave him able support throughout the number.

The Brahms symphony was grandly performed, the whole beauty of this splendid organization coming home with new emphasis to the audience, which year after year has noted the general excellence of the performances, but fairly appreciated to the full the many fine points necessary for this degree of excellence.

294

It is announced that the opening concert of the orchestra's twelfth season will be given Oct. 15.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The 24th and last of the 11th season of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given at Music Hall last evening, under Mr. Arthur Nikisch's direction.

Haydn's symphony in C major made the first number of the programme, and its simple, but tuneful and most enjoyable movements were splendidly played throughout.

Mr. Kneisel was the soloist, and this faithful, devoted artist, to whom so much of the good work of the string players is due, has good reason for pride in the spontaneous and hearty enthusiasm shown in the greeting given him as he stepped to the soloists' stand to begin his performance of the concerto for violin and orchestra, in D major, by Paganini.

It would be difficult to imagine a better performance of the difficult solo movements of this composition, which included the additions by Wilhelmj, than that given by Mr. Kneisel, for in tone, technical perfection, expression and brilliancy his playing called for the highest commendation. It was withal such an unassuming display of virtuosity that a distinct added charm was given to the performance, and, all in all, the honest merit of Mr. Kneisel's work fully warranted the ovation which rewarded his efforts, the applause continuing until he had repeatedly bowed his acknowledgments.

Mr. Kneisel's associates gave him splendid support throughout the concerto, and that these men were keenly alive to the excellence of their leader's playing was fully demonstrated by the hearty way in which they joined in the demonstration in his honor.

The concert ended with a performance of Mr. Brahms' mistake, or, as it has sometimes been called the "Tenth" symphony. It is curious how a reputation once gained will cling to an individual or thing. It is quite likely that when this symphony was first produced its composer prepared an analysis of what he thought he had written, and that the critic who called it the "tenth" missed his ear, or fell asleep, or something, and was compelled to write about it without having heard it at all. Probably feeling sure from the analysis that no one would know what its composer was driving at, and well knowing that overpraise escapes criticism easier than censure, he dubbed Brahms the successor of Beethoven, and went home and slept peacefully.

There is one thing about the repeated performances of Mr. Brahms' first symphony that should be attended to. Admitting that it is a revelation of beauties in musical construction and orchestral treatment, that it is the work of a master musician which repays all the study demanded to understand its algebraical combinations, and that to decry its merits is to admit ignorance—admitting all these things, how is the great public to be educated upon these points, unless the doors of the hall are locked and guarded by officers familiar with the treatment of insanity?

This is a serious question for Mr. Nikisch to consider. The asylums for the weak and infirm of mind are already overcrowded. Why increase this class of patients even if the first Brahms symphony does get a general hearing by the adoption of the "once in stay in" rules that have been so successful at some of the Lowell Institute lectures.

It is announced that the opening concert of the orchestra's 12th season will be given on Saturday evening, Oct. 15.

MUSICAL. Saratte

The Symphony Concert.

Last evening the twenty-fourth and last concert of the eleventh season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place in Music Hall. The programme was Symphony G major (No. 13 B. & H. edition), Haydn; Concerto for violin, Paganini; and Symphony No. 1, C minor, Brahms. Mr. Franz Kneisel was the soloist. The audience was very large and filled every available bit of standing room. When Mr. Nikisch came to the conductor's stand, he was received with cordial and prolonged applause. The Haydn Symphony was admirably read and was played in a clean cut and sympathetic manner. The tempi were excellent throughout. The delightful work was, on the whole, one of the most satisfying performances of the season. The Brahms symphony was given with much richness and variety of tone color, and with remarkable sustained fire. Occasionally there was a noisiness that caused the music to become obscure, but taken altogether, the rendering was interesting and highly effective. Mr. Kneisel played the concerto with exquisite finish and purity of style, and with faultless taste. The technical difficulties were overcome with apparent ease, and the force and elegance of the whole were charming. The performance was greeted with tremendous applause, and the artist received five of the stormiest recalls we have ever heard in Music Hall, and was presented with a huge wreath and some flowers.

The season just closed was, on the whole, less interesting than any of its predecessors, and it has witnessed a steady deterioration in the efficiency of the orchestra. The programmes were, with but few exceptions, weak. The music that was heard for the first time at these concerts consisted of: A Suite by Tchaikowski, the prelude to "Cavalleria Rusticana"; "Don Juan," by Strauss; Lalo's "Le Roi d'Ys" overture; Sveden's "Carnival in Paris"; a suite by Mr. E. A. MacDowell; a Concerto for strings and wind, by Handel; a prelude and fugue, by Florsheim; a symphonic suite, by F. B. Busoni; Tchaikowski's "Hamlet" overture; Mr. Henschel's "Hamlet" suite; a violin concerto, by Mr. C. M. Loewler; Dvorak's symphony No. 4; and Bruch's violin concerto No. 3. The soloists were: Mad. Nordica, Mr. A. Grunfeld, Mr. F. B. Busoni, Miss Marguerite Hall, Paderewski, Mad. Fursch-Madi, Mrs. H. H. A. Beach, Mr. W. Winch, Mr. W. H. Sherwood, Mad. Camille Urso, Mr. E. D'Albert, Mad. Joachim, Mrs. Georg Henschel, and for the "Manfred" music Mrs. Nikisch, Mrs. Wyman, Mr. W. Heinrich, Mr. H. Meyn, Mr. G. S. Lamson, Mr. Sargent, and Mr. I. Morawski. The members of the orchestra who appeared as soloists were Mr. A. Schroeder, Mr. C. M. Loewler, Mr. T. Adamowski, Mr. C. Molé, Mr. H. Schuecker, and Mr. F. Kneisel.

The performances of the orchestra were never up to the splendid standard to which Mr. Gericke had brought them. In fact, since his departure, the fine state of discipline in which he left it has slowly but surely degenerated. Its attack has become ragged, its precision has to a great extent disappeared, and its perfect finish of style has fallen away to a painful roughness. Delicate gradations of tone color have become almost unknown to it and its characteristic has, to a great extent, become noise. These evils have been supplemented by the extraordinary manner in which Mr. Nikisch has seen fit to "improve" the older masters by foisting upon their music new and incongruous readings. It would appear that he can only view music through an operatic medium, and the result is that a cantabile in a symphony or in a concert overture is distorted by the devices peculiar to the opera tenor or the opera prima donna. In other words Mr. Nikisch seems to be unable to resist indulging in a ritardando whenever the temptation offers, and the effect is invariably the vulgarizing of the music. In his propensity to give a new aspect to an old work at any cost, he boldly disregards the composer's express directions and subjects him to unwarrantable indignity. His treatment of the opening of the Mozart symphony in G minor, and of the opening of the Mendelssohn Scotch symphony, are flagrant instances of his predilections in this direction. Another of his peculiarities is to find some unimportant passage given by the composer to the second violins or the violas, and to bring it into a prominence manifestly never meant, but which wholly disturbs the balance of effect originally intended, and causes the theme to give way to a mere accompaniment. This tasteless and inartistic fumbling with great masterpieces is not the result of musicianly conscience or of fine art feeling, and to the thoughtful observer, charitably inclined, it looks more like ignorance and presumption than anything else. We have expressed our sentiments so frequently and so freely on this fever of Mr. Nikisch to compress the giants of musical art into a space only fitted to hold a dwarf, that it would be supererogation to dwell at any greater length on the subject. We have not been singular in the views we have held regarding the liberties taken by him with the great masters. The bulk of reputable critical opinion has set steadily in the same direction that we have held. In fact, criticism has seldom been so thoroughly in accord as it has been this season regarding the performances of the orchestra and the eccentricities of its conductor. It is but just to state, however, that Mr. F. P. Bacon and Mr. W. F. Apthorp have been in harmonious companionship on the other side.

295

We recall clearly that now and then we felt it our duty to censure even Mr. Gericke for some innovations he made in respect to the tempi of certain works, but he never indulged in such radical misreadings as those of which Mr. Nikisch is constantly guilty, and which wholly change the character of the music. We have also found fault with Mr. Gericke for over much of rigidity in respect to style, but this shortcoming may be more easily pardoned than can the wild looseness of style into which Mr. Nikisch falls much too frequently. After all, there is nothing perfect under the sun; but there are degrees in all things, and the few faults of Mr. Gericke, even at their worst, were far less misleading and inexcusable than are those of Mr. Nikisch, and, moreover, he disciplined his orchestra to a point that entitled it to rank among the finest in the world.

If this noble orchestra is to fulfil its mission as an educator, some change in the course that has been pursued during the past three years is necessary. Its playing should be restored to the high plane of efficiency in which it was left at the end of Mr. Gericke's term, and the works of the master composers of the era before Wagner imposed his baleful influence on musical art should be read and performed as they were written. The music of to-day gives the conductor ample opportunity to gratify his wildest aspirations for the noisy and the bizarre, and to this he should be content to confine his taste for the new and the novel. Here there is a full opening for baton flourishing of every description, and for permitting the conductor to glorify himself at the expense of the composer. Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, Schubert and Schumann, however, should be treated with respectful homage, and conducted with dignity. If their music does not sound like the high-seasoned music of our time, it is because they wrote when music had not sunk into sensationalism; and to shower pepper and other pungent spices on it by way of giving it a modern flavor, in order that callous palates may be made to tingle, is to be disloyal to art. To mar a beautiful statue is scarcely less reprehensible than to break it. Let us hear the master musicians as they made it clear they wished to be heard. If a conductor has ideas that he is ambitious to illustrate, let him write a symphony or a suite or an overture, and give full vent in it to the music that is in him. It would be infinitely better than to doctor the works of the immortals.

We understand that Mr. Nikisch does not read any of the criticisms that are written about him. This is to be regretted, for no man is above criticism, and least of all a comparatively young man on the threshold of a career in which his experience has not been large. We are convinced that if he were to give some of his valuable time to reading and reflecting on the more serious criticisms that are made on him, he could hardly fail to learn something useful from them, and would avoid the mistakes into which he heedlessly falls through inexperience and over-confidence. He might not increase the esteem in which his warmest admirers hold him; but he would win the esteem of those who wish heartily for justification to join the ranks of his warmest admirers.

214
noted the general excellence of the performances, but rarely appreciated to the full the many fine points necessary for this degree of excellence.

It is announced that the opening concert of the orchestra's twelfth season will be given Oct. 15.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The 24th and last of the 11th season of concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra was given at Music Hall last evening, under Mr. Arthur Nikisch's direction.

Haydn's symphony in C major made the first number of the programme, and its simple, but tuneful and most enjoyable movements were splendidly played throughout.

Mr. Kneisel was the soloist, and this faithful, devoted artist, to whom so much of the good work of the string players is due, has good reason for pride in the spontaneous and hearty enthusiasm shown in the greeting given him as he stepped to the soloists' stand to begin his performance of the concerto for violin and orchestra, in D major, by Paganini.

It would be difficult to imagine a better performance of the difficult solo movements of this composition, which included the additions by Wilhelmj, than that given by Mr. Kneisel, for in tone, technical perfection, expression and brilliancy his playing called for the highest commendation. It was withal such an unassuming display of virtuosity that a distinct added charm was given to the performance, and, all in all, the honest merit of Mr. Kneisel's work fully warranted the ovation which rewarded his efforts, the applause continuing until he had repeatedly bowed his acknowledgments.

Mr. Kneisel's associates gave him splendid support throughout the concerto, and that these men were keenly alive to the excellence of their leader's playing was fully demonstrated by the hearty way in which they joined in the demonstration in his honor.

The concert ended with a performance of Mr. Brahms' mistake, or, as it has sometimes been called the "Tenth" symphony. It is curious how a reputation once gained will cling to an individual or thing. It is quite likely that when this symphony was first produced its composer prepared an analysis of what he thought he had written, and that the critic who called it the "tenth" missed his ear, or fell asleep, or something, and was compelled to write about it without having heard it at all. Probably feeling sure from the analysis that no one would know what its composer was driving at, and well knowing that overpraise escapes criticism easier than censure, he dubbed Brahms the successor of Beethoven, and went home and slept peacefully.

There is one thing about the repeated performances of Mr. Brahms' first symphony that should be attended to. Admitting that it is a revelation of beauties in musical construction and orchestral treatment, that it is the work of a master musician which repays all the study demanded to understand its algebraical combinations, and that to decry its merits is to admit ignorance—admitting all these things, how is the great public to be educated upon these points, unless the doors of the hall are locked and guarded by officers familiar with the treatment of insanity?

This is a serious question for Mr. Nikisch to consider. The asylums for the weak and infirm of mind are already overcrowded. Why increase this class of patients even if the first Brahms symphony does get a general hearing by the adoption of the "once in stay in" rules that have been so successful at some of the Lowell Institute lectures.

It is announced that the opening concert of the orchestra's 12th season will be given on Saturday evening, Oct. 15.

MUSICAL. Sartre

The Symphony Concert.

Last evening the twenty-fourth and last concert of the eleventh season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place in Music Hall. The programme was Symphony G major (No. 13 B. & H. edition), Haydn; Concerto for violin, Paganini; and Symphony No. 1, C minor, Brahms. Mr. Franz Kneisel was the soloist. The audience was very large and filled every available bit of standing room. When Mr. Nikisch came to the conductor's stand, he was received with cordial and prolonged applause. The Haydn Symphony was admirably read and was played in a clean cut and sympathetic manner. The tempi were excellent throughout. The delightful work was, on the whole, one of the most satisfying performances of the season. The Brahms symphony was given with much richness and variety of tone color, and with remarkable sustained fire. Occasionally there was a noisiness that caused the music to become obscure, but taken altogether, the rendering was interesting and highly effective. Mr. Kneisel played the concerto with exquisite finish and purity of style, and with faultless taste. The technical difficulties were overcome with apparent ease, and the force and elegance of the whole were charming. The performance was greeted with tremendous applause, and the artist received five of the stormiest recalls we have ever heard in Music Hall, and was presented with a huge wreath and some flowers.

The season just closed was, on the whole, less interesting than any of its predecessors, and it has witnessed a steady deterioration in the efficiency of the orchestra. The programmes were, with but few exceptions, weak. The music that was heard for the first time at these concerts consisted of: A Suite by Tchaikowski, the prelude to "Cavalleria Rusticana;" "Don Juan," by Strauss; Lalo's "Le Roi d'Ys" overture; Svanen's "Carnival in Paris;" a suite by Mr. E. A. MacDowell; a Concerto for strings and wind, by Handel; a prelude and fugue, by Florabelm; a symphonic suite, by F. B. Busoni; Tchaikowski's "Hamlet" overture; Mr. Henschel's "Hamlet" suite; a violin concerto, by Mr. C. M. Loewler; Dvorak's symphony No. 4; and Bruch's violin concerto No. 3. The soloists were: Mad. Nordica, Mr. A. Grunfeld, Mr. F. B. Busoni, Miss Marguerite Hall, Paderewski, Mad. Fursch-Madl, Mrs. H. H. A. Beach, Mr. W. Winch, Mr. W. H. Sherwood, Mad. Camille Urso, Mr. E. D'Albert, Mad. Joachim, Mrs. George Henschel, and for the "Manfred" music Mrs. Nikisch, Mrs. Wyman, Mr. W. Heinrich, Mr. H. Meyn, Mr. G. S. Lamson, Mr. Sargent, and Mr. I. Morawski. The members of the orchestra who appeared as soloists were Mr. A. Schroeder, Mr. C. M. Loewler, Mr. T. Adamowski, Mr. C. Mold, Mr. H. Schuecker, and Mr. F. Kneisel.

The performances of the orchestra were never up to the splendid standard to which Mr. Gerlicke had brought them. In fact, since his departure, the fine state of discipline in which he left it has slowly but surely degenerated. Its attack has become ragged, its precision has to a great extent disappeared, and its perfect finish of style has fallen away to a painful roughness. Delicate gradations of tone color have become almost unknown to it and its characteristic has, to a great extent, become noise. These evils have been supplemented by the extraordinary manner in which Mr. Nikisch has seen fit to "improve" the older masters by jostling upon their music new and incongruous readings. It would appear that he can only view music through an operative medium, and the result is that a cantabile in a symphony or in a concert overture is distorted by the devices peculiar to the opera tenor or the opera prima donna. In other words Mr. Nikisch seems to be unable to resist indulging in a ritardando whenever the temptation offers, and the effect is invariably the vulgarizing of the music. In his propensity to give a new aspect to an old work at any cost, he boldly disregards the composer's express directions and subjects him to unwarrantable indignity. His treatment of the opening of the Mozart symphony in G minor, and of the opening of the Mendelssohn Scotch symphony, are flagrant instances of his predilections in this direction. Another of his peculiarities is to find some unimportant passage given by the composer to the second violins or the violas, and to bring it into a prominence manifestly never meant, but which wholly disturbs the balance of effect originally intended, and causes the theme to give way to a mere accompaniment. This tasteless and inartistic fumbling with great masterpieces is not the result of musicianly conscience or of fine art feeling, and to the thoughtful observer, charitably inclined, it looks more like ignorance and presumption than anything else. We have expressed our sentiments so frequently and so freely on this fever of Mr. Nikisch to compress the giants of musical art into a space only fitted to hold a dwarf, that it would be supererogation to dwell at any greater length on the subject. We have not been singular in the views we have held regarding the liberties taken by him with the great masters. The bulk of reputable critical opinion has set steadily in the same direction that we have held. In fact, criticism has seldom been so thoroughly in accord as it has been this season regarding the performances of the orchestra and the eccentricities of its conductor. It is but just to state, however, that Mr. F. P. Bacon and Mr. W. F. Apthorp have been in harmonious companionship on the other side.

295

We recall clearly that now and then we felt it our duty to censure even Mr. Gerlicke for some innovations he made in respect to the tempi of certain works, but he never indulged in such radical misreadings as those of which Mr. Nikisch is constantly guilty, and which wholly change the character of the music. We have also found fault with Mr. Gerlicke for over much of rigidity in respect to style, but this shortcoming may be more easily pardoned than can the wild looseness of style into which Mr. Nikisch falls much too frequently. After all, there is nothing perfect under the sun; but there are degrees in all things, and the few faults of Mr. Gerlicke, even at their worst, were far less misleading and inexcusable than are those of Mr. Nikisch, and, moreover, he disciplined his orchestra to a point that entitled it to rank among the finest in the world.

If this noble orchestra is to fulfil its mission as an educator, some change in the course that has been pursued during the past three years is necessary. Its playing should be restored to the high plane of efficiency in which it was left at the end of Mr. Gerlicke's term, and the works of the master composers of the era before Wagner imposed his baleful influence on musical art should be read and performed as they were written. The music of to-day gives the conductor ample opportunity to gratify his wildest aspirations for the noisy and the bizarre, and to this he should be content to confine his taste for the new and the novel. Here there is a full opening for baton flourishing of every description, and for permitting the conductor to glorify himself at the expense of the composer. Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, Schubert and Schumann, however, should be treated with respectful homage, and conducted with dignity. If their music does not sound like the high-seasoned music of our time, it is because they wrote when music had not sunk into sensationalism; and to shower pepper and other pungent spices on it by way of giving it a modern flavor, in order that callous palates may be made to tingle, is to be disloyal to art. To mar a beautiful statue is scarcely less reprehensible than to break it. Let us hear the master musicians as they made it clear they wished to be heard. If a conductor has ideas that he is ambitious to illustrate, let him write a symphony or a suite or an overture, and give full vent in it to the music that is in him. It would be infinitely better than to doctor the works of the immortals. We understand that Mr. Nikisch does not read any of the criticisms that are written about him. This is to be regretted, for no man is above criticism, and least of all a comparatively young man on the threshold of a career in which his experience has not been large. We are convinced that if he were to give some of his valuable time to reading and reflecting on the more serious criticisms that are made on him, he could hardly fail to learn something useful from them, and would avoid the mistakes into which he heedlessly falls through inexperience and over-confidence. He might not increase the esteem in which his warmest admirers hold him; but he would win the esteem of those who wish heartily for justification to join the ranks of his warmest admirers.

LAST SYMPHONY CONCERT.

End of the Season Regretted by Thousands of Music Lovers.

The last of this season's symphony concerts was given in Music Hall, last night, and then, as on the occasion of the last rehearsal Friday afternoon, the hall was crowded to its capacity. With the good-byes to Conductor Nikisch were hearty expressions of good will and tokens of appreciation for his efforts to maintain the standard of the orchestra and please the taste of its patrons.

To have always satisfied such exacting audiences as have attended these concerts, would have been a task almost beyond accomplishment, so it is not surprising that there should have been some fault finding with the character of Mr. Nikisch's programme, and his manner of presenting them.

But all must agree that he was sincere and earnest in his efforts to present what he believed to be best for the musical culture and enjoyment of his audiences. Possibly another season may bring him more general and favorable recognition.

Yesterday's programme consisted of Haydn's symphony in G, No. 13; Paganini's concerto in D major for violin, and Brahms's symphony No. 1 in C minor.

Mr. Kneisel was the soloist, and his playing of Paganini's difficult and brilliant concerto won most demonstrative expressions of approval. It is not remembered that the playing of any soloist at previous concerts of this season has created greater enthusiasm.

Mr. Kneisel is generally accepted as the most popular of resident violinists, and the regard that Boston has for him is well merited.

His playing yesterday was characterized by the same brilliancy, purity of tone and mastery of technique that made his previous performances so enjoyable.

The Haydn symphony was read by Mr. Nikisch with excellent taste, and it was played with splendid spirit and expression.

The gorgeous orchestral adornments which Brahms has given his No. 1 symphony were presented with admirable effect. Especially spirited and expressive was the performance of the magnificent fourth movement, and the dainty, graceful passages of the preceding movement were exquisitely played by the strings.

ORCHESTRA TOUR.

Conductor Nikisch and His Band to be Heard in Other Cities.

The sixth annual tour of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Arthur Nikisch, conductor, follows immediately upon the conclusion of its Boston series of 24 public rehearsals and concerts, the organization leaving Boston for Philadelphia this (Sunday) evening.

It is well known that the regular season of the orchestra just now ended has exceeded in its financial success that of any known since its establishment 11 years ago, and this fact, viewed in the light of the unprecedented competition it has been forced to meet, is incontrovertible evidence of the high artistic standard maintained in all its appearances and also of the great popularity of its accomplished conductor.

The substantial character of the indorsement of the Boston orchestra is well shown also by the limited financial risk assumed in the coming tour, despite the fact that the organization will travel with 81 people, mainly by special trains, and with such soloists as Mr. and Mrs. Henschel and Eugen D'Albert.

With the exception of three concerts, a handsome surplus over the expense is guaranteed for every appearance of the orchestra throughout the tour, a fact that removes any doubt as to the value of the organization in the estimation of the musical publics in all the leading Eastern cities.

In the arrangement of the tours of this orchestra care has always been taken to make the travel as easy as possible for the men independent of any question of expense, and Manager Charles A. Ellis, who has been identified with the organization from its formation, has again been so successful that only five nights in the three weeks will be passed on the road.

As in former years, Manager Ellis, whose executive ability has put him in the front rank of his associates in this country, goes in advance of the orchestra, and his able assistant, Mr. Fred R. Comee, will personally direct the affairs of the tour in charge of the orchestra.

The first week of the tour is utilized in completing the series of concerts announced for the season in Philadelphia, New York, Washington and Baltimore and Brooklyn, the engagements in the last named city being of the same character as in the home concerts, a public rehearsal occurring on Friday afternoon and the regular concert on Saturday evening.

On Monday evening, May 2, the orchestra appears at the new Madison Square Concert Hall in New York, to afford D'Albert an appearance with the organization in that city, and the first week in May will be given to concerts in Buffalo, Cleveland, Columbus, O., Cincinnati and Chicago.

The week of May 9 to 14 will be given to one concert each in Grand Rapids, Mich., Ann Arbor, Mich., and Detroit, and a series of three concerts in Pittsburg, Penn. Leaving Pittsburg directly after the concert of Saturday, May 14, the organization returns home, arriving Monday morning, May 16.

It is good evidence in favor of the standing of the orchestra in other cities that these engagements include a fifth annual appearance with the Mozart Club of Pittsburg, a fifth annual appearance in the Star course at Cleveland, a third annual appearance with the University Club at Ann Arbor and second annual appearances with the Cincinnati College of Music and the Orpheus Club of Columbus.

NEWS NOTES AND GOSSIP.

Mr. Arthur Nikisch has in many ways shown an appreciation of America and Americans all too uncommon among musicians whose residence in this country has been as limited as his has been. Upon the occasion of the 50th anniversary of the formation of the New York Philharmonic Society, last Thursday, he gave another notable instance of this characteristic feeling of friendship for the profession with which he is associated in his adopted home, by taking the initiative in sending a floral offering to the New York Philharmonics from the Boston Symphony orchestra.

LAST OF THE SERIES.

Close of This Year's Symphony Concerts.

Mr. Kneisel's Fine Playing of Paganini's Concerto.

A Review of the Orchestra's Work Under Mr. Nikisch.

The last of this year's series of Symphony concerts took place at the Music Hall on Saturday evening. The programme was as follows: Haydn's Symphony No. 13; concerto for violin in D, Paganini, with Wilhelmj's revision and additions, and cadenzas by Kneisel; Symphony No. 1, C minor, Brahms. The playing of the orchestra was more satisfactory than generally, and Mr. Kneisel's performance of the concerto was of the highest description in every particular. Among the many admirable performances that this fine artist has given us, none have surpassed his playing upon this occasion. He was recalled again and again, and presented with a magnificent wreath and a large bouquet of flowers.

Contrary to the hopes of many Mr. Nikisch will continue as conductor of the orchestra another season. We are sorry that this is so, for sharing the opinion of many others, we do not believe that Mr. Nikisch is a competent person to fill the position of conductor of the Boston Symphony, in all that that term should imply. When he came here three years ago, he began in a bombastic manner to display at the very first concert a coarse and theatric vulgarity of interpretation that has marked his career ever since, in all that he has done.

The orchestra, which was perfect under his predecessor, Mr. Gericke, began at once to degenerate, and has continued in such a state to the present time of writing. Noise is the prevailing element that has characterized Mr. Nikisch's leading. Coarseness in the strings and blatancy in the wind, with an infernal pounding of the drums, are the elements that seem to satisfy the yearnings of his musical soul. Add to his the persistent attempt to modernize the classics to suit the mawkishness of his notions, and you have a fair idea of the standard that he has tried to establish as the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He has not improved one iota since he came here three years ago, and if he remains here three years more I don't believe he will show any advancement towards the point of ability that the position he holds should command of its incumbent.

To be sure after a good sound belaboring by the majority of the critics, he has modified the eccentricities and violence of his manner in certain compositions; for instance he probably will never indulge again in such a musical bullfight, as his first performance of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony. Still, however, his mania for noise has been tempered but slightly, and then in rare cases only. From the first he has broken down all artistic barriers, and rushed through the compositions in hand regardless of the necessities for contrast of movement, contrast of power, repose, precision and a well defined gradation in dynamics. In all the time he has been here he has not showed that there is any difference between f and fff's; between mezzo-forte, piano and pianissimo.

Stuck up on two boxes he has posed before the audience and beat the air with his baton while the orchestra went on through the music, sometime apparently regardless of his gyrations.

When we stop to think how that superb drillmaster and eminent conductor Wilhelm Gericke had trained and perfected the Boston Symphony Orchestra, it is easy enough to see how any one with a fair schooling in music could stand up before it and play as well as Nikisch has the part of a conductor. The orchestra can play without a conductor if necessary, and quite as well as they often have done under the present incumbent. To control and wield the orchestra is quite another thing. This Mr. Gericke did on every occasion. When Mr. Gericke ruled every player had to keep one eye on the music and one on the conductor, and Mr. Gericke's eye was upon every player. Not the slightest mistake escaped his observation.

Strict attention and the most rigid discipline prevailed. Since Mr. Nikisch has been attached the contrary has been the rule. The players converse and laugh together, and, for long spells at a time, do not look at the conductor, nor pay heed to his movements. Instruments play out of tune, and mistakes are made and no attention is paid to them. I have seen the conductor beating at one time, the orchestra playing at another, and the soloists at still another. Many a fine solo has been ruined through a rough, ragged and noisy accompaniment because the orchestra paid no heed to the situation, and Mr. Nikisch paid no heed to the necessity of controlling the players. If Theodore Thomas and Wilhelm Gericke are conductors then Mr. Nikisch is not a conductor.

298

A conductor should be an exact time beater; he should have the constant and undivided attention of the players; he should guide and control all the movements of the orchestra; he should have a keen sense of contrasts and of gradations of tone; he should have, above all, the ability to impart repose to his renderings; he should have a discriminating taste and draw a sharp line between the purity of the classics and the sensuousness of modern composition; he should also be autocrat of the situation and hold his orchestra in an iron grip. In none of these particulars has Mr. Nikisch distinguished himself, and in most of them he has totally failed.

During the three years that Mr. Nikisch has been attached to the orchestra I have discovered but two elements over which he has control, and these are the violence of the brasses and the infernal pounding of the drums. He excites these departments to the most fearful distortion of their parts, and glows in apparent delight at the consequence thereof. To be sure, Mr. Nikisch does not stand up before the audience with his hand on his hip and his arm akimbo, like a common peasant, as he did when he first came here, but otherwise I cannot see that his three years' experience has improved him in the least as a conductor, either in appearance or in results tending towards a refinement of the coarseness of performance he brought with him from his theatre in Leipzig. On the contrary, observe what experience has done for Mr. Henschel.

There are hundreds of musical students in this country who can stand up before the Boston Symphony Orchestra and do as well, or as ill, as Mr. Nikisch has done, with the probability that they will improve with experience but the position does not demand that class of individual. The taste of the public needs cultivating, not vitiating, and it is Mr. Higginson's duty to see to it that he obtains the best that can be had in pursuing his noble enterprise. Art calls for bread, but this time he has given it a stone. The independent and discriminating critic of the Beacon exposes the situation in a clear light when he writes:

It is a thousand pities that Mr. Higginson—whose noble initiative and sustaining power in the matter of these concerts cannot be too much commended or too well remembered—cannot make up his mind to replace his too bumptious conductor with a man who knows more and is consequently more reasonable. Unfortunately a large part of the Symphony audiences do not know what is right—they attend the concerts in hope of learning—and another large part do not dare to protest. But the wrong Mr. Nikisch is allowed to do may become irreparable, unless at great cost of pains and labor, if he be not brought into subjection or dismissal.

Throughout the season the press have been almost unanimous in condemning the programmes and deficiencies of Mr. Nikisch and it would seem that in the end, if Mr. Higginson cares for the advancement of art, he must take cognizance of this opinion and find a more competent person for the position.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

LIFE IN CHICAGO.

The Federation of Women's Clubs—The Symphony Orchestra—Folk Lore—An Old Lincoln Servant Gone.

[Regular Correspondence of the Transcript.]

CHICAGO, May 10, 1892.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the leadership of Arthur Nikisch, gave a concert here Saturday evening and Mr. Nikisch's Eastern admirers would have been delighted could they have seen the greeting that was given to him. Eugen d'Albert, Alwin Schroeder and Franz Kneisel were soloists, and central Music Hall was filled to the walls with a brilliant audience. Each visit of Mr. Nikisch and his orchestra brings renewed admiration for them both, and for their thoroughly artistic work. They proved Saturday their right to the position as the first orchestra in America, and one whose equals across the water are few. The concert in many respects invites comparison between the two orchestras of Boston and Chicago. As a conductor, Mr. Nikisch lacks the repose and self-poise so characteristic of Mr. Thomas. He is more demonstrative. His beat is very elastic and suggestive, but withal firm, intelligent and intelligible, and he has complete control over his men. The reeds in the Chicago orchestra are indubitably superior to those in the Boston, and our brass choir is certainly equally good. In the strings, however, Mr. Nikisch's orchestra is much better equipped. They proved their undeniable superiority, never exhibiting that lack of agreement in intonation or precision that so frequently proved a disturbing element in the Chicago orchestra.

MUSICAL. Sonette

Anent Gratitude.

The Musical Courier, of New York, in its latest issue, has freed its mind regarding "a half dozen well-known music critics of the Hub," because of the strictures that they have made on the conducting of Mr. Nikisch. The Courier says: "His critical environment is at present singularly unpleasant, for, while the popularity of the Symphony concerts and his personal popularity continue unabated, the most determined opposition on the part of a half-dozen well-known music critics of the Hub to all he does must be very unpleasant for such an amiable, good-hearted man as Arthur Nikisch certainly is." The Courier has every reason to know how amiable and good-hearted Mr. Nikisch is, but it has, nevertheless, wasted unnecessary sympathy here, for Mr. Nikisch has placed it on record that he is too busy and his time is too valuable to read Boston criticisms of his conducting. Under the circumstances, therefore, it is not unreasonable to presume that he does not know of the "determined opposition" of which the Courier speaks, and, consequently, is undisturbed by it. Moreover a man may be both amiable and good natured and yet be an unsatisfactory conductor.

In its zeal to sympathize with Mr. Nikisch the Courier wanders slightly from fact, especially when it asserts, as far as the critics are concerned, "no epithets could be endearing enough to characterize Arthur Nikisch and his work during his first two years as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra." This is not so, for from the very outset of Mr. Nikisch's career here protests went forth from the critics against the liberties he took with the works of the older composers, and also against certain sensational features in his conducting. Never have endearing epithets been bestowed on him here as far as conscientious criticism is concerned. Even the one critical fugleman whom he has since grappled to himself with hooks of steel, was among the first to object to the methods of the then new conductor. The criticisms are all in print and therefore the Courier has no excuse for the misrepresentation in which it has indulged.

The Courier affirms that these critics "have suddenly discovered" that Mr. Nikisch "is not an interpreter of music, and possibly, later, they will assert that he is neither a conductor nor a musician." Here again is misrepresentation, for the critics "have suddenly discovered" nothing of the kind. They discovered at the second or third concert that Mr. Nikisch conducted in Boston, that he was prone to give new and unauthorized readings to the works of the great masters, and that these readings were vulgar and cheaply operative. However: "The Musical Courier gladly puts itself on record by declaring that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is unique as an orchestral organization, and its conductor, Arthur Nikisch, as conductor and musician, is the most versatile in this country." This is all well enough as far as the Courier is concerned, but who shall answer for the Courier as an authority in this matter? And how is the Boston Symphony Orchestra "unique" as an orchestral organization? A question still more difficult to answer is: what has Mr. Nikisch done to entitle him to be called the most versatile musician in the country? As far as Boston is concerned, it has never heard any work that Mr. Nikisch has composed, and it is not aware that he has ever composed one, even of the simplest kind. The most versatile musician in this country is surely capable of doing more than conducting an orchestra and playing the piano accompaniments of a song. Where is the evidence of this versatile musicianship? Mr. Henschel is a versatile musician. He sings, plays the piano, and is a talented composer. During his career here as a conductor we had an overture, a piano concerto and other works by him. Mr. Gericke is a versatile musician, and during his career here we had an overture, a choral work and other compositions by him. But where is the testimony to Mr. Nikisch's versatile musicianship?

Gratitude is so rare a virtue in this busy, selfish, every-day world of ours that it is comforting to meet with it now and then; and though we object to the misrepresentations of the Courier, we cannot too warmly admire its keen sense of thankfulness for favors received. Mr. Nikisch's portrait has been printed in the Courier, and as that spirited and interesting weekly is not conducted on eleemosynary principles, it is not wholly unreasonable to presume that our conductor paid for the honor conferred on him. Then, too, Mr.

299
Nikisch has performed here various pieces of music alleged to be composed and scored for the orchestra by one of the highly gifted and truly "versatile" editors of the Courier. It is also true that Mr. Nikisch has performed here music composed by another New York musical critic; but with that we have nothing to do just now, except to bestow a passing word of admiration on the policy of our conductor. Spenser has said: "Thankfulness is the tune of angels." Thanks are called by Shakspeare "the exchequer of the poor." Dr. Johnson wrote: "Gratitude is the fruit of great cultivation; you do not find it among gross people." It is true that Seneca calls it "an obvious, a cheap and an easy virtue;—so obvious that whenever there is life for it there is place for it; so cheap that the covetous man may be grateful without expense; and so easy that the sluggard may be so likewise without labor."

It is good to be grateful, and whether gratitude be called forth by a portrait paid for as an advertisement, by music performed for the good will that its performance may insure, and in the hope of favors still to come, it is gratitude, nevertheless. The Courier suggests: "There must be a very large colored gentleman hidden somewhere in the critical wood pile of the Hub." While this suspicion still remains to be proved, there can be no doubt whatever regarding the presence of the negro in the Courier wood-pile. We trust we may be pardoned if we are amused at the Courier assuming a highly moral tone, censuring "a half-dozen well-known critics" for doing what they considered to be their duty; critics who, whatever may be their shortcomings, have never placed it in the power of any one to say of them that they have "an itching palm, and sell and mart their offices for gold"—or for portraits, or performances of editor-fathered music. Still, gratitude is a blissful possession; but one can be grateful without going to the ostentatious subserviency of plunging chin-deep into the mire of mendacity in order to show how dirtily grateful one can really be.

MUSICAL. Sonette

More Gratitude.

The Musical Courier continues to indulge in virtuous and grateful indignation against the Boston music critics who have found fault with Mr. Nikisch for certain inexcusable innovations in his readings of the works of Beethoven, Mozart and other great composers, and for their strictures on the degeneration of the Symphony Orchestra since it has been under his control. The funniest feature in this second attack of the Courier on the Boston critics, is the piteous moan aroused by the fear that the course of these same critics may cast "contempt and discredit upon the critical fraternity of the metropolis." By way of overwhelming the Boston critics with a sense of their ignorance and wickedness, the Courier says: "Paderewski, who certainly knows what he is talking about, only last week praised the performances of the Boston Symphony Orchestra." It is on record here that Mr. Paderewski was delighted with the manner in which his pianoforte concerto was conducted by Mr. Nikisch; and as far as that is concerned, the pianist does know exactly what he is talking about. But what Paderewski's praise has to do with the unwarrantable liberties Mr. Nikisch takes with the music of Beethoven, Mozart, Mendelssohn and Schumann, and what relevancy it has in connection with the degeneration in the playing of an orchestra that he never heard when it was at its highest point of efficiency, do not appear. As far as Paderewski himself is concerned, admirable pianist as he is in his peculiar vein, he made sorry work with Beethoven whenever he played that composer's music here; and we have a very vivid recollection that New York criticism, that of the Courier included, was far from complimentary to the pianist in this connection. That one who misinterprets Beethoven should approve of a conductor who does the same thing is by no means remarkable. Moreover, it would be interesting to know what page in the last court calendar made Paderewski a final and indisputable authority on conducting and orchestral playing. The leading Boston critics, for the most part are trained musicians, and are quite as capable of passing judgment on orchestral performances as are Mr. Paderewski and the New York critics. It is true that some of the critics of our sister city are also musicians, though, Mr. H. W. N'choll and Mr. Ernest Catenhusen both solid musicians, are said to have excellent reasons for questioning the musicianship to which at least one of these critics lays claim.

The Courier asks, anent this almost unanimous stand that the Boston critics have taken against the new readings that Mr. Nikisch folats on great masterpieces, "Is it a Conspiracy?" It is scarcely worth while to suggest conspiracy until it be proved that the Boston critics have charged Mr. Nikisch with faults of which he is innocent. Even the most lenient and most admiring of Mr. Nikisch's critics remonstrated with "utterly superb" vigor against our conductor's highly-spiced misreading of Mendelssohn's Scotch symphony, and in his summing up of the season, fell into line with the other critics by saying: "It is not to be denied that the orchestra has fallen off in point of perfection of finish in playing during the past three years or so," and conceded "the frequency with which the wooden wind have been out of tune with the strings of late." The subject however is not worth pursuing further. All that has been proved thus far is, that the playing of the Boston Symphony Orchestra of late, has not pleased the Boston critics, while it has delighted those of New York. The moral of it all is that New York criticism is more easily satisfied than is that of Boston. Only this and nothing more. At the same time, we must again express our admiration for the affluence of gratitude, for favors received and to come, that is the characteristic, perhaps the only virtue of the Courier.

THE concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Mr. Eugen d'Albert attracted a large audience to the Madison Square Garden Concert Hall, Monday, and the performances were so admirable that they kept the spectators in their seats to the end, notwithstanding the wellnigh unbearable heat. Mr. d'Albert played Chopin's E minor and Liszt's E flat concerto. I liked him best in the latter work; in the Chopin number his tremendous technique did not blind me to the relative lack of poetry and morbidezza of his interpretation. I confess, too, that an astoundingly rapid rendering of Rubinstein's C major study failed to impress me deeply. It was a marvelous exhibition of a pianist's ability to strike a great many notes in a very brief space of time, but it was an unmelodious and blurred reading of a piece that can be grateful to the ear as well as valuable as an exercise in mechanism. Mr. Nikisch's band was in as good shape as usual, the "Sakuntala" overture—incomparably the best thing Goldmark ever wrote—disclosing its greatest excellences; and Mr. Kneisel's noble viola solo proved as effective as ever in the Pilgrims' March, from Berlioz's "Harold in Italy."

DAY, MAY 2, 1892.

MUSIC AND DRAMA.

The Symphony Concert Season.

Saturday before last, the last symphony concert of the season was given. It brought to a close a season which, like others, has to be commented on, and, like them, affords ample food for comment. It is some time since our Boston Symphony Orchestra has taken its place among the great orchestras of the world; and it behooves the constant listener, whom some call critic, to sum up, as well as he can, the good things, as well as the less good, that have been done. Let us look first at the menu, the bill of fare.

Leaving out the arias and songs sung at the concerts, and counting up the works for orchestra, or for a solo instrument and orchestra, we find that the prominent composers have been represented as follows:

Beethoven.....	10 works.
Mozart and Schumann.....	6 " each.
Brahms.....	5 " each.
Schubert and Wagner.....	3 " each.

This looks tolerably classical; and the classical spirit evinced in the programmes will be still more evident when we see that the composers, by whom two compositions each were given, are: Max Bruch, Dvorák, Gluck, Goldmark, Haydn, Mendelssohn, Raff, Rubinstein, Tchaikowsky, Volkmann and Weber. Those who were represented only once on the programmes were: Berlioz, Borodin, Busoni, Chadwick, Chopin, Floersheim, Handel, Henschel, Liszt, Löffler, Mascagni, Massenet, MacDowell, Paderewski, Paganini, Paine, Saint-Saëns, Spohr, Richard Strauss, and Svendsen. Of course, all these names are not classic, but kistring an average, and counting Beethoven, Gluck, Handel, Haydn, Mendelssohn, Mozart, Schubert, Schumann, Spohr and Weber as classic, and Brahms as a neo-classic, we find on the list forty-one compositions by classic masters, against twenty-five by Berlioz, Borodin, Max Bruch, Dvorák, Goldmark, Liszt, Raff, Rubinstein, Saint-Saëns, Richard Strauss, Svendsen, Tchaikowsky, Volkmann and Wagner. Forty one against twenty-five is pretty good odds.

No doubt we are lumping together, on the non-classical side, a lot of composers who have infinitely little in common, and who do not in the least belong in the same category. But our principal business is now with the classical ones; they are the ones who should, by rights, claim the lion's share in the programmes of any worthy season of symphony concerts; and they stand 41 to 25. This seems to us exactly as it ought to be. Let us consider a moment.

Every symphony concert season aims, or should aim, at two things: to afford a due amount of the highest and best sort of musical enjoyment to the public; and also to give the public a taste of as many and as important novelties as possible. Now, as the concert-going public is constituted, it enjoys most what it knows best; it may feel itself bored, in advance, by looking over a programme full of things which it has known for years. It may feel a certain elation at the idea of listening for the first time to works of which it has heard, which it knows by hearsay, and which it has been longing to know in the flesh for a good while. The programme of well-known stuff may be called by all sorts of names—by no means complimentary—beforehand; and the programme of new things, be hailed with exuberant joy. But when it comes to the listening, the old, familiar things are, as a rule, gulped down with a relish that is as evident as it is unfeigned; whereas the new works, of which so much was expected, too often seem tedious, if not absolutely exasperating. One might even say, and with considerable truth, that the ideal of programme-making, even with nothing higher than sheer popularity in view, would be to lure the public on to believing that it was hearing a maximum of new things, while really giving it as much as possible of what it knew well already; to temper the wind of novelty to its ears by as much of the well known as could escape adverse comment.

Then, too, in concerts of this character, something more is to be considered than the mere momentary pleasure the audience is to get from them. The present writer remembers well how, at a meeting of the programme committee of the old Harvard Musical Association, one of the stanchest old classicists dumfounded his fellow committeemen by bursting out with: "We must have something more in view than our own fun; we must think of the educational influence our concerts may have upon the people that come to hear them. I, for my own part, would gladly go through a season without anything by Bach, or Handel, or Haydn, or Mozart, or Beethoven, or Weber, or Mendelssohn, or Schumann; I should like to hear nothing but Wagner and Liszt and Berlioz and Raff, and the devil knows whom not of the modern people. It is enormous fun to listen to their B-SH for the first time; but we must not think of clipping our audience to fit a Procrustes bed of that sort." There is no little solid truth hidden in this sputter from the heart; a course of symphony concerts that does not give more of what is best than of what is less good fails in achieving any object whatsoever, except that of being a "museum of curiosities." And, speaking generally, what is best in the music we have is pretty likely to be of the classic sort.

Much has been written about the average style of performance by the orchestra this season, and not always in the complimentary vein. It is not to be denied that the orchestra has fallen off in point of perfection of finish in playing during the last three years or so. There are two styles of conductors just as there are two sorts of players; each sort has its virtues and shortcomings, and we have never yet seen the good qualities of both united in a single individual. There are the large, intense and passionate players, like Rubinstein; and the fine, delicate and highly finished players like Paderewski. We have never yet heard a man of the Rubinstein sort play with the impeccable finish of a Paderewski; neither have we ever heard a man of the Paderewski sort play with the overpowering dash and impressiveness of a Rubinstein. Mr.

quite as capable of passing judgment on orchestral performances as are Mr. Paderewski and the New York critics. It is true that some of the critics of our sister city are also musicians, though, Mr. H. W. N'choll and Mr. Ernest Catenhusen both solid musicians, are said to have excellent reasons for questioning the musicianship to which at least one of these critics lays claim.

The Courier asks, anent this almost unanimous stand that the Boston critics have taken against the new readings that Mr. Nikisch foists on great masterpieces, "Is it a Conspiracy?" It is scarcely worth while to suggest conspiracy until it be proved that the Boston critics have charged Mr. Nikisch with faults of which he is innocent. Even the most lenient and most admiring of Mr. Nikisch's critics remonstrated with "utterly superb" vigor against our conductor's highly-soiced misreading of Mendelssohn's Scotch symphony, and in his summing up of the season, fell into line with the other critics by saying: "It is not to be denied that the orchestra has fallen off in point of perfection of finish in playing during the past three years or so;" and conceded "the frequency with which the wooden wind have been out of tune with the strings of late." The subject however is not worth pursuing further. All that has been proved thus far is, that the playing of the Boston Symphony Orchestra of late, has not pleased the Boston critics, while it has delighted those of New York. The moral of it all is that New York criticism is more easily satisfied than is that of Boston. Only this and nothing more. At the same time, we must again express our admiration for the affluence of gratitude for favors received and to come, that is the characteristic, perhaps the only virtue of the Courier.

THE concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Mr. Eugen d'Albert attracted a large audience to the Madison Square Garden Concert Hall, Monday, and the performances were so admirable that they kept the spectators in their seats to the end, notwithstanding the wellnigh unbearable heat. Mr. d'Albert played Chopin's E minor and Liszt's E flat concerto. I liked him best in the latter work; in the Chopin number his tremendous technique did not blind me to the relative lack of poetry and morbidez of his interpretation. I confess, too, that an astoundingly rapid rendering of Rubinstein's C major study failed to impress me deeply. It was a marvelous exhibition of a pianist's ability to strike a great many notes in a very brief space of time, but it was an unmelodious and blurred reading of a piece that can be grateful to the ear as well as valuable as an exercise in mechanism. Mr. Nikisch's band was in as good shape as usual, the "Sakuntala" overture—incomparably the best thing Goldmark ever wrote—disclosing its greatest excellences; and Mr. Kneisel's noble viola solo proved as effective as ever in the Pilgrims' March, from Berlioz's "Harold in Italy."

DAY, MAY 2, 1892.

MUSIC AND DRAMA.

The Symphony Concert Season.

Saturday before last, the last symphony concert of the season was given. It brought to a close a season which, like others, has to be commented on, and, like them, affords ample food for comment. It is some time since our Boston Symphony Orchestra has taken its place among the great orchestras of the world; and it behooves the constant listener, whom some call critic, to sum up, as well as he can, the good things, as well as the less good, that have been done. Let us look first at the menu, the bill of fare.

Leaving out the arias and songs sung at the concerts, and counting up the works for orchestra, or for a solo instrument and orchestra, we find that the prominent composers have been represented as follows:

Beethoven.....	10 works.
Mozart and Schumann.....	6 " each.
Brahms.....	5 " each.
Schubert and Wagner.....	3 " each.

This looks tolerably classical; and the classical spirit evinced in the programmes will be still more evident when we see that the composers, by whom two compositions each were given, are: Max Bruch, Dvorák, Gluck, Goldmark, Haydn, Mendelssohn, Raff, Rubinstein, Tchaikowsky, Volkmann and Weber. Those who were represented only once on the programmes were: Berlioz, Borodin, Busoni, Chadwick, Chopin, Floersheim, Handel, Henschel, Liszt, Löffler, Mascagni, Massenet, MacDowell, Paderewski, Paganini, Paine, Saint-Saëns, Spohr, Richard Strauss, and Svendsen. Of course, all these names are not classic, but kisthing an average, and counting Beethoven, Gluck, Handel, Haydn, Mendelssohn, Mozart, Schubert, Schumann, Spohr and Weber as classic, and Brahms as a neo-classic, we find on the list forty-one compositions by classic masters, against twenty-five by Berlioz, Borodin, Max Bruch, Dvorák, Goldmark, Liszt, Raff, Rubinstein, Saint-Saëns, Richard Strauss, Svendsen, Tchaikowsky, Volkmann and Wagner. Forty one against twenty-five is pretty good odds.

No doubt we are lumping together, on the non-classical side, a lot of composers who have infinitely little in common, and who do not in the least belong in the same category. But our principal business is now with the classical ones; they are the ones who should, by rights, claim the lion's share in the programmes of any worthy season of symphony concerts; and they stand 41 to 25. This seems to us exactly as it ought to be. Let us consider a moment.

Every symphony concert season aims, or should aim, at two things: to afford a due amount of the highest and best sort of musical enjoyment to the public; and also to give the public a taste of as many and as important novelties as possible. Now, as the concert-going public is constituted, it enjoys most what it knows best; it may feel itself bored, in advance, by looking over a programme full of things which it has known for years. It may feel a certain elation at the idea of listening for the first time to works of which it has heard, which it knows by hearsay, and which it has been longing to know in the flesh for a good while. The programme of well-known stuff may be called by all sorts of names—by no means complimentary—beforehand; and the programme of new things, be hailed with exuberant joy. But when it comes to the listening, the old, familiar things are, as a rule, gulped down with a relish that is as evident as it is unfeigned; whereas the new works, of which so much was expected, too often seem tedious, if not absolutely exasperating. One might even say, and with considerable truth, that the ideal of programme-making, even with nothing higher than sheer popularity in view, would be to lure the public on to believing that it was hearing a maximum of new things, while really giving it as much as possible of what it knew well already; to temper the wind of novelty to its ears by as much of the well known as could escape adverse comment.

Then, too, in concerts of this character, something more is to be considered than the mere momentary pleasure the audience is to get from them. The present writer remembers well how, at a meeting of the programme committee of the old Harvard Musical Association, one of the stanchest old classicists dumfounded his fellow committeemen by bursting out with: "We must have something more in view than our own fun; we must think of the educational influence our concerts may have upon the people that come to hear them. I, for my own part, would gladly go through a season without anything by Bach, or Handel, or Haydn, or Mozart, or Beethoven, or Weber, or Mendelssohn, or Schumann; I should like to hear nothing but Wagner and Liszt and Berlioz and Raff, and the devil knows whom not of the modern people. It is enormous fun to listen to their B—SH for the first time; but we must not think of clipping our audience to fit a Procrustes bed of that sort." There is no little solid truth hidden in this sputter from the heart; a course of symphony concerts that does not give more of what is best than of what is less good fails in achieving any object whatsoever, except that of being a "museum of curiosities." And, speaking generally, what is best in the music we have is pretty likely to be of the classic sort.

Much has been written about the average style of performance by the orchestra this season, and not always in the complimentary vein. It is not to be denied that the orchestra has fallen off in point of perfection of finish in playing during the last three years or so. There are two styles of conductors just as there are two sorts of players; each sort has its virtues and shortcomings, and we have never yet seen the good qualities of both united in a single individual. There are the large, intense and passionate players, like Rubinstein; and the fine, delicate and highly finished players like Paderewski. We have never yet heard a man of the Rubinstein sort play with the impeccable finish of a Paderewski; neither have we ever heard a man of the Paderewski sort play with the overpowering dash and impressiveness of a Rubinstein. Mr.

302
 Gertrude was, so to speak, a "Paderewski conductor." Mr. Nikisch is one of the other, "Rubinstein" kind. If our orchestra have lost in perfection of technical finish, it has gained in force and largeness of style and in emotional impressiveness. The frequency, however, with which the wooden wind has been out of tune with the strings of late is another matter; to our mind it might suggest the possibility that abandoning the old practice of tuning on the stage has turned out to be rather a failure. Still, with all that has been open to criticism, there has been more to enjoy than to be sorry for. We, for one, are more sorry that the season is over than for anything else.

ARCHAEOLOGY AND CRITICISM.

THE latest defense of one of the anti-Nikisch critics in Boston consists of a resuscitation of a series of criticisms published in a New York musical paper, defunct for more than a year. These criticisms are now published as a sort of evidence that Mr. Nikisch was attacked by other critics outside of Boston, and that therefore those Boston critics who are now abusing the great conductor are not alone in their attitude. The fact that these criticisms are taken from a defunct paper is good evidence of the extremes to which our Boston friends are driven, who are also forgetting that the dead paper owes, to a great extent, its demise to the ridiculous nature of its criticism and its reactionary tendencies. The man who wrote these absurdities about Nikisch claimed that Mascagni was a greater composer than Richard Wagner, and also asserted that much great Italian music was neglected here on account of the extravagant worship of Bach and Beethoven.

When intelligent musicians or critics can find no better material to draw from than such as is given out in this instance, it might be judicious to admit at once that there is no defense. Mr. Warren Davenport is the gentleman who is responsible for this archaeological triumph, for he signs his name to the article. Mr. Davenport has been excoriating Nikisch and his orchestra in a rather rough manner. We should like to ask him to give us the names of the great orchestras and great orchestral conductors under whom he made his practical studies of criticism. Has he ever heard (for any length of time) any other symphony orchestra than the Boston Symphony Orchestra?

MUSICAL MATTERS.

It is nice to be an optimist even on such matters as a serious malady results—it is a good thing always to wear gowns I will never admit. Lovely, finely modelled busts and alabaster never intended to waste their sweetness in the desert air. What is a prettier group of young and handsome in evening dress. Mind you, I would encourage the old and scraggy to expose their charms. Heaven forbid! I experienced the painful sensation of the workings of an attenuated throat in gastronomic duties at a supper protest against such a needless exhibition of anatomical study. I think that evening dress, just as we congratulate ourselves that it was beneficial in New York, should be killed by la grippe would be too disagreeable.

Evening gowns the Watteau pleat is very worn. Sometimes a bow is between the shoulders, the long flowing taking the place of the folds. Of different varieties is the material ordered for evening gowns, under different names called from "La belle France," it has different textures and tints to be used in robes. It always drapes prettily. I, just returned from a Continental tour, bring back all sorts of Parisian novelties.

The gold-mired when
 "I understand the
 "Yes; she played in a manner
 —Boston
 Don't talk perfect. The can be done that could you have ladies were not double-stop-swift scale broad theme
 "Homer denza (com-
 "Why?" self) and in
 "He was rruosity and
 Life. airly bristles
 But at the
 "They say himself ask-his mind laid? Reduced
 "Well, he its glitter, to say; it is

303
 In violin music what "Bel Raggio" is in vocal; it is a great display of tonal fireworks. Paganini was not a musician, he was only a virtuoso, and the whole difficult work sinks out of sight when compared with Bruch's G minor concerto, or even the well-worn violin concerto by Mendelssohn. The French and Belgian school of technicalities have led to a high grade of execution, but they have also led away from the true beauty and expressive power of the noblest of instruments. Bach's Chaconne teaches us the lesson that technical difficulty is not incompatible with musical ideas. Paganini's work shows us on the contrary, that it is possible and even easy, to win a popular triumph by bravura alone, and that musical thought is not absolutely essential to violin music. It is, however, certain that Mr. Kneisel by his performance, proved himself a giant in the technique of his instrument.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA'S TOUR.

The sixth annual tour of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Arthur Nikisch, conductor, follows immediately upon the conclusion of its Boston series of 24 public rehearsals and concerts, the organization leaving Boston for Philadelphia this Sunday evening. It is well known that the regular season of the orchestra just now ended has exceeded in its financial success that of any known since its establishment 11 years ago, and this fact, viewed in the light of the unprecedented competition it has been forced to meet is uncontrovertible evidence of the high artistic standard maintained in all its appearances and also of the great popularity of its accomplished conductor.

The substantial character of the indorsement of the Boston orchestra is well shown also by the limited financial risk assumed in the coming tour, despite the fact that the organization will travel with 81 people, mainly by special trains, and with such soloists as Mr. and Mrs. Henschel and Eugen D'Albert. With the exception of three concerts, a handsome surplus over the expense is guaranteed for every appearance of the orchestra throughout the tour, a fact that removes any doubt as to the value of the organization in the estimation of the musical public in all the leading eastern cities.

In the arrangement of the tours of this orchestra care has always been taken to make the travel as easy as possible for the men independent of any question of expense, and Manager Charles A. Ellis, who has been identified with the organization from its formation, has again been so successful that only five nights in the three weeks will be passed on the road. As in former years, Manager Ellis, whose executive ability has put him in the front rank of his associates in this country, goes in advance of the orchestra, and his able assistant, Mr. Fred R. Comee, will personally direct the affairs of the tour in charge of the orchestra.

The first week of the tour is utilized in completing the series of concerts announced for the season in Philadelphia, New York, Washington, Baltimore and Brooklyn, the engagements in the last named city being of the same character as in the home concerts, a public rehearsal occurring on Friday afternoon and the regular concert on Saturday evening.

Gericke was, so to speak, a "Paderewski conductor." Mr. Nikisch is one of the other. "Rubinstein" kind. If our orchestra have lost in perfection of technical finish, it has gained in force and largeness of style and in emotional impressiveness. The frequency, however, with which the wooden wind has been out of tune with the strings of late is another matter; to our mind it might suggest the possibility that abandoning the old practice of tuning on the stage has turned out to be rather a failure. Still, with all that has been open to criticism, there has been more to enjoy than to be sorry for. We, for one, are more sorry that the season is over than for anything else.

ARCHAEOLOGY AND CRITICISM.

THE latest defense of one of the anti-Nikisch critics in Boston consists of a resuscitation of a series of criticisms published in a New York musical paper, defunct for more than a year. These criticisms are now published as a sort of evidence that Mr. Nikisch was attacked by other critics outside of Boston, and that therefore those Boston critics who are now abusing the great conductor are not alone in their attitude. The fact that these criticisms are taken from a defunct paper is good evidence of the extremes to which our Boston friends are driven, who are also forgetting that the dead paper owes, to a great extent, its demise to the ridiculous nature of its criticism and its reactionary tendencies. The man who wrote these absurdities about Nikisch claimed that Mascagni was a greater composer than Richard Wagner, and also asserted that much great Italian music was neglected here on account of the extravagant worship of Bach and Beethoven.

When intelligent musicians or critics can find no better material to draw from than such as is given out in this instance, it might be judicious to admit at once that there is no defense. Mr. Warren Davenport is the gentleman who is responsible for this archaeological triumph, for he signs his name to the article. Mr. Davenport has been excoriating Nikisch and his orchestra in a rather rough manner. We should like to ask him to give us the names of the great orchestras and great orchestral conductors under whom he made his practical studies of criticism. Has he ever heard (for any length of time) any other symphony orchestra than the Boston Symphony Orchestra?

MUSICAL MATTERS.

It is nice to be an optimist even on such matters as a serious malady results—it is a good thing always to wear gowns I will never admit. Lovely, finely modelled busts and alabaster never intended to waste their sweetness on the desert air. What is a prettier group of young and handsome in evening dress. Mind you, I would encourage the old and scraggy to expose their charms. Heaven forbid! I experienced the painful sensation of the workings of an attenuated throat in gastronomic duties at a supper protest against such a needless exhibition anatomical study. I think that evening dress, just as we congratulate ourselves that it was beneficial in New York, should be abandoned by la grippe would be too disap-pening gowns the Watteau pleat is elegantly worn. Sometimes a bow is taken between the shoulders, the long flowing taking the place of the folds. Of different varieties is the material used for evening gowns, under different names called from "La belle France," it is of different textures and tints to be used in robes. It always drapes prettily, just returned from a Continental trip, back all sorts of Parisian novel-

The gold of classical music is a treasure. I underplayed the "Yes; she" amid an encounter of musical stand-Don't talk perfect. The can be done that could you have left were not double-stop swift scale "Homer broad theme "Why?" denza (com-elf) and in "He was rtuosity and airily bristles But at the himself ask his mind laid? Reduced "Well, he its glitter, to say; it is

In violin music what "Bel Raggio" is in vocal; it is a great display of tonal fireworks. Paganini was not a musician, he was only a virtuoso, and the whole difficult work sinks out of sight when compared with Bruch's G minor concerto, or even the well-worn violin concerto by Mendelssohn. The French and Belgian school of technicalities have led to a high grade of execution, but they have also led away from the true beauty and expressive power of the noblest of instruments. Bach's Chaconne teaches us the lesson that technical difficulty is not incompatible with musical ideas. Paganini's work shows us on the contrary, that it is possible and even easy, to win a popular triumph by bravura alone, and that musical thought is not absolutely essential to violin music. It is, however, certain that Mr. Kneisel, by his performance, proved himself a giant in the technique of his instrument.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA'S TOUR.

The sixth annual tour of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Arthur Nikisch, conductor, follows immediately upon the conclusion of its Boston series of 24 public rehearsals and concerts, the organization leaving Boston for Philadelphia this Sunday evening. It is well known that the regular season of the orchestra just now ended has exceeded in its financial success that of any known since its establishment 11 years ago, and this fact, viewed in the light of the unprecedented competition it has been forced to meet is uncontrovertible evidence of the high artistic standard maintained in all its appearances and also of the great popularity of its accomplished conductor.

The substantial character of the endorsement of the Boston orchestra is well shown also by the limited financial risk assumed in the coming tour, despite the fact that the organization will travel with 81 people, mainly by special trains, and with such soloists as Mr. and Mrs. Henschel and Eugen D'Albert. With the exception of three concerts, a handsome surplus over the expense is guaranteed for every appearance of the orchestra throughout the tour, a fact that removes any doubt as to the value of the organization in the estimation of the musical public in all the leading eastern cities.

In the arrangement of the tours of this orchestra care has always been taken to make the travel as easy as possible for the men independent of any question of expense, and Manager Charles A. Ellis, who has been identified with the organization from its formation, has again been so successful that only five nights in the three weeks will be passed on the road. As in former years, Manager Ellis, whose executive ability has put him in the front rank of his associates in this country, goes in advance of the orchestra, and his able assistant, Mr. Fred R. Comee, will personally direct the affairs of the tour in charge of the orchestra.

The first week of the tour is utilized in completing the series of concerts announced for the season in Philadelphia, New York, Washington, Baltimore and Brooklyn, the engagements in the last named city being of the same character as in the home concerts, a public rehearsal occurring on Friday afternoon and the regular concert on Saturday evening.

their duty, but take AYER'S
NOW. It is the best of all purifying, and enriching the tint of youth to cheeks which thin, and it vitalizes and invigorates body. AYER'S Sarsaparilla

temporary relief, it strikes at removing the conditions which thus enables nature to speedy recovery.

DR. Sarsaparilla is composed of the most active and highest grade alteratives known to the medical fraternity. The method employed for extracting medicinal power and curative value from it, is the best, most scientific, and more than human ingenuity and skill ever devised.

DR. Sarsaparilla is always pure in appearance, in flavor, and in its action. It is the medicine for MARCH Cures Others, and Will

Small Talk.

~~~~~

handle on an umbrella is not ad-it is raining hard.—Ram's Horn.

~~~~~

stand she married beneath her." e's four inches taller than he is."
ews.

~~~~~

k about yourself in company—it much more satisfactorily after t.—Elmira Gazette.

~~~~~

must have been triplets."

"Weaknee has been wandering in ely."
s safe enough; he can't go far."

A
You
T
So
S His
T

The Symphony Concert.

Not so the Brahms symphony (which however was equally applauded) for in this there was much that differed radically from the accepted readings. Messrs. Henschel and Gericke may both be accepted as having the sanction of the composer in their readings, and neither of them made such a drawl of the beginning of the pizzicato phrase of the finale, or such a tumult of the coda. Perhaps this very fact won more applause for the work than it has ever received here before, for even in a symphony audience there are many, too many, who can be caught by blatancy. Let the orchestra play the hurly-burly which ends the "Peer Gynt" suite or an arrangement of a Liszt rhapsody, and they will win still greater applause. The encomiums of a large miscellaneous audience are not always a safe guide save to pecuniary results. Yet at the end of the season it is but justice to pay tribute to the virility of much of the work; it is a good quality in itself, but it is a pity that it has so often led into the bizarre and sensational. Mr. Nikisch breathes the atmosphere of the footlights into the pure realm of classical music, and loss of perfect ensemble is a high price to pay for vigorous treatment.

The hero of the concert, however, was the soloist, Mr. Franz Kneisel. He played the Paganini Concerto in D, in such a manner that he was recalled four times amid an enthusiasm seldom seen in these concerts recently. Judged from the technical standpoint the work was well nigh perfect. The only point of adverse criticism that could be made was that the harmonies were not broad enough. But the rapid double-stopping, the high positions, the swift scale work, the difficult skips, the broad theme on the G string, the trying cadenza (composed by the player himself) and in short, the various points of virtuosity and bravura with which the work fairly bristles were overcome in noble style. But at the end of it all the musician finds himself asking, was it all worth the doing? Reduced to hard fact, and stripped of all its glitter, the work has nothing musical to say: it is

LOUIS C. ELSON.

The sixth annual tour of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Arthur Nikisch, conductor, follows immediately upon the conclusion of its Boston series of 24 public rehearsals and concerts, the organization leaving Boston for Philadelphia this Sunday evening. It is well known that the regular season of the orchestra just now ended has exceeded in its financial success that of any known since its establishment 11 years ago, and this fact, viewed in the light of the unprecedented competition it has been forced to meet is uncontrovertible evidence of the high artistic standard maintained in all its appearances and also of the great popularity of its accomplished conductor.

The substantial character of the indorsement of the Boston orchestra is well shown also by the limited financial risk assumed in the coming tour, despite the fact that the organization will travel with 81 people, mainly by special trains, and with such soloists as Mr. and Mrs. Henschel and Eugen D'Albert. With the exception of three concerts, a handsome surplus over the expense is guaranteed for every appearance of the orchestra throughout the tour, a fact that removes any doubt as to the value of the organization in the estimation of the musical publics in all the leading eastern cities.

In the arrangement of the tours of this orchestra care has always been taken to make the travel as easy as possible for the men independent of any question of expense, and Manager Charles A. Ellis, who has been identified with the organization from its formation, has again been so successful that only five nights in the three weeks will be passed on the road. As in former years, Manager Ellis, whose executive ability has put him in the front rank of his associates in this country, goes in advance of the orchestra, and his able assistant, Mr. Fred R. Comee, will personally direct the affairs of the tour in charge of the orchestra.

The first week of the tour is utilized in completing the series of concerts announced for the season in Philadelphia, New York, Washington, Baltimore and Brooklyn, the engagements in the last named city being of the same character as in the home concerts, a public rehearsal occurring on Friday afternoon and the regular concert on Saturday evening.

AN OFF NIGHT FOR THE SYMPHONY.

(Mr. and Mrs. Algernon Browning have tickets for the Symphony concert.)

THE CROWD—Get on to the dude comin' in with his girl.

DOORKEEPER—Them ain't no good here.

MR. AND MRS. BROWNING (together)—What, is this not the Symphony night?

DOORKEEPER—Don't know nothing 'bout Sinfonus. We're running a sluggin' match.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Symphony Concert.

It was rather a peculiar programme for the end of a season, for it gave a rather simple symphony for its first number, and a very abstruse one for its finale. The Haydn symphony in G, No. 13 of Breitkopf & Haertel's edition, presented a few of the faults to which we are beginning to become accustomed; the first violins were too violent in the first movement, and the contrasts were a trifle too brusque. Apart from these defects the performance was a notably good one; the largo was full of breadth and true legato effects, the trio of the minuet had just the right Musette effect with its characteristic drone-bass, and the geniality of the chief theme of the finale was excellently caught up. The tempi also call for praise; a Haydn allegro is not like a modern one, and a largo is not greatly different from an andante of the present; this conservative application of terms Mr. Nikisch seemed to appreciate and the result was a good one which deserved the liberal recognition it received.

Not so the Brahms symphony (which however was equally applauded) for in this there was much that differed radically from the accepted readings. Messrs. Henschel and Gerike may both be accepted as having the sanction of the composer in their readings, and neither of them made such a drawl of the beginning of the pizzicato phrase of the finale, or such a tumult of the coda. Perhaps this very fact won more applause for the work than it has ever received here before, for even in a symphony audience there are many, too many, who can be caught by blatancy. Let the orchestra play the hurly-burly which ends the "Peer Gynt" suite or an arrangement of a Liszt rhapsody, and they will win still greater applause. The encomiums of a large miscellaneous audience are not always a safe guide save to pecuniary results. Yet at the end of the season it is but justice to pay tribute to the virility of much of the work; it is a good quality in itself, but it is a pity that it has so often led into the bizarre and sensational. Mr. Nikisch breathes the atmosphere of the footlights into the pure realm of classical music, and loss of perfect ensemble is a high price to pay for vigorous treatment.

The hero of the concert, however, was the soloist, Mr. Franz Kneisel. He played the Paganini Concerto in D, in such a manner that he was recalled four times amid an enthusiasm seldom seen in these concerts recently. Judged from the technical standpoint the work was well nigh perfect. The only point of adverse criticism that could be made was that the harmonics were not broad enough. But the rapid double-stopping, the high positions, the swift scale work, the difficult skips, the broad theme on the G string, the trying cadenza (composed by the player himself) and in short, the various points of virtuosity and bravura with which the work fairly bristles were overcome in noble style. But at the end of it all the musician finds himself asking, was it all worth the doing? Reduced to hard fact, and stripped of all its glitter, the work has nothing musical to say; it is in violin music what "Bel Raggio" is in vocal; it is a great display of tonal fireworks. Paganini was not a musician, he was only a virtuoso, and the whole difficult work sinks out of sight when compared with Bruch's G minor concerto or even the well-worn violin concerto by Mendelssohn. The French and Belgian school of technicalities have led to a high grade of execution, but they have also led away from the true beauty and expressive power of the noblest of instruments. Bach's Chaconne teaches us the lesson that technical difficulty is not incompatible with musical ideas. Paganini's work shows us on the contrary, that it is possible and even easy, to win a popular triumph by bravura alone, and that musical thought is not absolutely essential to violin music. It is, however, certain that Mr. Kneisel by his performance, proved himself a giant in the technique of his instrument.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA'S TOUR.

The sixth annual tour of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Arthur Nikisch, conductor, follows immediately upon the conclusion of its Boston series of 24 public rehearsals and concerts, the organization leaving Boston for Philadelphia this Sunday evening. It is well known that the regular season of the orchestra just now ended has exceeded in its financial success that of any known since its establishment 11 years ago, and this fact, viewed in the light of the unprecedented competition it has been forced to meet is uncontrovertible evidence of the high artistic standard maintained in all its appearances and also of the great popularity of its accomplished conductor.

The substantial character of the indorsement of the Boston orchestra is well shown also by the limited financial risk assumed in the coming tour, despite the fact that the organization will travel with 81 people, mainly by special trains, and with such soloists as Mr. and Mrs. Henschel and Eugen D'Albert. With the exception of three concerts, a handsome surplus over the expense is guaranteed for every appearance of the orchestra throughout the tour, a fact that removes any doubt as to the value of the organization in the estimation of the musical public in all the leading eastern cities.

In the arrangement of the tours of this orchestra care has always been taken to make the travel as easy as possible for the men independent of any question of expense, and Manager Charles A. Ellis, who has been identified with the organization from its formation, has again been so successful that only five nights in the three weeks will be passed on the road. As in former years, Manager Ellis, whose executive ability has put him in the front rank of his associates in this country, goes in advance of the orchestra, and his able assistant, Mr. Fred R. Comee, will personally direct the affairs of the tour in charge of the orchestra.

The first week of the tour is utilized in completing the series of concerts announced for the season in Philadelphia, New York, Washington, Baltimore and Brooklyn, the engagements in the last named city being of the same character as in the home concerts, a public rehearsal occurring on Friday afternoon and the regular concert on Saturday evening.

On Monday evening, May 13, the orchestra appears in New York at the New Madison Square Concert Hall to afford D'Albert an appearance with the organization in that city, and the first week in May will be given to concerts in Buffalo, Cleveland, Columbus, O., Cincinnati and Chicago.

The week of May 9 to 14 will be given to one concert each in Grand Rapids, Mich., Ann Arbor, Mich., and Detroit, and a series of three concerts in Pittsburg, Pa. Leaving Pittsburg directly after the concert of Saturday, May 14, the organization returns home, arriving Monday morning, May 16.

It is good evidence in favor of the standing of the orchestra in other cities that these engagements include a fifth annual appearance with the Mozart Club of Pittsburg, a fifth annual appearance in the Star Course at Cleveland, a third annual appearance with the University Club at Ann Arbor, and second annual appearances with the Cincinnati College of Music and the Orpheus Club of Columbus.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA'S TOUR.

The week just ended has been utilized by the Boston Symphony orchestra in completing its series of concerts in New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington, and again the press and public of these cities have recognized in the most flattering manner the value of this organization and the entire competency of its conductor.

The financial results of these six series of concerts (Brooklyn having the public rehearsal and concert usual in this city) has been more gratifying than ever before, and in New York, where the sharpest competition is met with by the orchestra, its managers have the satisfaction of being already assured by the renewal of subscriptions of the entire success of the concerts next season.

The Boston orchestra was formally adopted by the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society this season, and at a meeting held last week, in anticipation of the final concert of its series last evening, it was decided to deck the stage and conductor's desk with flowers the same as when the position now held by Mr. Nikisch was filled by Theodore Thomas. It was also voted to unanimously adopt the following resolutions as an expression of the sentiments of the entire musical public of Brooklyn:

Resolved, that the board of directors of the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn offers its congratulations to the management of the Boston Symphony orchestra upon the brilliant series of concerts which it has given in Brooklyn during the past season.

Resolved, that the thanks of the society are due to the conductor, Mr. Arthur Nikisch, for the high standard of the music which he has presented, and for the rare excellence of the performances.

Resolved, that the board fully recognizes the important results which have followed the establishment of the Boston Symphony orchestra upon a permanent basis, and desires to express its appreciation of the liberal spirit of devotion to the cause of music which has made such an orchestra possible.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA'S TOUR.

The reports received from the concerts of the week just ended by the Boston Symphony orchestra are well calculated to sustain the faith in this organization on the part of its home admirers, and it is pleasant to know that the favor shown the Boston musicians in the concert rooms of the West is supplemented by marked social courtesies to Director Nikisch and the leaders of the orchestra wherever they appear.

The concert on Monday evening in New York, with D'Albert as soloist made a pronounced success, and this was followed on Tuesday evening by the greatest artistic triumph the orchestra has ever gained in Buffalo, the demand for tickets far exceeding the limits of the auditorium used.

On Wednesday evening at Cleveland, O., the audience numbered over 4000, and both Conductor Nikisch and D'Albert were recalled repeatedly to receive the ovation of the delighted audience. On Thursday evening at Columbus, O., the orchestra played under the auspices of the Orpheus Club, to the capacity of the opera house in that city, and at the close of the concert the Columbus Club gave a dinner to Conductor Nikisch, D'Albert, Messrs. Kneisel, Schroeder and the Adamowskis of the orchestra and Managers Charles A. Ellis and Fred R. Comee.

The concert at Cincinnati on Friday evening, under the auspices of the College of Music, was the most successful financially of any ever given there by the Boston orchestra, the hall being packed and four recalls given Mr. Nikisch after the first number. At Chicago, last evening, the attendance also exceeded the record of any preceding year, and altogether it is evident that the Boston orchestra is getting to be a very popular organization "out West."

The Last Symphony Concert. Part

The man who could find fault with either the programme or the rendition at Saturday night's concert in Music Hall must indeed be hard to please.

Haydn's symphony in G major, Paganini's concerto for violin and Brahms's splendid first symphony in C minor made up a programme of unusual strength and brilliancy.

The appearance of Franz Kneisel, the soloist of the evening, was greeted with prolonged applause. He has been rightly named the "tenderest of violinists," but the expression does not express enough; it conveys no idea of the mellowness of the notes which follow the movement of the bow, of the sweetness of each tone. It would be difficult to imagine more finished performance, his purity of tone and brilliancy of execution meriting all the applause he received with such a modest and unassuming air. The orchestra gave him able support throughout the number.

The Brahms symphony was grandly performed, the whole beauty of this splendid organization coming home with new emphasis to the audience, which year after year has noted the general excellence of the performances, but rarely appreciated to the full the many fine points necessary for this degree of excellence.

It is announced that the opening concert of the orchestra's twelfth season will be given Oct. 15.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The last Symphony concert of this eleventh season showed Mr. Nikisch at his best. There were, to be sure, two symphonies on the programme; but as Brahms—the first, in C minor—is miles away from Haydn—the G major, No. 13—and as each was played properly in time, spirit and manner, there was everything to approve in the selection and the direction. Between them Mr. Kneisel played the concerto in D major by Paganini, passing over its manifold difficulties so easily and elegantly that they did not appear to be such, filling it throughout with a sweet and sufficient tone and adding cadenzas of his own, the variety, brilliancy and elaboration of which were quite in keeping with the original, which, by the way, had been revised and rounded out by Wilhelmj from its author's imperfect manuscript. Mr. Kneisel was heartily received and was recalled again and again with an enthusiasm unparalleled during the season.

A review of the entire season shows that the number of works performed—counting each air or lied separately, although perhaps grouped by the singer—was a little less than one hundred, of which eighty were of German authorship, that is if Rubinstein, Volkmann, Dvorák and Paderewski may be classed in the German schools. The French compositions were five; the American, taking Mr. Loeffler and Mr. Floersheim as belonging here, five; the Russian, three; the Italian, three, and the Scandinavian, one. England was not represented. The works new to Boston, of which several had been heard at least in New York, were twenty; a small group had their first readings here, and Mr. Henschel's "Hamlet" suite was presented for the first time in America. There can be little fault found with this proportion of new to old, although the elder concert-goers would easily have accepted a larger infusion of novelty, and with it a more catholic distribution, the division being this: Germany, eleven works; America, four, Italy, two; France, Russia and Scandinavia, one each. The scheme of programmes could have been easily improved and places made for more desirable material by omitting such works as Berlioz's "Harold"; Liszt's "Preludes"; Schumann's "Overture, Scherzo and Finale"; Schubert's "Rosamunde" music; Beethoven's "Dedication of the House" overture; Wagner's "Huldigung's March" and the "Walküre" selections. Mr. Floersheim's music was not necessary, even as an illustration of American composition, unless it were as a compliment to New York criticism which has been so excessively considerate of the orchestra and its conductor, and the adaptation of the Beethoven movement from a quartette for the full string orchestra could have been well spared. That the programmes have as a whole tended toward heaviness, is indicated by the fact that although each averaged about an hour and three-quarters in performance, the whole number of works was considerably less than in some previous seasons, and this, in spite of the increasing of the total footing by the insertion of six short Schubert songs. The current criticism of the city—which has been practically unanimous, in spite of the different musical training and personal point of view of the various writers—has been to the effect that the work of the orchestra has not been what it should be in accuracy, elegance, aptness or discrimination. The only notable exception has been on the part of one evening paper, the eccentricity of whose opinions about music and the drama has been expressed in language so extravagant as to excite amusement quite as often as any more serious attention. If the band has not absolutely retrograded,—as many competent judges, connoisseurs and dilettanti, as well as critics, have been disposed to say,—it certainly has not advanced, and when it has been at its best in some one work, or throughout one evening, there has been blended with the perfect satisfaction of that time the unavoidable regret that it should not be at its best always. The rapid growth in all the finest qualities of public performance made by the New York Philharmonic orchestra, of which Mr. Damrosch is the conductor, and his own marked improvement in directing, have been observed almost with surprise and commented upon favorably and significantly by the critical who heard its concerts in this town. There were a lesson and a warning in these concerts, but we cannot help doubting whether Boston will be profited by them as it should. The Boston orchestra must be by this time a source of revenue to its management. Liberal estimates do not reach the amount of money received in advance for tickets to its concerts here; gains are made of course when its men are supplied to other organizations, and its concerts in other cities are almost without exception contracted for at remunerative rates. While there is ground for pride in all this, there is also cause for distrustful anticipation. The orchestra plays during the season to many audiences which have no opportunity to compare it with others and no standard of absolute judgment. Its conductor has been confirmed in his position for another term of years, as it is understood, and therefore both he and his men have some reason to assume that their way is the right way and to persist in it. In art, as in everything else, the path which does not tend upward tends downward, and the orchestra now stands near the dividing of the ways with an inclination toward the wrong. If merely a far-seeing and bold speculation had prompted the establishment of these concerts, it would be almost impertinent and certainly foolish for the press to repeat from week to week its criticisms. But the orchestra took its rise, as has always been said, in an honest, generous and courageous desire to benefit musical art and music lovers, to show the truth and to insist upon it. If this be so, the press is right in calling upon the founder of the orchestra—even though it now costs him little or nothing—to see that it fulfils its purpose,

304
On Monday evening, May 2, the orchestra appears in New York at the New Madison Square Concert Hall to afford D'Albert an appearance with the organization in that city, and the first week in May will be given to concerts in Buffalo, Cleveland, Columbus, O., Cincinnati and Chicago.

The week of May 9 to 14 will be given to one concert each in Grand Rapids, Mich., Ann Arbor, Mich., and Detroit, and a series of three concerts in Pittsburg, Pa. Leaving Pittsburg directly after the concert of Saturday, May 14, the organization returns home, arriving Monday morning, May 16.

It is good evidence in favor of the standing of the orchestra in other cities that these engagements include a fifth annual appearance with the Mozart Club of Pittsburg, a fifth annual appearance in the Star Course at Cleveland, a third annual appearance with the University Club at Ann Arbor, and second annual appearances with the Cincinnati College of Music and the Orpheus Club of Columbus.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA'S TOUR.

The week just ended has been utilized by the Boston Symphony orchestra in completing its series of concerts in New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington, and again the press and public of these cities have recognized in the most flattering manner the value of this organization and the entire competency of its conductor.

The financial results of these six series of concerts (Brooklyn having the public rehearsal and concert usual in this city) has been more gratifying than ever before, and in New York, where the sharpest competition is met with by the orchestra, its managers have the satisfaction of being already assured by the renewal of subscriptions of the entire success of the concerts next season.

The Boston orchestra was formally adopted by the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society this season, and at a meeting held last week, in anticipation of the final concert of its series last evening, it was decided to deck the stage and conductor's desk with flowers the same as when the position now held by Mr. Nikisch was filled by Theodore Thomas. It was also voted to unanimously adopt the following resolutions as an expression of the sentiments of the entire musical public of Brooklyn:

Resolved, that the board of directors of the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn offers its congratulations to the management of the Boston Symphony orchestra upon the brilliant series of concerts which it has given in Brooklyn during the past season.

Resolved, that the thanks of the society are due to the conductor, Mr. Arthur Nikisch, for the high standard of the music which he has presented, and for the rare excellence of the performances.

Resolved, that the board fully recognizes the important results which have followed the establishment of the Boston Symphony orchestra upon a permanent basis, and desires to express its appreciation of the liberal spirit of devotion to the cause of music which has made such an orchestra possible.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA'S TOUR.

The reports received from the concerts of the week just ended by the Boston Symphony orchestra are well calculated to sustain the faith in this organization on the part of its home admirers, and it is pleasant to know that the favor shown the Boston musicians in the concert rooms of the West is supplemented by marked social courtesies to Director Nikisch and the leaders of the orchestra wherever they appear.

The concert on Monday evening in New York, with D'Albert as soloist made a pronounced success, and this was followed on Tuesday evening by the greatest artistic triumph the orchestra has ever gained in Buffalo, the demand for tickets far exceeding the limits of the auditorium used.

On Wednesday evening at Cleveland, O., the audience numbered over 4000; and both Conductor Nikisch and D'Albert were recalled repeatedly to receive the ovation of the delighted audience. On Thursday evening at Columbus, O., the orchestra played under the auspices of the Orpheus Club, to the capacity of the opera house in that city, and at the close of the concert the Columbus Club gave a dinner to Conductor Nikisch, D'Albert, Messrs. Kneisel, Schroeder and the Adamowskis of the orchestra and Managers Charles A. Ellis and Fred R. Comee.

The concert at Cincinnati on Friday evening, under the auspices of the College of Music, was the most successful financially of any ever given there by the Boston orchestra, the hall being packed and four recalls given Mr. Nikisch after the first number. At Chicago, last evening, the attendance also exceeded the record of any preceding year, and altogether it is evident that the Boston orchestra is getting to be a very popular organization "out West."

The Last Symphony Concert. Part

The man who could find fault with either the programme or the rendition at Saturday night's concert in Music Hall must indeed be hard to please.

Haydn's symphony in G major, Paganini's concerto for violin and Brahms's splendid first symphony in C minor made up a programme of unusual strength and brilliancy.

The appearance of Franz Kneisel, the soloist of the evening, was greeted with prolonged applause. He has been rightly named the "tenderest of violinists," but the expression does not express enough; it conveys no idea of the mellowness of the notes which follow the movement of the bow, of the sweetness of each tone. It would be difficult to imagine more finished performance, his purity of tone and brilliancy of execution meriting all the applause he received with such a modest and unassuming air. The orchestra gave him able support throughout the number.

The Brahms symphony was grandly performed, the whole beauty of this splendid organization coming home with new emphasis to the audience, which year after year has noted the general excellence of the performances, but rarely appreciated to the full the many fine points necessary for this degree of excellence.

It is announced that the opening concert of the orchestra's twelfth season will be given Oct. 15.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The last Symphony concert of this eleventh season showed Mr. Nikisch at his best. There were, to be sure, two symphonies on the programme; but as Brahms—the first, in C minor—is miles away from Haydn—the G major, No. 13—and as each was played properly in time, spirit and manner, there was everything to approve in the selection and the direction. Between them Mr. Kneisel played the concerto in D major by Paganini, passing over its manifold difficulties so easily and elegantly that they did not appear to be such, filling it throughout with a sweet and sufficient tone and adding cadenzas of his own, the variety, brilliancy and elaboration of which were quite in keeping with the original, which, by the way, had been revised and rounded out by Wilhelmj from its author's imperfect manuscript. Mr. Kneisel was heartily received and was recalled again and again with an enthusiasm unparalleled during the season.

A review of the entire season shows that the number of works performed—counting each air or lied separately, although perhaps grouped by the singer—was a little less than one hundred, of which eighty were of German authorship, that is if Rubinstein, Volkmann, Dvorák and Paderewski may be classed in the German schools. The French compositions were five; the American, taking Mr. Loeffler and Mr. Floersheim as belonging here, five; the Russian, three; the Italian, three, and the Scandinavian, one. England was not represented. The works new to Boston, of which several had been heard at least in New York, were twenty; a small group had their first readings here, and Mr. Henschel's "Hamlet" suite was presented for the first time in America. There can be little fault found with this proportion of new to old, although the elder concert-goers would easily have accepted a larger infusion of novelty, and with it a more catholic distribution, the division being this: Germany, eleven works; America, four, Italy, two; France, Russia and Scandinavia, one each. The scheme of programmes could have been easily improved and places made for more desirable material by omitting such works as Berlioz's "Harold"; Liszt's "Preludes"; Schumann's "Overture, Scherzo and Finale"; Schubert's "Rosamunde" music; Beethoven's "Dedication of the House" overture; Wagner's "Huldigung's March" and the "Walküre" selections. Mr. Floersheim's music was not necessary, even as an illustration of American composition, unless it were as a compliment to New York criticism which has been so excessively considerate of the orchestra and its conductor, and the adaptation of the Beethoven movement from a quartette for the full string orchestra could have been well spared. That the programmes have as a whole tended toward heaviness, is indicated by the fact that although each averaged about an hour and three-quarters in performance, the whole number of works was considerably less than in some previous seasons, and this, in spite of the increasing of the total footing by the insertion of six short Schubert songs. The current criticism of the city—which has been practically unanimous, in spite of the different musical training and personal point of view of the various writers—has been to the effect that the work of the orchestra has not been what it should be in accuracy, elegance, aptness or discrimination. The only notable exception has been on the part of one evening paper, the eccentricity of whose opinions about music and the drama has been expressed in language so extravagant as to excite amusement quite as often as any more serious attention. If the band has not absolutely retrograded,—as many competent judges, connoisseurs and dilettanti, as well as critics, have been disposed to say,—it certainly has not advanced, and when it has been at its best in some one work, or throughout one evening, there has been blended with the perfect satisfaction of that time the unavoidable regret that it should not be at its best always. The rapid growth in all the finest qualities of public performance made by the New York Philharmonic orchestra, of which Mr. Damrosch is the conductor, and his own marked improvement in directing, have been observed almost with surprise and commented upon favorably and significantly by the critical who heard its concerts in this town. There were a lesson and a warning in these concerts, but we cannot help doubting whether Boston will be profited by them as it should. The Boston orchestra must be by this time a source of revenue to its management. Liberal estimates do not reach the amount of money received in advance for tickets to its concerts here; gains are made of course when its men are supplied to other organizations, and its concerts in other cities are almost without exception contracted for at remunerative rates. While there is ground for pride in all this, there is also cause for distrustful anticipation. The orchestra plays during the season to many audiences which have no opportunity to compare it with others and no standard of absolute judgment. Its conductor has been confirmed in his position for another term of years, as it is understood, and therefore both he and his men have some reason to assume that their way is the right way and to persist in it. In art, as in everything else, the path which does not tend upward tends downward, and the orchestra now stands near the dividing of the ways with an inclination toward the wrong. If merely a far-seeing and bold speculation had prompted the establishment of these concerts, it would be almost impertinent and certainly foolish for the press to repeat from week to week its criticisms. But the orchestra took its rise, as has always been said, in an honest, generous and courageous desire to benefit musical art and music lovers, to show the truth and to insist upon it. If this be so, the press is right in calling upon the founder of the orchestra—even though it now costs him little or nothing—to see that it fulfils its purpose, 306 and to forbid its conductor to give false impressions of the spirit and the form of the masterpieces of music. If he does not do this, he will be responsible for the implanting and diffusion of error, for ignorance and defiance of the truth and for the encouragement of the pernicious doctrine that a performer is greater than an author, that a messenger may misrepresent him who speaks by him and a servant set at naught the commands of his lord. That Mr. Nikisch is able and of much promise, one would stultify one's self to deny; but that he uses his ability so as to make improbable the fulfilment of that promise is also indefinable. If he be too proud, too vain or too self-sufficient to learn, he is not fit to teach, and if he be unwilling to follow authority, like a good centurion, he ought not to have soldiers under him. The pecuniary status of the orchestra may be assured for a long future, but its place in art and in educational influence is yet to be settled. Mr. Nikisch's next term may determine this, and if he be allowed to follow his fantasy and take counsel of his own pertinacity, there can be little doubt as to what the result will be. It is easier to pull down than to build up, and it behooves Mr. Higginson to consider seriously whether—if he and his intentions and desires have been rightly understood—he can afford to let the fortunes of the orchestra drift or be guided at the pleasure of one romantic and self-willed man.

305

WINS CHICAGO PRAISE

Chic. Tribune May 8, 92

A BIG AUDIENCE HEARS THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Central Music Hall Filled with Persons Who Applauded Mr. Nikisch and His Musicians in an Enthusiastic Way—Their Right to Be Called the First Orchestra of America Clearly Proved—Violinist Remenyi Warmly Received by the Union League Club.

If the young Boston women who hang on Mr. Arthur Nikisch's baton, metaphorically speaking, from the beginning of the "symphony" season in that city to its lamented end, could have been present at Central Music Hall last evening they would have been gratified at the reception Chicago accorded their petted orchestra. They might have felt, possibly, that the applause accorded Mr. Nikisch was far scantier than his deserts, but they would certainly have found comfort in the fact that the night was fair beyond what is ordinarily expected of Chicago nights in early spring, and that the audience was all that it should be.

Every seat in the hall was filled from the front row in the pit to the very farthest in the second balcony, and enthusiasts stood in the aisles and foyer during the entire program.

It was a representative audience, too, made up from all classes of Chicago society, including all the types with which the inveterate concert-goer is familiar—the inconsiderate man who promenades the foyer in squeaky patent-leather shoes, the inconsiderate woman who chatters without regard for orchestral shading, the elegant young person who carries an American Beauty rose, that other who clutches a paper-bag of bonbons, and, not least, the serious-minded folk who propose to listen to the music and who persevere in their determination grimly.

Each visit of Mr. Nikisch and his orchestra brings increase of admiration for them both and for their thoroughly artistic work. As a conductor Mr. Nikisch satisfies by the high musicianship and the scholarly qualities displayed in his readings, and delights the artistic as well as the esthetic senses of his hearers by the poetic and emotional power of his interpretations. The orchestra stands today the product of over a decade of severe discipline, rigid technical drill, and constant practice under gifted and thorough directors, and it is to his long and careful training that it in a large measure owes its position today as the first orchestra of America, and one whose equals in Europe are but few. The playing last evening proved conclusively the right of the organization to this position, and the results were in every respect such as the most exacting spirit could require from an orchestra of such worth. Technically flawless, the work of the men may be considered as beyond aught save the highest praise.

The interpretation accorded Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture, Saint-Saëns' "Rouet d'Omphale," the "Pilgrim's March" from Berlioz, "Harold in Italy," and Schumann's Symphony No. 1 was in each instance masterly. Belonging as they did to the romantic or the modern school of composition, these selections lent themselves with unusual grace to the impassioned, highly emotional style of Mr. Nikisch's interpreting, and their poetic and dramatic beauties stood revealed with superb power and seemed to gain increased splendor of coloring and tonal effects by his affectionate treatment. The Goldmark overture was given with rare appreciation of its marked oriental character, and the Saint-Saëns Symphonic Poem was almost ideal in the technical finish with which it was played and in the delicacy and the keen appreciation of its dramatic import which characterized its interpretation. Schumann's joyous Symphony received a performance, which, for perfection of execution and loveliness of reading, has rarely been equaled in this city. The box-holders at the concert were:

Mr. and Mrs. J. M. Clark, Mrs. J. J. Glessner, Mrs. A. N. Eddy, Mr. Beal, Mr. G. Hickes, Miss Getty, Mrs. W. B. Howard, and Mr. Crane.

MAY 16, 1892.

NIKISCH AS CONDUCTOR.

A Reply to the Musical Courier Critic.

Mr. Gori's Opinion of the Boston Symphony Leader.

The Gag to be Applied to the Boston Press.

The New York Musical Courier seems to be quite exercised over the opinion expressed by the majority of Boston critics concerning the incapacity of Nikisch as a conductor, and would have its readers believe that Nikisch has never suffered severe criticism at the hands of other than the Boston members of the critical fraternity. Regarding this unfavorable opinion of the Boston critics, the Musical Courier remarks that it is "in startling contrast to the unanimity of the press throughout the country." Now as regards this claimed unanimity away from Boston, let us call attention to one break in its ranks, and that is in the case of Mr. Gori, by far the best equipped of all the New York critics, as critic of the New York American Musician, until its recent discontinuance the leading musical journal of the country. Mr. Gori laid the severest strictures upon Nikisch's efforts in connection with the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts in New York city.

As regards Mr. Gori's ability it might be well to say that he has had great experience as a conductor of orchestras abroad; is a first class musician and composer; as a musical critic he had no axe to grind; did not solicit the publication of the portraits of any conductor and his wife; had no compositions for production by the Boston conductor; enjoys the reputation of having composed his own music and scored it without the aid of other men's wits; and not being a rabid Wagnerite he was not offended because Mr. Seidl was not elected conductor of the New York permanent orchestra instead of Mr. Damrosch, the present able and efficient incumbent.

Let us now look at the critique in the number of the American Musician, issued

Dec. 13, 1890, and see what Mr. Gori's opinion is of Nikisch as a conductor:

The gradual deterioration of the once famous Boston orchestra from relative perfection to absolute mediocrity has by this time become so clearly defined that the most superficial observer could not avoid remarking the consequences at the last concert. The results of the insufficient authority exercised by the leader and his lax discipline are so manifest that "he who runs may read" the lessons which they teach. The sad work of disintegration begun last season continues this year with accelerated virulence. Under Gericke's direction the work of the orchestra was distinguished by its accuracy, precision in details and by the just balance always maintained between different families of orchestral instruments. Today the conditions are changed; the execution is careless, details are neglected, and now one body of instruments and then another is assertive and blatant to the detriment of the quality of tone of the orchestra as a homogeneous whole.

Again in another critique Mr. Gori writes thus of Nikisch as an interpreter.

Nikisch displays neither individuality in conception, nor originality of expression; the only ideal effect which he seems intent on attaining is a plastic one, the eye being called upon to assist the ear in grasping its import. The only dynamic effects which he obtains are extremes; the grades of transition are missing, consequently the passage from one extreme to the other is abrupt and often illogical, so that it is unexpected not only for the hearers but even for the executants themselves. In his manipulation of the baton of command, Mr. Nikisch indulges in capricious fantasticities which ought, perhaps, to be qualified as a system of mystification, with which he seeks to make an impression on a certain portion of his public. The erratic circles, semi-circles and ellipses, the sudden sweeps of the arms, the hands fluttering from side to side or poised in statuesque immobility in mid-air, the occasional disappearance of the right hand while the left languidly continues to beat the measure, the turning of the entire body towards one side of the orchestra, presenting of course a rear view to the other, are eccentricities which might be found appropriate in a professional mesmerist, but are singularly out of place in a classic orchestra conductor. One might be disposed to overlook all this by-play did it serve any legitimate artistic purpose; unfortunately it does not, as it only results in diverting the attention of the audience from the music to the person of its would-be expounder.

It is only necessary to observe that the above criticisms are in accord with the opinion of the majority of Boston critics that has disturbed the Musical Courier so sensibly, and with Mr. Gori's opinion is conveyed the assurance that the Boston Symphony Orchestra plays as badly in New York as it does in Boston and, of course, the other "provin-

and to forbid its conductor to give false impressions of the spirit and the form of the masterpieces of music. If he does not do this, he will be responsible for the implanting and diffusion of error, for ignorance and defiance of the truth and for the encouragement of the pernicious doctrine that a performer is greater than an author, that a messenger may misrepresent him who speaks by him and a servant set at naught the commands of his lord. That Mr. Nikisch is able and of much promise, one would stultify one's self to deny; but that he uses his ability so as to make improbable the fulfilment of that promise is also indefinable. If he be too proud, too vain or too self-sufficient to learn, he is not fit to teach, and if he be unwilling to follow authority, like a good centurion, he ought not to have soldiers under him. The pecuniary status of the orchestra may be assured for a long future, but its place in art and in educational influence is yet to be settled. Mr. Nikisch's next term may determine this, and if he be allowed to follow his fantasy and take counsel of his own pertinacity, there can be little doubt as to what the result will be. It is easier to pull down than to build up, and it behooves Mr. Higginson to consider seriously whether—if he and his intentions and desires have been rightly understood—he can afford to let the fortunes of the orchestra drift or be guided at the pleasure of one romantic and self-willed man.

WINS CHICAGO PRAISE

Chic. Tribune

May 8. 92

A BIG AUDIENCE HEARS THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Central Music Hall Filled with Persons Who Applauded Mr. Nikisch and His Musicians in an Enthusiastic Way—Their Right to Be Called the First Orchestra of America Clearly Proved—Violinist Remenyi Warmly Received by the Union League Club.

If the young Boston women who hang on Mr. Arthur Nikisch's baton, metaphorically speaking, from the beginning of the "symphony" season in that city to its lamented end, could have been present at Central Music Hall last evening they would have been gratified at the reception Chicago accorded their petted orchestra. They might have felt, possibly, that the applause accorded Mr. Nikisch was far scantier than his deserts, but they would certainly have found comfort in the fact that the night was fair beyond what is ordinarily expected of Chicago nights in early spring, and that the audience was all that it should be.

Every seat in the hall was filled from the front row in the pit to the very farthest in the second balcony, and enthusiasts stood in the aisles and foyer during the entire program.

It was a representative audience, too, made up from all classes of Chicago society, including all the types with which the inveterate concert-goer is familiar—the inconsiderate man who promenades the foyer in squeaky patent-leather shoes, the inconsiderate woman who chatters without regard for orchestral shading, the elegant young person who carries an American Beauty rose, that other who clutches a paper-bag of bonbons, and, not least, the serious-minded folk who propose to listen to the music and who persevere in their determination grimly.

Each visit of Mr. Nikisch and his orchestra brings increase of admiration for them both and for their thoroughly artistic work. As a conductor Mr. Nikisch satisfies by the high musicianship and the scholarly qualities displayed in his readings, and delights the artistic as well as the esthetic senses of his hearers by the poetic and emotional power of his interpretations. The orchestra stands today the product of over a decade of severe discipline, rigid technical drill, and constant practice under gifted and thorough directors, and it is to his long and careful training that it in a large measure owes its position today as the first orchestra of America, and one whose equals in Europe are but few. The playing last evening proved conclusively the right of the organization to this position, and the results were in every respect such as the most exacting spirit could require from an orchestra of such worth. Technically flawless, the work of the men may be considered as beyond aught save the highest praise.

The interpretation accorded Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture, Saint-Saëns "Rouet d'Omphale," the "Pilgrim's March" from Berlioz, "Harold in Italy," and Schumann's Symphony No. 1 was in each instance masterly. Belonging as they did to the romantic or the modern school of composition, these selections lent themselves with unusual grace to the impassioned, highly emotional style of Mr. Nikisch's interpreting, and their poetic and dramatic beauties stood revealed with superb power and seemed to gain increased splendor of coloring and tonal effects by his affectionate treatment. The Goldmark overture was given with rare appreciation of its marked oriental character, and the Saint-Saëns Symphonic Poem was almost ideal in the technical finish with which it was played and in the delicacy and the keen appreciation of its dramatic import which characterized its interpretation. Schumann's joyous Symphony received a performance, which, for perfection of execution and loveliness of reading, has rarely been equaled in this city. The box-holders at the concert were:

Mr. and Mrs. J. M. Clark, Mrs. J. J. Glessner, Mrs. A. N. Eddy, Mr. Beal, Mr. G. Hickes, Miss Getty, Mrs. W. B. Howard, and Mr. Crane.

MAY 16, 1892.

NIKISCH AS CONDUCTOR.

A Reply to the Musical Courier Critic.

Mr. Gori's Opinion of the Boston Symphony Leader.

The Gag to be Applied to the Boston Press.

The New York Musical Courier seems to be quite exercised over the opinion expressed by the majority of Boston critics concerning the incapacity of Nikisch as a conductor, and would have its readers believe that Nikisch has never suffered severe criticism at the hands of other than the Boston members of the critical fraternity. Regarding this unfavorable opinion of the Boston critics, the Musical Courier remarks that it is "in startling contrast to the unanimity of the press throughout the country." Now as regards this claimed unanimity away from Boston, let us call attention to one break in its ranks, and that is in the case of Mr. Gori, by far the best equipped of all the New York critics, as critic of the New York American Musician, until its recent discontinuance the leading musical journal of the country. Mr. Gori laid the severest strictures upon Nikisch's efforts in connection with the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts in New York city.

As regards Mr. Gori's ability it might be well to say that he has had great experience as a conductor of orchestras abroad; is a first class musician and composer; as a musical critic he had no axe to grind; did not solicit the publication of the portraits of any conductor and his wife; had no compositions for production by the Boston conductor; enjoys the reputation of having composed his own music and scored it without the aid of other men's wits; and not being a rabid Wagnerite he was not offended because Mr. Seidl was not elected conductor of the New York permanent orchestra instead of Mr. Damrosch, the present able and efficient incumbent.

Let us now look at the critique in the number of the American Musician, issued Dec. 13, 1890, and see what Mr. Gori's opinion is of Nikisch as a conductor:

The gradual deterioration of the once famous Boston orchestra from relative perfection to absolute mediocrity has by this time become so clearly defined that the most superficial observer could not avoid remarking the consequences at the last concert. The results of the insufficient authority exercised by the leader and his lax discipline are so manifest that "he who runs may read" the lessons which they teach. The sad work of disintegration begun last season continues this year with accelerated virulence. Under Gericke's direction the work of the orchestra was distinguished by its accuracy, precision in details and by the just balance always maintained between different families of orchestral instruments. Today the conditions are changed; the execution is careless, details are neglected, and now one body of instruments and then another is assertive and blatant to the detriment of the quality of tone of the orchestra as a homogeneous whole.

Again in another critique Mr. Gori writes thus of Nikisch as an interpreter.

Nikisch displays neither individuality in conception, nor originality of expression; the only ideal effect which he seems intent on attaining is a plastic one, the eye being called upon to assist the ear in grasping its import. The only dynamic effects which he obtains are extremes; the grades of transition are missing, consequently the passage from one extreme to the other is abrupt and often illogical, so that it is unexpected not only for the hearers but even for the executants themselves. In his manipulation of the baton of command, Mr. Nikisch indulges in capricious fantasticalities which ought, perhaps, to be qualified as a system of mystification, with which he seeks to make an impression on a certain portion of his public. The erratic circles, semi-circles and ellipses, the sudden sweeps of the arms, the hands fluttering from side to side or poised in statuesque immobility in mid-air, the occasional disappearance of the right hand while the left languidly continues to beat the measure, the turning of the entire body towards one side of the orchestra, presenting of course a rear view to the other, are eccentricities which might be found appropriate in a professional mesmerist, but are singularly out of place in a classic orchestra conductor. One might be disposed to overlook all this by-play did it serve any legitimate artistic purpose; unfortunately it does not, as it only results in diverting the attention of the audience from the music to the person of its would-be expounder.

It is only necessary to observe that the above criticisms are in accord with the opinion of the majority of Boston critics that has disturbed the Musical Courier so sensibly, and with Mr. Gori's opinion is conveyed the assurance that the Boston Symphony Orchestra plays as badly in New York as it does in Boston and, of course, the other "provincial" cities where it goes are treated to the same sort of performance. Mr. Woolf of the Saturday Evening Gazette has so successfully replied to what the Musical Courier has had to say on the subject of this derogatory opinion of the Boston critics that with its Nikisch-worship it is driven to the wall, from whence comes the threat that "the result of all this may be the dismissal of these Boston critics from their places on the papers," etc. It don't tell who is to apply the gag to the press, but then I suppose we shall find that out later on. Oh, happy fellows, Bacon of the Herald and Apthorp of the Transcript! The wrath to come will not visit you. But tremble, ye miserable wretches, Hale, Elson, Woolf, Ticknor, for knowing the truth and daring to tell it! You are tried and found guilty, and the guillotine awaits you. You know not the moment when the executioner will come for you or how soon your head will be dancing in the bloody basket. Do I expect to escape? Well, I guess not. "We are five" on the black roll of the Musical Courier, and I rejoice that I am with you, my comrades.

The editor of the Courier might compose a joyful tune in celebration of our timely taking off, and get his friend Nikisch to play it. No doubt he would do it with great pleasure. It might be well to suggest that it be scored "full," with fff's in the brass and tympani. Tempo rubato. A la Hungarian. In the meantime we calmly await our fate.

AT THE PROMENADES.

Musical Boston Begins Its Season of Relaxation.

A Great Audience Fills Music Hall—The Tables and Balconies All Occupied—Director Adamowski Given a Hearty Greeting—Some Bright Novelties in the Programme.

Musical Boston again abandoned its winter aspect, and entered upon its summer season of relaxation at Music Hall last evening.

There is little in common between the audiences that throng this auditorium during the season of Symphony concerts and those that crowd the tables and balconies at the promenades, and yet the same faces are seen at both series of concerts.

This may seem contradictory, but its truth will be vouched for by any one who has watched the attendants upon Music Hall concerts throughout the year.

The same individual who sits bolt upright, with an "I know it all" sort of expression, in the winter may be seen seated with crossed continuations and generally comfortable pose, tapping the table in time with the merry dance measures, or chatting in an undertone about the gossip of the day with the most unaffected expression and with every indication of enjoyment.

"You will find no more cosmopolitan style of audience on the continent of Europe than you see here tonight," was a remark heard in passing a group just inside "the ring," as the square of inclosed tables is known, and a little farther within the charmed square a representative from 'Frisco's best society admitted that no more attractive audience could be got together in the city of the "Golden Gate," a compliment only to be fully appreciated by those acquainted with the high estimate a native of 'Frisco puts upon everything and everybody "hailing" from that transcontinental metropolis.

This is the seventh season that Manager Charles A. Ellis has opened Music Hall to the lovers of such entertainments as are provided in these promenade concerts, and last evening was in many ways merely a repetition of the sights, sounds and scenes which have characterized other opening nights in former years.

The floor was filled with tables, each of which had its full complement of sociably inclined patrons, the balconies held a large contingent of those who found the musical programme an ample attraction, all around the balcony fronts were the traditional festoons of green, the stage line was marked by a border of gay bunting, and a background of cool green boughs gave additional prominence to the men of the orchestra. The service on the floor was prompt and as noiseless as circumstances and commodities would permit, and all about the keen-sighted assistants of the manager watched and guarded against all that would mar the pleasure of the patrons of the evening.

A year ago, when Mr. T. Adamowski stepped to the conductor's desk to open the season's Promenades, his ability as a conductor was somewhat of an unknown quantity. His skill as a soloist and ensemble player had given him a well deserved reputation in these lines of work, but his power to control a large orchestra and to intelligently assume the duties of his new position were questioned even by his well-wishers.

His success in the concerts of last season served to remove all doubts as to his fitness for the position to which he was appointed, and when he stepped to the conductor's desk last evening he was greeted with a spontaneous outburst of applause that showed beyond all question an acknowledgment of his being the right man in the right place. His programme was as follows:

Kronungsmarsch.....Meyerbeer
Ballet music, "Henry VIII.".....Saint-Saens
(a) Gypsy dance.
(b) Gigue.
Waltz, "Kaiser".....Strauss
Overture, "Orpheus".....Offenbach
Overture, "Die Meistersinger".....Wagner
Ballet music, "Boabdil".....Moszkowski
(a) Scherzo waltz.
(b) Malaguena.
Hymn to "St. Cecilia".....Gounod
Overture, "Fledermans".....Strauss
Selection, "Cavalleria Rusticana".....Mascagni
Loin de Bal.....Gillet
Polka, "Libelle".....Strauss
March, "Boccaccio".....Suppe

It is generally understood that critical consideration of these concerts is out of form. They are given for the enjoyment of patrons, and such music lovers as cannot listen without mentally measuring the correctness of the "readings" and the details of the interpretation given the various compositions should remain away from the Promenades.

Not that Mr. Adamowski does not give intelligent readings and artistic interpretations, but such programmes are not fully appreciated unless properly received, and an exercise of critical judgment sadly interferes with the full value of a Strauss waltz.

It was delightful to hear again the selections from the "Henry VIII." ballet music, and the brilliant "Kaiser" waltz, new to Boston, and the "Boabdil" ballet music, new to America, set all feet tapping and created a sensation among the lovers of those forms of composition. The "Cavalleria Rusticana" selections was played with such splendid fire and dash that it created a furor, and the "Orpheus" overture was followed by an ovation that showed how fully the director's abilities were appreciated.

All in all, it was a brilliant opening night, and, without doubt, it began the most successful season of the Promenades yet known. The concerts continue for six weeks, from 8 to 11 each evening, with constantly varied programmes.

(FROM OUR SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT.)

PARIS, Nov. 1, 1888. The Lemoireux concerts began last Sunday, just one week later than the symphony concerts under Mr. Gerike baton in Music's Hall. I must confess I listened with mingled feelings to what musical judges consider the finest orchestra in Europe, and I cannot say I have quite recovered yet from the impression it has made on me, actuated as I am with the idea that Boston's orchestra could not be beat, even in Paris, not to mention London and other art centres. But last Sunday afternoon I buckled on all my critical Boston armor. I started out in the warm October sunshine for the Cirque in the Champs Elysees, where, at 2:15, the Lemoireux concerts are given. The weather was too heavenly almost to think of going indoors and leaving it, and I never wished more ardently for the power to be in a dozen places at once. That's the way in Paris. You want to divide yourself into 50 pieces and go somewhere with every one of them. The world and his wife—and here the world is a Mormon, for there are lots of wives—were evidently of my mind, as the most hilarious Fourth of July at home is but a circumstance to the gayety and the crowds which distracted my Sunday-go-meeting attention en route. Fashionable Paris dashed about in superb equipages, hastening goodness knows where, the humbler classes spinning along in the public volitures, some of them carrying five people, not counting the inevitable bebe, and throngs on foot sunning themselves in the balmy air, as though they had not a care or a responsibility in life, was all a picture that you have to come to this adorable city to see of a Sunday afternoon. It was so different from solemn, proper, Commonwealth avenue at the same time of day. I wondered if I were really in the flesh or not in another sphere!

"Glitter and Froth!"

Yes. But what a relief to have a little "glitter and froth" after the dullness, the solid boredom of a New England Sunday afternoon. I find that most Bostonians over here share this pious sentiment, and having paid their devoirs to the Mme. de Berri Sunday morning, go in for a "good time" the rest of the day. It is certainly a very mild dissipation to go to a Sunday concert where one hears the best music, and I had no compunctions in doing so. I wish Boston had a hall like the Cirque for concerts. The acoustics here are perfect, and Lemoireux's arrangement of the orchestra is very much better for effect than Mr. Gerike's. But getting into the place is like getting through the eye of a needle. You have to go through so much when you go to a public place of entertainment, and the doorkeepers, the ticket takers, the harpies who show you your seats, and all the complications, generally, of locations, are enough to distract a novice accustomed to the simpler formalities of the theatre or concert entertainers at home. When you are once in your seat, and the officious she usher in a pink-ribboned cap has pocketed the two sous for doing nothing at all with a great deal of bluster, and departed to annoy some one else, the interior of this concert hall strikes you as delightfully sociable. The audience is cut up in sections, according to price, the least desirable places being the most expensive, and corresponding in situation to those in the parquet of a theatre. The cheapest seats in the upper tier of the second balcony cost only 40 cents, and as they are as fine for hearing as the $1.60 seats on the floor, are frequented by the best as well as by the most musical people. Our seats in the "premiere" cost $1, but they were the choicest. I thought of the prices paid for our symphony tickets and hugged myself, as I read over this programme of the eighth series of the Lemoireux concerts.

1. Ouverture de Phedre.....J. Massenet
2. Symphonie en si bemol (No. 4).....Beethoven
3. Romance pour orchestre (1re audition a Paris).....Dvorak
4. Ouverture de Genevieve (1re audition aux Concerts-Lemoireux).....Schumann
5. Les Murmures de la Foret (de Siegfried).....R. Wagner
6. Prelude de Deluge.....Saint-Saens
Le solon de violon, par M. Houfflack.
7. Polonaise de Struensee.....Meyerbeer

Here Was Variety,

novelty and the old familiar numbers we know by heart, a model programme, in fact, which proved as good as it looked. The 10 minutes previous to the beginning of the overture were thoroughly entertaining, for having settled into our own places we could gaze at Paris, for rather a two thousand crumb of Paris getting seated. It was delightful not to see the Marlboros, the Beacons and other Back Bay satellites, not to speak in too much of the base ball vernacular, parading down the narrow aisles, and I must confess the French style of baldhead was even a comfort after years of the Boston variety. As a matter of fact, baldheads do not prevail in Paris. No doubt they ought to, if wickedness takes off the hair, but the consequences of "living" don't show themselves on the top of a Frenchman's skull, as far as my observation goes. There were any number of old men, distinguished in appearance, in the audience, but I saw no one more singularly noticeable that afternoon than Theodore Tilton. He is still a very handsome man, though age has whitened his locks and deepened the lines in his

Finely Moulded Face.

Any one would remark him in a crowd, but it was impossible to pass him over as he sat there among so many good looking strangers, listening with the deepest enjoyment to the music. As we all sat in a circle, of course it was very easy to recognize one's acquaintances all over the house. Again I compared "the back seat" sensation in Music Hall with this cheery, sociable disposition of an audience, and heartily wished Boston had a cirque for concert purposes. So much of the pleasure of hearing music is in the sight of the performers, and to watch Lamoreux's splendid band is a joy for the most critical eye. The conductor himself shows in every motion what a master he is, though he looks, when not waving that baton, a good natured, stout old party in spectacles, whom you take for anybody rather than a musician. But when he raps on the desk and begins his work you feel the presence of a master, and are carried along with the orchestra with almost magical force. His orchestra is the instrument on which he plays. And such playing! I didn't want to think it would be so fine. I wanted to be critical, and to say, after it was over, "Pshaw, our Boston orchestra is precisely as good! This Lamoreux is no better than Gericke." But I am unable to perjure myself, even for the sake of Boston prejudice, Boston loyalty, and the knowledge that I may be pilloried for my candor. I do not say Mr. Gericke's orchestra does not play well. I only say that it has not attained

This Perfection of Style and finish. I never heard the Fourth Symphony interpreted as Lamoreux read it at this concert. Virility, color, dignity were the leading characteristics, and though it was a disappointment at first that it had not been the fifth or the seventh, when it came to an end I felt I had listened to almost a new work. And how they applauded! It seems odd to get excited over a Beethoven symphony, but the freshness and beauty of this reading thrilled one through and through. Curiously enough this number and the Wagner selection were received with the most favor. The new romance by Dvorak is rather melodious, but it won't set the river on fire. It was played with exquisite delicacy. You all know that Lamoreux is a Wagnerite, and so, too, is "tout Paris," and I cannot much blame them if we are to hear this sort of reading of the idol of the day, for I begin to feel the prevailing frenzy creeping through my veins, even on this first occasion. It was a masterly performance, and Lamoreux beamed over his gold-rimmed spectacles in acknowledgment of the cheers, but he only shook his head in response to the repeated cries for an encore. Alas, the encore fiend flourishes here as elsewhere, indeed there is a good deal more of him in this enthusiastic art centre, but he has this virtue, he is discriminating and never screams "bis" to an indifferent performance, nor

Flatters the Author of a new work by "calling him out" unless he deserves it. A priest who sat next to me last Sunday grew deeply excited because we were denied a repetition of "The Murmurs of the Forest." If he had not been clothed in the conventual caftan and held a shovel hat in his lap, I would have sworn he said a wicked word. But, at all events, the good brother rolled up his eyes in an ecstasy that was decidedly "lay" to the worldly observer who was unaccustomed to such demonstrative shepherds outside of a church. The "Prelude to the Deluge," by Saint-Saens, was chiefly interesting to me for the violin solo, played by M. Houfflack, one of the first violins, and a young man whose name is quite unknown. He is an artist, however, and it detracted nothing from my enjoyment of his playing to be told "there are 50 just as good as he among the violinists in Paris." I liked his sitting at his own desk, and not "starring" for the occasion, for though the composition scarcely called for a "soloist," he might have come to the front with perfect propriety. His beautiful playing, so true, so warm and sympathetic, won for him a hearty round of applause and a very kind and friendly glance from the conductor himself. I do not much wonder that artists dread and long for an audition in this art centre, because, when recognition does come, how much it means!

To the Ambitious Student.
Paris may be fickle, but Paris knows a good thing when it hears it. The arrangement of Mr. Lamoreux's orchestra, too, is the best I ever saw, and you can readily understand, after hearing that splendid body of strings, how much more effective it is than to spread it across a wide stage. When musical Boston takes its summer vacation, gadding over Europe, and then returns home with the impression that Mr. Gericke's orchestra has no peer, I beg leave to inter that "musical Boston" has not heard Lamoreux. His orchestra, be it remembered, does not play during the tourist season, and it is only in the winter time that it can be heard in its perfection, hence the absurdity of any such opinion, however flattering to Boston's egotism. Really, I don't see why we should be miserable because we haven't a Lamoreux! Paris would have one less attraction for us without him, and now it is such a delightful place to come to. For my part, I am glad Boston is the provincial infant, otherwise this cosmopolitan giant would not seem worth the candle, only I would suggest that our music loving friends drop into the Cirque des Champs Elysees Sunday afternoons and hear for themselves the finest orchestral playing in the world. It is worth coming a few thousand miles to do so.

CHICAGO LATE AMUSEMENTS.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.
Art is long, but the Boston Symphony Orchestra appears to have a position closer to its goal than any similar organization in this country. Eleven years of association have given its members the individual impulse, the unity of action, and the close sympathy only begotten by actual companionship in music. One of the finest audiences of the season welcomed this fine organization last evening at Central Music Hall, and applauded its performances to the echo. If the financial results were singularly gratifying to the management, the artistic appreciation that cheered the performers in this practical issue of reciprocity was even more so. Mr. Arthur Nikisch is the same graceful and spirited conductor as of yore, and has that singular power of sympathetic touch with his players that gains most gratifying results in harmony. His orchestra at present enlists seventy-five players, each having individual work, all joining to guard finesse in ensemble. If is not within the limitations of a brief and hurried review to describe the fine work of this organization. Owing to the unfortunate illness of Mr. Franz Kneisel, the violinist, there was one change in the regular programme. The Paganini concerto, in D minor, op. 6, was substituted by three numbers, Chopin's "Nocturne," Schubert's "Leament Musicale," and Klengel's "Capriccio," delightfully played by Alvin Schroeder, cellist; Director Nikisch furnishing the piano accompaniment.

The concert was charmingly opened with Gudmark's passionate and pompous overture "Sakuntala," a very dainty and delightful feature was Saint-Saens' weird and romantic symphonic poem, "Le Ronet d'Omphale," with the restless whirr of its spinning wheel, and the sighs of love-lorn Hercules. The third movement of Berlioz' "Pilgrims' March," from Harold in Italy, had a viola solo by Mr. Kneisel, who played in spite of the indisposition that disbarred him from the more trying ordeal of the Paganini selection. The concluding orchestral feature was Schumann's first symphony, in B flat, his best work from a technical standpoint. The orchestral work throughout the evening was as delightful as it was graceful and finished. Eugene D'Albert was the piano soloist, and appeared as the interpreter of Chopin's concerto in E minor. It is a composition that pianists regard as one of the noblest and most poetic of the repertoire. Its dazzling runs, beautiful melodies, sparkling passages of bravura make it a magnetic masterpiece for testing the powers of the pianist. The solo part has the advantage of peculiar beauties, but the orchestral part has some exquisite effects, notably the employment of the French horns, the flutes and clarinets; while the effect of the muted string accompaniment in the romanza is one of the loveliest effects of Chopin. D'Albert was the master of the situation, in both the philosophy of the interpretation and the art of its technical requirements. The first movement was absolutely fearless, while the brilliancy of his octave work in the finale called forth the most enthusiastic expressions of approval. In response to encore he gave Rubinstein's staccato etude in superb style.

It was a great night for music, and a distinct triumph for the Boston Symphony Orchestra and all associated with it.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Arthur Nikisch conductor, gave its only concert in Chicago this season at Central Music hall last night. Last year it gave three concerts in the same place, the first of them May 7 also, and all of them were well attended, and it is not quite clear why Chicago is passed this year with but one concert. That one, however, drew a very large audience, probably the largest the orchestra has ever had in Chicago, and served again to emphasize the wonderfully poetic and superbly rounded finish of the orchestral interpretations. And in this word "finish" is meant to be included all the elements that go to make up the best possible orchestral interpretation, not only the technical but what may be called the inspirational. Mr. Nikisch exhibits often unexpected treatment of tempo and of shading, but in every case, as has heretofore been remarked, his peculiar treatment is in entire harmony with the spirit of the composition in hand, and goes to make clearer a symmetrical interpretation of a warmly appreciative conception of the composer's purpose. It may be said in passing that the precision, the delicacy, the bold, picturesque shading, and above all the wonderfully fine unity of feeling obvious in all the band's work were the more appreciated last night, because since the last visit of this band a year ago nothing so spiritually, as well as intellectually and technically fine in orchestral work has been offered to Chicago music-lovers.

The orchestral numbers last night were Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture, Saint-Saens' symphonic poem "Le Ronet d'Omphale," the "Pilgrim's March" from Berlioz' symphony "Harold in Italy," and Schumann's symphony, No. 1, in B flat.

It only remains to speak of the playing of d'Albert in the Chopin concerto. From the virtuoso point of view it left nothing to be desired, and the closing passage in the rondo was a wonderful piece of pianism, but we cannot speak so warmly on the point of interpretation. The warmth of coloring of the orchestra found no fitting response in the piano forte, but aside from this it was full of enthusiasm if not high flights of imagination. He received a warm encore, and responded by playing Rubinstein's staccato etude.

Mr. Kneisel was unfortunately too ill to play the Paganini work, and Mr. Schroeder filled his place by playing some cello solos by Chopin and Schubert, accompanied by Mr. Nikisch.

ONY No. 2, in A major. "In the

A Brilliant Concert.

D'ALBERT AND NIKISCH.

A BRILLIANT concert was given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in conjunction with Eugen d'Albert last Monday night at the Madison Square Garden Concert Hall. The hall was crowded and the audience a representative one. Here is the program :

Overture, "Sakuntala" Goldmark
 Concerto for piano in E minor, op. 11..... Chopin
 Mr. Eugen d'Albert.
 Introduction to Act III., Dance of Apprentices, Procession of Mastersingers and Homage to Hans Sachs ("Die Meistersinger") Wagner
 "Pilgrim's March," from symphony "Harold in Italy" (by request)..... Berlioz
 Viola solo, Mr. Franz Kneisel.

Concerto for piano in E flat..... Liszt

The orchestra was in capital form, and the appearance of Mr. Nikisch and Mr. Kneisel was the signal for warm applause. Mr. Nikisch's reading of Goldmark's Oriental overture is familiar to us, and it lost not a jot of its warmth and dramatic coloring on this occasion. It was played superbly.

The "Meistersinger" music also received an adequate interpretation, being finely worked out as to details.

Mr. Kneisel, who plainly showed traces of his recent illness, played his viola solo with his accustomed suavity and taste and was enthusiastically applauded. Mr. d'Albert has played both the Chopin and Liszt concertos here before, and we all know his unquenchable vigor, his fiery attack and tremendous climacteric effects. The Chopin concerto was partially Chopin and partially Tausig in the piano part, though d'Albert retained the original orchestration, with the exception of the big cut in the first tutti. While lacking tenderness, the concerto was played most brilliantly, particularly the rondo. The Liszt concerto was given con amore, especially the finale, and the house fairly rose at the conclusion. Mr. d'Albert played for encores Rubinstein's staccato etude and Chopin's A flat valse. The etude was a marvel of speed and sustained power. Mr. Nikisch conducted, as usual, with skill and fire, and his accompaniments were miracles of tact and sympathy.

VOLUME 12

1892-1893

THIS VOLUME CONTAINS MANUSCRIPT MATERIAL.

MANUSCRIPTS MAY NOT BE REPRODUCED

WITHOUT PERMISSION.

★★
No. M.125.5

v.12

1892-93

ALLEN A. BROWN FUND

Arthur Nikisch,
CONDUCTOR OF THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

(SEASON)

✻ (1892-1893) ✻

(PROGRAMMES) AND (COMMENTS)

COMPILED BY

ALLEN A. BROWN

Green half leather

2449

L.S. Spence, Inc.

Arthur Nikisch,
CONDUCTOR OF THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON

1892-1893

PROGRAMMES AND COMMENTS

COMPILED BY

ALLEN A. BROWN

2449

J. S. Spence, Inc.

Aug 14, 1894

DIAGRAM SEATS, BOSTON MUSIC HALL.

125.5 706.10
 1892-1893
 Boston Symphony Orchestra
 Aug 16 1893

Oct. 15	Oct. 22	Oct. 29	Nov. 12	Nov. 19	Nov. 26	Dec. 3	Dec. 17	Dec. 24	Jan. 7	Jan. 14	Jan. 21	Jan. 28	Feb. 4	Feb. 11	Feb. 18
1	2	3	4	5	6	7	8	9	10	11	12	13	14	15	16

Boston Music Hall
THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
 MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor
 SATURDAY EVENINGS AT 8 O'CLOCK
 TWELFTH SEASON

Apr. 29	Apr. 22	Apr. 15	Apr. 8	Apr. 1	Mar. 25	Mar. 11	Mar. 4	Feb. 2
24	23	22	21	20	19	18	17	16

DIAGRAM SEATS, BOSTON MUSIC HALL.

TIGHT BINDING

Index

Composer	Title of Work	Concert	Date	Soloists
Albert E.	Symphony No. 1. in F op. 4.	VII	Dec. 3. 92
Bach J. S.	Orchestral Suite in D min: maj	VII	Dec. 3. 92
	Prael. adagio & Gavotte arr. by Bachrich	I	Oct. 15. "
Beethoven	Symphony No. 2. in D op. 36	IV	Nov. 12. 92
	" " 3 E flat - 55	XXIV	Apr. 29. 93
	" " 4 B flat - 60	XX	" 1. "
	" " 5 C min - 67	I	Oct. 15. 92
	" " 7 A maj: " 92	XV	July 18. 93
	" " 8 F - 93	VIII	Dec. 17. 92
	" " 9 D min: " 125	"	" " "
	Solos by Priscilla White, Louisa Limer
	W. J. Wink & Heinrich Meyer
	Overture "Leonore" No. 3 op. 72	XI	Jan. 7. 93
	" "Coriolan" op. 62	XIV	July 4. 93
Berlioz H.	"Damnation of Faust" 2 Mib for ork.	V	Nov. 19. 92
	Overture "Benvenuto Cellini" op. 23	X	Dec. 31. "
	" "Le Carnaval Romain" - 9	XVIII	Feb. 11. 93
Bizet G.	Suite Nos. "Arlesienne" Nos. 1. 2. 3. 4.	XI	Jan. 7. 93
Brahms J.	Symphony No. 3. in F min: op. 90	V	Nov. 19. 92
	" " 4 " E min " 98	XVII	Feb. 4. 93
	Concerto for Violin D maj. op. 77	XXII	Apr. 15. 93	Franz Kneisel
	"Song of Destiny" Chor. for ork. op. 54 (Boston Symphony Chorus)	XVI	July 4. 93
Bruch Max	Concerto for Violin No. 1. G min: op. 26	XII	Jan. 21. 93	Henri Marteau
Lusoni F. B.	Symphonic Tone Poem (Mss.)	XXII	Apr. 15. 93
Chopin F.	Nocturne in E min: for Piano	IX	Dec. 24. 92	Eugenia Castellano
	Scherzo in B min: " "	"	" " "
Tchaikoff	Concerto for 'Alto' No. 3	VI	Nov. 26. 92	Alvin Schroeder

TIGHT BINDING

Index

Composer	Title of Work	Concert	Date	Soloists
Albert E.	Symphony No. 1 in F op. 4.	VII	Dec. 3. 92
Bach J. S.	Orchestral Suite in D min.	VII	Dec. 3. 92
	Prael. adagio & Gavotte arr. by Bachrich	I	Oct. 15.
Beethoven	Symphony No. 2 in D op. 36	IV	Nov. 12. 92
	" " 3 E flat - 55	XXIV	Apr. 19. 93
	" " 4 B flat - 60	XX	" 1. "
	" " 5 C min - 67	I	Oct. 15. 92
	" " 7 A maj. - 92	XV	July 18. 93
	" " 8 F - 93	VIII	Dec. 17. 92
	" " 9 D min. - 125	"	" " "
	Solos by Priscilla White, Louisa Limer
	W. J. Wink & Heinrich Meyer
	Overture "Leonore" No. 3 op. 72	XI	Jan. 7. 93
	" " Coriolan" op. 62	XIV	July 4. 93
Berlioz H.	"Damnation of Faust" 2 mib for orch.	V	Nov. 19. 92
	Overture "Benvenuto Cellini" op. 23	X	Dec. 31. "
	" " Le Carnaval Romain" - 9	XVIII	Feb. 11. 93
Bizet G.	Suite Nos. "Arlesienne" Nos. 1. 2. 3. 4.	XI	Jan. 7. 93
Brahms J.	Symphony No. 3 in F min: op. 90	V	Nov. 19. 92
	" " 4 " E min " 98	XVII	Feb. 4. 93
	Concerto for Violin 2 maj. op. 77	XXII	Apr. 15. 93	Frang Kneisel
	"Song of Destiny" Chor. & orch. op. 54	XVI	July 4. 93
	(Boston Symphony Chorus)
Bruck Max	Concerto for Violin No. 1. F min: op. 26	XII	Jan. 21. 93	Henri Marteau
Busoni F. B.	Symphonic Poem (Mss.)	XXII	Apr. 15. 93
Chopin F.	Nocturne in E min: for Piano	IX	Dec. 24. 92	Eugenia Castellano
	Scherzo in B min: " "	"	" " "
Davidoff	Concerto for 'Alto' No. 3	VI	Nov. 26. 92	Alvin Schrieder

SPECIAL NOTICE.

The owner of this ticket will please write name and address on the lines below as an aid to its recovery in case of loss.

NAME, Miss A. Brown

ADDRESS, 30 Kelly St. Boston or P.O. Box 180

This ticket must be presented to the door-keeper at every performance. Persons neglecting to bring tickets will be admitted to the hall only by purchasing an evening ticket.

Index

Composer	Title of Work	Concert	Date	Soloists
D'Albert S.	Symphony No. 1 in F op. 4.	VII	Dec. 3. 92
Bach J. S.	Orchestral Suite in D min: maj	VII	Dec. 3. 92
	Prael: adagio & Gavotte arr. by Bachrich	I	Oct 15. "
Beethoven	Symphony No. 2. in D op. 36	IV	Nov 12. 92
	" " 3 E flat - 55	XXIV	Apr 29. 93
	" " 4 B flat - 60	XX	" 1. "
	" " 5 C min - 67	I	Oct 15. 92
	" " 7 A maj: - 92	XV	July 18. 93
	" " 8 F - 93	VIII	Dec 17. 92
	" " 9 D min: - 125	"	" " "
	Solos by Priscilla White, Louisa Limer
	W. J. Winch & Heinrich Meyne
	Overture "Leonore" No. 3 op. 72	XI	Jan 7. 93
	" "Coriolanus" op. 62	XIV	July 4. 93
Berlioz H.	"Damnation of Faust" 2 Mib for orcho.	V	Nov 19. 92
	Overture "Benvenuto Cellini" op. 23	X	Dec 31. "
	" "Le Carnaval Romain" - 9	XVIII	Feb 11. 93
Bizet G.	Suite Nos. "Arlesienne" Nos. 1. 2. 3. 4.	XI	Jan 7. 93
Brahms J.	Symphony No. 3. in F min: op. 90	V	Nov 19. 92
	" " 4 " E min - 98	XVII	Feb 4. 93
	Concerto for Violin D maj. op. 77	XXII	Apr 15. 93	Franz Kreisler
	"Song of Destiny" Chor. 1. ork. op. 54	XVI	July 4. 93
	(Boston Symphony Chorus)
Bruch Max	Concerto for Violin No. 1. G min: op. 26	XII	Jan 21. 93	Henri Marteau
Busoni F. B.	Symphonic Tone Poem (Mss.)	XXII	Apr 15. 93
Chopin F.	Nocturne in E min: for Piano	IX	Dec. 24. 92	Eugenia Castellano
	Scherzo in B min: " "	"	" " "
Davidoff	Concerto for 'Alto' No. 3	VI	Nov. 26. 92	Alvin Schroeder

SPECIAL NOTICE.

The owner of this ticket will please write name and address on the lines below as an aid to its recovery in case of loss.

NAME, Miss A. Brown

ADDRESS, 30 Kelly St. Boston or P.O. Box 180

This ticket must be presented to the door-keeper at every performance. Persons neglecting to bring tickets will be admitted to the hall only by purchasing an evening ticket.

Index

Composer	Title of Work	Concert	Date	Soloists
D'Albert E.	Symphony No. 1 in F op. 4.	VII	Dec 3. 92
Bach J. S.	Orchestral Suite in D min:	VII	Dec 3. 92
	Prael. adagio & Gavotte arr. by Bachrich	I	Oct 15.
Beethoven	Symphony No. 2 in D op. 36	IV	Nov 12. 92
	" " 3 E flat " 55	XXIV	Apr 29. 93
	" " 4 B flat " 60	XX	" 1. "
	" " 5 C min " 67	I	Oct 15. 92
	" " 7 A maj: " 92	XV	July 18. 93
	" " 8 " " 93	VIII	Dec 17. 92
	" " 9 D min: " 125	"	" " "
	Solos by Priscilla White, Louisa Limer
	W. J. Winch & Heinrich Meyer
	Overture "Leonore" No 3 op. 72	XI	Jan 7. 93
	" "Coriolan" op. 62	XIV	July 4. 93
Berlioz H.	"Damnation of Faust" 2 Mib for orch.	V	Nov 19. 92
	Overture "Benvenuto Cellini" op. 23	X	Dec 31. "
	" "Le Carnaval Romain" " 9	XVIII	Feb 11. 93
Bizet G.	Suite Nos. "Arlesienne" Nos. 1. 2. 3. 4.	XI	Jan 7. 93
Brahms J.	Symphony No. 3 in F min: op. 90	V	Nov 19. 92
	" " 4 " E min " 98	XVII	Feb 4. 93
	Concerto for Violin D maj. " 277	XXII	Apr 15. 93	Franz Kreisler
	"Song of Destiny" Chor. & orch. op. 54	XVI	July 4. 93
	(Boston Symphony Chorus)
Bruck Max	Concerto for Violin No 1. F min: op. 26	XII	Jan 21. 93	Henri Marteau
Busoni F. B.	Symphonic Poem (Mss.)	XXII	Apr 15. 93
Chopin F.	Nocturne in E min: for Piano	IX	Dec 24. 92	Eugenia Castellano
	Scherzo in B min: " "	"	" " "
Davidoff	Concerto for 'Alto' No. 3	VI	Nov 26. 92	Alvin Schroeder

Dvořák A.	Symphony No. 2 D min: op 70 Suite in D major op 39 Tcherno Capriccioso op. 66 Dram. Ouv. "Husitska" op 67	XVI III XXI VI	Feb 25.93 Oct 29.92 Apr 8.93 Nov 26.92
Ernst H.W.	Concerto for Violin 7 th min: op 23	IV	Nov. 12.92	J. Adamowski
Fooke, Arthur	"The Skeleton in Armor" op 28. and Boston Symphony Chorus -	XIV	Feb 4.93	Maria Bonard - Smith Lillian Carlson with Geo. J. Parker Clarence E. Hay
Gade H.W.	Symphony No 4. B flat op 20.	III	Oct 29.93
Gilson, Paul	"La Mer" Symphonic Sketches Nos 1, 2, 3	XIX	Mar 25.93
Goldmark C.	Symphony "Liedliche Hochzeit" op 23 Ouverture "Im Frühling" op 36	XIX XII	Mar 25.93 Jan 21.93
Gounod G.	"La Vision de Jeanne d'Arc" Violin torch.	XII	Jan 21.93	Henri Morteau
Grieg Ed.	Suite No. 2 "Peer Gynt" op. 55	XVI	Feb 25.93
Haydn J.	Symphony No. 9 B. + D. C minor " " 12 " B flat	XXI XI	Apr 8.93 Jan 7.93
Humperdinck	Humoreske	IV	Nov 12.92
Lalo E.	Ouverture "Le Roi d'ys"	IX	Dec 24.92
Lang M.R.	Dramatic Ouv. No 2. op 12. mss.	XXI	Apr 8.93
Liszt F.	Symphonic Poem "Tasso" "Mephisto Waltz" Concerto for Piano No 2. a major "Die Loreley" song with orch.	V XII XX III	Nov 19.92 Jan 21.93 Apr 1.93 Oct 29.92	J. B. Busoni Emma Juch
Mac Dowell E.A.	Two Symphonic Poems "Hamlet" & "Ophelia" Concerto for Piano No 1. op 15.	XIII V	Jan 29.93 Nov 19.92	E.A. Mac Dowell
Martucci	Etude de Concert for Piano	IX	Dec 24.92	Eugenia Castellano

Mendelssohn	Symphony No. 4 A major op 90. Ouv. "Fingals Cave" op 36	IX XVI	Dec 24.92 Feb 25.93
Morzkowski	Suite No. 1. op 39. Nos. 3. 5.	XXI	Apr 8.93
Mozart	Symphony in D major. (Parisian) No. 31 Letter aria from "Don Giovanni" with orch.	XXIV XI	Apr 29.93 Jan 7.93	Mad. Basta-Tavery
Nicolai G.	Ouv. to the "Merry Wives of Windsor"	XVII	Mar 4.93
Radzewski Jg.	Concerto for Piano A minor op 17.	XIII	Jan 28.93	Jg. Radzewski
Rame J.K.	Columbus March and Hymn Boston Symphony Chorus	XIV	Feb 4.93
Raff J.	Symphony No. 3 "Im Walde" op 153 "La Fee d'Amour" Violin torch. op 67	XII XIX	Jan 21.93 Mar 25.93	Otto Roth
Reinecke C.	Ouverture to "King Manfred"	II	Oct 22.92
Reinischneider	"Todtentanz" for orch.	XVII	Mar 4.93
Rubinstein A.	Concerto for Piano torch. No. 4 op 70	XVIII	Mar 11.93	Fanny Hillmfield-Zeiser
Saint-Saens G.	Symphony No. 2 in A minor op 55 Concerto for Violin torch. No. 1. a major ⁴²⁰ Concerto for Piano torch No 2. op 22 " " " " No. 4. op 44	IV XVI XV II	Nov 12.92 Feb 25.93 Feb 18.93 Oct 22.92	G.M. Loeffler Geo. M. Howell Carl Starny
Scharwenka P.	Symphonic Poem "Frühlingsorgen" op 87	III	Oct 29.92
Schubert F.	"Gruppe aus Tartarus" Song with Piano "Die Allmacht" " " " Unfinished Symphony in B minor	XXI " XXIV	Apr 8.93 " " " " 29.93	Max Kleinrich
Schumann R.	Symphony No 1. B flat op 38. " " 2 C major " 64 " " 3 E flat " 97 Ouverture "Manfred" " 115	XIII VI XVIII XXII	Jan 28.93 Nov 26.92 Mar 11.93 Apr 18.93

Spohr L.	Rec. u. Arië "Der Kille Selbst" from Faust	XXI	Apr 8.93	Max Heinrich
Grondsen J. J.	Legende for orch. "Lorahayda" op 11.	VI	Nov 26.92
Thieriot F.	Sinfonietta in E major op 55	XV	July 18.93
Tschaikowsky	Symphony No 5. E minor	II	Oct 22.92
	Overture Fantasy "Romeo u. Juliet"	XX	Apr 1.93
Vieuatempo H.	Concerto for Violin + Orch. D minor: op 31	X	Dec 31.92	J. Schnitzler
Wagner R.	Prelude and Liebestod "Tristan + Isolde"	I	Oct 15.92
	Kaiser Marsch	"	" "
	Siegfried Idyll	XVIII	Mar. 11.93
	Waldweben from Siegfried	IX	Dec 24.92
	Overture "Tannhauser"	XIX	Mar 25.93
	" "Rienzi"	XXIII	Apr 12.93
	" "Der Fliegende Holländer"	VII	Dec 3.92
	Prelude "Meistersinger von Neumberg"	XXIV	Jan 28.93
	" to act III + Dance of apprentices and	XXIII	Apr 22.93
	Hommage to Hans Sachs "Meistersinger"	"	" " "
	"Siegfried passing this fire" "Dawn"	"	" " "
	+ Siegfried's voyage up the Rhine "for orch"	"	" " "
	Siegfried's Funeral March from "Götterdämmerung"	"	" " "
	Brünnhilde's dying speech over Siegfried's	"	" " "	Felicia Kaschotka
	Body" from "Götterdämmerung"	"	" " "
	Prelude and Scene I from Das Rheingold	"	" " "	Felicia Kaschotka Mrs. St. Mikisch Louisa Simon Heinrich Meyer
	Aria "Dich Liebe Halle" Tannhauser	XI	Jan 7.93	Mme. Berta-Tavory
Weber L. M.	Overture "Der Freischütz"	XVII	Mar 4.93
	" Oberon	XXII	Apr 15.93
	Scene and aria "Ocean, thou mighty"
	"Monter" from Oberon. with orch	III	Oct 19.92	Emma Jack

Composers

With number of works given

D'Albert, Eugen	1
Bach J. S.	2
Beethoven	9
Berlioz H.	3
Bizet Geo.	1
Brahms J.	4
Bruch, Max	1
Busoni F. B.	1
Chopin F.	2
Davidoff	1
Dvořák A.	4
Ernst H. W.	1
Foot, Arthur	1
Gade H. W.	1
Gilson, Paul	1
Goldmark, Carl	2
Gornod Chas.	1
Grieg, Edvard	1
Haydn Jos.	2
Humperdinck	1
Lalo E.	1
Lang, Margaret Ruthven	1
Liszt F.	4
Mac Dowell E. A.	2
Martucci	1
Mendelssohn	2
Moszkowski	1
Mozart	2
Nicolai O.	1
Paderewski J.	1
Pavie J. K.	1
Raff J.	2
Reinecke C.	1
Rimmonschneider	1
Rubinstein A.	1
Saint-Saens G.	4
Scharwenka P.	1

12
Schubert F.
Schumann R.
Spohr L.
Trendelenburg J. J.
Frierich F.
Tschaiikowsky P.
Tuxtenps H.
Wagner R.
Weber L. M. von

Soloists, with date of appearances

Pianists

Bloomfield-Zeider, Fanny
Busoni F. B.
Castellano, Eugenia
MacDowell E. A.
Nowell Geo. M.
Paderewski Jg.
Itzany, Carl
Violinists

Adamowski P.
Kneisel, Franz
Loeffler L. M.
Marteau Henri
Roth, Otto
Schnitzler, J.

Cello

Schroeder, Arthur

Vocalists

Berta-Jenny, Mad.
Heinrich, Max
Juch, Emma Kaschaska, Felicia

also a quartet of Vocalists

Boston Symphony Chorus

Conductor

Arthur Nikisch

13
Mch 11. 1893
Apr 1. "
Dec 24. 1892
Nov 19. "
Feb 18. 1893
Jan 28. "
Oct 22. 1892

Nov. 12. 1892
Apr 15. 1893
Feb 20. "
Jan 21. "
Mch 25. "
Dec 1. 1892

Nov. 26. 1892

Jan 7. 1893
Apr 8. "
Oct 29. 1892
Apr 22. 1893

Feb 4. 1893 + Apr 22. 1893
Feb 4. 1893

14

BOSTON MUSIC HALL.

.....
TWELFTH SEASON 1892-93.
.....

THE
Boston Symphony Orchestra,

—90 PERFORMERS,—

Mr. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

WILL GIVE A SERIES OF

TWENTY-FOUR CONCERTS

ON CONSECUTIVE SATURDAY EVENINGS, FROM OCTOBER 15, 1892, TO
APRIL 29, 1893, OMITTING NOV. 5, DEC. 10, 1892, JAN. 14, FEB. 11,
AND MARCH 18, 1893, AND

TWENTY-FOUR PUBLIC REHEARSALS

ON CONSECUTIVE FRIDAY AFTERNOONS, FROM OCTOBER 14, 1892, TO APRIL 28, 1893, OMITTING NOV. 4, DEC. 9, 1892, JAN. 13, FEB. 10, AND MARCH 17, 1893.

A select Chorus will participate occasionally in the Concerts and the best available Soloists will appear.

.....
TICKETS for the series of Concerts $12.00 and $7.50, according to and for the series of Rehearsals, location.
.....

The $12 Seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall,
Monday, September 19th, at 10, A. M.

The $7.50 Seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall Tuesday, September 20th, at 10, A. M. Any Rehearsal Seats not sold at auction will be on sale at the Box Office, Music Hall, Wednesday, Sept. 21st.

The $12 Seats for the Concerts will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, on Thursday, September 22d, at 10, A. M.

The $7.50 Seats for the concerts will be sold in like manner at the same place, on Friday, September 23d, at 10, A. M.

Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold.

.....
Tickets will be delivered in the Hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be resold.
.....

All Seats remaining unsold after the auction will be on sale at the Box Office on and after Saturday, September 24th.

STAGE.

BOSTON MUSIC HALL
A 34	28	A		A 7	1	A
B 34	28	B 27	18	B 17	8	B 7	1	B
C 34	28	C 27	18	C 17	8	C 7	1	C
D 34	28	D 27	18	D 17	8	D 7	1	D
E 34	28	E 27	18	E 17	8	E 7	1	E
F 34	28	F 27	18	F 17	8	F 7	1	F
G 34	28	G 27	18	G 17	8	G 7	1	G
H 34	28	H 27	18	H 17	8	H 7	1	H
I 34	28	I 27	18	I 17	8	I 7	1	I
J 34	28	J 27	18	J 17	8	J 7	1	J
K 34	28	K 27	18	K 17	8	K 7	1	K
L 34	28	L 27	18	L 17	8	L 7	1	L
M 34	28	M 27	18	M 17	8	M 7	1	M

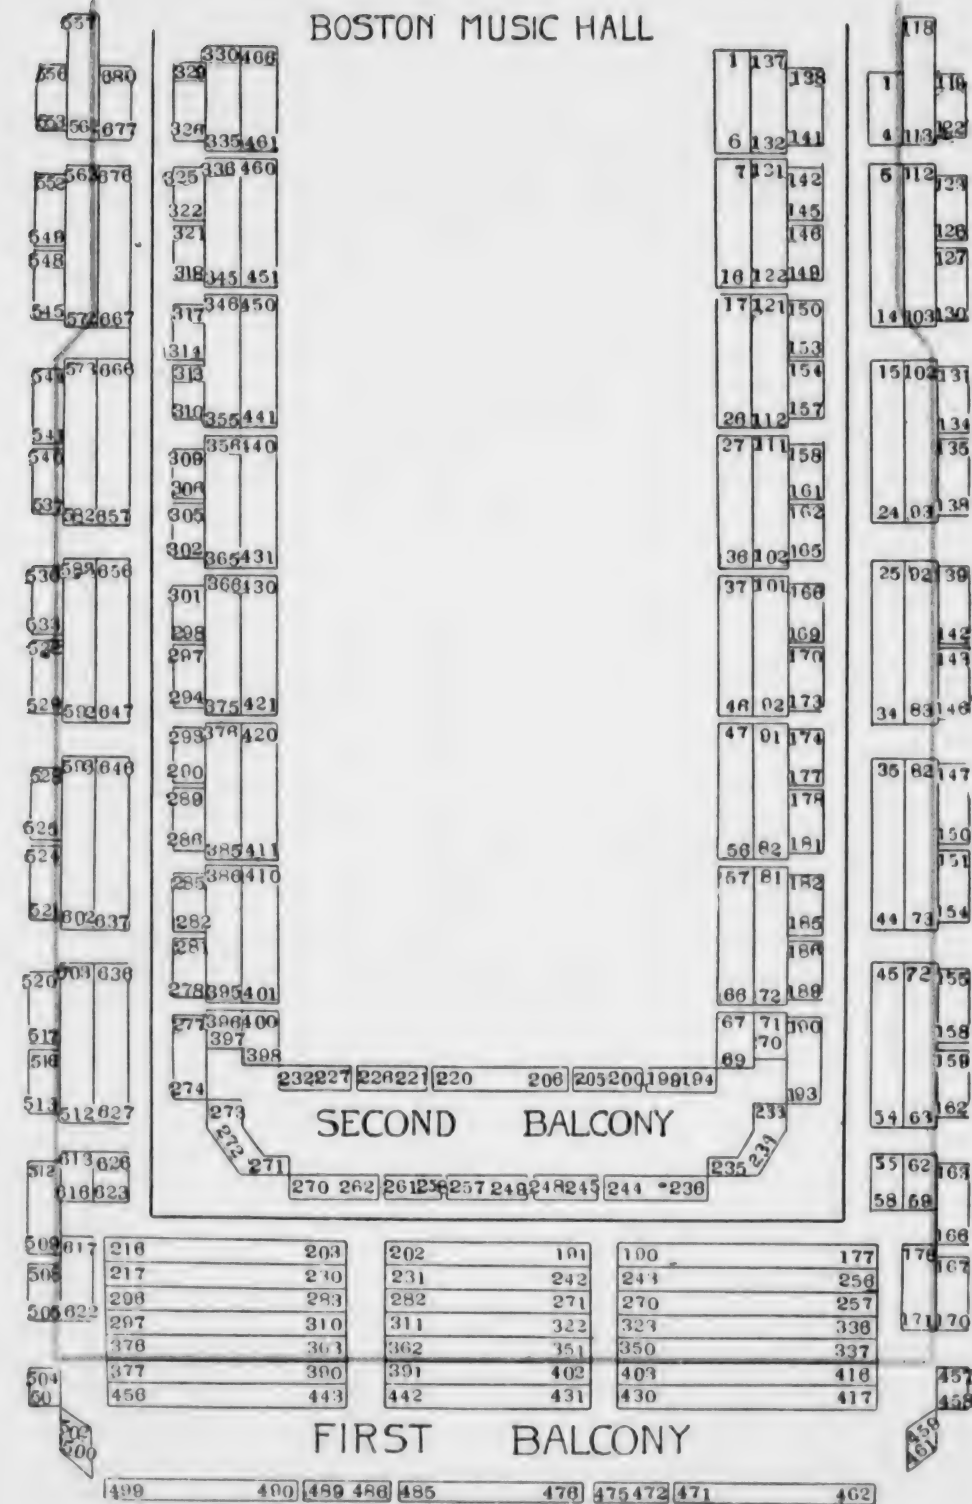

N 34	28	N 27	18	N 17	8	N 7	1	N
O 34	28	O 27	18	O 17	8	O 7	1	O
P 34	28	P 27	18	P 17	8	P 7	1	P
Q 34	28	Q 27	18	Q 17	8	Q 7	1	Q
R 34	28	R 27	18	R 17	8	R 7	1	R
S 34	28	S 27	18	S 17	8	S 7	1	S
T 34	28	T 27	18	T 17	8	T 7	1	T
U 34	28	U 27	18	U 17	8	U 7	1	U
V 34	28	V 27	18	V 17	8	V 7	1	V
W 34	28	W 27	18	W 17	8	W 7	1	W
X 34	28	X 27	18	X 17	8	X 7	1	X
Y 34	28	Y 27	18	Y 17	8	Y 7	1	Y
Z 34	28	Z 27	18	Z 17	8	Z 7	1	Z
AA 34	28	AA 27	18	AA 17	8	AA 7	1	AA

FLOOR

10	42	48	10	49	52	10	53	61	10	62	65	10	68	72
11	11	3	11	02	07	10	06	88	10	87	82	10	81	73
11	12	20	11	21	26	11	27	35	11	36	41	11	42	50
11	89	81	11	80	75	11	74	66	11	65	60	11	59	51
11	90	98	11	99	4	12	05	13	12	14	19	12	20	28
12	67	59	12	58	53	12	52	44	12	43	39	12	37	29
12	68	76	12	77	82	12	83	91	12	92	07	12	08	8
13	45	37	13	36	31	13	30	22	13	21	16	13	15	7
1346	54	55	58	1359	67	1368	71	1372	80

THE RED LINES MARK THE DIVISIONS BETWEEN

BOSTON MUSIC HALL

THE $12.00 AND THE $7.50 SEATS.

Music Hall,
Boston, October 1, 1892.

You are invited to become a member of the Chorus now being organized to sing with the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the coming season.

It is expected that the Chorus will appear at several Concerts in the regular series, and at two extra performances.

Rehearsals will be held under the direction of Mr. Arthur Foote, in Bumstead Hall, on Tuesday evenings, beginning punctually at 7.30, and ending at 9. Due notice will be given of the date of the first rehearsal.

The works to be studied are: —

Te Deum, - - - - -	Bruckner.
Ninth Symphony, - - - -	Beethoven.
Rhapsodie for alto solo and male chorus, - - - - -	Brahms.
Schicksalslied, - - - - -	Brahms.
Faust Symphony for male chorus, -	Liszt.
Vintage Chorus from Prometheus, -	Liszt.

The last rehearsal before each Concert in which the Chorus will take part will be held in Music Hall, on Thursday evening, and will be with Orchestra and Soloists. Four tickets for this rehearsal will be given to each member of the Chorus.

It is my earnest desire that the choral and orchestral parts of the proposed performances shall be of the same standard of excellence, and I shall be very grateful for your assistance.

Kindly send your reply by enclosed postal card within three days, and oblige,

Yours sincerely,

Arthur Nikisch

SANDERS THEATRE, CAMBRIDGE,

THE
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor,

with the assistance of

Eminent Soloists,

will give a series of

TEN CONCERTS,

on

THURSDAY EVENINGS,

October 20th, November 10th, December 1st, December 22d, 1892, January

19th, February 2d, February 23d, March 23d, April 13th and April 27th, 1893.

Season Tickets, with reserved seats for the series, $7.50, will be on sale at the University Bookstore, Cambridge, on and after Saturday, October 15th. Sale opens at eight A. M.

A limited number of seats have been reserved for College Officers and invited guests.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

Revised

Sept 4, 92

The Symphony Concerts, Plans for the Season.

Final Performances of "Puritania"

Last of the Sunday Concerts on the Common—New Organizations in the Field—Gossip and Comment Concerning Events at Home and Abroad.

The concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra have, quite naturally, come to be looked upon as the central attraction of the local musical season, and the preliminary announcements of each year's series are accepted as the signal for the opening up of all sorts of musical enterprises for the fall and winter months.

After 11 years of uninterrupted development this feature of the local world of music has gained such great prominence, both at home and abroad, that its influence can hardly be overestimated.

It may be well to again call attention to the fact that these concerts occupy a unique place in the musical history of the day, as they all supported by the public-spirited action of Mr. Henry L. Higginson, who in establishing them sought to give to the citizens of Boston a permanent orchestra. How successfully this purpose has been accomplished is best shown by the position these concerts now hold, and it is gratifying to know that every evidence points to a continuance of the remarkable success of the past in the series of the coming season.

In general, the scheme of the Symphony concerts for '92-93 will be identical with that of last season, Mr. Arthur Nikisch entering upon his fourth year in the position of its conductor, and having very largely the same musicians in the orchestra. The orchestra, devoted to the performance of the best music of all times.

The most notable change in the organization will be in the addition of a permanent chorus of good proportions, made up of picked voices, which will be heard during the season in a number of unfamiliar compositions for chorus and orchestra, as well as, possibly, in some large works in which the orchestra takes a subordinate part.

Director Nikisch has given much of his summer vacation time to the preparatory work of the coming season, and, from the mass of composition of all classes forwarded from Europe and submitted by American composers has chosen a large amount of new music, a performance of which has been duly arranged for in the season's programmes. Among these novelties will be found many works which will have a first hearing both sides of the Atlantic during the coming season, and many which the Boston orchestra will give a first performance.

In the line of soloists it is promised that the coming season's scheme shall be especially strong, and the list of engagements already completed indicates that much well directed enterprise has been shown in this department.

The season's work for the orchestra, as now planned, embraces 24 concerts and 24 public rehearsals in Boston, six concerts in Providence, four in Worcester, 10 in Cambridge, and the usual series in New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Brooklyn, and single concerts in various western cities during the month of May.

The public rehearsals begin on Friday afternoon, Oct. 14, and the concerts on Saturday evening, Oct. 15, continuing weekly, save during the five stated visits of the orchestra to other cities of one week each.

The prices for tickets for both rehearsals and concerts will be the same as in former seasons, the hall being divided into three grades for the rehearsals and two for the concerts. The usual 25 cent admission tickets for the upper balcony at the rehearsals will continue to be sold, and the balance of the seats for the rehearsals will be put at $7.50 and $12, as usual, for the season. The concert tickets, as formerly, will be reserved for the whole house, prices being $7.50 and $12, as for many years past.

Promptly at 10 o'clock on Monday morning, Sept. 19, Auctioneer Jackson will mount to the Music Hall stage and begin the sale of the $12 rehearsal tickets, following on Tuesday with the sale of the $7.50 rehearsal tickets. Thursday morning the 22d inst., he will sell the $12 concert seats, and on Friday the $7.50 concert seats. The usual rules will govern these sales, no more than four seats being sold on a single bill, and all sales being made in regular order.

From the inquiries already received from travellers abroad, from residents now in distant summer homes all over this country, and from the perpetual members of the "can't get away" clubs there is good cause to anticipate a maintenance of the interest and the same liberal patronage that has characterized recent seasons, and, as every seat has been sold for the season of late years, it is impossible to look for any increased support of the coming series.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

Sept 11, 92

Conductor Nikisch's Plans for the Symphony Season.

Interest in These Concerts Fully Maintained—Worcester Festival Ticket Sales—The Operatic Outlook—Current Events at Home and Abroad—News Notes, Gossip and Comment.

Many indications justify a belief that the 12th season of the Boston Symphony orchestra will be one of unusual importance in its history, and it is extremely gratifying to know that the interest in the concerts of this organization, both in this city and in those visited at stated periods, was never more pronounced.

The maintenance of the Boston Symphony orchestra for such an extended period is in itself the most convincing evidence of its value as an organization, and the position it has gained throughout the country is a just cause for local pride. At no time since its formation has the orchestra been in better shape for its season's work than at present, and the admirable management of its affairs will unquestion-ably again give the most satisfactory results to the patrons of its concerts.

The membership of the organization remains essentially the same as last season, Conductor Arthur Nikisch having retained practically all of 90 musicians who took part in last year's concerts, and the general scheme for the season remains largely the same as that of earlier years.

One important addition has been arranged for the home concerts of the orchestra at Music Hall, this consisting of the organization of a chorus of mixed voices, numbering about 200, to take part in certain works which are to be given as a part of the regular series of programmes, as well as, possibly, to assist in other concerts. This chorus will be drilled by Mr. Arthur Foote, who will without doubt prove a valuable assistant for Conductor Nikisch.

A change contemplated in placing the orchestra will interest those familiar with the arrangement of the various divisions in former years. The men will be seated upon a platform rising in the shape of an amphitheatre from the conductor's desk, with the first and second violins upon the immediate left and right of the conductor, then the violas and celli, with the wind and tympani in the centre, the double basses being divided at the back of either of the two wings, and separated by the wind players.

The summer leisure has been well improved by Mr. Nikisch in the examination of new compositions, and he has secured so many attractive novelties that the concerts will afford a constant succession of interesting features which will be duly analyzed and explained to the patrons by Mr. William F. Authorp, the accomplished musical writer, who is to have charge of the programme books of the season. Among the works to be given a first hearing in these concerts are the following:

Liszt.....Faust symphony (with chorus)
Eugene D'Albert.....Symphony (new)
Tchaikowsky.....Symphony, E minor, No. 5
Saint-Saens.....Symphony, A minor, Op. 55
Rudorff.....Symphony, G minor, No. 2
Dvorak.....Dramatic overture, "Rusalka"
Richard Strauss.....
Symphonic poem, "Death and Apotheosis"
Tchaikowsky.....Symphonic poem, "Tempest"
Wagner.....Scene I. from "Das Rheingold"
(Alberich and the Rhine Daughters.)
Theriot.....Symphonietta, Op. 55
Cesar Cui.....Petite suite, Op. 43 (In modo populari)
Bazzini.....Overture, "King Lear"
Riemenschneider.....Symphonic poem, "Todtentanz"
Cherubini.....Overture, "All Baba"
Reinecke.....Overture, "King Manfred"
Raff.....Symphonietta for wind instruments
Cherubini.....Impressions d'Italie
Philip Scharwenka.....
Symphonic poem, "Frühlingswagen"
Heuberger.....Nachtmusik for string orchestra
Brahms.....Rhapsodie for alto solo and male chorus
Liszt.....Vintage chorus from "Prometheus"
Brahms.....Schicksalslied for chorus and orchestra

The season's scheme will also include performances of the following standard compositions:

Beethoven.....Symphonies Nos. 2, 3, 5, 7 and 9
Schumann.....Symphony No. 2
Brahms.....Symphonies Nos. 3 and 4
Mendelssohn....."Ita-tan"
Berlioz....."Romeo and Juliette"
Berlioz.....Overture, "King Lear"
Dvorak.....Symphony, D major
Dvorak.....Serenade for strings
Wagner....."Tristan and Isolde," music
Wagner.....Kaisermarsch
Goldmark.....Symphony No. 2
Goldmark.....Spring Overture
Macdowell.....Symphonic poem,
"Launcelot and Elaine"
Macdowell.....Piano concerto
Mozart.....Symphony, D major
Haydn.....Symphony, B-flat major
Gade.....Symphony, B-flat major
Smetana.....Overture, "Verkaufte Braut"
Saint-Saens.....Symphonic poem, "Phaeton"
Greg.....Suite, from "Holberg's Time"

The engagements already made with the orchestra indicate that this portion of the season's scheme will be arranged with a view to the enjoyment of patrons. Among the vocalists now named are Miss Emma Juch, her farewell appearance; Mme. Amy Sherwin, who has not sung in America for several years, and, probably, Mme. Emma Eames. The German tenor, Herr Raimond von Zur Muhlen, will also have a hearing. The pianists of the season will include Paderewski, Joseffy, E. A. Macdowell, Carl Stasny and George M. Nowell.

The orchestra's season, as at present arranged, includes about 100 public appearances, aside from those incidental to its annual western tour, half of these being given to the concerts and public rehearsals in this city, six in Providence, four in Worcester, 10 in Cambridge, five each in New York, Philadelphia and Baltimore, and 10 public rehearsals and concerts in Brooklyn. The Boston series begins at Music Hall on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Oct. 14 and 15.

Despite the fact that the plans for the sale of tickets for the home rehearsals and concerts have become traditional, inquiries are received from all sorts of sources daily by Manager Charles A. Ellis asking for information concerning the disposition of tickets. This indicates a steady increase in the public interest in this enterprise, which is essential to a continuance of the influence sought to be maintained by its public spirited founder and patron, Henry L. Higginson.

The $12 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction at Music Hall Monday, Sept. 19, at 10 A. M. The $7.50 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction at Music Hall Tuesday, Sept. 20, at 10 A. M. Any rehearsal seats not sold at auction will be on sale at the box office, Music Hall, Wednesday, Sept. 21. The $12 seats for the concerts will be sold at auction at Music Hall on Thursday, Sept. 22, at 10 A. M. The $7.50 seats for the concerts will be sold in like manner at the same place on Friday, Sept. 23, at 10 A. M. Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice, and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold.

Intending purchasers should note the dates omitted in the weekly home appearances of the orchestra, these being Nov. 4, Dec. 9, 1892; Jan. 13, Feb. 10, and March 17, 1893, in the public rehearsal series; and Nov. 5, Dec. 10, 1892; Jan. 14, Feb. 11, and March 18, 1893, in that of the concerts.

MUSIC HALL.

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Mr. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

TWELFTH SEASON, 1892-93

Auction sale of $12 Season Tickets for Public Rehearsals at Music Hall, Monday, Sept. 19, at 10 A. M.

Auction sale of $7.50 Season Tickets for Public Rehearsals at Music Hall, Tuesday, Sept. 20, at 10 A. M.

Auction sale of $12 Season Tickets for Concerts at Music Hall, Thursday, Sept. 22, at 10 A. M.

Auction sale of $7.50 Season Tickets for Concerts at Music Hall, Friday, Sept. 23, at 10 A. M.

BOSTON Symphony Orchestra.

TWELFTH SEASON.

AUCTION SALE OF $12 SEATS FOR THE SATURDAY EVENING CONCERTS, AT MUSIC HALL, THURSDAY MORNING, SEPT. 22, AT 10 O'CLOCK, CONTINUING THROUGH THE DAY.

Auction sale of $7.50 seats for concerts, FRIDAY, Sept. 23. It A] s 20

TELEPHONE 3544.

2t[A]

s 19

BEST SYMPHONY TICKET BRINGS $392.

Extraordinary Premium. Paid for a Season Ticket to the Rehearsals.

It was an exciting scene that took place in Music Hall this morning in the course of the auction sale of season tickets for the rehearsals of the Symphony Orchestra. The sale had been of only ordinary interest up to the point when the seats in Row 1 were being disposed of. The bidding had ranged about a third higher than that of last year, but the highest premium that had been paid was $69, while the average price had been a trifle less than $40. When the first of the seats ordinarily occupied by Mrs. John L. Gardner was offered for sale, every one began to look around. The first bid was $20, and as fast as the auctioneer could speak the price was raised by steps of $1 each to $60. From that point the jumps were of $5 each, until at last the seat was obtained for $150. Stewart, the ticket agent, was the successful bidder, and after a moment's hesitation he took three seats, leaving one on the aisle untaken.

"How much am I offered for the next seat?" asked the auctioneer.

"Seventy dollars," was the reply. This was a most unusual starting bid, and there was a chorus of whispers of "Oh!" and "Ah!" By quick jumps the price went up, until it seemed as if the bids would never stop. At length $380 was offered, and at this the bidding stopped. Mr. Stewart was the successful purchaser, and he took the single seat that was left.

All the other sales made at the auction seemed tame when compared with this one transaction, but otherwise they would have been considered unusually good. There was a large attendance at the sale, but, as is usual, the ticket agents had most of the bidding to do. Each of them had a long list of patrons to secure places for and they did it, but at higher prices than have been known before.

The comparatively undesirable seats on the short front rows found ready purchasers at premiums ranging from $8 to $10, and the seats in the rows back brought much higher prices, those on the centre aisles commanding premiums of $58, $52, $61, $69 and $75 in the fifth, sixth, eighth and tenth rows respectively.

Only the $12 seats for the rehearsals were sold this morning. At 10 A. M. tomorrow the $7.50 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction, and any rehearsal seats not taken at the auction will be placed on sale at the Music Hall box office on Wednesday. The $12 seats for the concerts will be sold by auction in Music Hall on Thursday, beginning at 10 A. M., and the $7.50 seats Friday. All seats remaining unsold after the auction will be on sale at the box office on and after Saturday, Sept. 24.

CHEAP SEATS WENT HIGH.

Excessive Premiums Again Paid at Music Hall.

The results of the sale of the $12 seats for the public rehearsals of the Boston Symphony orchestra had the usual effect upon the premiums bid for the cheap seats yesterday. The difficulty of procuring seats increased the number of applicants, and when Auctioneer Jackson began the sale of the $7.50 seats on the 11 or under the balcony, the demand from the big crowd of buyers sent the premium up to $19 for seats that sold a year ago for one-third of that advance.

The eagerness of the buyers kept the premium up to from $10 to $15, all the way back to the wall, and the lowest figure bid for the most undesirable seats, such as sold last year for 25 and 50 cents each, was $6.

When the seats in the right balcony were offered the premium took a jump to $25, this being paid for seats 103, 104 and 105. The premium for the back row against the wall in the right balcony touched $30, and the corresponding seats in the left balcony went at about the same figure. In the front balcony the three back rows brought from $14 to $19.50, the last seat bringing the latter figure, and every reserved seat for the season for the rehearsals thus being sold. The advance over last year's prices will aggregate a very handsome figure.

There are no seats left for the rehearsals to go on sale at the box office this morning, but about 700 admission tickets are sold each week, and half of this number can be accommodated in the upper balcony, which is not reserved for the public rehearsals.

Tomorrow morning, beginning at 10 o'clock, the $12 seats for the regular Saturday evening concerts will be put up at auction, and on Friday morning the $7.50 seats for the concerts will be sold. It should be remembered that every seat in the hall is reserved for the Saturday evening concerts.

BIG PREMIUMS PAID.

The Symphony Rehearsal Tickets Fetch High Prices.

The unexpected happened again at the auction sale of tickets for the public rehearsals of the symphony concerts of the coming season, which occurred at Music Hall yesterday.

Last year's figures were looked upon as the very top possible to attain in this enterprise, but in yesterday's sale of the $12 seats there was an advance roughly estimated as giving an increase of 25 per cent. over last season's sale of this class of tickets.

Auctioneer Jackson conducted the sale, under the usual conditions, and was put to his utmost to meet the demands of the buyers, who frequently entered into very sharp competition for choice seats.

The first sale made, Nos. 1, 2 and 3 in slip A, at $8 premium each, proved to be the keynote of the morning's operations, and the prices were rapidly advanced, with results which gave the best possible evidence of the interest felt in this enterprise.

The 14 seats in slip A were sold at $8, $12, $13.50, $14 and $15, and the bids for seats in slip B began at nearly the highest figure had for slip A. In slip B the lowest premium was $14 per seat and the highest $28.50; in slip C the range was from $16 to $31; in slip D from $22 to $34.50, and in slip E from $25.50 to $58, the latter price being the result of a sharp competition by two opposing patrons.

The sensation of the sale was apparently caused by an error of judgment or slip of some sort on the part of one of the professional buyers. He advanced the price in slip J to $150 each seat, and at that figure took Nos. 14, 15 and 16, omitting to ask for No. 17, which is the end seat.

This was quickly noted by his associates and competitors, and, acting with a common purpose upon the instant, they each and all determined that No. 17 should go high.

It resulted in raising the premium on J 17 to $380, or just $16.33 for each rehearsal.

The advance in the prices in the front rows was steadily maintained, the average premium in H being about $70; I, $100; J, $75; K, $70; L, $65; O, P, Q, R and S, about $60. In R the seats 18 and 19 sold up to $105 each.

The demand continued steady to the end of the floor seats front of the balcony, and even the second and third rows under the balcony sold well up to $20 and $25.

The front row of the right balcony ranged from $26 to $52, and the second row from $25 to $40. On the left balcony side facing the stage the front row fetched from $22 to $44, and the second row from $20 to $30.

The centre balcony sold at $25 to $32 for the first, $20 to $23 for the second, $19 to $23 for the third, and at an average of $16 for the fourth and fifth rows.

The $7.50 rehearsal seats will be sold today, beginning at 10 A. M.

HIGHER PRICES THAN LAST YEAR.

Ready Bidders for All the $7.50 Seats at the Symphony Rehearsals.

There was one disappointed young lady in Music Hall this forenoon. She had come to attend the auction sale of season tickets for the rehearsals of the Symphony Orchestra, but she had determined that she would pay no phenomenal price for a seat. Richer persons could pay premiums of $380 if they chose, but she would not go beyond $5. When bids were called for for the first of the $7.50 seats she was prompt in replying "Five dollars!" But there were other bidders, and she saw the seat purchased for $14.50 premium. For half an hour she made first bids of "Five dollars," but every time the price ran up far beyond her limit, and the comparatively undesirable seats beneath the gallery on the back row on the floor found ready purchasers at prices ranging from $6 to $8.50.

The attendance was not so large as at the sale on yesterday, but all were would-be purchasers. The ticket speculators had few orders to place in this part of the hall, and music lovers contended one with another for the coveted places. The highest premium paid for any of the seats under the gallery was $19, for which four seats were purchased on the front row offered at the cheaper price. For the places on the sides of the gallery the bidding was much sharper, and hardly one brought a premium of less than $20. The highest price paid during the sale was for two seats in the second row of the gallery at the left of the stage, for which Connelly, the ticket agent, paid $35.

Instead of diminishing, the enthusiasm seemed to increase as the sale went on, and by one o'clock every seat in the house had been sold. It had been announced that those seats for the rehearsals remaining unsold would be offered at the box-office tomorrow morning, but not a single ticket is left unpurchased. The auction sale of $12 seats for the concerts will be held Thursday morning beginning at ten o'clock, while the $7.50 seats for the concerts will be disposed of in the same manner Friday. If there should be any seats unsold from the indications today there will be none—they will be sold at the Music Hall box-office on Saturday.

PAID $392 FOR A SEAT.

Mrs. Jack Gardner's Agent a High Bidder.

Her Premiums on Four Seats Will Pay the Symphony Fiddler.

Bought Three at $162 Each and Fourth One Was Raised.

OST people would not pay $392 for a single seat to the Friday afternoon rehearsals of the Boston Symphony orchestra. Yet that is what a man did yesterday. A true Bostonian, however, will pay more money for the pleasure of indulging in the symphony fad than for any other thing under the sun, unless it is a glass of ice cream soda.

Yesterday morning the sale of $12 seats for the Friday afternoon rehearsals began in Music Hall at 10 o'clock.

The hall was comfortably filled with people.

Most of them were buying for themselves. Many of them were speculators. Some of them were buying for friends. Not a few came in just out of curiosity. Mr. Fred Jackson was again on hand to use out his voice in the endeavor to make people bid, but they did not need any urging.

The seats went like hot cakes. The $12 seats include all of the floor, with the exception of the last six rows and part of the first balcony.

This is the way you do if you want a seat. You enter from Hamilton pl., and if you have never been there before while the sale of seats is in progress, 10 to 1 you attempt to walk into the office where the assistants are counting out great wads of bills and piles of silver. Another man is giving out the precious pasteboards.

At the other side of a low door are the faces of some of the prettiest girls in Boston—and that means the world—who are getting their tickets. All this you see through the glass of the door, and then the policeman tells you that you must walk along further and go in at another door.

Ah! Here you are! See the man on the step ladder. No, he is not trying to make his mark, except on the charts of the seats which are pasted on to the board.

He has flowing side whiskers, and all the concert world know him as the head usher of the hall.

THE WAY ONE FAIR BIDDER GOT THREE SEATS FOR $27 EACH.

BOTH BID AT ONCE.

But observe the actions of the man in front of the upright board flourishing a short, fat baton, and pacing the platform like an actor doing heavy tragedy.

You might think that he had lost some money on Sullivan and was bemoaning his fate.

But he is only the auctioneer. Listen! "Remember, ladies and gentlemen, that the amount you bid is the premium on the price of the seat which is $12. Don't blame me if you make a mistake in this matter. It won't be my fault. Now what do I get for this one. Right in the centre of the house—$10, $15, $18."

And so he goes up the scale until he cannot seem to vamp up the price any higher.

Then he does something with that fat baton which is more than artistic.

He lifts it up about three feet above his head and brings it down into his left hand with a reckless and sublime disregard of the consequences, exclaiming, "Going once."

This little ceremony he repeats three times, and at the third time the seat is declared sold.

Your part in the transaction?
Why, the simplest thing in the world.
Just take lots of money, all you can beg, borrow or steal with you, and shout till you are hoarse and black in the face; or, if you prefer, shake your hand at the auctioneer. Keep it up till he says "Going for the third time." Then gracefully walk down to the office, give your name, pay your money, turn and give the people a chance to see what you look like, for they will want to know, and then leave the hall.

G. W. STEWART BIDS $380 FOR A SEAT FOR MRS. JACK GARDNER.

Nothing simpler, unless you don't happen to have quite money enough.

And as one of the fat, jolly policemen said yesterday morning, "God help the man without money in that crowd."

As a rule the prices paid were much higher than last year.

There was one rather peculiar incident during the morning, which served to help along the monotony of the buying.

Row "I" had been reached, and in this are some of the best seats in the house.

The bidding began and was run steadily up by jumps of five till the hundred mark was passed. The biggest thing paid before had been $69. People began to get up in their seats to see who was so flush as to pay that amount for a seat. It was Mr. George W. Stewart, the manager of the Germania band, who was buying for a friend.

Finally the price reached $150, and when the auctioneer asked the bidder how many he wanted he said, after some hesitation, that he wanted three. They were for Mrs. Jack Gardner.

Then the very next seat was put up, and here is the funny thing about the whole matter. The same man bid the next seat in for $380, when he might have had the whole four, which is the limit of one bid, for the $150 premium each that he paid for three. But he probably reasoned that few people would want but one seat, and he could get it cheap.

It was the highest price ever paid for a seat in Music Hall.

See those two giggling girls over there. They do not know whether to bid or not, and this is evidently their first experience.

But when they have been buying a few years they will be as unconcerned as the maiden of uncertain summers and about the same wintery, who says with a pert toss of her head, "Four, please."

The girl from the Back Bay, with all the money she needed, was out in great numbers. That is her, the one that just said "$20," and then got her two seats with the assurance that papa would not feel it out of his pocket in the least.

The sale of the $7.50 seats for the rehearsals will take place today at the same hour, and there you may see the long hair of the artiste in leonine luxuriousness.

THE SYMPHONY TICKETS.

The Prices Range Much Higher Than Last Year.

Auctioneer Jackson was "knocking down" chairs in Music Hall yesterday for the Friday afternoon rehearsals of the Symphony Orchestra.

The sale was extremely dull for some time, the bidding at its highest reaching only a $69 premium. Taken as a whole, however, the bidding is running higher than last season.

The real excitement came this morning when row I was reached, and the favorite old seats of Mrs. J. L. Gardner came into question. The bidding was brisk and stopped finally at $150. The bidder gave his name as G. W. Stewart and took three seats. There was a buzz of excitement all over the hall, which was only quieted by a fierce contest for the next seat. The bidding passed over the $150 figure in disdain, and never stopped on its mad career until stopped at $380.

"How many seats?" "One." "What name?" "Stewart."

Then there was more excitement. If Stewart wanted four seats, why did he not take them all at once on the $150 premium? That was the universal query. The natural supposition that Mrs. Gardner was bound to have her old seats at any price was enough to elicit the confession from the bidder that he bought them for her.

But that fourth seat remains unexplained.

A new arrangement of the players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been made as follows: A series of platforms radiating from the conductor's stand and rising as they retreat will form an amphitheatre. The first and second violins will be placed at the conductor's right and left, respectively, the violas, violoncellos, wind and percussion in the centre and the basses at the back on each wing, divided by the wind chairs. The season of the orchestra will include about one hundred entertainments aside from those of the western tour, half being the concerts and public rehearsals in this city, six in Providence, four in Worcester, ten in Cambridge, five each in New York, Philadelphia and Baltimore, and ten public rehearsals and concerts in Brooklyn.

THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The interest shown by the auction sale of seats to the Symphony concerts indicates a social even more than an artistic attraction. If we are not mistaken, the suggestion that the seats at these concerts should be disposed of by auction was originally made by us as a means of overcoming the obvious defects of the scramble for places in the line that had previously existed. As matters are now conducted the premiums on the seats go entirely, with the exception of the slight commission paid to ticket dealers, who are employed to represent purchasers, to the promoter of the concerts, Mr. Henry L. Higginson, a disposition of the bonus in every way better than that which had previously been made of it. We dare say that this addition in the form of premiums, which must now amount to very much more than the fixed income through tickets, has enabled Mr. Higginson to make a number of improvements and to hold out inducements to artists that were hardly possible before, even with his generous and public spirited method of carrying on this enterprise; hence, the value of the concerts given has probably appreciated when judged of on a strictly mercantile basis.

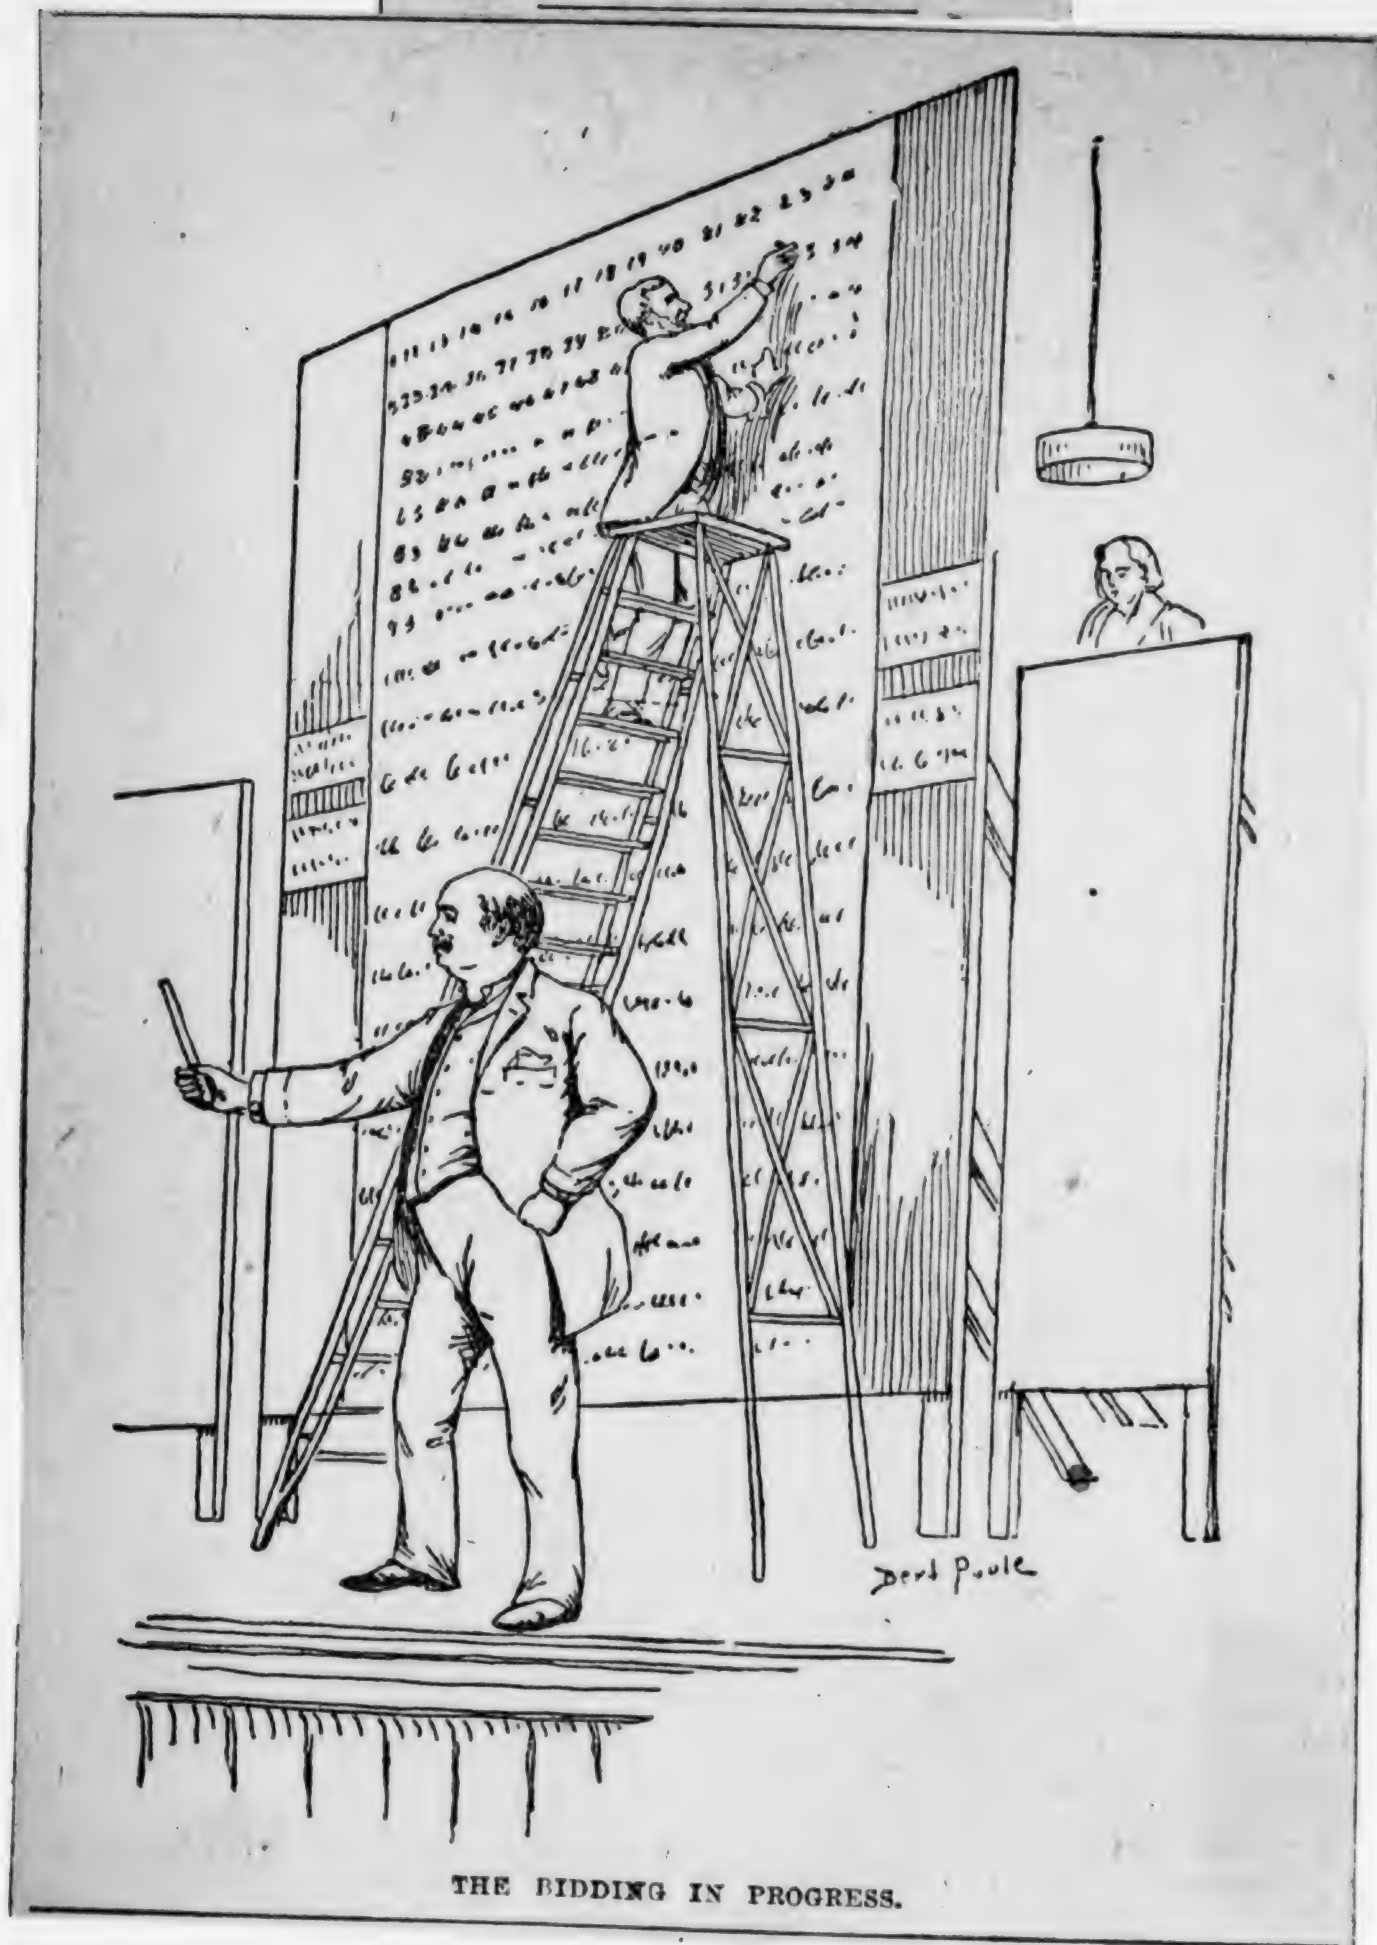

But that this has been brought about by a departure from the original intentions of the originator of this series of entertainments is too well known to need more than a fair statement. We are obtaining in Boston performances of orchestral music through the maintenance of a permanent, high class orchestra superior to those given or obtainable in any city on the American continent, and in many, and perhaps most, respects equal to the best given in any of the musical centres of the old world. But, adding the premium which the tickets command to the regular price of admission, the cost of these entertainments to those who attend them is by no means a small one. We do not refer to such an extraordinary price as that paid for one seat at the auction of rehearsal tickets on Monday—a price which made each concert cost to the purchaser more than $16—but to the average price for reasonably good seats. These latter were disposed of on a range of premiums entailing the payment of from $2 to $4 per concert, an amount obviously beyond the means of persons of limited incomes.

If it could be said that this demand was due to the willingness of a large number of our people to make great financial sacrifices simply for the purpose of hearing musical performances of a high class rendered by artists of a high grade, the statement would be a very creditable indorsement of the artistic development attained by the residents of Boston and its vicinity. But, unfortunately, there is reason for thinking that this extraordinary demand is due more to social than to artistic considerations, and that a very considerable number of those whose bids have tended to raise the scale of premiums attend the concerts of the Symphony orchestra, not from a special love of music, but because it is considered in certain ranges of society the proper thing to do. It may furthermore be added that the probable effect of the fashionable demand has been to lessen the sum total of obtainable musical enjoyment by the exclusion of those who would appreciate the concerts much more than do many of those who attend them.

We do not state this in criticism of the management, for the reason that we do not see how Mr. Higginson can in any way be held responsible for the change that has taken place in his original plan of procedure. The only suggestion that can be given is one which we have made in the past, and which has been in some degree followed by those having charge of these entertainments; that is, increasing as far as possible the number of concerts given, or, in other words, providing a new series for those who find it financially impossible to attend the rehearsals and the final concerts. Years ago the Philharmonic Society in New York used to give first and second public rehearsals before its concerts, and while this system may have in it certain defects it might be well to see whether its adoption here, completely or in some modified form, would not be possible. It may be added that as fashion is uncertain in its dictates, in a few years more the changes that it makes may give larger opportunities to music lovers, even in these entertainments that are now accorded. Twenty-five years ago the Harvard Symphony concerts were supported by the social prestige connected with attendance upon them. But later on the fancy changed; social leaders turned in other directions, and, unfortunately in this case, the transition brought about the financial collapse of what had been a deserving enterprise.

THE BIDDING IN PROGRESS.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

Remarkable Interest in the Symphony Concerts.

The Coming Ticket Sales — That "Music Hall" Scheme — The Henry Mapleson Opera Company — Marie Tempest's New Opera, "The Fencing Master" — Fets and Rumors.

The rare good judgment jointly of Manager Charles A. Ellis and Conductor Arthur Nikisch in making public the very complete outline of the season's plans for the Symphony concerts has had its legitimate result, and the box office people at Music Hall have been kept busy for the last week giving information as to the ticket sales of the coming week.

The average American wants to know what he or she is paying for in his or her purchases, and the ready way in which Conductor Nikisch has adapted his plans to this national characteristic "is greatly to his credit." Few of the earlier seasons of the Boston orchestra have been more fruitful in novelties than that shortly to be begun gives promise of being and the public has ample reason to anticipate a full realization of all the promises made.

As it has become a custom to announce the sale of every seat in the hall for the entire season of both rehearsals and concerts at the close of the week, an increase in the public patronage cannot be had, but there is every reason to anticipate a repetition of the results of recent years in the sales of the coming week.

The rearrangement of the orchestra is a matter of such general interest that a plan of the new seating of the men is presented herewith.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The Ticket Sale Yesterday Results in High Prices.

The would-be patrons of the Saturday evening concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra rallied in full ranks at Music Hall yesterday morning, and when Auctioneer Jackson opened the bidding for the $12 seats, under the usual conditions, he found a ready response from the audience.

Last year the first seat sold, No. 1 in slip A, down under the second violins, with a fine view of the exit to Hamilton place, was bid off at 25 cents, but this choice (?) location induced some one to bid a premium of $3 yesterday, and the example set was followed by subsequent purchaser to such an extent that fully double the amount of last year's premiums was realized from the first four rows, the top figure in slip C being $38.

There was a steady, legitimate demand for all the floor seats, the prices ranging from $20 to $50, according to the location. Some few seats on the outer aisles sold below $20, but the average was maintained at a figure that promised to bring the gross amount up to a figure largely in excess of last year's receipts.

The prices, from $2 and $3, when the rows under the balcony were reached, and the last three seats of the $12 lot on the floor were not taken. The box office sale of these three seats, without any premium, begins on Saturday morning.

The sale of the balcony seats showed that on the right, facing the stage, to be the more popular, and the seats in this part of the hall fetched about the same premiums as the same seats commanded for the rehearsals, the prices ranging from $25 to $40. The seats in the left balcony brought about two-thirds the prices for the right balcony seats, and the front balcony seats sold from $10 to $20, running down toward the last to $8.

It should be borne in mind that the prices quoted are premiums, and that $12 must in all cases be added to get the actual cost of the seat.

This morning, at 10 o'clock, the $7.50 concert seats will be sold, these including the rear rows on the floor under the balcony, the rear rows of the first balcony and all the seats in the second balcony, the entire house being reserved for the concerts.

SYMPHONY SEATS SOLD.

Concert Tickets Bring Lower Premiums Than Those for Rehearsal.

A rehearsal of a play is less interesting for the spectator than a performance of the same piece, but this rule does not hold true in regard to symphony concerts, for the rehearsals are more popular than the regular performances. On the first two days of this week all the rehearsal seats were disposed of at auction in Music Hall and today the sale of seats for the Saturday evening performances was begun. The $12 seats were those under consideration this morning and there was a large attendance when the auction began, but not so large as that on Monday or Tuesday.

"How much am I offered for this seat?" asked the auctioneer, indicating the end seat in the front row.

"Fifty cents" was the somewhat discouraging first offer, but subsequent bids raised the premium to $8. This was the highest price paid for a seat in the front row, the lowest being $5. On the second row the premiums ranged between $6 and $16; on the third, between $8 and $38; on the fourth, between $10, and $35; on the fifth, between $11.50 and $25.50; on the sixth between $11.50 and $41; on the seventh, between $9 and $47; and on the tenth, between $14 and $31.

When the auctioneer neared the seats on the eleventh row which commanded the now famous price of $380 on Monday's sale, the interest of the spectators increased. That seat with the two next to it brought a premium of $53 each, while the two just across the second aisle brought premiums of $55 each.

The bidding was rather slow this morning, and the premiums seemed small compared with those for the rehearsal tickets. Tomorrow the $7.50 seats will be disposed of at auction, and any left unsold will be placed in the Music Hall box office Saturday morning.

Eugene Gruenberg has withdrawn from the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and will devote his time to teaching and to literary work. He purposes to form a class for ensemble playing, trios, quartets and other combinations of strings.

SYMPHONY.

After filling orders we have a few seats for sale on floor and in the balcony.

CONNELLY'S THEATRE TICKET OFFICE
40[A] ADAM'S HOUSE. 321

SYMPHONY REHEARSALS

FOR SALE—One end seat—G 34. Price $40.
Apply to CASHIER, Transcript Office. 321

SYMPHONY
Seats for sale by GEO. W. STEWART, 120
Tremont street, Room 97. 321

HIGH PRICES FOR GALLERY SEATS.

Ninety Dollars Premium Paid on Three Symphony Concert Tickets.

Only surpassed by the exciting moment in the auction sale of symphony rehearsal seats was a scene which occurred in Music Hall this morning. The $7.50 seats for the Saturday evening concerts were being sold and the sale had proceeded in the ordinary manner with ready buyers but comparatively slow bidding. The seats on the floor had been disposed of at premiums ranging between $13 and $1 for the comparatively undesirable seats on the side of the hall under the gallery. The auctioneer was disposing of the seats on the back row of the first gallery on the right-hand side. Mr. Connelly, the theatre ticket agent at the Adams House, had just bought four seats at a premium of $11.50 each, and the adjoining seats were offered. Suddenly bidding began with a rush, and before the spectators realized it the premium had been pushed up by steps of $1 each to $90, for which J. R. Heard, the West-street agent, took three seats. Just a moment later, Mr. Connelly purchased two equally desirable seats at premiums of $17 each.

No other remarkably high prices were paid during the sale. With the one exception just noted, the highest premium was $22, for which sum several seats on the sides of the gallery were purchased. The average premium for a seat on the sides of the gallery was about $12, and for those on the floor, $6.

The sale lasted much longer than those of the previous days this week, as the entire second gallery is reserved for the Saturday concerts and the disposition of these seats occupied considerable time, although the premiums were not excessively high. There was a large attendance at the sale.

Sale of Symphony Tickets.

It had been the original intention to have the seats remaining unsold after the auction placed on sale at the Music Hall box office Saturday morning, but when the sale finished today every seat in the hall had been disposed of. Last year there were about fifty seats untaken at the auction sale, but the season before every one was bought at the first sale.

THE SYMPHONY SEA-ON.

Every Seat for Both Rehearsals and Concerts Sold.

For the third successive season of the Boston Symphony orchestra's home rehearsals and concerts every reserved seat has been sold, the auction sales of the week having again surprised even those best acquainted with local amusement enterprises. The prices given by the public for these tickets—aggregating at a rough estimate $125,000—will afford a surplus over the expenses of the season and make a partial return for the vast sums expended in establishing the orchestra and maintaining it in former years.

The auction sale of the $7.50 seats for the Saturday evening concerts called out the biggest attendance of the week yesterday morning, and the premiums bid were more within the means of ordinary patrons.

The six rows of seats on the rear floor under the balcony were quickly disposed of at merely nominal premiums, compared with the sums paid for the nearer locations, the bids ranging as a rule from $2 to $6, with occasional variations slightly above and below these figures.

In the right balcony, facing the stage, the seats against the wall brought from $10 to $20, except that Mr. John T. Heard, who had an unlimited order, passed the record of the concert ticket premiums by advancing the price of seats 138, 139 and 140, after a sharp competition, to $90.

THE HIGHEST BIDDER, MR. JOHN T. HEARD.

The seats in the left balcony sold at about the same figure.

There are three rows of the $7.50 seats at the rear of the front first balcony, and these sold at from $8 to $12.

More interest was shown in the sale when the upper balcony seats were put up, and the premiums for this part of the house averaged from $5 to $8.

It appears that the entire lot of $12 seats were sold at a premium, as the three that were not bid off at the sale of Thursday were taken immediately after at a premium of 50 cents each.

MORE SYMPHONY CONCERTS NEEDED.

To the Editor of the Transcript: The average music lover of modest means in these September days is haunted with anticipations of the symphony concerts which he cannot regularly hear.

"Now is the winter of [his] discontent," if he happens to have a family who takes pleasure in the art. His memory of the auctions has a bitter taint. The hours were solely vexatious in which the seats steadily eluded his resources on the gay wings of luxurious premiums.

Indeed it is, this season, more clearly and seriously true than ever before that a large and important class of the music-loving public is debarred from regular attendance at the concerts by the present condition and kind of demand for the tickets. That the class is large is evidenced by the number of complaints that any person interested in the matter may hear if the subject is mentioned; and it is also an important class because it includes not only large numbers of earnest amateurs who practice self-denial in other directions for the sake of their art, but also very many professional students and workers in the art.

Now, ought not some modification or extension of the present system be devised and attempted by which this class of persons might be accommodated? The suggestion most frequently heard is that a third performance, even of part, if not of all, the concerts be given.

The writer has met this suggestion from many individuals who have duly considered the matter. The losses incurred by the projector of this valuable enterprise in its earlier years are fully and gratefully recognized; but it is highly probable that these latter seasons are vigorously moving the balance to the other side of the account. And it is confidently believed by these well-wishers that the plan above suggested could be made practicable without serious loss, if any.

On behalf of the numerous disappointed seekers for seats at reasonable prices, the writer begs that this matter may be carefully weighed and some effort be made to make this worthy enterprise of education and elevating enjoyment more comprehensive. Its doors now work on springs that shut out very many who ought not to be so excluded. ONE OF THIS CLASS.

OUR correspondent who demands more symphony concerts rehearses an old complaint and reiterates an old suggestion. The answer may be equally familiar to many. On several occasions in the course of the past five or six seasons extra concerts at low prices have been given by the Symphony Orchestra with the hope of catching some of the overflow. Except when an extraordinary attraction has been offered (and not always then) these concerts have not paid expenses. Our correspondent may remember also that other worthy concert enterprises have been projected in Boston, again in the hope of receiving the overflow from the symphony concerts, and disappointment and loss have been the results. Now, if the class to which our correspondent belongs had wished to hear good music, symphonies and the like, for music's sake, why did they not go to hear Mr. Damrosch's orchestra, or Mr. Listemann's orchestra, each of which offered good programmes, with skilled solo musicians, at very low prices? The answer will be that these outside affairs were not "fashionable," while the symphony concerts were "fashionable," and not to be where are found the fashion-ruling people is not to be in the world.

This is the week when the annual sensation is stirred among our amateurs of orchestra music. The sales of the symphony concert tickets are in progress, and hopes and fears are again contending among hundreds, yes, thousands, of people. Again there is much disappointment because of the failures to buy rehearsal tickets at prices within the means of intending purchasers. But the sales are not over, and judging from the experience of many seasons, the tickets for the Saturday-night concerts, which will be offered tomorrow and Saturday, will be sold at much lower rates than were touched at the auctions of the rehearsal tickets. In the minds of trained observers the Saturday-night performances are better than those of the Friday afternoons, mainly because of the practice acquired at the first public presentations; and there is more than solace in the knowledge of that fact for those who went away with no tickets from the sales on Monday and Tuesday.

It is understood that the Harvard Musical Association have bought the house No. 1 West Cedar street, formerly occupied by Mr. Malcolm S. Greenough, for a permanent home, including the personal residence of the venerable president, Mr. John S. Dwight. The association was driven by the spreading waves of trade from Pemberton square to Park square, and now is dislodged by the same cause from thence. Its excellent library, formerly housed in the Athenaeum, will find convenient quarters in its new house, which will also accommodate not only its fortnightly gatherings of members for their musical suppers, but may permit the famous annual dinners to be held therein.

The history of the Harvard Musical Association, if anybody had kept notes of the gay and witty meetings of its members and invited guests, would be a very interesting affair. Few visiting or resident musicians but have been numbered among its visitors and associates, and the strictness of its conditions of membership, confined to college graduates, or otherwise requiring a practically unanimous election, have kept it a very select organization. Its concerts, lasting for several seasons, were very eagerly sought so long as the preference in obtaining tickets was had through members, but when, in consequence of the complaints by press and public, the sale was made free and open, the public interest immediately diminished. A considerable fund, which had been accumulated in a series of successful seasons, was so rapidly depleted in one or two that prudence compelled the abandonment of the enterprise. This experience proves the wisdom of Mr. Higginson's change of base to the auction system, which keeps the Symphony in vogue by the demonstration of fashionable competition. It is better to have the opportunity, even though it is scarcer than it used to be, and probably than the founder desires it to be, than not to have it at all. If the tickets were sold without premium, open to all, and without fashionable prestige, it may be doubted if our community even yet would buy enough of them, for music's sake alone, to pay the bills.

The popularity of the Symphony rehearsals and concerts is attested by the fact that this year the orders received by Mr. Connolly of the Adams House are nearly doubly in number that received in any previous year. Among those who placed their orders with him this season for rehearsals may be mentioned: Mrs. John C. Phillips, Robert C. Winthrop, Jr., Mrs. B. P. Cheney, Mrs. Eben D. Jordan, Jr., Mrs. Winthrop Sargent, Miss Wessellhoeft, nine seats, Arthur Amory, Charles L. Lovering, Mrs. W. Powell Mason, Henry M. Whitney, Mrs. D. R. Emerson, Jerome Jones, Miss Heloise E. Hersey, J. B. Billings, Miss R. L. Dexter, Mrs. Frances E. Bacon, George Bixby, Mr. Sylvester Tower, Mrs. T. Parsons, Mr. H. F. Sears, J. C. Kittredge, Mrs. J. G. Cooper, J. P. Stearns, Bert Dunbar, C. N. Wallace, Mr. Fennessy, Walter Ellis, Mrs. C. K. Earle of Worcester, T. E. Zerrahn, M. P. Mason, Mrs. S. I. Williams, William E. Cox, Rev. Fr. Bodfish of Canton, F. E. James, E. L. Sanborn, W. V. Kellen, Mrs. E. C. Swift of Lowell, Mrs. Dabney, Mrs. E. M. Bales, Mrs. Emily S. Rogers, Mrs. James L. Plympton, Russell Tyson, Arthur B. Smith, John Richardson, Frank L. Fish. And for concerts, Mrs. S. J. Williams, Mark Hollingsworth, Ellis Hollingsworth, M. M. Cuniff, Morrison Fuller, Charles Hollings, E. D. Lowe, Mrs. A. B. Claffin, Dr. Francis Minot, Miss Payson, George A. Pierce, Miss Heloise E. Hersey (20 seats, school), Mrs. M. H. Crocker, Mrs. Thatcher Loring, Miss Parkman.

The eagerness to obtain season tickets for the Symphony Orchestra rehearsals and concerts was greater this year than ever, and judging by the large premiums paid, the receipts should exceed those of any other season. While this state of affairs removes these performances somewhat further from the plan on which they were originally projected, and makes them essentially entertainments for the wealthy rather than for music lovers of moderate means, it is difficult to see how such a result could be well avoided. The number of season tickets is necessarily limited by the capacity of Music Hall to seat those who desire to attend the concerts, and if the demand is greater than the supply the only fair way is to dispose of the seats by auction; for it would be wholly unbusiness like and the height of folly to decline the premiums that go so far toward defraying the expenses. It is true that much of the buying at extravagant prices is done by those who care less for music than they do for coming to the fore in a prevailing fad, finding their reward in the consciousness that they are in line with those who are well up in the mysteries of the proper caper; but the premiums they pay go far toward lessening the burden the projector of these concerts has taken upon himself. It is, however, none the less to be regretted that the large army of sincere music-lovers, who have not means to enter into the furious competition for tickets, should be placed at a disadvantage; but as we have already suggested, there seems to be no remedy for it, and certainly there is nobody to blame.

MORE SYMPHONY CONCERTS NEEDED.

To the Editor of the Transcript: My attention was caught by a letter with the above heading in Friday's Transcript. Will you let me repeat under that heading a suggestion as to a practical way to solve the problem?

Instead of one series of twenty-four concerts there might be two series of twelve concerts each, the concerts in the second series to be an exact repetition of those in the first, except in the matter of soloists and some of their musical numbers. These two series might alternate, the first series having its rehearsal and concert the first week and the second series its turn in the second week, and so on.

It is true that fewer musical numbers could be produced during the winter, but it is probable that the performance would be even better than now.

The number of persons who could secure tickets for a good season of concerts would thus be practically doubled. It is probable that this would result in lower premiums at the auction sales, and the main objection that I see to the plan is that Mr. Higginson would get less return for his generous outlay. Perhaps, however, he would be glad of the suggestion.

PUBLIC SPIRIT.

Symphony Rehearsals.

Two very desirable $12 seats, just back of the centre of the house, can be had at a reasonable price, because the owner is unable to use them. Apply by letter to A. B. H., the Youth's Companion Office, 301 Columbus avenue. 1t[A] s 26

SYMPHONY REHEARSALS.

FOR SALE—One seat, last row, first balcony, $30. One seat under clock, floor, $17. Address L. W. G., Transcript Office, Boston. 2t[A] s 24

SYMPHONY REHEARSALS.

FOR SALE—Two seats—"R 26, 27"; price $78 each. Address M. P. W., Transcript Office. 1t[A] s 26

SYMPHONY

Seats for sale by GEO. W. STEWART, 120 Tremont street, Room 97. 1t[A] s 22

THE SYMPHONY SEASON.

No previous sale of tickets for the season's rehearsals and concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra has ever awakened the interest that has been shown in the auctions of the week just ended, and the handsome financial results indicate a lively appreciation of this great musical enterprise by the public of Boston and neighboring cities and towns.

It might gratify public curiosity to state the actual amount received from the sales of the week, but as the founder and patron of the orchestra is in no sense a professional manager he has a perfect right to withhold such a public announcement of his private affairs.

The public is apt to be led into error each year in regard to the expense attending these concerts, and it seems desirable to call to mind again the large opportunities given for a hearing of these rehearsals and concerts at a nominal expense.

The total receipts for the rehearsals and concerts may be figured at $125,000, and for this amount 103,872 seats are provided during the season, making the average expense $1.20 per seat, which is certainly a reasonable figure for such concerts. In addition to this, counting the upper balcony at the rehearsals and the admissions sold, there are about 30,000 opportunities given to hear these concerts during the season at the nominal fee of 25 cents, thus bringing the average expense per concert to each individual attending down below $1.

It will gratify all who have benefited in former years by the public-spirited action of Mr. Henry L. Higginson, the sole patron of the Boston Symphony orchestra, to know that the receipts of sales for the week will offset a portion of the large expense attending the maintenance of these concerts in earlier seasons.

SYMPHONY TICKETS.

Rehearsal and Concerts, in good locations and reasonable prices. ELLA GOERING, formerly with Russell, 10 Hamilton place. 1t[A] s 28

SYMPHONY REHEARSALS.

4 seats in E. floor, $55.00 and $50.00; two end seats in balcony, near stage, $45.00. Box 1878, P. O. WThs[A] s 28

SYMPHONY

Seats for sale by GEO. W. STEWART, 120 Tremont street, Room 97. 1t[A] s 22

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

It has often been said, and so truly that it can hardly be repeated too often, that the central fact, the heart, so to speak, of the musical life of a community is its established orchestra. The heart of our musical life in Boston is undoubtedly the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It is the sine qua non, the thing without which all our musical doings would be otherwise than they are.

It may be noted in passing that, compared with most other musical centres in the world, our city is in two respects in a somewhat original position. Our subventioned orchestra—for the fact that its financial sinews come from a private individual, instead of from the State, does not make it any the less a subventioned institution—is an independent organization, and not, as is the case almost everywhere else, immediately dependent upon an established opera. Then its component members are predominantly foreigners, at least of foreign blood, and its conductors have been, in every case, not Americans, nor even German-Americans, but distinctly Germans. In both these respects our orchestra differs from those in all the great musical centres in Europe, with the single exception of London; and in the second particular it differs even from London. Still, as these circumstances have, upon the whole, little to do with the object and scope of the present article, it is enough to mention them as facts, without further comment.

There can be little doubt now—notwithstanding much that was said and written in the beginning, and a good deal that is still muttered in some quarters—that, in establishing and maintaining the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Higginson has done a great and good thing. One hears it said at times that the institution has failed in compassing its object, in bringing fine orchestral performances of good music within the means of the "millions." That the symphony concerts have become largely an article of "fashionable," and also costly, luxury, and that a pure love of music does not reign as supreme as it might over the souls of our audiences. But these objections seem really to be unfounded enough. No doubt exorbitant, even ludicrously exorbitant, prices have been paid for choice seats for both concerts and rehearsals; but one fails to see how this shuts out of the concerts any one who can afford the regular price of admission, and comes in time not to be turned away from the box office. If there be any "fashionable luxury" in the matter, it lies solely in the choice of certain particular seats, and not in the concerts themselves. To say that the enormous premiums paid for certain seats prevent people of moderate or exiguous means attending the concerts, is much like saying that an extortionate price of partridges and terrapin took beef and pork out of the poor man's mouth. The people who pay large, or even small, premiums, would get their seats at any rate, even if there were no premium at all to be paid. As for the frame of mind in which our audiences go to the concerts (premium-payers as well as non-premium-payers), one would think that this was, to a considerable extent, their own business. But one might think that the long queues of people waiting for the doors to open on Friday afternoons, and the lines of listeners standing under the side galleries on some Saturday evenings, were a pretty good proof of at least some musical earnestness. It is not easy to prevent money buying what it has set its heart on buying, and no method has yet been discovered of preventing some people from being fools. If a long purse does not "get there" in one way, it probably will in another, and if some people like to pay dearly for the pleasure of going to concerts because some other people go, and it is in general good to be seen there (even admitting this to be the case), it should be no matter for public mourning.

No; the symphony concerts unquestionably do an enormous amount of good; so much good, indeed, that it is idle to speculate upon whether they do that utopian something known as "unmixed good" or not. Still, no thing in this world is so superlatively excellent that the question whether it could not be better is ever out of place. There are two points in the symphony concerts at which we still growl—the hall and the programmes. Let us take the hall itself first. Here are many, many years that symphony concerts have been given in the Music Hall—to go back no farther, let us say, seventeen years of concerts by the Harvard Musical Association, and eleven years by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which makes, allowing for overlapping, twenty-seven years in all; and during the whole of this time every musician in Boston, without a single exception that has come to light, has been of the opinion that the Music Hall is a bad place for orchestral effect. One may object, "What other or better hall have we?" That is a pretty question to ask in a city where money can be raised as easily as it can in Boston! If we want a hall we can have it. Not that the Music Hall has not its good points; the approaches to the building are enough to tempt a saint to unparliamentary language, if you will; the atmosphere of the hall itself is often of a specific gravity not recommended by the faculty, and complaints about draughts have not been unheard of; but the delightful quiet of the place, when you once have got there, enclosed by other buildings as it is on all sides, and far from the maddening street-car bell and roaring truck, makes up for a good deal of inconvenience. Then again the hall is undeniably a slightly and handsome hall, or would be were it painted a color less suggestive of the liver, according to the popular notion, the seat of melancholy. Still, the prime fact that it is a bad place for orchestral music cannot be argued away. One need not quarrel with the situation of the hall, which has many advantages, but only with the hall itself.

Not the least bad part of the poor orchestral acoustics of the Music Hall is the effect that sound there has upon the orchestra itself. This would have sometime been a paradox, but now the time gives it proof. Time was when all that was expected of an orchestral player was to play straight on, following the conductor's beat, playing forte, mezzo-forte, or piano, according to the marking of his part. But the modern orchestra, in its highest estate, is a wondrously sensitive thing; each player must not only follow the conductor's beat metrically and mind the expression marks in his part in a general way, but he must be immediately and sensitively responsive to every faintest momentary suggestion of dynamic shading that may come from the conductor; each player must, moreover, not only consider his own particular part, but must have a certain realizing sense of the ensemble, of how the whole performance sounds. The orchestral player of today is no longer like what some persons imagine the private in the Prussian army to be—a lifeless machine, drilled into an unintelligent but infallible performance of a certain routine; he is, on the contrary, or should be, an intelligent artist, whose business it is to comprehend and realize his conductor's idea—through the eye, by catching and immediately responding to his every movement and expression of face; through the ear, by a sympathetic gauging of what the rest of the orchestra is doing, for the conductor's eye cannot be everywhere at once. Now, all the players in our orchestra complain that, on the Music Hall stage, they do not feel themselves to be constituent members of an organic body; one part of the orchestra cannot hear the other; the men have to play, as it were, "in the dark." They feel this constantly, but are more than ever conscious of its bad influence, after coming back from a tour to other cities, and playing in other, better halls—say in the Philadelphia Academy of Music, which, from all accounts, seems to be nearly perfect. The present writer well remembers a perfectly simple "entry," most lamely and ineffectively taken up by one of the very best solo players in the whole orchestra at a concert that came immediately after a return of the orchestra from Philadelphia. The delinquent player said afterwards that after the perfect clearness of everything at the Academy of Music, all sounded so vague in the Music Hall "that he hardly dare attack the passage at all." On the Music Hall stage the orchestra plays without any consciousness of musical esprit de corps; not like a "team," but like a mere aggregation of good musicians who know their conductor, to be sure, but do not know one another. Their playing is, to a great extent, like that on the old great organ, on which the organist could not hear himself play.

Add to this untoward effect upon the orchestra itself the terrible proportion of the volume and intensity of musical sound that evaporates ineffective in the Music Hall, leaving but a comparatively small residue to work upon the ears of the audience, the vague, breezy, narrowless tone of the band, as it is heard in almost all parts of the hall (with but few exceptions), and one sees what an unfortunate place it is for our admirable orchestra to have to play in. This is no hap-hazard fad of an individual croaker; no blindly ridden hobby of one or another disgruntled mare's-nest hunter. It is the long experience and the matured opinion of every musician in Boston. And, where all musicians think alike, there is at least a probability of their opinion having some truth in it. The cure for the evil? Well, with that we have nothing to do. Devote the Music Hall to other uses, and build a new hall; tear down the Music Hall and build another hall on its site; remodel the auditorium de fond en comble; do at least something to give the Boston Symphony Orchestra a hall worthy of it, and the Boston public a hall in which an orchestra can be heard at its best, and not at its painful third or fourth best!

The next point for a "restless spirit" to be discontented with is the programmes. Let not the reader imagine that the present writer is about to join the noble and immortal army of programme grumblers. The symphony concert programmes have been from the beginning far better, upon the whole, than those of any orchestral concerts in Paris (with the possible, but by no means certain, exception of the Conservatoire) and fully as good as those of most concerts in Germany or Austria. The average symphony concert programme in London is a thing of terror in comparison. We have no disposition to quarrel with either the general animus or the musical judgment shown hitherto in the make-up of our programmes. There is, however, one point which really should be amended. Neither the Music Hall nor, in general, any hall adapted for orchestral performance is a fit place for songs with piano accompaniment, or pianoforte or other instrumental solos unaccompanied by the orchestra. With pianoforte or violin concertos the case is somewhat different. Instrumental concertos with orchestral accompaniment form an important department in composition, and one that should by no means be ignored in any comprehensive scheme of orchestral concerts; both inherent propriety and long usage have determined that the instrumental concerto finds its proper place at a symphony concert. No doubt "orchestral" halls are not as a rule places where the pianoforte or a solo violin is heard at its best; but having a fine and fully equipped orchestra as a regular adjunct of "pianoforte" halls is generally impracticable. A pianoforte concerto in an "orchestral" hall is perhaps not the best that can be imagined, but it is the best that, under ordinary circumstances, need be asked for. At the very least, it is better than no concerto at all.

But songs with pianoforte accompaniment belong distinctly and indefeasibly to the domain of chamber music, and as such have no right whatever to intrude themselves upon an orchestral concert. As the vocal part of our symphony programmes has hitherto been ordered, the singer usually sings one aria with orchestra in the first part, and a batch of songs with pianoforte in the second. Now, waiving for a moment the question of the hall itself, just consider the chance there is of the same singer performing both these tasks equally well. "Universal" singers are extremely rare anywhere; singers, as a rule, have their specialties much more than instrumental performers do; with the former it is often a matter of mere physique. A singer is often limited to a certain circumscribed musical domain by the calibre and character of his voice. Add to this that a specially trained liedersänger, or "song-singer," from choice and not from necessity is the rarest of rare birds. Singing is a profession like another, and singers who have large voices, fit for doing large work in large halls, take, as a rule, to the more lucrative fields of oratorio and the stage, and their style is redolent of the fields they habitually cultivate; not one in ten or twenty of them, great as they may be in their own way, has any more notion of how a Schubert, Schumann, Mendelssohn, Franz, Rubinstein or Brahms song should be sung than of the rules of the Alcaic pentameter acatalectic. Almost all special "song-singers" all over the world, and many of the very best, have taken to this field less from choice than because they had not voice enough to attempt oratorio or opera successfully. There are exceptions, we know, but they are exceedingly rare.

Now, what a gentle-voiced song-singer will do with grand dramatic scena or aria (and most of the arias sung at our symphony concerts come from operas; comparatively few from oratorios) is more than probable; he or she will do next to, or worse than, nothing with it, large hall apart. What most of the great dramatic singers do with the "songs with pianoforte," sad experience has quite sufficiently taught us by this time; they simply tear them to threads! Now add the fact that the Music Hall, or any proper "orchestral" hall, is as fit for "song-singing" as the Colosseum is for a gallery of Meissonniers, and an inkling may be had of why the "song with pianoforte" should go! And remember that it is not with the song as with the concerto; people who are fond of songs have plenty of opportunity of hearing them at chamber concerts, of which Boston certainly does not lack its full share. Striking them from the programmes of our symphony concerts would in no wise be shelving them; it would simply be relegating them to their proper, natural sphere. The same holds good with pianoforte solos unaccompanied by orchestra. The financial enterprise of great pianists' managers—employers would be a fitter term—has, to be sure, accustomed us to trying to hear unaccompanied pianoforte solos in the Music Hall; but this is no reason why an institution like the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which has avowedly a purely artistic aim, should follow in their wake and imitate them in their felony.

THE TRUTH ABOUT THE SYMPHONIES.

Letters from disappointed seekers for symphony concert tickets continue to pour in upon us. They contain a myriad of inventions for the better ordering of the sale of these widely desired passports. Were all these suggestions adopted, the end of the whole matter would, we fear, resemble the last scene in the antique fable of the man, the boy and the ass. In each of them, as well as in those that have been printed among the Letters to the Editor, there are grains of sense, but as a rule the writers forget that managers of large enterprises must be supposed to know their own business best. For instance, there is the oft-repeated idea of a third concert in each week, with the same programme. The fatal objection to this is that it would be unwise to repeat the concert a second time, as the risk of dulling the player's thoughts and nerves is too great. Taking into account the repetitions at Cambridge and elsewhere, it is known by those best able to judge that the band is, mentally, as severely taxed as it should be, to maintain a high standard of artistic effect. One correspondent asks, How many people can afford to pay $50 to $100 for premiums? Does the writer know how few really pay those high rates? He will be surprised to learn how small is the proportion. As for desirability of location in the hall, there are very few positions where the truly musical ear cannot be richly gratified, so far as that goes. Of course, if one wants to see everybody, and be seen by everybody, that is another matter. A fact cited by this correspondent, that the price for a seat at the New York and Brooklyn concerts of the orchestra is but $1.50, proves nothing, because that is considerably higher than the average cost here, premiums and all. Furthermore, the concerts in these and in other cities outside of Boston have not always earned a profit. And just here it may be noted that in several seasons since the auctions were established, and the trips South and West were organized, the accounts have shown a balance on the wrong side. But that does not lead to a moment's faltering in the noble purpose at the back of this great institution. Somebody asks that the orchestra be reduced; but in a high-art venture of this sort it will never do to step backward. The standard and the expenses are ever upward, no matter what the returns may be. With ninety men, the present force, owing to an increase of violins as compared with last year, the orchestra is at about the numerical standard of the best bands of Europe. But never yet has an educated musician complained that an orchestra (if composed of good men) was too large for any hall. Besides the cost of the recent additions to the orchestra, the outlay for the coming season will be further increased by the expenses of the choral contingent. The orchestra is not maintained either to make or to save money.

The suggestion that the tickets be offered at paying rates and sold in the old way would not prevent speculators from obtaining them. As for the speculators—what is there so much worse in the purchase of concert or theatre tickets for a possible profit than in the accumulation of stores of sugar or cotton? Indeed, the locking up of the necessities of life may be a sin at peculiar moments. But a symphony concert is not a necessity to one's existence, even to that of a student or an amateur of music. A little calculation of the average cost of a seat or a group of seats, a little knowledge that even though that average were anywhere from one dollar to one dollar and half the price is still far below the rate abroad for similar diversions of equal merit, with a little confidence and readiness to bid, would have thwarted the designs of the speculators in many instances at the recent auction sales. Sym.

MORE SYMPHONY CONCERT TALK.

A correspondent craves one last word concerning the Symphony Concert tickets. He asks, "Is it fair in estimating the average cost of desirable seats to take those under the balcony?" Certainly, since the premiums paid for some of those seats were higher than were earned for some of the seats "in the open," so to speak. Very high premiums were also paid for seats in the back rows of one of the galleries, where there are only narrow benches without backs, and a constricted space for one's knees. It would be impossible to strike an average without including every seat that was sold. The writer adds that in New York, Brooklyn and Philadelphia there are few or no undesirable seats in the halls, meaning, presumably, those where the Symphony Orchestra gives concerts. The statement needs qualification. For our own part we would prefer the most remote corner on the Music Hall floor to any seat in the highest gallery of either the Brooklyn or the Philadelphia Academy of Music. Individual taste may guide one's preference. Our correspondent thus refers to the system pursued by the New York Philharmonic Society: "At the beginning of each season, subscribers of the previous season are invited to renew their tickets, and failing to do so the tickets are at the disposal of new subscribers, who must send their orders by mail to the secretary. No season tickets are to be had at the box office." If this custom were adopted by the managers of the Symphony Orchestra there would be no end to the moans and sobs over the favoritism and the exclusion of the masses from the benefits of the concerts. It is also to be remembered that the Symphony Orchestra gives at least forty-eight concerts in the Music Hall and eight in the Sanders Theatre—which, by the way, is nearer to the homes of many lovers of high class music on this side of the bridge than is the Metropolitan Opera House to the homes of many buyers of the Philharmonic tickets—while the great New York orchestra provides only twelve concerts, all told, in a season. Our correspondent complains of the eternal echo of Music Hall and protests against the great increase in numbers of the Symphony Orchestra on that account. Forty years' experience of the hall have not made us aware of echoes there with these exceptions: when the hall has been empty or nearly so, when somebody has been projecting a cornet solo into space, and when a brass band has been playing. An increase of the host of violins will not make more echoes possible—quite the contrary. The proportion of an orchestra to a hall is not a question of mathematics. In Paris, where they really know a little something about beauty of tone, the Sunday concerts at the Conservatory are given in an apartment much smaller than the Music Hall and with an orchestra of ninety. Sym.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The announcements made last week have awakened a widespread interest in the coming season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and the opinion is freely expressed that it will be the most brilliant in the career of the organization. The chorus that is being organized by Arthur Foote will add a potent attraction to the scheme and make possible the performance of a class of music that it has long been the desire of the management to include in the programmes. The partial list of music to be played already published, indicates that Mr. Nikisch is fully alive to his opportunities, and that worthy compositions of all schools will find places on his programmes. It is impossible to present a complete list of the solo artists engaged, but the names of Paderewski, Joseffy, Miss Juch and Miss Sherwin show that a liberal policy will be pursued in this respect.

Though it can be no longer necessary to speak of the quality of the orchestra and of the carefulness in every detail which characterizes all the work of preparation, it is well again to remind the town that the band stands on a plane where but few other orchestral bodies can be compared with it. In the individual excellence of the players and in the completeness of its equipment, the Boston Symphony Orchestra is superlatively fine. It is in one sense a compliment to its chief when the interpretation of a piece is criticised and the conductor alone is held responsible, since it is in effect an admission that he has impressed his individuality on the entire host under him; that he has made, as Berlioz says, the orchestra into one instrument upon which he plays at will. Nor need the members of the band feel that this result is an indication of a surrender of their personal importance; rather is it a proof of the development among them of artist natures, which thus consent to be moulded into an artistic whole.

The arrangements for the sale of season tickets for the season in the Music Hall, the twelfth, are again repeated below. Public opinion has long ago accepted the auction as the fairest method of disposing of these tickets. Even with the premiums—excepting, of course, the enormous ones which are paid for a very few tickets only—the prices are very much lower than will buy the opportunities to hear concerts of equal merit in any city of the United States or Europe. They who purpose to buy are advised to attend the sales in person. Ladies will have no difficulty in making bids. These are the established terms and conditions:

Public rehearsals—$12 seats at auction next Monday; $7.50 seats at auction Tuesday; seats not taken, for sale at the office Wednesday.

Concerts—$12 seats at auction, Thursday; $7.50 seats at auction Friday; seats not taken for sale at the office Saturday.

Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order, not for choice, and for premiums in addition to the price of the ticket; not more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats will be shown on a diagram and will be marked off as sold. Tickets will be delivered and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be resold. The auction will be held in the Music Hall, beginning at 10 o'clock, A. M.

Tickets for Symphony Concerts.

Next week the most important preliminary event of the Boston season takes place in the sale of the tickets for the Symphony concerts. It is necessary in Boston to have tickets to the Symphony concerts as elsewhere it is necessary to have a box at the opera. To be without is to be outside the social pale. That one does not in the least care for music has nothing in the world to do with the matter. If one does enjoy music of course that is so much the better, but it does not really count. One of the most absurd things about it is that certain parts of the hall are fashionable and others are not wholly aside from their advantages as positions where one can hear well. Over the clock, for instance, which is the portion of the first balcony opposite the stage and might seem an especially desirable place, is distinctly "South End," and no true society woman would think of sitting there even if the seats were given to her. She might take a place in the third balcony on the side high overhead where the air is as scarce as the heat is superabundant, because certain musicians have set upon those seats the seal of pecuniarily thrifty indorsement. To sit there would be a musical eccentricity, excusable and even admirable as showing originality and musical individuality; but to sit near the clock would be a social faux pas not to be thought of for a moment! So subtle and so mysterious are the fine distinctions of the social world. It is no wonder that one who attempts to follow them must make up his mind to attend seriously to nothing else. Fashion is a goddess who is no less exacting than she is capricious. She will have no half-way service. One must give her the whole or be left completely in the lurch.

Chorus and Orchestra.

There is to some extent to be a new departure in the establishment of a chorus to cooperate with the orchestra this winter. This will be drilled by Mr. Arthur Foote, and will consist of some 200 voices. It will, of course, be used only for the bringing out of certain works; but, if once it is established, such a chorus must either be used or go to pieces, and it can hardly fail to prove a constant temptation to bring out mixed work rather than the purely orchestral, which is the legitimate field of the orchestra. It seems to me somewhat of a pity that things should move in this direction, but that is because personally I am fond of purely orchestral music, and resent the intrusion of even soloists at the Symphony concerts. It may be that the managers of the Symphony course, who are supposed to feel accurately the pulse of the public, have discovered a disposition to weary of classic music, but I do not believe that this is the true explanation of the change. I fancy that to tell the whole story would necessitate a closer knowledge of Boston musical intrigues than I possess, albeit no one can be fully ignorant that such intrigues go on.

He Wanted "Screamers."

The collection of paintings owned by the Boston Art Museum is increasing slowly, the latest important addition being "L'Ami des Humbles," the celebrated picture by L'Hermite, which represents the supper at Emmaus. There are always good pictures in the galleries, but for the most part the collection is a loan one. One of the petty scandals of the day is to the effect that a wealthy man who was of much social pretension and no social standing went to a well known Paris picture dealer, who is often patronized by Boston buyers, and said to him:

"I want to buy two or three pictures of the kind that they lend to the Art Museum. I don't care what they cost, but I want 'em to be screamers so they'll be talked about. You know what'll hit Boston—only I want to hit 'em hard."

As the pictures are not in evidence to support the story it is possible to doubt this tale, which rests upon the evidence of the Parisian picture dealer. It is ben trovato, however, in so far as it indicates one of the lines in which certain Boston prejudices run. There are many men who take a not unnatural pleasure in showing their pictures at the museum. The public gets the benefit of this, however, and no one need grumble. What is needed now is a fund with which to purchase pictures, and of this there is at present little prospect.

The summer is over and life is rapidly ebbing back to town. The disorganization of the out of town season is resolving itself again into the homogeneous order of the winter. Life takes the place of the makeshift existence of the summer hotel, and for that I, at least, most heartily give thanks.

Chas. Tribune

ARLO BATES.

—Another sign of the return of society to town was the audience at Music Hall Friday afternoon, which was assembled for the first Symphony rehearsal. It was a goodly sight, the spacious floor and both balconies filled with the representative company which only comes together in such numbers for these rehearsals. Mr. Nikisch was very heartily welcomed as he appeared and took his old place on the stand. He is looking finely after his summer's rest. In the audience, which was made up almost entirely of season ticket holders, were Col. and Mrs. H. L. Higginson, who occupied the same seats in the middle of the hall which Mr. Higginson has had since the opening of the Symphonies; Mr. and Mrs. C. P. Curtis and Mrs. Agassiz, who were in their old places, Mrs. Nikisch, Mr. and Mrs. W. F. Weld, who have seats near the platform. Mr. and Mrs. T. S. Bradlee, Mr. and Mrs. W. R. Dupee and daughter, Father Bodfish, who keeps his old place in front of the platform, Mr. and Mrs. Thornton Lothrop, Mrs. Montgomery Sears, Mrs. Barthold Schlesinger and her handsome daughter, Mr. and Mrs. Russell Tyson, the latter looking extremely well, Robert C. Winthrop, Jr., and his bright-faced daughter, Mrs. John C. Phillips, Mr. John D. Williams, Mrs. E. D. Jordan, Jr., Mr. J. H. Bradford, Mrs. Matthew Luce, Mrs. George B. Shattuck and Mr. Perabo were also among those who had centre seats on the floor of the hall. In the balcony were Dr. Sturgis Bigelow and his aunt, Miss Mary Bigelow, Mr. and Mrs. Edmund Dwight, Mrs. Charles Fairchild and son, Mrs. Henry S. Howe, Prof. and Mrs. Ernest Fenollosa, Miss Virginia Stackpole, Mr. Henry Wainright, Mr. Apthorp and many, many more. Miss Windom, daughter of the ex-secretary, was in the audience.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

MUSIC HALL, BOSTON, Oct. 7, 1892.

The members of the Boston Singers' Society are cordially invited to join the chorus now being organized to sing with the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the coming season. It is expected that the Chorus will appear at several concerts in the regular series, and at two extra performances. Rehearsals will be held under the direction of Mr. Arthur Foote, in Bumstead Hall on Tuesday evenings, beginning punctually at 7.30 and ending at 9. Due notice will be given of the date of the first rehearsal. The last rehearsal before each concert in which the Chorus will take part will be held in Music Hall on Thursday evening and will be with Orchestra and soloists. Four tickets for this rehearsal will be given to each member of the Chorus. Acceptances, stating full name, address and voice, may be sent to me, Music Hall, Boston.

SYMPHONY TICKETS

FOR SALE AT

KENDRICK'S,

Traveller Building,

31 STATE STREET.

SWtc[A] s 24

SYMPHONY TICKETS,

on Floor and in Balcony, at CONNELLY'S THEATRE TICKET OFFICE, ADAMS HOUSE

7th[A]

Symphony Tickets
at reasonable prices
in all parts of the Hall.

Telephone 3544.

SYMPHONY.

A few seats left, in good locations, which we are closing out reasonably, reserving a few to rent as usual. Apply to

Ste[A]

Formerly with Russell, 10 Hamilton place.

SYMPHONY TICKETS.

FOR SALE—Two front seats Nos. 34, 35; (evenings)
ALBERT METCALF, 26 Franklin street.

11[A]

SYMPHONY REHEARSALS.

I have placed two tickets, 2nd row in first balcony, with Miles & Thompson, 13 West street. Price $40 each.

11[A]

SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

One seat in first balcony for Saturday evenings for sale. Price $20. S. H. ROOT, 136 Summer street.

11[A]

SYMPHONY TICKETS WANTED.

Two good seats for rehearsals. Address, stating location and price, L. F. J., Transcript Office.

MWS[A]

0 8

SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

FOR SALE—Two seats together on floor; one end seat; $25 each. Address M. P. J., Transcript Office.

11[A]

SYMPHONY REHEARSALS.

FOR SALE—Seats floor P 23 and 24, $68 each, for Friday Rehearsals. W., P. O. Box 2216.

31[A]

SYMPHONY REHEARSAL

TICKET. One seat in B, centre, floor, $35. Address Box 2062, Post Office.

SYMPHONY REHEARSALS.

Seats sixth row from stage, $50.00. Side balcony $40.00. P. O. Box 1878.

31[A]

SYMPHONY.

Wanted—Two seats in first balcony, for alternate concerts. Address, giving seat numbers and price, H. V. C., Transcript Office.

SYMPHONY

Seats for sale by GEO. W. STEWART, 120 Tremont street Room 97.

SYMPHONY CONCERTS. For sale, two seats, front row, centre, second balcony; also one seat, first balcony centre. Price $22 each. Address T. D. R., Transcript Office.

REHEARSAL TICKETS.

The owner of two excellent seats on Floor would like to sell the use of them for alternate Fridays at cost. Address C., Box 3376.

SYMPHONY REHEARSALS.

FOR SALE—Three seats on floor. Address T. S. B., Transcript Office.

SYMPHONY REHEARSAL

TICKET. One seat in B, centre, floor, $35. Address Box 2062, Post Office.

SYMPHONY REHEARSALS.

Seats, fifth row from stage, $50.00; balcony, side, $40.00. P. O. Box 1878.

SYMPHONY REHEARSALS.

Seats S 24 and 25 for Friday Rehearsals, $75 each. F. P. O. Box 2216.

SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Two seats for Saturday evenings, in second row of second balcony, at $20 each. Apply L. P., 67 Bromfield street.

SYMPHONY

REHEARSALS.

Two desirable seats on floor nearly midway in letter Z. Will sell for same price as paid out for them, as owner cannot use them. Address H., Lock Box 253, Boston.

The sale of season tickets for the 10 concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, will take at the University bookstore, Harvard square on Saturday Oct. 15, at 8 A. M.

The members of the Boston Singers' Society are cordially invited to join the chorus now being organized to sing with the Boston Symphony orchestra during the coming season. It is expected that the chorus will appear at several concerts in the regular series, and at two extra performances. Rehearsals will be held under the direction of Mr. Arthur Foote, in Bumstead Hall, on Tuesday evening, beginning punctually at 7.30 and ending at 9. Due notice will be given of the date of the first rehearsal. The last rehearsal before each concert in which the chorus will take part will be held in Music Hall on Thursday evening, and will be with orchestra and soloists.

There has been over much discussion anent the symphony tickets and the question of money versus art, but let disappointed people take comfort in the thought that it is the speculators who have shown this extraordinary greed for music. A little neglect on the part of the public would have brought the Symphony tickets to a righteous monetary standard. The public has only itself to thank for the present state of affairs. When Mr. Vanderbilt made that emphatic comment of his, he was not so far out of his depth, only the public, ever a sensitive bud, disliked hearing itself sworn at, and very naturally resented the Vanderbiltish expressiveness. Nevertheless, we as a public can be very ridiculous, and in this matter of Symphony concerts we have shown how easy it is to kill the goose that lays the golden eggs. Money will always go to the front, but it is quite content with a back seat until fashion takes the reins, and then look out for the immodesty of riches! Our Symphony concerts are an excellent institution, and it is conceivable that Mr. Higginson is a benefactor; but neither art nor its child, music, has anything to do with the present congested condition at Music Hall. It is some half-dozen speculators, ever on the alert for fortune, who now represent Boston's music loving spirit. A few individual purchasers of the auctioned seats share with these agents the glory of having paid exorbitant prices for a series of concerts that are not worth them. This thought should soften the regrets of many former patrons. It acts like a charm upon mine, for I confess that last season's performances fell tame and dull on my ears. Sour grapes? No, merely the game wasn't worth the candle! The pleasure of sitting beside Mrs. D'Estaing Gay at $16 per time, or listening to the same old programmes at the rate of $3 or $4 a Saturday evening because it is the proper cover to be seen there, would naturally carry its own punishment of boredom, and, therefore, I for one, am resigned to the fashionable inevitable.

The struggle for social supremacy, the struggle to get into society, the heart burnings of those who are in and the envy of those who are not cause any number of curious spectacles to be witnessed. Several weeks ago when the Symphony seats were put on sale at auction and the one next to Mrs. John L. Gardner was sold for $392, it was the general belief that it was taken by some devout admirer. Much curiosity was manifested as to who would and could pay $392 for the privilege of sitting next to the Queen of Society, but I can now inform them that it was not devotion but revenge which prompted the act.

The purchaser of the seat is a woman well known in Boston for her wondrous beauty, her lavish display of dresses, and also for the fact that she is the wife of a prominent theatrical manager. Her appearance in her box on all first nights is a thing which is eagerly looked for, and which is always attended with a flutter of excitement throughout the house and a leveling of opera glasses from all sides. And the sight is worth the effort, for she usually—nay, always—displays some marvel of millinery dear to feminine eyes, and a toilet which is a delight to all. And as she sits back in her box, languidly waving her fan to and fro her regal looks impel one to the belief that she is the queen of the evening.

And so one might think that her desire to sit next to the Queen of Society was to put that lady's charms to the test of comparison with her own radiant ones, a test which the Society Queen could hardly stand, thus giving the Queen of Beauty an unequivocal victory. But, alas for speculation, such was not the ambition which prompted the desire to obtain that particular seat regardless of expense. It is a tale of revenge, and the venting of a pique. It appears that the Queen of Society took a fancy to a certain piece of dress goods which was exposed for sale, and the Queen of Beauty also took a fancy to it. There was enough for both but the Queen of Society had the first chance to take what she desired of it. Perhaps she would have been moderate in her purchase had she not learned that the Queen of Beauty also wanted a portion of it, but learning this she purchased the entire piece.

Thereat the Queen of Beauty's eyes flashed and she evidently vowed a mental vow that if the Queen of Society was not willing to share a piece of dress goods with her she should be compelled to share her enjoyment of the Symphonies. And so we see the result of her determination. Either Mrs. Gardner will be obliged to give up her favorite seats or else sit next to the woman who is her rival in the Queen business. Who but a woman would have thought of such a thing, and who but a woman with an immense determination would have carried it out? But the Queen of Beauty is as noted for her strength of purpose as she is for her jet black eyes or her finely chiseled features.

Home Journal — Oct 15, 1892

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1892-93.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

I. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 15, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

LUDWIG VAN BEETHOVEN. SYMPHONY in C minor, No. 5, op. 67.
Allegro con brio (C minor).
Andante con moto (A flat major).
{ Scherzo, Allegro (C minor).
{ Trio (C minor).
Finale, Allegro (C major).

RICHARD WAGNER. VORSPIEL AND "LIEBESTOD" Prelude and "Love-death") from "Tristan und Isolde."

RICHARD WAGNER. KAISER-MARSCH (B flat major).

There has been over much discussion anent the symphony tickets and the question of money versus art, but let disappointed people take comfort in the thought that it is the speculators who have shown this extraordinary greed for music. A little neglect on the part of the public would have brought the Symphony tickets to a righteous monetary standard. The public has only itself to thank for the present state of affairs. When Mr. Vanderbilt made that emphatic comment of his, he was not so far out of his depth, only the public, ever a sensitive bud, disliked hearing itself sworn at, and very naturally resented the Vanderbiltish expressiveness. Nevertheless, we as a public can be very ridiculous, and in this matter of Symphony concerts we have shown how easy it is to kill the goose that lays the golden eggs. Money will always go to the front, but it is quite content with a back seat until fashion takes the reins, and then look out for the immodesty of riches! Our Symphony concerts are an excellent institution, and it is conceivable that Mr. Higginson is a benefactor, but neither art nor its child, music, has anything to do with the present congested condition at Music Hall. It is some half-dozen speculators, ever on the alert for fortune, who now represent Boston's music loving spirit. A few individual purchasers of the auctioned seats share with these agents the glory of having paid exorbitant prices for a series of concerts that are not worth them. This thought should soften the regrets of many former patrons. It acts like a charm upon mine, for I confess that last season's performances fell tame and dull on my ears. Sour grapes? No, merely the game wasn't worth the candle! The pleasure of sitting beside Mrs. D'Estaing Gay at $16 per time, or listening to the same old programmes at the rate of $3 or $4 a Saturday evening because it is the proper caper to be seen there, would naturally carry its own punishment of boredom, and, therefore, I for one, am resigned to the fashionable inevitable.

The struggle for social supremacy, the struggle to get into society, the heart burnings of those who are in and the envy of those who are not cause any number of curious spectacles to be witnessed. Several weeks ago when the Symphony seats were put on sale at auction and the one next to Mrs. John L. Gardner was sold for $392, it was the general belief that it was taken by some devout admirer. Much curiosity was manifested as to who would and could pay $392 for the privilege of sitting next to the Queen of Society, but I can now inform them that it was not devotion but revenge which prompted the act.

The purchaser of the seat is a woman well known in Boston for her wondrous beauty, her lavish display of dresses, and also for the fact that she is the wife of a prominent theatrical manager. Her appearance in her box on all first nights is a thing which is eagerly looked for, and which is always attended with a flutter of excitement throughout the house and a leveling of opera glasses from all sides. And the sight is worth the effort, for she usually—nay, always—displays some marvel of millinery dear to feminine eyes, and a toilet which is a delight to all. And as she sits back in her box, languidly waving her fan to and fro her regal looks impel one to the belief that she is the queen of the evening.

And so one might think that her desire to sit next to the Queen of Society was to put that lady's charms to the test of comparison with her own radiant ones, a test which the Society Queen could hardly stand, thus giving the Queen of Beauty an unequivocal victory. But, alas for speculation, such was not the ambition which prompted the desire to obtain that particular seat regardless of expense. It is a tale of revenge, and the venting of a pique. It appears that the Queen of Society took a fancy to a certain piece of dress goods which was exposed for sale, and the Queen of Beauty also took a fancy to it. There was enough for both but the Queen of Society had the first chance to take what she desired of it. Perhaps she would have been moderate in her purchase had she not learned that the Queen of Beauty also wanted a portion of it, but learning this she purchased the entire piece.

Thereat the Queen of Beauty's eyes flashed and she evidently vowed a mental vow that if the Queen of Society was not willing to share a piece of dress goods with her she should be compelled to share her enjoyment of the Symphonies. And so we see the result of her determination. Either Mrs. Gardner will be obliged to give up her favorite seats or else sit next to the woman who is her rival in the Queen business. Who but a woman would have thought of such a thing, and who but a woman with an immense determination would have carried it out? But the Queen of Beauty is as noted for her strength of purpose as she is for her jet black eyes or her finely chiseled features.

Home Journal — Oct 15, 1892

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1892-93.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

I. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 15, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

LUDWIG VAN BEETHOVEN. SYMPHONY in C minor, No. 5, op. 67.
Allegro con brio (C minor).
Andante con moto (A flat major).
Scherzo, Allegro (C minor).
Trio (C minor).
Finale, Allegro (C major).

RICHARD WAGNER. VORSPIEL AND "LIEBESTOD" Prelude and "Love-death") from "Tristan und Isolde."

RICHARD WAGNER. KAISER-MARSCH (B flat major).

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

From:

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the first symphony concert of the present season, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening was as follows:

Beethoven: Symphony No. 5, in C minor, Opus 67.
Wagner: Vorspiel and "Liebestod" from "Tristan und Isolde."

Wagner: Kaiser-Marsch.

"Ta-ta-ta, Tah!" That was good, unspeakably good, to hear those four notes (whether "Fate knocking at the door," or some less exalted operation, matters little) ring out short, strong and crisp; and not long drawn out, like the pompous "Oyez! oyez!" of some portentous town-crier! What Hans von Bülow said of this wonderful opening of the Fifth Symphony, when asked his opinion as to how it should be played, is worth remembering: "Ab initio erat rhythmus!" (in the beginning was rhythm!), shrieked the little man, stamping his foot to the beat; "Snap out those notes sharp and strong, as they stand written; don't drag them out!" Thanks to Mr. Nikisch for once more restoring this passage to its original estate. And how splendidly the orchestra played the four notes, all together, with a will, like one man! It is a good thing to be put into the very best of humors at the outset of a concert; these four notes did it. It is no mean thing to be called to hear music, and even great music, once more, after a whole summer's rest (which begins by seeming like immunity, and then gradually turns to something more and more like starvation); but it is better still to be met on the threshold by a welcome surprise. And these four notes were something of a surprise, after all; for the last time Mr. Nikisch gave the Fifth Symphony here, he fell into the error, not uncommon nowadays, of trying to make Beethoven greater by making him bigger and more magniloquent. Let there be double rejoicing over the repentant sinner! The whole first movement was admirably played, with beautiful clearness, with vigor, go, and true Beethovenish fury. Mr. Sautet's playing of the oboe cadence was a gem of artistic phrasing and true depth of sentiment. The slow movement went to a charm. Here, too, it was to be noted that Mr. Nikisch had made up his mind to bury again that queer little bit of cantilena he once unearthed in the second violins, so that the unheard-of was once more unheard. Again bravo! The weird ghost-spookery of the Scherzo was done to perfection, and Berlioz's "frolicking elephant" sported through the Trio with a clearness of articulation such as no trained clog-dancer could have surpassed. When double-basses can play like that, they can match themselves against any body. The great Finale was one grand outburst of splendor, the horns especially covering themselves with glory in the second theme. If the season begins so, what may we not look for in the future? Such a performance of the C minor symphony is a thing to be marked with a white stone in the records of every concert-goer.

Whether any conductor or programme maker ever before dared to play anything after the Finale of the C minor symphony is a question which we are in no position to answer authoritatively; but surely no one ever tried a more daring experiment. Yet an intermission is a good time to cool down in and prepare one's self for further listening, even after that blaze of glory, especially on an opening night, when the question of who is sitting where can legitimately act as a sedative to over-excited nerves. To us, at least, the Wagner selections came as no anticlimax; the audience, too, seemed to enjoy them as if no Fifth Symphony had been. Such is the power of a young, fresh, unsurfeited musical digestion. But we doubt if the experiment would prove equally successful later on in the season.

The ever-beautiful prelude to "Tristan" was played with the most exquisite finish. How the 'celli breathed out that opening phrase, and what perfect balance there was between the various wind instruments! The great climax in the middle, too, was superbly worked up; and yet, admirable as the performance was in all technical points, and poignantly expressive as every phrase was made, we could not wholly and unreservedly like it. Here Mr. Nikisch gave the fullest rein to what has ever been his most questionable tendency, to our thinking—a tendency toward over-elaboration, resulting in this case in the most serious of all musical misfortunes, a lack of continuity of impression. Every single phrase in the prelude was given to perfection, with a finish of style, a beauty and depth of expressiveness that left nothing to be desired; thus to get every drop of blood out of a phrase is next to the sunlight of the performer's art—next to the summit, but not quite the summit. The one trouble was that, with and in spite of all this rare perfection, the whole prelude was, so to speak, constantly in large capitals, emphasis overshot its mark by sheer pertinacity. Those continual rhythmic modifications checked the free onward flow of the music, and made it seem always out of breath. Note, for one thing, that in music nothing is so monotonous as a persistent irregularity; always to hold back the rhythm at just the same point in the phrase is to produce a more wearying monotony of rhythmical impression than even the metronomic regularity of a Kéler-Béla galop. Mr. Nikisch's reading of the syncopated descending violin passage, after the great fortissimo outburst, is new to us, and certainly has a good deal to say for itself. He gives it great prominence, as a sort of dramatic declamatory recitative, and the first violins played it as such with poignant power of effect. As we have said, much may be urged in favor of this. Still we must own to preferring the old reading in which the syncopations in the violins served only to break up all sense of rhythm, and the long-drawn climax ended in a measure or two of sheer mad raving, in a giving up all attempt to express the inexpressible, followed immediately by complete exhaustion and a state of quasi-coma. The wonderful "Liebestod" was, however, grandly played, and carried everything before it. Here were both expressiveness and artistic measure; to be expressive is not all, but to be coherently expressive.

To the playing of the "Kaiser-Marsch" we have the same objection to make as to that of the "Tristan" prelude: it seemed all too mannered, tortured out of shape, and lacking in frank, direct vigor. No doubt in a work of this magnitude, the term "March" in the title may safely be taken with a grain of salt; it is a march in the ideal, rather than in the prosaic real sense—as much of a march as a Chopin waltz is a waltz. Still one instinctively attributes something of rhythmic simplicity (not to speak of simplicity of other sorts) to even the most idealized march form, together with something more nervously inspiring than an absolutely funereal slowness of gait. Probably Mr. Nikisch finds the "Kaiser-Marsch" planned on the largest scale, and deems no inflation of style too grandiose for it. But there should be measure in all things; admitting that the "Kaiser-Marsch" is somewhat bigger than the Berlin Kurfürsten-Brücke, and might well span the Rhine itself, there is no need of so stretching it out that it can reach "from the Aurora Borealis to the Precession of the Equinoxes"! To our mind, this process of Procrustes-stretching results only in making it crack and totter. But it was superbly played, for all that.

The new seating of the orchestra, with all the heavy brass in the middle at the back, and the double basses divided equally, four on a side, seems at once to be an admirable improvement. The wind players say they can now hear each other better than before, and they certainly seem to play more exactly together than they did last year. The blending of the general mass of the wind tone is also better. Strange to say, too, the double-basses, although their two wings are separated by the trumpets, trombones and tuba, make decidedly more effect than formerly, and play wonderfully well together.

Mr. Nikisch was very warmly received, both as he first stepped up to the conductor's desk and at the close of the concert.

The next programme is: Reinecke: overture to "König Manfred;" Saint-Saëns: pianoforte concerto No. 4, in C minor, op. 93; Tchaikowsky: symphony No. 5, in E minor, op. 64. Mr. Carl Stansy will be the pianist.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Brilliant Inauguration of the Twelfth Season of Boston's Magnificent Orchestra at Music Hall Last Evening.

The "Open Sesame" of the musical season has been pronounced and the winter's flood of melody has begun, for the first rehearsal and concert in the 12th season of the Boston symphony orchestra are now but pleasant remembrances, and musical Boston for the coming six months will be "at home" on Friday afternoons and Saturday evenings at Music Hall only.

The hall was crowded, of course, about every seat was occupied, and standees fringed the walls in uncomfortable abundance.

One great improvement was noticeable, and that was the new terraced manner of seating the players, every member of the orchestra now being in plain view of the conductor, which also enables the men to see the leader without difficulty.

The popular director, Mr. Nikisch, was greeted with prolonged plaudits as he took his position at his desk, and after receiving his acknowledgments, the audience settled back in their seats to listen to a fine classical programme, interpreted by one of the best if not the best orchestra in the world.

The programme consisted of Beethoven's familiar fifth symphony, the prelude and "Lovedeath" from Tristan, and Wagner's "Kaiser March."

The fifth is undoubtedly the best known of all Beethoven symphonies, and surely it is the most popular.

Berlioz, the celebrated French composer, says it was Beethoven's own life which he illustrated in it.

His secret sorrows, his concentrated wrath, his dreams of sad dejection, his nocturnal visions, his outbursts of enthusiasm, supplied him with its subject; and the forms of the melody, harmony, rhythm and instrumentation, show themselves to be as essentially individual and new as they are endowed with power and nobility.

The allegro, in which is pictured the disordered emotions of a great soul, is considered one of the grandest pieces of passionate compositions ever given to the world, and grandly was it played by Mr. Nikisch's men.

The alternate phrases of violence or weakness by the full orchestra or strings were beautiful tone pictures of conflicting emotions, and the lights and shades of the composition were finely illustrated by the players.

The second movement is full of melancholy sombreness and sad simplicity, and the scherzo partakes of this gravity, relieved by the peculiar sinister introductions which are almost fantastic.

The difficult passages for the basses in the scherzo were excellently played, and the finale was as effectively performed as the most captious critic could desire.

The prelude and "Lovedeath" from Wagner present great technical difficulties, but they were hardly discernible last evening, the work of the orchestra being so uniformly excellent in this almost perfect composition.

The intermittent wailing of the strings and the mournful, mysterious rhythm of the brasses were fine bits of instrumentation, and the whole composition was marked with exquisite interpretation of varied motifs.

The "Emperor's March," with its joyous pomp of victory and discordant notes of battle, was brilliantly performed and made an effective finale to an enjoyable concert.

The programme for the second rehearsal and concert, Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, will be the overture from "King Manfred," Reinecke; concerto for pianoforte No. 4 in C minor, Saint Saëns, and symphony No. 5 in E minor, Tchaikowsky. The overture and symphony will be given for the first time in this city. Mr. Carl Stansy will be the soloist.

The "Billy" Apthorps have tightened another peg that holds them close to the social and otherwise inner life of the Hub, for Mr. Apthorp has become the editor of the much-heralded Symphony concert programmes, and Mrs. Apthorp's picture is, I see, on view—not like Katisha's in the "Mikado," upon presentation of a visiting card, but in the Mechanic's fair, where all who pass may stare. It is a rather decorative picture, "taken"—for it is a large photograph—if I mistake not, in the semi-Turkish, semi-Japanese gown which she wore to the memorable folk-lore tea party.

BUD BRIER.

—What a jam there was at the first Symphony rehearsal, Friday! and nearly every girl had a bunch of Galvin's violets. Galvin's is the only place in town to get the Victoria Regina.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Symphony Concert.

Although there were no novelties on the programme of Saturday's concert, the fifth symphony by Beethoven was the worthiest possible manner of launching the new season, and the Wagner selections which followed were admirable foils to its shapely movements. At the very first, one was impressed with a fuller quality of tone than heretofore, and this must undoubtedly be ascribed to the new mode of grouping the orchestra. By the new method the wood wind instruments have more clearness, yet the strings lose nothing of their power and unity. The Achilles' heel of the arrangement lies in the separation of the contra-basses into two groups; one would imagine that in such passages as, for example, the finale of the fourth symphony, there would be a deterioration of ensemble. The choice of the fifth symphony for the opening piece seemed like a gauntlet thrown down to criticism in this matter, for this work gives unusual prominence to the contra-basses. It is but justice, therefore, to state at the outset that the figure in the trio of the Scherzo (almost the acme of contrabass virtuosity in orchestral work) has never been played so clearly as last Saturday, and this would seem to dispose of the one objection to the new grouping.

The reading of the work throughout was a conservative one, free from exaggeration, and in this respect much in advance of past distortions, and the execution too, was excellent for a first-concert performance. Yet the first movement left many things to be desired. The difficult attacks of the chief figure were at times good but also at times very ragged; the sequence figures of the contrabasses, interrupting the second theme in so marvellous a manner, could have been made more forcible, and the horn playing both in the entrance of the second theme and in the inversion of the chief figure, seemed timid, and the tones broke more than once. The coda was roughly played and the contrasts not well brought out. But the second movement was charmingly rendered, and the cellos and violas did their important work finely, although the contra-basses seemed light in their variation of the theme; it is a question whether the orchestra would not gain by the addition of two more contra-basses, for at times there is a little topheaviness in the ensemble—too much power in the upper voices and too little to balance against it in the lower.

The Scherzo was magnificently played and the crescendo which led from it into the finale was a fine specimen of orchestral dynamics. The kettle-drummer deserves praise for the gradation of his important work here, and the balance throughout the orchestra was praiseworthy. Of the superb work of the contrabasses I have already spoken. Beethoven was the first composer to fully develop the contrabass part in orchestral work, and this passage in the Scherzo has not been sufficiently dwelt upon by commentators as an instance of the composer's fidelity to an ideal. The terrific contrabass passages of the finale of the fourth symphony had aroused the keen sarcasm of Weber. In the quarrel between Weber and Beethoven, the former fought with a rapier, the latter with a bludgeon. Weber had written a trenchant satire of the whole proceedings of the fourth symphony in the "Cecilia" and made especially merry over the use of the contra-basses. He portrayed the instruments holding an indignation meeting, and the contra-basses bemoaning the way in which they were made to caper and jump about as if they were giddy young violins, until finally, when the instruments grew boisterous in complaint, the janitor entered the hall and threatened that, unless they ceased their uproar, he would get Mr. Beethoven to write another symphony—"and they all ceased in terror." Beethoven only answered with oaths, but when the next symphony came (this fifth symphony) he continued calmly on his course, and finally, in the ninth symphony, gave the instruments an earnest theme and a set of recitative phrases such as the world had never dreamed of.

The finale was given with a good, heroic style that was invigorating, and it fully deserved the great applause which greeted it. It is in just such massive semi-military effects that our conductor shines at his best, and the broad crescendos and the sharp contrasts were all well done.

Almost unlimited praise can be given to the "Liebestod" from "Tristan and Isolde." Occasionally a sub-theme was drowned in the rush of the harmonies, but there was so much of loftiness, such power and ecstasy in the conception that one could readily excuse this. The unity of the orchestra was remarkable throughout.

Now came Wagner's "Kaiser-Marsch" with a force sufficient for the resurrection-morning. I do not think that the world would suffer greatly if all of Wagner's marches (always excepting the noble ones in his operas) were lost. They give the public a false impression of his school. Wagner was not filled with a wild desire to make all the noise possible; when he began his wonderful performances at Bayreuth he could have had an orchestra of 1000 men of the best material in Europe, yet he chose but 116. But when he wrote marches he seems to have fallen into the Berlioz vein of inflated force and blatancy. Yet this Emperor March is the best of his marches. Divest it of its extreme loudness (and this lost nothing in the handling) and one finds a martial rhythm and a very appropriate theme. When Wagner wrote his poorest work, the "American Centennial March," he knew not a single American theme and the figures and theme in it have no real meaning; but when he wrote this march of the German empire he was well equipped with material, and it shows the taste and artistic force of the man that he discarded the rather bombastic themes of the German national songs of today and chose "Ein Feste Burg" as his proper core. Luther's great hymn (the tune is probably by Franc however) is the fittest representation of united Protestant Germany today. In the stirring times of the reformation it was the war cry of the protestants. The soldier sang it as he marched to battle; the martyr intoned it as he walked to the stake. Wagner's disesteemed contemporaries, Mendelssohn and Meyerbeer had already used it in the "Reformation symphony" and in "The Huguenots," but it remained for him to show that it belonged to modern Germany as well as to bygone times. But, spite of this tribute to the fitness of things, one wears with the incessant fortissimo effects and longs for a less forcible expression of musical ideas. The complexity too, is not always pleasing; in short the "Liebestod" was to this as Hyperion to a satyr. Such music is too exciting and one begins to ask whether it is healthy. Of old, music was a sedative; let us beware of making it a morbid or abnormal excitement. After hearing such a noisy and furious instrumentation, after being conducted from forte to fortissimo, and from fortissimo to fortississimo, one feels like asking with Emerson—"Why so hot, my little man?"

LOUIS C. ELSON.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Twelfth Season's Symphony Concerts Begun.

The Diaby Bell "Jupiter" Production at the Globe—"Fadette" by the Mapleson Company at the Tremont—Boston Triumphs of Cyril Tyler—Note and Gossip.

The concerts of the 12th season of the Boston Symphony orchestra were begun, under the direction of Mr. Arthur Nikisch, last evening, with the most favorable auspices, the usual record of recent years, every seat sold for the entire season, having been made.

The long continuance of this great musical enterprise, and the rapidity with which generations of concert, as well as amusement, patrons pass away, makes it desirable to call attention, at the opening of each season of the Symphony concerts, to the condition under which Boston has been able to enjoy the performances of a permanent orchestra made up of the best musicians, directed by an able conductor and thoroughly competent to perform the most varied and difficult repertoire of instrumental compositions.

The Boston orchestra is essentially a one-man institution, Mr. Henry L. Higginson having, without financial aid of any sort, founded, established and maintained the organization upon his own ideas of what is best and most valuable to the cause of music in this city. The public-spirited action of Mr. Higginson in regard to this enterprise is often ignored by those who are unfamiliar with the earlier years of the orchestra's existence, and the utter lack of ostentation in the conduct of its affairs is not calculated to give the prominence deserved to the citizen who has so nobly estimated his duty to his fellows.

The programme chosen by Conductor Nikisch for the opening concert of this season consisted of the symphony in C minor, No. 5, op. 67, Beethoven; Vorspiel and "Liebestod" (prelude and "Love-death"), from "Tristan and Isolde," Wagner, and the Kaiser-Marsch, Wagner.

The conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra has all the advantages possible in the engagement and control of his men, and so no allowances are called for, under ordinary circumstances, the standard of perfection under human condition being justifiable in estimating the merits of its performances. Director Nikisch has had his men in harness, so to speak, for two weeks, and in last evening's work the orchestra was as complete in its subjection to the director's will as it was in the final concert of last season.

It can be said at once that the performance of last evening showed distinctly the results of the control enjoyed over the organization by its faithful conductor, and the audience were treated to readings of the works given which must have filled the measure of anticipation of the most captious critic.

It will be remembered that a great many exceptions were taken to the reading given by Mr. Nikisch of the great fifth symphony in his first season here. Possibly allowances should then have been more generally made for the innovations introduced by the new director, and possibly a greater familiarity with the ideas of Mr. Nikisch and his treatment of the great composers have led to a more correct estimate of his work. Certain it is that, aside from the opening movement, which by contrast with the ideal interpretation of the elder Dambrosch seemed somewhat lacking in refinement, the fifth symphony was given with well nigh faultless grace, force and dignity. The beauty of the andante was all apparent in the delightful performance given it, and the brilliant finale was played with grand effect throughout.

The excellence of the performance of the "Tristan" excerpts charmed all, and these numbers have rarely been heard under such complete conditions as upon this occasion.

"The Kaiser-Marsch" made a spirited ending of the programme, and left the audience enraptured with the pleasures of the opening concert of the season.

The personal and artistic popularity enjoyed by Mr. Nikisch here in Boston was again very clearly shown by the ovation which attended his entrance and the hearty applause which followed the conclusion of the several portions of the programme.

The new platform planned by Mr. Nikisch is the greatest improvement yet made in the hall, and the correctness estimate of its effect made by the conductor has been fully demonstrated. All of the string players are now raised above the stage upon lightly built platforms, which add much to the effect of these sections of the band, and the massing of the wind players at the back in the rear of the strings solidifies and improves the tone of the organization as a whole. Next week's programme includes Reinecke's overture, "King Manfred" (first time in Boston); Saint-Saens' concerto for pianoforte, No. 4, in C minor; Tschalkowsky's symphony No. 5, in E minor (first time in Boston). Mr. Carl Stasny is to be the soloist.

Mr. Louis Svecenski, who as occupied with Mr. Adamowski the second desk of the first violins of the Boston Symphony orchestra for the past seven years will assume the position of first viola during the coming season.

The brothers Adamowski, looking splendidly browned after their voyage over the sea, had quite a reception in the foyer of the Music Hall after the rehearsal, Friday afternoon.

The Symphony Concert.

The twelfth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra opened at Music Hall, last evening, in the presence of a large audience. The personnel of the orchestra remains substantially the same as it was last season. There are some changes in the arrangement of the players, the most notable being the division of the string bases into two bodies, one being placed at the upper right and the other at the upper left-hand corner of the orchestra. There was a decided gain in the body tone under the new distribution. Mr. Nikisch was accorded a genial recognition when he first appeared. The programme was devoted to Beethoven and Wagner. Illustrating musical art in its strongest development and in its degeneration. The selections were: Symphony, C minor, Beethoven; Prelude and "Love-death," from "Tristan and Isolde," Wagner; and "Kaiser-Marsch," Wagner. The symphony was read in a more conservative and a more satisfying manner than it has been of late; at these concerts, and though its performance was a little ragged now and then, and there was occasionally, something of uncertainty in attack, it may be justly urged in excuse, that it was the first concert by the orchestra after a vacation of some six months, during which its members have not played together. The Wagner selections were given their fullest effect, though it must be confessed that they are beginning to sound like musical platitudes, and, strangely enough, to seem more stale than does the symphony, which is some eighty and odd years older. The audience was generous in its applause. The programme for the next concert is: Overture, "King Manfred," Reinecke (first time here); Concerto for pianoforte, No. 4, in C minor, Saint-Saens; Symphony No. 5, in B minor; Tschalkowsky (first time in Boston). The soloist is to be Mr. Carl Stasny.

The first Symphony rehearsal of the season filled Music Hall to overflowing with the representatives of all the different social circles who there find food for eyes or ears, or both. The woman was there who says she goes because it is the one time and place in the week where, during the "season," she gets "time to sit quiet and think"; so was the music lover, poring over his Beethoven score; so were a very great many more people, including more young people than ever before; a proportionate sprinkling of very fashionable people; a much larger contingent of people who like, above every thing else on earth, to be where the fashionable people congregate, to sit in the seats of the wealthy, and to feel themselves (if the elect); and in between, and above and all about, were the runners who go because they like the tunes, when there are any, and the general atmosphere sacred to the haunts of the musical muse, as she abides in Boston. The Symphony players were in all shades of bronze along with their afternoon dress, Mr. Loeffler, looking vastly better than for a long time; Mr. Adamowski, the pink of perfection in dress, and more distinguished than ever; while Mr. Roth was every whit as boyish-looking as when he first made his advent among the "strings." Mr. Nikisch's appearance was the signal for a politely cordial welcome, as effective as well gloved hands could make it in point of noise; and then, everybody fell to talking about the white fur rug which is a departure in the way of a drape for the Herr Conductor's stand, until the uplift and down beat of the commanding baton put a period to chatter. It was very like a reception between movements, what with the talk that went on on all sides; and the big hall looked very festive and actually picturesque, with the gay garb, of the audience, largely feminine, and including more pretty women than ever, and a good many who make admirable follies for beauty. Dr. Oliver Wendell Holmes was not present; Mrs. John L. Gardner was not there, being still on the other side; and thus the two most prominent figures of the Rehearsals were missing. Among the well known people who were in evidence were Mrs. Montgomery Sears, Dr. Cabot, Miss Rice, Mr. and Mrs. H. L. Higginson, Miss Sturgis, Mrs. N. U. Walker, Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, Mrs. John Reece, of Longwood, Mrs. Thomas Mack, Mrs. Barthold Schlesinger and daughters, Mr. and Mrs. Dana Estes, Mrs. William H. Prior, Miss Ada Langley Briggs, Mrs. Lowell, of Newton, Mr. Ernest Perabo, Mrs. H. W. Dodd, Miss Harriet A. Shaw, Mrs. Will H. Cook, Miss Lyman, Mr. and Mrs. Charles P. Curtis.

MUSICAL MENTION.

The Symphony Orchestra Begins Its Season.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra began its twelfth season on Saturday evening at the Music Hall with a performance of the following programme: Beethoven's Fifth Symphony; Prelude and "Love-Death" from Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde," and the Kaiser March of the same composer. The orchestra, materially the same as last season, but somewhat differently and much better placed upon the stage, played in the conventional manner of the past three seasons, although at times with less roughness in the strings. The wood wind, however, still preserves the coarseness concerning which so much has been written in these columns, while the brass was as boisterous and violently overblown, as it has been ever since the present incumbent has had the direction of the orchestra.

In the Beethoven symphony, which was read without exaggeration and in most reasonable tempo, the strings played with much delicacy and a fine discrimination of the composer's indications, but the tranquillity, repose and refinement suggested by the efforts of the strings was immediately destroyed when the wind instruments came in. There was a lack of precision at times in the efforts of the players, and the wood wind was out of tune oftener than it should be with such skilful players as compose the members of this department. Strange to say, the first oboe offended in this respect. The compositions given being familiar ones call for no critical review. A praiseworthy feature of this opening concert was the short duration of the programme—a feature it is to be hoped which will prevail for the rest of the season. Last season it was the rule rather than the exception that the programmes were over-long and tedious. Next Saturday evening the orchestra will play "King Manfred" overture by Reinecke; concerto for piano in C minor, No. 4, by Saint-Saens, Mr. Carl Stasny, soloist; and Tschalkowsky's Fifth Symphony in B minor, given for the first time in Boston. An interesting programme.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

for him to show that it belonged to modern Germany as well as to bygone times. But, spite of this tribute to the fitness of things, one wearies with the incessant fortissimo effects and longs for a less forcible expression of musical ideas. The complexity too, is not always pleasing; in short the "Liebestod" was to this as Hyperion to a satyr. Such music is too exciting and one begins to ask whether it is healthy. Of old, music was a sedative; let us beware of making it a morbid or abnormal excitant. After hearing such a noisy and furious instrumentation, after being conducted from forte to fortissimo, and from fortissimo to fortississimo, one feels like asking with Emerson—"Why so hot, my little man?"

LOUIS C. ELSON.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Twelfth Season's Symphony Concerts Begun.

The Digby Bell "Jupiter" Production at the Globe—"Fadette" by the Mapleson Company at the Tremont—Boston Triumphs of Cyril Tyler—Note and Gossip.

The concerts of the 12th season of the Boston Symphony orchestra were begun, under the direction of Mr. Arthur Nikisch, last evening, with the most favorable auspices, the usual record of recent years, every seat sold for the entire season, having been made.

The long continuance of this great musical enterprise, and the rapidity with which generations of concert, as well as amusement, patrons pass away, makes it desirable to call attention, at the opening of each season of the Symphony concerts, to the condition under which Boston has been able to enjoy the performances of a permanent orchestra made up of the best musicians, directed by an able conductor and thoroughly competent to perform the most varied and difficult repertoire of instrumental compositions.

The Boston orchestra is essentially a one-man institution, Mr. Henry L. Higginson having, without financial aid of any sort, founded, established and maintained the organization upon his own ideas of what is best and most valuable to the cause of music in this city. The public-spirited action of Mr. Higginson in regard to this enterprise is often ignored by those who are unfamiliar with the earlier years of the orchestra's existence, and the utter lack of ostentation in the conduct of its affairs is not calculated to give the prominence deserved to the citizen who has so nobly estimated his duty to his fellows.

The programme chosen by Conductor Nikisch for the opening concert of this season consisted of the symphony in C minor, No. 5, op. 67, Beethoven; Vorspiel and "Liebestod" (prelude and "Love-death"), from "Tristan and Isolde," Wagner, and the Kaiser-Marsch, Wagner.

The conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra has all the advantages possible in the engagement and control of his men, and so no allowances are called for, under ordinary circumstances, the standard of perfection under human condition being justifiable in estimating the merits of its performances. Director Nikisch has had his men in harness, so to speak, for two weeks, and in last evening's work the orchestra was as complete in its subjection to the director's will as it was in the final concert of last season.

It can be said at once that the performance of last evening showed distinctly the results of the control enjoyed over the organization by its faithful conductor, and the audience were treated to readings of the works given which must have filled the measure of anticipation of the most captious critic.

It will be remembered that a great many exceptions were taken to the reading given by Mr. Nikisch of the great fifth symphony in his first season here. Possibly allowances should then have been more generally made for the innovations introduced by the new director, and possibly a greater familiarity with the ideas of Mr. Nikisch and his treatment of the great composers have led to a more correct estimate of his work. Certain it is that, aside from the opening movement, which by contrast with the ideal interpretation of the elder Damrosch seemed somewhat lacking in refinement, the fifth symphony was given with well nigh faultless grace, force and dignity.

The beauty of the andante was all apparent in the delightful performance given it, and the brilliant finale was played with grand effect throughout.

The excellence of the performance of the "Tristan" excerpts charmed all, and these numbers have rarely been heard under such complete conditions as upon this occasion.

"The Kaiser-Marsch" made a spirited ending of the programme, and left the audience enraptured with the pleasures of the opening concert of the season.

The personal and artistic popularity enjoyed by Mr. Nikisch here in Boston was again very clearly shown by the ovation which attended his entrance and the hearty applause which followed the conclusion of the several portions of the programme.

The new platform planned by Mr. Nikisch is the greatest improvement yet made in the hall, and the correctness of estimate of its effect made by the conductor has been fully demonstrated. All of the string players are now raised above the stage upon lightly built platforms, which add much to the effect of these sections of the band, and the massing of the wind players at the back in the rear of the strings solidifies and improves the tone of the organization as a whole. Next week's programme includes Reinecke's overture, "King Manfred" (first time in Boston); Saint-Saens' concerto for pianoforte, No. 4, in C minor; Tschalkowsky's symphony No. 5, in E minor (first time in Boston). Mr. Carl Stasny is to be the soloist.

Mr. Louis Svecenski, who, as occupied with Mr. Adamowski the second desk of the first violins of the Boston Symphony orchestra for the past seven years will assume the position of first viola during the coming season.

The brothers Adamowski, looking splendidly browned after their voyage over the sea, had quite a reception in the foyer of the Music Hall after the rehearsal, Friday afternoon.

The Symphony Concert.

The twelfth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra opened at Music Hall, last evening, in the presence of a large audience. The personnel of the orchestra remains substantially the same as it was last season. There are some changes in the arrangement of the players, the most notable being the division of the string basses into two bodies, one being placed at the upper right and the other at the upper left-hand corner of the orchestra. There was a decided gain in the body tone under the new distribution. Mr. Nikisch was accorded a genial recognition when he first appeared. The programme was devoted to Beethoven and Wagner. Illustrating musical art in its strongest development and in its degeneration. The selections were: Symphony, C minor, Beethoven; Prelude and "Love-death," from "Tristan and Isolde," Wagner; and "Kaiser-Marsch," Wagner. The symphony was read in a more conservative and a more satisfying manner than it has been of late; at these concerts, and though its performance was a little ragged now and then, and there was occasionally, something of uncertainty in attack, it may be justly urged in excuse, that it was the first concert by the orchestra after a vacation of some six months, during which its members have not played together. The Wagner selections were given their fullest effect, though it must be confessed that they are beginning to sound like musical platitudes, and, strangely enough, to seem more stale than does the symphony, which is some eighty and odd years older. The audience was generous in its applause. The programme for the next concert is: Overture, "King Manfred," Reinecke (first time here); Concerto for pianoforte, No. 4, in C minor, Saint-Saens; Symphony No. 5, in B minor; Tschalkowsky (first time in Boston). The soloist is to be Mr. Carl Stasny.

The first Symphony rehearsal of the season filled Music Hall to overflowing with the representatives of all the different social circles who there find food for eyes or ears, or both. The woman was there who says she goes because it is the one time and place in the week where, during the "season," she gets "time to sit quiet and think"; so was the music lover, poring over his Beethoven score; so were a very great many more people, including more young people than ever before; a proportionate sprinkling of very fashionable people; a much larger contingent of people who like, above every thing else on earth, to be where the fashionable people themselves are; and in between, and above and all about, were the numbers who go because they like the tunes, when there are any, and the general atmosphere sacred to the haunts of the musical muse, as she abides in Boston. The Symphony players were in all shades of bronze along with their afternoon dress, Mr. Lotzler, looking vastly better than for a long time; more distinguished than ever; while Mr. Roth was every whit as boyish-looking as when he first made his advent among the "strings." Mr. Nikisch's appearance was the signal for a politely cordial welcome, as effective as well gloved hands could make it in point of noise; and then, everybody fell to talking about the white fur rug which is a departure in the way of a drape for the Herr Conductor's stand, until the uplift and down beat of the commanding baton put a period to chatter. It was very like a reception between movements, what with the talk that went on on all sides; and the big hall looked very festive and actually picturesque, with the gay garb, of the audience, largely feminine, and including more pretty women than ever, and a good many who make admirable follis for beauty. Dr. Oliver Wendell Holmes was not present; Mrs. John L. Gardner was not there, being still on the other side; and thus the two most prominent figures of the Rehear-

